the glorious views of Swami Vivekananda whose holy birth-centenary we are celebrating joyfully, gratefully in India and abroad. As one of the greatest exponents of this sublime Mother-Doctrine of India, he has brought out its real implications, for the benefit of all, in a manner at once unique and inspiring, logical and lofty, scientific and sweet.

For example, take one of his magnificent descriptions of the Divine Mother thus :—

"The sea calm is the Absolute; the same sea in waves is Divine Mother". (VII, 25).

Of course, the example of the sea and the waves is a common one in the Vedanta Philosophy, used by almost all its Schools. By means of this ordinary well-known, easily intelligible example, the Vedantists try to make clear to all the most difficult problem of Philosophy, viz. that of Creation.

Creation, indeed, is an eternal, insoluble, intriguing enigma, yet an entirely unavoidable one. For, who can ever escape this difficulty, the questioner himself being a created one, at least an apparently created one? In fact, we all feel that we have been created — if that be a fact, let us explain it; if not, then, too, or rather, then more, let us explain it away. But what explanation is possible here, at all, from any point of view whatsoever?

The crux of the question, the core of the inherent difficulty is this:

Brahman or Isvara, the Absolute or God, call Him by any name, is, according to all Indian accounts, "Nirvikara" or Changeless; this being taken to be one of His most fundamental characteristics. Why? Because, according to all accounts, the Absolute or God is "Nitya-Suddha" or ever-perfect. For, who can ever conceive of an imperfect God? Imperfect are we all, imperfect is the Universe. So, why should we need one more imperfect being to be added unnecessarily to this whole existing lot of imperfect beings and things? Hence, the very first condition of Godhead is its eternal, essential, ever-full perfection.

Now, such an All-Perfect Being cannot, evidently, be subject to changes. For, all changes must be either changes for the better, or changes for the worse. Thus, first, an All-Perfect Being, like God, cannot evidently change for the better; for, is He not fully perfect from all eternity? So, how can He, again, become still better, still higher, still purer, still more perfect? Then, secondly an All-Perfect Being, like God, cannot, still more evidently, change for the worse, for, is He not eternally perfect to all eternity? Thus no changes are at all possible on the part of an All-perfect Being, like God.

But a question remains as to whether any change from an already existing perfect state to another equally perfect state is at all possible or not. For example, cannot a blooming flower have a change of hues; or a humming bird of tunes; or a flowing stream, of courses? Certainly, these can: But every change, undoubtedly, if it be a real change, must involve a change of the present state of the object or the person; and, so, we inevitably, come back to the very same conclusion that every change is necessarily either a change for the better, or a change for the worse, so that by it the flower become brighter or duller, the bird, more sweet-sounding or less; the stream, more rushing or less. Thus an All-Perfect Being can have no changes at all. That is why, according to our Indian view, a "Nitya-purna", or an eternally perfect Being is also, at the same time, a Nitya-nirvikara or an eternally unchangeable One.

So, what happens to creation? Are we not created at all? Is the world not created at all? How very strange, how very absurd; how very impossible! For, what are we then? What is the world?

STRANGER THAN FICTION

But truth is stranger than fiction, at least, according to wise philosophers! So, let us face Truth bravely, even if it means our own annihilation, the annihilation of all we know and feel and value, the annihilation of this vast and variegated, loved and longed for, apparently ever-lasting and ever-active Universe of ours.

But what is the Truth here? The Truth, indeed is one; yet what prevents it from being differently interpreted? Accordingly, we have two main views here, of two main Schools of the Vedanta: Monistic (of Samkara and others), and Monotheistic (of Ramanuja and others). The common example of the sea and the waves is used by both; but naturally, in altogether different ways.

Now, what is the sea, what the waves? As stated, here the very same example of the sea and the waves has been cited by both the monistic and monotheistic Vedanta for proving their cases.

The crux of the whole matter is this:
Are the sea and the waves wholly identical, or wholly different or partly identical and partly different?

According to the strictly monistic views of Samkara and others, the sea and the waves are wholly identical. For, both are water in essence and though their forms are different, yet such a difference in forms does not count here at all, as, after all, it is the essence alone that counts. For example Devadatta, with stretched out hands and legs, and again with contracted hand and legs, is the same—because of these different forms, he himself does not become different.

According to the strictly dualistic views of Madhva and others, the sea and the waves are wholly different. For, the sea is one thing, the wave quite another; and no one would mistake a sea for a wave, or vice versa.

According to the intermediate dualistic-non-dualistic views of Ramanuja and others, the sea and the wave are neither wholly identical, nor wholly different, but something in-between; that is, partly identical and partly different, identical in essense, and different in forms. For, both are water in essence, yet possess different forms, which, also cannot be ignored.

The strictly dualistic view cannot, evidently, be accepted. For, this, really, involves the fundamental philosophical question of the relation between the cause and the effect; and, the cause and the effect cannot, evidently, be entirely different, as it is the cause itself that is transformed into the form of the effect. Can a clay-jar e.g. be entirely different from a lump of clay? Absurd and impossible!

So, we have to choose between the first and the last views. The first is the celebrated Doctrine of

"Vivarta" or "Vivartavada"; the second, the equally celebrated Doctrine of "Parinama", or "Parinama-Vada". According to the first view, there is no such thing as an effect, the so called effect being "Maya-Mithya", an illusion and a delusion. According to the second, the effect is real, very real, being, as already, pointed out, an actual transformation, or form of the cause itself. But mysteriously enough, the cause is not changed, although it is transformed.

Now, what is Swami Vivekananda's view here? Is he a "Vivartavadi", or a "Parinama-Vadi?"

He is really neither; for, as usual, he is unique and incomparable in this respect, no less. Thus, he is not a Parinama-Vadi, as he does not believe in creation at all. Compare:—

"There is neither existence, nor non-existence. Shake off all ideas of relativity; shake off all superstitions; yet caste and birth and Devas and all else vanish. Why talk of being and becoming? Give up talking of Dualism and Advaitism. When were you two that you talk of two or one? The Universe is this Holy One, and He alone. Talk not of Yoga to make you pure: You are pure by your very nature. None can teach you" (VIII 71).

"No one was ever bound, none was ever free. There is none but me. I am the Infinite, the ever-free. Talk not to me! Who can change me, the essence of knowledge. 'Who can teach, who can be taught.' " (VII 7).

Again, although in a few passages, he seems to propound "Vivartavada", ultimately, he is not a Vivarta-Vadin in the strict "Advaita" sense. For, according to him, the Universe of souls and matter is not ultimately "Maya-Mithya", not false, but Brahman or the Absolute Itself. So, do not deny the world, but deify it; do not reject it, but realise its real nature; do not look down upon it, but look upon it as God Himself.

"Deify it, it is God alone . . . . . The whole world is full of the Lord. Open your eyes and see Him. This is what the Vedanta teaches" (II. 146).

Thus, Swamiji is a strict "Advaitin," but not a Vivartavadin or Maya-Mithya-Vadin in the ordinary senses of the terms. In fact, Advaita-Vada may be arrived at by two ways — positive, and negative. Thus, we may arrive at the solitary existence or strict Oneness of Brahman positively, by taking the Universe of souls and matter to be Brahman, and nothing but Brahman; or negatively by taking the Universe of souls and matter to be Mithya or false, a mere appearance, with no reality behind. But the traditional Advaita-Vadins all adopt the negative method, laying the whole stress on the falsity of the Jiva-Jagat, rather on their divinity

But not so Swamiji, as we have seen above. And, here lies his wonderful uniqueness as an Advaita-Vadin.

And, herein lies, also, his wonderful uniqueness as a "Matri-Sevaka" or Mother-Worshipper. For, to a traditional Advaitin, there is no question of any "Mother", his only concern being "Brahman a neutral "It", with whom no personal relation of love and reverence is at all possible. But Swamiji's Brahman is Mother Herself, the Sakti. The sea calm is the same as the sea in waves, for whether it is calm, or disturbed, it is, after all, the very same sea.

Such are Brahman and Mother,—only in the worldly example of the sea and its waves, there is a real change from one state to the other; here there is not, for, as pointed out above, Brahman is Nirvikara or changeless.

SWEET PARADOX

But, then, why call them two? And, is, also, the Mother a mere false appearance of Brahman? No, definitely not, and herein lies, as pointed out above, the wonderful uniqueness of Swamiji's Doctrine of Mother. For, according to him, Brahman and Mother are one, yet there is no falsity, at all, in conceiving them as two. What a great paradox, but what a sweet one! We repeat: Brahman and Mother are one, yet there is no falsity, at all, in conceiving them as two. For, such is the way to Self-realisation: Self—Mother—Brahman. Actually, all are one, all are Brahman; and the fact need be realised from our point of view, from the worldly point of view, from the "Vyavaharika" or empirical point of view.

But how do these arise? Only because of this—the Divine Mother is "Lilamayi" and "Mayamayi." Because of the first, that is, because the Mother is Lilamoyi, playful in nature, She plays, so to speak, hide and seek with Herself; dividing Herself into two, so to speak; hiding Herself from Herself, by Her Maya, so to speak, this being creation or the state of so-called Bondage; re-uniting Herself with Herself, so to speak, this being the so-called state of "Moksa."

Thus, the world is a Lila or Divine Play. So, it is not false, as stated above, yet it is not separate or different for the Mother, from Brahman. And, so Sadhanas or our spiritual strivings, our attempts to know the Mother, worship Her, act according to Her injunctions, are not false, but essentially necessary for realising that Jiva-Jagat are but Her Lila, so one with Her.

Hence, the Mother is everything, everything is the Mother. What truer definition of the Mother can there be, what sweeter description? No need, then, to search for Her in the far off Heavens; no need, then, to nullify the world to reach Her holy feet; no need, then, to transcend the self to ascend the "Brahma-Loka." But, only find Her in the world, find Her in the self, and nowhere else, nowhere else. Only look around and see; see for yourself, see joyfully, see lovingly, see gratefully; see, see, see with all your heart and soul, with all your love and longing, with all your hope and happiness. Won't you see that in every blade of grass She smiles, in every drop of water She shines, in every grain of dust She plays, in every molecule of atoms, She stays?

What higher realisation can there be,
what fuller fulfilment?

"The Deity who is present in all

In the form of loving Mother
Obeisance to Her Obeisance to Her.

Obeisance, again, to Her."
(Sri Sri Chandi 5.73)

The Question of Language

By SUNITI KUMAR CHATTERJI

Emeritus Professor, University of Calcutta
Chairman, West Bengal, Legislative Council

INDIA is not a single, unilingual nation, like Japan and Germany, or France and Britain. These countries are virtually unilingual, in spite of some diversity of speech which still obtains, specially in France and Britain. India is a polyglot (and a multi-religious) country. The intelligentsia of India, however, in the different language-areas, are striving to feel and work as a single nation, in the modern sense, in spite of many great hindrances and handicaps. Here is, of course, a profound sense of a geographical, historical and cultural unity which transcends the diversity of race and speech in India as a whole.

A unilingual nation, which has moreover learnt to check or restrict the fissiparous tendencies of an organised dogmatic and intolerant religious faith, is free from most of these handicaps. Multiplicity of speech in the world, or in any particular country, is considered by some to be an unmixed evil, and by others as something which brings in complications, and therefore not quite a blessing, although not an insurmountable handicap. According to one's mental and political make-up and inclinations, one is either tempted to look upon diversity in speech (as in other matters) to be equally important with an all-embracing unity; or he is tempted to condemn outright diversity as something to be eschewed, since it tends to divide a people, and to retard or prevent or hamper the unity that is needed to forge humanity into one single and all-inclusive entity. With the one mentality goes the strong sense of the Individual, whether as a person or as a community, as having its own inherent right to exist and develop in se—its right to continue and progress in its own special line and along its own natural and inherent proclivities so long as it does not seek to curb or curtail similar rights of other individual elements. With the other kind of mentality, we have a stronger sense of the mass or the total as opposed to the components, regarding it necessary to subjugate the components in the interest of the mass. This commonly resolves itself in practice into a subordination (or even elimination) of the minority in favour of the majority, within a particular sphere or world or context.

THE UNILINGUAL IDEAL AND 'LINGUISM'

In India, in the domain of language, problems of various types, individual and social, cultural and communal, and administrative and political, and even economic, are presenting themselves; and in the interests of the various elements of the body-politic in India—of the Indian Nation itself—an objective and a dispassionate survey of the linguistic situation is called for. It may be presumed that a similar situation with analogous conditions prevail in many other countries or communities; so that mutatis mutandis, this linguistic problem is not confined to India alone. India is a polyglot country, which is a palpable fact. This polyglot character of India is either being made too much of; or it is being treated cavalierly, and dismissed light-heartedly as an undesirable thing and as an evil inheritance which must be and can easily be removed by following a particular regimentation, even one that has to be officially sponsored and enforced. Between these two points of view, there is a third line of approach, which does not minimise the nature of the linguistic diversity in the country, but which at the same time gives special emphasis to the fact that underlying this linguistic diversity there is a profound sense of cultural unity throughout the entire country. This sense of cultural unity has risen and still can rise superior to the disintegrating tendencies of linguistic communalism, or provincialism, or even what may be called "provincial nationalism"—what has been labelled in India as Linguism, and still can maintain the all-round unity of the country in a single nationhood, cultural and political.

Religious Communalism has been in India the greatest hindrance to this maintenance of Unity, when this Religious Communalism has as one of its bases some kind of extraterritorial affiliation and loyalty, as for instance in certain forms of Islam as well as of Christanity. This has been up till now the greatest problem of India, and this has led to the vivisection of India into the two independent States of India and Pakistan, and has created new problems in states like Kerala. Unfortunately, even after 14 years, this Religious Communalism is not yet dead, and is still being fostered and encouraged in the interest of political parties and immediate political expediency. A situation like this is quite baffling indeed, and seems on the face of it hopeless of solution. In a matter like this, we cannot only practise the cheerful optimism of Mr. Micawber, hoping for something good to turn up. But we must also strive in our own spheres to bring about a better outlook and attitude, and work for a reasonable frame of mind through the wider spread of a non-denominational secular education. So long as this devoutly wished for consummation has not been attained, we shall have to prepare ourselves for some more decades of national suffering and frustration.

To come back to the question of language in a polyglot country like India, which as a whole has not yet accepted or reconciled itself to a single language as the one and unique national or official language for all the various linguistic areas. The great fact is frequently forgotten that the vast country of India, particularly in modern times, never developed and adopted a single Modern Indian language as a Common Language, official, cultural or otherwise, for the entire country, from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin and from Afghanistan to Burma. There is no modern Indian language which can act as a language of higher thought and education for the whole of India, a language which in its literature in both the Humanities and in Science and Technology can present something approaching the wide thought-content and incentive to action which one finds in a Modern European language like English. So that when it is proposed to set up in Free India one Modern Indian Language, viz. Hindi, as the Official Language (and even as the National Language, whatever it may really mean) for the whole country, the matter is not so simple as many of the supporters of this proposal would seem to think. These supporters of Hindi largely belong, naturally enough, to those groups which speak it or have already accepted it—particularly when it will give them some obvious advantages as well as prestige over speakers of the other languages.

ROLE OF A NEUTRAL LANGUAGE

In British India and Pre-British India, the question of language was not at all a problem when we think of the deplorable linguistic conflicts of the present day. Now, within the last few years, with the background of a new kind of linguistic nationalism, of small linguistic nationalities with the ideal of one single language in the state replacing the old polyglot provinces, a new outlook or attitude has come into being in India. Till recently, we had a number of multilingual states or provinces, in which people speaking different languages and dialects lived amicably under one administration, and never felt any rivalry or animosity or conflict of interests in the domain of language. But now people are finding it increasingly difficult to adjust or harmonise the claims of the home and the outside in the matter of language. In supporting or advocating Hindi as the first or main language to be used in most affairs outside of the home by all and sundry throughout the whole of India, there appears to be a lack of both the knowledge and the imagination to appreciate the difficulties of implementing such a proposition. Sixty years ago, English was flourishing on the Indian scene as the very much needed common modern language for the whole of a politically unified India, for all-India administration, for higher education in the humanities as well as in science and technology, for business and industry, and for exchange of ideas through books and journals, and meetings and conferences. In Free India, when the British people are no longer dominating the scene, its importance has not yet passed away ; although formally or officially its prestige is sought to be lowered, and persistent efforts are being made in some quarters to remove it entirely, if that were possible, from the Indian scene. English formed (as it still forms) the most effective link binding up the intelligentsia of the whole of India in a common nationalism and a common quest for freedom and free and honourable existence. English not only brought us air and light from outside, but it was the great neutral language. There was no occasion for a conflict among the speakers of the various languages, since English, as the language in the higher levels of administration and education, did not seek to make subordinate any modern Indian language or dialect to another, much less to suppress it.

English was never forcibly imposed upon the people. The greatest amount of latitude possible was allowed in the matter of language, and the masses were always approached through their own languages. But there was in favour of English its great prestige, in the first instance as the rulers' language, and then as the language of the administration in the higher levels. A new type of competence with a new outlook was necessitated for service in a new kind of administrative machinery set up by the British, and that could be obtained only through English. The people accepted this new machinery as it presented something more efficient, more equitable and more understanding than what was prevalent in India during the 18th-19th centuries. And this was in spite of the British subordination of the economic and political interests of India to those of Britain. English was tacitly accepted by many (or strongly opposed by others) as the Symbol and expression of a new intellectual and spiritual revolution and renaissance.

SUPERIORITY COMPLEX AND LANGUAGE

Those who studied English became, in spite of occasional cases of faux pas among them in being swept away from their national moorings, by the strong current of English, the greatest force for good in waking up India. It would be ignorance and ingratitude to suggest that the English-knowing elite wanted to keep up English and reserve it for their own group for selfish reasons. Nothing can be farther from the truth. Those who benefited by their knowledge of English were most eager to share their benefit with the people, and were always anxious to spread English education among the largest group of people possible.

The "superiority complex" which is in season and out of season ascribed to English-knowing people we find also in present day India among persons who are studying Hindi, vis-a-vis those who speak some patois only, or only some other language which is their mother-tongue.

English took the place which Persian occupied in North India and the Deccan during the 17th, 18th and early 19th centuries. The highest offices in the state were of course jealously reserved for British people, and it was there the English tried to keep up and maintain their controlling and directing power. At first the lower offices only in the British administrative set up were kept open for Indians ; and since here too English became first a desirable and then a necessary qualification, a large number of Indians took to acquiring English for respectable jobs not only in the government but with British firms and offices, and in the learned professions which were now based on English or European learning (law, medicine, engineering, teaching) where English was fully established by 1850. People eager for literary and scientific culture and for progress in business and later on in industry, took to the study of English not only as a matter of course but also with eagerness. For their own needs and requirements, English became for Indians with progressive ideas their first language. English helped the leaders of the Indian people to carry on successfully their right for freedom, notwithstanding what many sincere and ardent political workers and leaders (including persons like Mahatma Gandhi) preached to the country that English was an anti-national and a denationalising force. As English did not give special privileges to any particular group of people in India, but offered equal chances (or equal disabilities, when there was a lack of qualification in English) to all, and as it permitted under its umbrage fullest development to all Indian sistance, and it was your Chaitanya who preached and practised it more than four hundred years ago." If this story be true—and there is no reason to doubt it—Gandhi is also indebted to Chaitanya for his doctrine of Passive Resistance or Civil Disobedience.

A typical and successful example of non-violent non-co-operation was witnessed in Bengal just about a hundred years ago in connection with the protest made by the peasants of Bengal against being forced to cultivate indigo. The outrages perpetrated by the British indigo-planters in Bengal (and Bihar) constitute one of the saddest and blackest chapters in the history of British rule in India. It is not possible to give a detailed account of all the miseries suffered by the peasants, but only a few may be indicated. The Planters forced the cultivators to sow indigo and sell it to them at a fixed price although it was much more profitable to grow other crops. Written agreements were drawn up by the Planters and the ignorant and illiterate cultivators were made to sign or fix their thumb impression on them. This meant that for generations they were bound to sow indigo at a loss. If they refused they were forcibly confined in dark cells in the factory for months, their women were ravished, the crops in their fields were mercilessly destroyed, and their bullocks, ploughs etc. were forcibly seized. There was hardly any remedy, for the English Magistrates, with rare exceptions, favoured the British planters, and what was exceedingly strange, the Planters themselves were appointed as Honorary Magistrates. A picture of the miserable life of indigo-cultivators has been drawn in the famous drama Niladarpan written by Dinabandhu Mitra. It is said that when this drama was played on the stage the people were so much excited that shoes were hurled from the auditorium at those who played the parts of the planters.

The Bengali peasants meekly submitted to these insults and injuries for nearly half a century. Then they revolted, But it was an unarmed revolt. They decided not to sow indigo, come what may. Harish Chandra Mukherji wrote in his famous paper, the Hindoo Patriot: "Twenty lakhs of poor ryots combined and resolved, even at the sacrifice of their hearth and of home, nay of their lives, not to cultivate their lands with indigo, nor to enter into any fresh contract with the planters for the same." Such an organization could not, of course, be built up in a day. There were some who took up the cause of the indigo-cultivators and helped them in every way. Harish Chandra Mukherji was one of these. By his writings and severe declamations he aroused public opinion. Another destined to become no less famous was Sisir Kumar Ghosh, the future founder of the Amrita Bazar Patrika. He was then a young man of 18 but he took up the cause of the cultivators and not only wrote letters to the Calcutta papers bringing to light the atrocities of the planters with full details, but also moved from village to village encouraging and urging the cultivators to make a united stand. At the instance of Sisir Kumar the representatives of ninety-two villages assembled in a meeting at Jayrampur in the District of Nadia where the plan of resistance was discussed. It was decided that the sound of a drum (nagra) would be the signal of an attack by the planters in a village and an urgent summons to other villages to come to its help. In this way the peasants learnt self-help and unity.

Shortly, there arose from among the people two leaders named Bishnu Charan Biswas and Digambar Biswas of the village of Chaugachha in Nadia district. They originally served as dewans of indigo factories, but the horrible atrocities perpetrated there moved them to pity. They gave up their jobs and began to organize the cultivators. As a result of the unwearing efforts of these three the indigo-cultivators of the districts of Jessore, Nadia, Rajshahi, Pabna and Maldah took a vow not to sow indigo. Cases were instituted against the recalcitrant cultivators, and the planters got money-decrees against them. The Biswases helped them with money and spent nearly seventeen thousand rupees from their own pocket to save them. These instances had a great reaction upon the people. No amount of fines, imprisonment or physical torture could induce the peasants to sow indigo. The Government were forced to come to terms and the cause of the heroic cultivators was vindicated by a Commission appointed by the Government. The Non-co-operation of the indigo-cultivators triumphed at the end and their grievances were removed.

SPARK IN COLD FRAME

Discerning men realized the importance of the heroic struggle of the Bengali cultivators from a broader standpoint. The following extract from an article in the Amrita Bazar Patrika of May 22, 1874, would be read with interest even today: "It was the indigo disturbances which first taught the natives the value of combination and political agitation. Indeed it was the first revolution in Bengal after the advent of the English. If there be a second revolution it will be to free the nation from the death grips of the all-powerful police and District Magistrate. Nothing like oppression! It was the oppression which brought about the glorious revolution in England and it was the oppression of half a century by indigo planters which at last roused the half-dead Bengalee and infused spark in his cold frame."

In addition to these two episodes of the sixteenth and nineteenth centuries which foreshadowed the Non-co-operation and Passive Resistance or Civil Disobedience Movements, they were developed in full detail by Arabinda Ghose early in the twentieth century, immediately after the inauguration of the Swadeshi movement in Bengal. Practically all the details of Non-co-operation which were enunciated by Gandhi in 1920 were discussed by Arabinda in a series of articles during the month of April, 1907, in his paper, the Bande Mataram. These have now been published in the form of a book entitled The Doctrine of Passive Resistance.

Boycott of educational institutions, law-courts, of foreign goods etc. are all included in his scheme. "The policy of Passive Resistance," said he, was "a means of putting pressure on Government. The essence of this policy is the refusal of co-operation so long as we are not admitted to a substantial share and an effective control in legislation, finance and administration. Just as 'No representation no taxation' was the watchword of American constitutional agitation in the eighteenth century, so 'no control, no co-operation' should be the watchword of our lawful agitation in the twentieth."

It is unnecessary to give further details, but it would be obvious that the movements of Mahatma Gandhi, at least in their theoretical aspects, were fully anticipated by Arabinda, and were more elaborately dealt with by him than Thoreau or Tolstoy ever did. It is a matter of surprise that while Mahatma Gandhi referred to these sources he never referred to the doctrines of Arabinda, even once, as a source of his inspiration.

The Society of the FUTURE

By DR. SRIKUMAR BANERJEE

THE origin of society has always been wrapped in obscurity which no subsequent investigation has been able completely to dissipate. The two elements of its composition—the gregariousness of man and the regulative power of a collective association—have coalesced in course of a long evolutionary process, which can be imagined but not marked into well-defined phases. Researchers of a later and more self-conscious age have tended to oversimplify the process and to convert the undefined and unconscious course of events into certain concrete positive actions which just could not have happened. Rousseau's famous theory of Social Contract ascribes contractual definiteness to an arrangement which came to be evolved by itself. Contract and delegation of power imply a maturity of judgment and a conscious separation of identity between the two parties which we cannot ascribe to that remote age and primitive frame of mind.

A nebulous idea of entrusting the guidance and protection of half-grown humanity to a superior individual dimly representing the interests of the community could hardly be designated as an act of contract. Neither the retained powers of the component elements nor the delegated functions of society could clearly emerge in this complete reliance on the leader of the clan or group. The formation of groups tied together by the common problem of living and a sense of common danger from rival groups was the first element in the process of crystallisation. The group led directly to the group-leader and indirectly to the consciousness of a more composite entity which held men together and guaranteed that common pool of energy which was the minimum requisite for self-preservation. The authority of the group in time of danger gradually led to its recognition and consolidation in safeguarding the more complex interests of a time of peace. Physical authority thus turned in time to moral, and the implicit obedience customarily paid to the former was transferred, more or less as a matter of habit, to the more far-reaching control and supervision of the latter. Any revolt against a group meant not an assertion of the right of the individual but involved a transfer of allegiance to another group. The basic elements of what we mean by contract were absent even in embryo in the transaction.

Burke, on the contrary, has gone to the opposite extreme from Rousseau. He has stressed the mystical element in the evolution of society and discountenanced the conception of reason and enlightened self-interest as having anything to do with its beginnings. He speaks of society as "the great mysterious incorporation of the human race." Living together is an innate quality which man shares with other animals which have not as yet reached the rational level. A herd of cattle is drawn together by an instinctive attraction without developing in its long history even a rudimentary social sense. Some animals, however, like ants and bees, have succeeded in refining gregariousness into a limited social solidarity. A higher co-operative feeling regulates the activities of individuals, instils a sense of order and discipline and lays the foundation of a compact, well-knit organisation. Ants, and bees, however, have never moved beyond the strictly restricted area of their semi-rational functionings, and evolved a higher and more comprehensive social sense. Something must have occurred to arrest the natural process of evolution and leave them stationary at a particular point of progress.

SUPERADDED POTENCY

It will be thus seen that the growth of a full-fledged social conception cannot be accounted for on either the instinctive or the rational plane. A special mystical purpose must have taken shape in the human species to make it realise the full potentialities of a social life. Society did not merely mean the aggregate of the individuals living in it; it was a superadded potency, a kind of charged atmosphere which brought out latent human faculties and richer qualities not inherent in the individual life. The gap between the isolated, self-sufficient life and the expanded life lived in a social environment could only be bridged by the assumption of the operation of a mystic impulse, a supra-rational inspiration, that elevated man to a higher plane of existence.

However society may have originated, it soon assumed a dominant and ever-expanding share in directing the lives and actions of men and women living under its protecting influence. The earliest societies, as reflected in the literature of antiquity, concentrated in themselves the spiritual wisdom of the community and this gave it the right to exercise a progressively stricter control on the unrestrained impulses of average humanity. In all ancient literature, in the Vedas and Upanishads, the Old Testament, in the earliest epic poetry of Homer and Valmiki and Vyasa, we find a patriarchal form of society, in which the wisdom of a few, whether worldly or spiritual, has conferred the right to direct and rule. The norm of righteous conduct, of a well-regulated life which prescribed both religious rites and social observances, gradually came to be fixed and tightened the grip of society on the individual. In cases of conflict between an erring refractory will and the collective influence of society, the sympathy of all right-thinking men was in favour of conformity rather than that of dissent. Domestic ceremonies like marriage, baptism, the last rites became compulsory observances on the part of every member, no deviation from prescribed standards being permitted. Social festivals and enjoyments, however originating in the joyous instincts of man and the stimulus of seasonal appeals, such as sowing and harvesting or the springtide germination of fresh life in Nature, soon assumed a religious complexion and made of religion the one strongest force in the life of the community. In fact in the early ages of human history, religion became the most powerful factor in the consolidation of the influence of society.

In the Middle Ages, all sorts of human relationships and diversities of human conduct fell more and more into a stereotyped pattern. The overstrained pressure of religion was gradually felt to be more and more oppressive and made the individual restive to break away from the yoke. Religion overdid its part and in its growing encroachment on the other functions of life made itself an instrument in the process of social disintegration. Sectarianism and schism disturbed the unity of the religious sphere and made men split up into rival camps. The twin Popes each claiming the religious allegiance of Christendom created a gap which was soon taken advantage of by the emergence of a new secular power, that of the Emperor.

STATIC ELEMENT

Politics and nationalism now dominate the scene and oust religion from its place of power, besides making deep inroads upon the autonomy of the social unit. A traditional society, which has practically exhausted its new potentialities, propped up on the basis of staid conservatism, could hardly absorb the progressive currents of energy in the life of man. It became the static element in life as contrasted with the dynamic element represented in political experiments and fights. The assertion of the freedom of the individual, who found his new-born and expanding aspirations more and more out of tune with the unchangeable fixed pattern of society, the Renaissance with its fierce untamed passions and the Reformation with its glorification of individual conscience and claim to worship God in its own way—all combined to undermine the structure of society. Society was no longer the living expression of the growing human will, but a sort of unadventurous shelter for the stay-at-home impulses of humanity.

In India things took a rather different turn. Politics had never been a live issue in pre-modern India, and there a religion-centred society grew up unchecked by any political competition; Religion, which ever grew more and more engrossing in its claims, made use of society as a formalised expression of its inner urge. Society became a kind of handmaid to religion, embodying its injunctions with almost a mechanical obedience and subordinating its free impulses as completely as possible to religious dictates. In medieval India we reached the closest approximation to a theocratic society achieved by any country in the world, ruled entirely by the priesthood and developing an almost completely fatalistic surrender to the imagined will of Divinity. Families with their hereditary customs and traditions, their rigidly prescribed duties and ordinances held their members in an iron grip, not merely nipping any tendency to revolt but undermining the very will to attempt it. These unitary family cells built up the wider social organisation and their relation to society was an exact replica of the individual family members to the family.

Society, presuming upon its superior moral standards and as the repository not merely of the religious heritage but of the collective practical wisdom of countless generations, assumed an air of absolute infallibility and exercised a more autocratic sway over its component family units and all individuals comprised within it. Conformity to the accepted standards was developed to such high perfection that the very thought of dissent, even in minor articles of food and dress, provoked a sacrilegious horror. Saivism, Vaishnavism and Saktism, the three main channels of the flow of religious emotion, no doubt broke through the outer crust of formalism and released a stock of dynamic spiritual energy that infused fresh blood into the old veins of conventional faith and saved religion from stagnation. But in course of time these fresh religious upsurges hardened into fixed custom and failed to have much impact on the rigid social system. Vaishnavas, Saktas and Sahajiyas, Bauls and other kindred forms of popular religion founded some minor sects with a spurt of heterodoxy in them, but in most cases they were absorbed in the time-honoured social system and kept their heterodoxy a closely guarded secret known only to the initiate.

In the Western countries, the industrial revolution and the dominance of the economic factor in life hastened the dissolution of the old society, already undermined by the progressive assertion of individual freedom. The break-up of the family was accomplished much earlier in them than in the East. Democracy accentuated the sturdy individualism innate in the Western mind, and philosophers like Mill and Bentham assisted with their powerful, if one-sided advocacy in demolishing the social structure by ruthlessly exposing its irrational basis. The shattering earthquake of political revolutions brought in its wake the toppling down of all established social institutions, and left man free to make his contact with his fellowman without the intervention of an intermediate agency. Literary societies, associations, clubs, organisations for promoting a common object sprang up as miniature forms of society to keep up human ties for filling up the gaping void left by the uprooting of the all-inclusive social edifice. The individual now carries on a cash transaction with life, without

Our UNIVERSITIES

By Dr. ANIL CHANDRA BANERJEE

EXPANSION has been the keynote of India's educational policy since 1947. This policy was the inevitable result of the release of aspirations and of energy after the achievement of Independence. Nor was it a wrong policy, for the size of the country and of its growing population demanded rapid expansion of educational facilities. The framers of the Constitution were aware of the possibility that in the race for expansion quality might be sacrificed to quantity. While recognising education as a State subject they vested in the Centre the power as well as the responsibility in respect of "co-ordination and determination of standards in institution for higher education or research and scientific and technical institutions". The inclusion of this item in the Union list in the Seventh Schedule was intended to give legislative power to Parliament to regulate standards in Universities and in higher technical institutions. The framers of the Constitution obviously wanted the Centre to maintain an all-India level of uniformity so far as standards of higher education were concerned. Parliament and the Union Government sought to discharge this responsibility through the University Grants Commission, a body created by a Central Act and financed by the Union Government. During the comparatively brief period of its existence the Commission has done much good work, but it is generally admitted that the standards of higher education are falling rather than rising. It is more or less apparent that the constitutional objective has not been fulfilled. Expansion has resulted in qualitative deterioration. It is a matter of vital national importance and a thorough scrutiny is overdue.

MULTIPLICATION OF UNIVERSITIES

A fairly large number of Universities have come into existence in recent years. As these are sponsored by the State Governments, the U.G.C. and the Central Government do not come into the picture directly at the initial stage. But no State can make large-scale financial commitments without the approval of the Central Government, and every State expects generous financial assistance for its Universities from the U.G.C. No new University can, therefore, be brought into existence by a State Government without the goodwill of the Central Government and the U.G.C. Delhi has effective co-ordinating authority in this matter. It can decide whether a new University is really an academic need, whether it can be expected to work in conditions conducive to the maintenance of proper standards, whether its financial requirements can be met without affecting the legitimate needs of the existing Universities, etc. Unfortunately Delhi makes no such scrutiny; it permits the State Governments to go on with their plans, although those plans would involve heavy expenditure from Central funds. And it is not a question of drain of financial resources only; it involves the much more important question of maintenance of standards. As Chairman of the U.G.C. Mr. Deshmukh was aware of the likely effects on educational standards of the hasty creation of new Universities, although he was unable to resist the rising tide of pressure. His successors do not appear to have given much thought to the problem at all.

The decision to establish new Universities is generally taken at the political level, i.e. the academic implications of the matter are not considered by educationists from the educational point of view. Such Universities are in most cases the offspring of political interests or regional patriotism. In some cases these two factors unite in an unholy combination. The common people, fed by propaganda, welcome new Universities as gifts from their democratic Government. But dis-illusionment follows quickly enough. Students continue to rush to the older Universities and complain if they are refused seats, forgetting that the new Universities were established ostensibly to cater to their needs.

NEW UNIVERSITIES

Most of the new Universities have two well marked characteristics. First, they are more or less departments of the State Government, deprived by statute and administrative practice of that autonomy without which a University becomes a lifeless machine. There is no analogy between such shadows of Secretariats and the State Universities in the United States. The latter enjoy complete autonomy after their budgets are approved by the State Legislatures; the State Governments do not interfere in policy-making and in administration as they do here. Again, there is much difference between the passing of a University budget by a State Legislature and the allocation of funds to a University by the Secretariat. In the former case decisions are taken collectively by the representatives of the people after open discussion on a public forum. In the latter case public funds are distributed in the dark rooms of the Secretariat by a few individuals on principles (if any) known only to themselves. A Vice-Chancellor ready to oblige them might get much more than another who had views of his own. Distribution of public funds in this arbitrary method is open to the gravest objections.

It demoralises the Universities and frequently results in wastage of public money. It is an issue on which public opinion is deplorably silent.

The second feature of most of the new Universities is scarcity of competent teachers and of essential instruments of teaching such as libraries, laboratories, etc. It takes long years to build a rich library or a good laboratory. It would, therefore, be wrong to expect a high standard in these matters in a newly founded University. But a beginning must be made on the right lines so that healthy development in stages might follow. Here lies the real difficulty of the new Universities. In many cases they are unable to secure the services of experienced teachers who alone can organise good libraries and laboratories. Books selected by inexperienced, inadequately equipped teachers put libraries on the wrong track. The same difficulty arises in a larger measure in the case of laboratories.

So far as teaching and research are concerned, the new Universities are at a disadvantage for various reasons. Very few really capable and promising teachers are attracted to these new seats of learning even if they are offered higher salaries and better positions than they get in the older Universities. A teacher who is not intellectually dead will refuse to tie himself to an institution which cannot offer him a good workshop, i.e. a good library and a good laboratory. Moreover, the new Universities are located at centres where there are no learned societies or institutions (apart from the Universities themselves) and no libraries or laboratories except those provided by the Universities. It is not surprising that teachers who want opportunities for researches should hesitate to court intellectual exile. Naturally the new Universities have to satisfy themselves with teachers of inferior quality. Even if they succeed in roping in a few competent men the latter soon exhaust their capacity for good work for lack of the necessary apparatus, i.e. libraries and laboratories.

The procedure of appointment of teachers in some of the new Universities leaves much to be desired. There are no statutory Selection Committees as we have in Calcutta. Sometimes ad hoc Selection Committees are constituted and experts are chosen at random by the administrative authorities. Sometimes appointments are made by Vice-Chancellors, with or without formal advice from external experts. It is obvious that such easy-going methods of selection do not inspire the confidence of aspirants for teaching jobs. Justice, as the saying goes, must not only be done but must appear to have been done. Persons in close contact with academic circles know that lack of confidence in the procedure of appointment is responsible for keeping away many promising teachers from the new Universities.

The quality of teachers naturally affects the quality of teaching and examination. In ancient times, when large scale public examinations were unknown, the quality of a student was judged, at the end of the period of study, by the reputation of the teacher from whom he took his lessons. Even under the vastly changed circumstances of to-day the value of degrees awarded by a particular University depends to a large extent on the teachers who teach and examine the degree-holders in that University. This is one of the reasons which explain the reluctance of promising students to join or to continue their studies in the new Universities. Rightly or wrongly they believe that degrees conferred by the older Universities carry greater weight and open better prospects of employment. How can the new Universities improve their standards if they do not succeed in attracting really meritorious pupils? The average intellectual equipment of the students has a decisive influence on the determination of University standards. Backward students drag the standards down to their own level.

Thus the new Universities move in a vicious circle. They cannot attract teachers of the highest type who can bring distinction to the new seats of learning and release a fresh intellectual stimulus. And because they cannot attract such teachers they fail to attract promising students. Educational institutions failing in the two-fold task of attracting worthy teachers and worthy pupils are doomed to stagnation: the initial handicaps continue to cripple their work and they fail to play their normal role of enlightening the community.

From this point of view the establishment of new Universities is a sheer wastage of public funds. Universities are not required for the production of Pass—or even of Honours graduates. That task should be left to the Colleges, which can perform it with much less cost to the public exchequer. A University is primarily a centre of advanced studies and researches. A University which cannot perform that primary task is no University at all; it is merely a camouflage for a degree-giving body. If the number of under-graduate Colleges is found to be too large to be supervised by the older Universities, it would be much better to establish purely examining Universities conferring degrees up to the graduate standard. Post-graduate teaching, examinations and researches are specialised jobs which cannot be done properly by institutions created by political decrees and managed by bureaucratic orders.

It is not generally recognized, although it is well known to academic circles, that the deterioration of standards in some Universities affects the standards in other Universities as well. If University 'A' is liberal enough to grant Class I M.A./M.Sc. degrees in dozens, University 'B' is in an embarrassing position. The employers—even the supposedly expert bodies like Public Service Commissions—rarely discriminate between genuine Class I degrees and the inflated imitations. The result is that good Class II M.A./M.Sc. of University B' find themselves superseded by their intellectual inferiors, the Class I diploma holders of University 'A'. Naturally University 'B' is subjected to increasing pressure for placing its degrees on a par with those of University 'A'. Such pressure frequently becomes irresistible. It is a new, and pretty serious, threat to the maintenance of proper standards in the Universities. This threat comes generally from the new Universities, but some of the older Universities are no less guilty in this respect. One result of the establishment of new Universities is the intensification of this threat. It is unwise to multiply centres of infection.

UNIVERSITY GRANTS COMMISSION

All Universities, old and new, depend largely upon subsidies from the University Grants Commission. Here their primary difficulties are two-fold. First, most of the grants made by the U.G.C. are development grants and not maintenance grants. Development grants are available for a fixed period—generally five years—after which they are discontinued. But the commitments of the Universities continue. For example, a Professorship is created at the instance of the U.G.C. and the salaries are paid by the U.G.C. for five years. At the end of the term the U.G.C. grant is stopped, but the University is committed to the U.G.C. to maintain the

FANTASY AND MORALITY IN CONTEMPORARY ENGLISH FICTION

By HAYDN MOORE WILLIAMS

Reader in English, Jadavpur University

A CHAPTER of English literature opened and closed between 1910 and 1922, the period of experiment and innovation, and the climacteric of naturalism. James Joyce took the novel to the little-charted lands of "streams of consciousness" in the great novel-to-end-all-novels—Ulysses. Ever since the pundits have been prophesying the imminent demise of the novel; and even now many critics are conducting a post-mortem on a still living body. But what happened after Joyce? The American novel went merrily on with Faulkner and Hemingway. For them the experimental period was not over (The Sound and the Fury, for example) and the Americans to some extent created their own idiom.

In Britain Joyce seemed to have a paralysing effect; and it was not until the Thirties that social realism combined with dogma (Marxist, Freudian, and Christian) began to transform the content and form. Graham Greene is the most notable figure in the novels of the Thirties but the reader will find interesting symptoms in the less successful novels of Rex Warner (The Aerodrome, The Professor). For both Greene and Warner the novel was a vehicle for ideas; in Greene Catholicism, in Warner the strength (and weakness) of liberal humanism. There was also a crop of Marxist or pseudo-Marxist writers eager as usual to display their orthodoxy in their religion.

It seems to me that the form of these "philosophical" novels was conditioned by two new phenomena in contemporary art and entertainment: the film, especially the film-thriller of Lang and above all Alfred Hitchcock with their technique of terror-in-ordinary-life and economy of narration through deft cutting and editing; and the fantasies of Kafka. The film-thriller brought terror through realism and sought the fantastic in everyday life (actually John Buchan's thrillers had first used this trick superbly); Kafka on the other hand found terror inside the mind of man and gave a realistic setting to nightmarish fantasy. Incidentally both the film and Kafka reflect the atmosphere of political terror and despair in post-1918 Europe. Almost all of Greene's novels and entertainments are shot through with Hitchcockian idioms—the hare-lipped hired killer stalking his paralysed victim in the middle of the students' rag (A Gun for Sale) or the monstrously fat Nazi spy crumbling Rowe's cake in the air-raid in his frantic search for the hidden documents.

After the Second World War, outside the work of Joyce Cary and Ivy Compton-Burnett, the "artistic" novel wavered uncertainly—still dominated by realism and naturalism. What was wanted was a fresh start—but one that would still utilise the formula of the well-directed film (the most lively art in Western Europe, after all) and the Kafkaesque philosophical fantasy. Three quite different English writers seem to me to have provided such a fresh start.

First there is what Arthur Koestler has called the earthquake in modern fiction: the novels of William Golding. Golding (a wartime naval officer) wrote The Lord of the Flies (recently filmed) out of his schoolmastering knowledge of boys, and his disagreement with Ballantyne in The Coral Island that boys without adults to control them could still behave like little gentlemen. The Inheritors was the fruit of Golding's disagreement with yet another book, H. G. Wells's humanistic Outline of History in which Man is presumed to be an advance on pre-Man and "progress" is a good thing.

Both books are frightening allegories; and the theme is the same—the Fall of Man, Original Sin. So the nice English schoolboys marooned on an island in a nuclear war descend to bestial savagery and devil-worship. In The Inheritors, innocent primitive man is destroyed and supplanted by sinful treacherous, lecherous Homo Sapiens. Golding's novels are not only graphically written—they are deeply disturbing. Take Pincher Martin with its vivid narration of a man's purgatory—the soul of the dead naval officer shrinking to the size of crab's claws and scuttling over the surface of a decayed tooth!

A second writer has taken over the police thriller and the religious theme from Graham Greene. This is James Barlow, a Birmingham rates-inspector turned writer who has come to the front in the last five or six years. His novels fall into two classes: the realistic novel of contemporary English life centred around an unusual character (The Patriots for example with its ironical title deals with two British paratroopers—veterans of Arnhem—disgusted with post-war England, who plan a master crime, and comes nearer to tragedy than any other novel since The Heart of the Matter); and second, Barlow goes in for what is almost Science Fiction, Buchan-like fantasies of which One Half of the World is typical: the saga of a policeman in a Communist Britain of the near future under foreign occupation who joins the resistance when he becomes converted to Christianity and dies a martyr's death. All Barlow's novels keep coming back to certain recurrent themes and character-situations. Christianity is a central theme—dogmatic Church Christianity menaced by the armed heresies of our time—Marxist atheism, materialism, humanism, hedonism. It is Christianity of the catacombs. Barlow is also obsessed by the struggles of the lonely, unheroic hero against the establishment (e.g., the schoolmaster in Term of Trial). But Barlow's hated establishment is not that of Amis, Osborne and the "Angries". In fact Barlow attacks many of the things they stand for. Barlow's establishment consists of the success-merchants, "yes men", the intellectuals, the complacent or bleating humanists, the good "Party" men (whether Communist or Capitalist), the hedonists, the peddlers of lust and violence. And Barlow's hero is often the much maligned policeman, detective, M.I. 5 man who has to do the necessary "dirty" work of a pharisaical society.

Professorship on a permanent basis. Where will the University get the money then? Acceptance of U.G.C. grants means, in most cases, mortgaging the future.

Secondly, most of the U.G.C. grants are available only on condition of providing matching grants which usually amount to 50 p.c. or 33 p.c. of the total expenditure. The rules of the U.G.C. require that matching grants are to be provided by the University out of its own funds or by the State Government. As the University's own funds are seldom adequate for the purpose, the State Government has to be approached. In effect, therefore, the acceptance of U.G.C. grants depends upon the generosity of the State Government.

In addition to these two difficulties, the Universities have to submit themselves to U.G.C. control even in regard to details of planning and expenditure. In this respect the U.G.C. is a loyal imitator of the Secretariat technique. The U.G.C. Visiting teams will determine the size of the windows of buildings constructed out of U.G.C. grants. The U.G.C. will dictate the number and qualifications of teachers whose salaries it pays. Perhaps the day is not far off when not a sparrow will move in any University building without orders from the U.G.C. All wisdom, it seems, is concentrated in the U.G.C. and men who run the Universities are to be treated as perpetual minors.

During the last few years the U.G.C. has spent tons of money on the Universities and it has done much for their improvement. That it has been a stimulating factor in the sphere of higher education is undeniable. But much more might have been done if the Universities had been given reasonable freedom to use the grants in conformity with local traditions and local needs. The fact is that the U.G.C. is a wing of the Central Secretariat and believes in the old saying: He who pays the piper will call the tune. It is highly regrettable that the U.G.C. should develop so soon into an enemy of the Universities' autonomy.

DIFFERENT STAGES OF EDUCATION

No University can maintain really high standards in the sphere of post-graduate studies, examinations and researches if a fairly high level is not maintained at the secondary and collegiate levels. It is necessary, therefore, that there should be effective and fruitful co-ordination between the secondary, collegiate and post-graduate stages. The existing system does not provide for co-ordination between Boards which control secondary education and Universities which control collegiate and post-graduate education. The Universities have no voice in determining the standard of secondary education which lies within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Boards. But any student who passes a secondary education examination is automatically eligible for admission into a College. In other words, the Universities cannot lay down the qualifications of persons who join the Collegiate courses. A host who cannot choose his guests is in a really embarrassing position.

The difficulty would have been less acute than it is to-day if secondary education throughout the country had been placed at a level of uniformity. But despite the Mudaliar Commission's recommendations and the flow of money from the Centre there is a bewildering variety in this sector of education. The number of subjects taught, the total marks assigned to different subjects, the limits of the syllabi, the books prescribed for study, the rules of examination: in all these matters there are wide variations. Naturally there is no uniform standard of secondary education, and in some cases the standard is deplorably low. For example, Board 'A' recognizes Physics and Chemistry as two separate subjects for the Higher Secondary Examination and assigns 200 marks to each of them, but Board 'B' groups them together under the name 'Physical Sciences' and assigns 100 marks to the group as a whole. Board 'C' recognises type-writing or soap-making as alternatives to History or Geography. Board 'D' allows candidates to pass the examination in two instalments, taking some subjects in July and the others in December, while other Boards require them to pass the entire examination at one sitting.

Such differences obviously imply material differences in the equipment of the students who seek admission into the Colleges. But no University can, for practical reasons, make any discrimination, in the matter of eligibility for admission into its Colleges, between fully equipped and partly equipped applicants. Inter-State migration of students is quite frequent now, and in big cities like Calcutta thousands of students from different parts of the country seek opportunities for higher education. Many of them come from Boards whose standard is low. To debar them from admission on purely academic grounds would raise many problems, personal and political. To admit them would mean lowering of the standard of the Degree courses.

The same bewildering variety prevails in the field of Collegiate education. University 'A' requires every B.A. candidate to pass in five subjects; University 'B' reduces the number of subjects to three. University 'C' prescribes an eight-paper Honours course, University 'D' is liberal enough to make it a six-paper course, and University 'E' has no Honours course at all. In regard to admission to post-graduate courses the graduates of all these Universities claim equal eligibility. If this claim is recognized (as it usually is), the level of post-graduate teaching is inevitably lowered to accommodate the backward section of students.

Even post-graduate degrees of different Indian Universities do not imply equality of equipment. In most cases these degrees require a two-year course of teaching, but in some cases post-graduate courses are of one year's duration. And there are Universities which confer post-graduate degrees without teaching and without examination upon graduates holding the three-year Honours degree. I found one M.Sc. of this category teaching in a Government College within the jurisdiction of Calcutta University, although Calcutta University graduates with three-year Honours degrees cannot blossom into M.A./M.Sc.s overnight without going through a two-year post-graduate course and passing an eight-paper examination.

It is really surprising that neither the University Grants Commission nor the Inter-University Board takes any notice of these anomalies. It is neither expected nor desirable that all Boards and Universities should conform to the same pattern in all particulars. Variety is the spice of education as it is of life. But if variety means simplification of courses and of examinations it thwarts educational progress instead of accelerating it. To stimulate intellectual forces is the proper function of a University. This function cannot be discharged by distributing cheap degrees and diplomas for the immediate benefit of job-hungry youngmen and women. The least that the U.G.C. can do—and should do immediately — to arrest the infectious

NETAJI AND NEHRU

By NANDALAL CHATTERJI, Ph.D.,D.Litt.
Research Professor, Lucknow University.

NETAJI and Nehru have been makers of the Age and daring path-finders in their own ways. Their flaming patriotism and undying courage form an epic chapter in the annals of Modern India and of the modern World.

Netaji's role as a Congress leader was from the very outset characterised by a spirit of revolutionary dynamism and his forward and aggressive ideas reinforced the leftist trend in Indian politics. Having made great sacrifices like Nehru, he was also associated like Nehru with the formulation of the socialist idea in India.

His role in the Congress leadership, distinguished though it was, was only a prelude to his subsequent role as a soldier of freedom in distant land. It is his spectacular war-time escape from the country despite the surveillance of the British police and his remarkable exploits later outside India which really established his claim to immortality as a national hero.

There was a time when the British propagandists and many Indians doubted his bona fides and took him for a Quisling in the pay roll of the Axis Powers. This accusation was as false as it was cruel. A man, whom the powerful British Government sent to jail eleven times and yet could not cajole or corrupt would not dream of selling his conscience to Germany or Japan.

Netaji's objects in going over to the Axis Powers was only to seek their help in India's fight for freedom. These Powers and India had at the time a common enemy, and therefore, there was bound to be, for the time being at least, a common interest and objective. Netaji simply tried to exploit the international situation, but he was never once willing to give up his freedom of action on any account. Till the end, he studiously maintained his independence and never allowed himself to be dictated to by the Axis Powers.

ENTERPRISE

The manner in which Netaji recruited and assembled a National Army first in Europe and then in the Far East testifies to his wonderful capacity for organisation and skill in strategy. It was indeed a signal achievement that he induced the Axis Powers—and Japan in particuar—to render all possible military help to his plans to liberate India. It was even a greater achievement that he organised the scattered Indians outside India—especially, Indians in East Asia—and prepared with their moral and material assistance a fighting force which was named Azad Hind Fauj or the Indian Army of Liberation. This army was fashioned entirely under Indian leadership and went to battle under Netaji's supreme guidance. Its inspiring slogan, "To Delhi, Onward to Delhi", galvanised the entire I.N.A. personnel with the three ideals: patriotism, duty and sacrifice. Everyone was conscious of the grave risks and manifold difficulties that faced the army, but Netaji instilled into every heart an unshakable determination to fight for the motherland shoulder to shoulder through joy and sorrow, through sunshine and darkness and through suffering and martyrdom till the goal was reached.

It is significant that this Azad Hind Government which was formed on foreign soil ushered in a new era of Indian political enterprise and produced a great effect on the popular mind in India. The recognition it received from the Axis Powers gave it an international status which went a long way towards strengthening the morale of the Indian people in and outside India.

Netaji's bid to launch an offensive on the Assam front with the help of his new Azad Hind Force will be long remembered as a romantic chapter in the history of India. The initial success of his army in penetrating inside the borders of Manipur, was, however, ultimately frustrated.

Even though Netaji's plans eventually failed, his grand failure itself created history. His historic achievements in the Far East and on the Manipur front brought at least moral victory for the cause of India's independence.

His lofty idealism created a new spirit among the Indians, and his I.N.A. completely shattered the illusion of the Indian Army sepoys' blind devotion to the alien ruler. If the British Governmen had in the end to decide to quit India, one of the contributory causes was the new conviction that the Indian sepoys would no longer fight and die for the British Government. The new feeling of self-sacrifice and patriotism of the men of the I.N.A. who had once served under the British and had surrendered to the Japanese in the Far East and Burma showed that the days of the British domination in India were over for ever.

India has been blessed with a Gandhi but also with a Jawaharlal Nehru. Both were complementary to each other and both have advanced the cause of India's freedom in different ways. The greatest follower of Mahatma Gandhi, Nehru, is yet a liberator in his own right. If Gandhiji gave the idea, Nehru gave the colour, shape and the concrete form to India's independence. And, there is no doubt that Gandhiji forged the weapon which Nehru wielded with will and ability.

Nehru is the best interpreter and spokesman of Gandhiji's thought and it was the two together in a brilliant partnership that led India's fight for freedom. Gandhiji was the Lord Krishna and Nehru the Arjuna of the great Indian Mahabharata-conflict of the 20th Century.

Why did Nehru accept non-violence in this struggle for independence ? With his rational and historical sense Nehru could not simply have done otherwise. Terrorism made no appeal to him, for he regarded it as a sign of political immaturity. He had no doubt that it formed a tragic and futile weapon and no nation had really benefited by it. Non-violence, he was convinced, was to be the salvation of India and, indeed, of the whole world. Violence, he thought, had had a long career, and had been weighed repeatedly and always found to be wanting. Violence must go from excess to excess and ultimately it would perish in the flame it kindled and be reduced to ashes.

CHOICE

But, like Gandhiji, Nehru was also clear that non-violence could not mean cowardice or weakness. Nehru made his choice because Gandhiji appeared to him as the age-old soul of India. He chose the path of non-violence and suffering in the spirit of a true votary and took thereby the proud position in the vanguard of the army of freedom which believed that freedom would be valueless and tainted, if it came through foul means.

In 1929, Mahatma Gandhi who had so far been rather lukewarm about the independence creed, at last gave it his blessings in the Lahore session of the Congress. This enabled the Congress to unfurl the flag of independence on the banks of the river Ravi at midnight of December 21, 1929 and in the early hours of first January, 1930. This was indeed a glorious day in the political career of Nehru. He had positively changed the outlook of the Congress and had given it a new orientation altogether.

The word 'Swaraj' in the Congress constitution was henceforth to mean complete independence.

FORESIGHT

As a soldier of freedom, Nehru took his stand with the socialist and nationalist forces of the world in order to rise above the tide of world-imperialism. He saw the world divided into two blocs—the imperialists and Fascists on the one side, the Socialist and anti-imperialist on the other.

The British Empire represented the strongest and oldest imperialism and this was the real argument for India's freedom and for the end of India's connection with this Empire. After all, there could be no connection between India's freedom and the British imperialism. So, if India remained within the imperialism fold, whatever name or status and whatever external appearance and power India might have, India would have remained a slave to the reactionary forces and to the imperialist bloc.

Nehru saw as no other leader saw it, that the only key to the solution of India's problems lay in socialism and this socialism he viewed in its scientific and economic sense. To him socialism was more than an economic idea. It was a way of life and as such it immensely appealed to him. He saw no way of eradicating economic backwardness, the large scale unemployment, the political subjection and the misery of the masses except through socialism.

He was aware that this meant drastic changes both in the political and social structure of the vested interests in all spheres. It was ultimately to mean the replacement of the present profit system by a higher ideal of cooperative service — which would amount to a change in philosophy of life, completely different from the existing capitalist order. But, Nehru was always clear on the point that there could not be a slavish imitation of the Soviet system which he personally admired. He held that every nation must have its socialist system after its own liking and shape it with its own genius.

He worked for Indian independence not only because the patriot in him could not put up with foreign rule but also because it appeared to him to be the inevitable step to a socialistic rebuilding of society. But he realised that the majority in the Congress might not be prepared to go thus far and so he was prepared to slow down the pace of advance. In any case, he was not willing to force the issue in the Congress and thereby create difficulties, in the way of India's national struggle against the British rule.

He was always ready to co-operate gladly and with all the strength in him with all those who worked for independence even though they did not feel much attracted to the socialist idea. The object was to convert the Congress slowly, if not all at once. The Congress was in the British period a broad popular front representing a variety of ideologies. It was to remain thus for a long time to come. That is why Nehru could with his passion for socialism and rapid industrialisation co-operate with Gandhiji for the village uplift, Khadi and untouchability-removal programmes. But, these appealed to him no more than temporary acceptance of a transition stage rather than a permanent solution of the country's problems.

INFLUENCE

As a soldier of freedom, Nehru always experienced the thrill of mass feeling, the power of influencing the common man. Unlike Gandhiji he kept religion outside politics. He took to the crowd as the crowd took to him, and yet, he never lost himself in it, despite their love and adoration.

His sentiments and language were noble but they were never those of a rabble-rouser. From his higher mental perch he never ceased to feel how different he was from those thousands who idolised him; different in outlook, in taste and in aspirations. In order to be sure that the people really liked him for what he was, he was often frank, critical and even rough and rude in his criticisms and denunciations. Still the people put up with him and he remained their hero and darling.

On a survey of Nehru's contributions to the freedom struggle it would appear that Nehru powerfully influenced it and gave it a new orientation. Firstly, he introduced the independence creed which even Gandhiji had not at first approved. Secondly, he gave the Indian freedom movement a world background and perspective. Thirdly, though no pioneer in the socialist field in India, Nehru was the first Congress leader who popularised the socialist thought of the Marxian kind. Fourthly, he organised a broad-front against all kinds of communalism and casteism. Lastly, it was Nehru who first gave a concrete shape to the idea of national planning after the Soviet model of the Five-Year-Plan.

Nehru's name in modern Indian History will live for ever as that of a great patriot and architect of freedom.

Asian MOTHER GODDESSES

By DR. SUDHAKAR CHATTOPADHYAYA

IT is autumn. India wears a gay look at the advent of the Divine Mother. Her image is a source of consolation to the devotees who pray for salvation and to others whose aim is to gain material prosperity through worship. Amongst the mass of devotees and visitors assembled at the hall of worship, if there be any historian or anthropologist, his sight would be at once attracted towards Kalabau (several plants covered in cloth) placed by the side of the great image. The priest would explain that she, and not the image, represents the real mother goddess. This assertion is in keeping with the tradition recorded in the Mahabharata where the goddess is described as Sakambhari. This shows indirectly that her presence should be searched for in corns and plants. Thus she at once becomes the earth-goddess, bhu-devi, the goddess of fertility. Bhumi, the soil, is one of the village cults and to her offerings are made of cakes. sweetmeats and fruits. Such worship may be as old as the time of the Indus valley culture (C. 3000 B.C.), as we have from Harappa a seal representing nude female figure upside down with legs wide apart and a plant coming out of her womb.

Frazer has pointed out that from the primitive conception of earth mother as either kindly or malevolent has developed the worship of the mother goddess, which forms such an important element in the beliefs of the people of India. As in Greece, the close connection of the mother goddess with the earth is illustrated in sacred art as well. In the Greek vases, the mother-goddess is depicted as rising out of a mound. Similarly, the Dravidian goddess Ellamma is often figured on stone, the head being only visible while the body is concealed in the earth. It is not without significance that the great Indian mother goddess is worshipped at the advent of the autumn and spring, the two harvesting seasons. It has often been conjectured, however, that mother worship cannot arise simply in an agricultural society, that society should be matriarchal too. It can arise in a society where mother is the head of the group. This is no doubt illustrated to some extent by the history of the early Semites who developed a mother cult and had at the same time a polyandrous form of life. But India proves a contrary case. After the Vedic Aryans settled in the land of the seven rivers they had to fight constantly with the original dwellers—the Dravidians and the Proto-Austroloids etc.—of the land. At that time the male gods were predominant. Later on, when they tasted a quieter life, the conception of a supreme mother goddess developed among them. Their mainstay was agriculture but their society was never polyandrous. Looked at from this point of view it may be held that mother cult develops mainly in a predominantly agricultural society.

Long before India developed the conception of Adya-Sakti or Supreme Mother Goddess, the worship of a supreme feminine energy had been prevalent in Western Asia among the Semetic Assyro-Babylonians and Hittite Aryans. Whether the Assyro-Babylonians and the Hittites developed these cults independently or got inspiration from a common source is still a moot question. In the regions around the Mediterranean the worship of the mother goddess was prevalent in remote antiquity and this may have influenced the Asiatic cult to some extent. In Punic Africa, Egypt, Asia Minor and Greece a virgin goddess was worshipped along with a male god who was her son. Some historians think that this cult was of Cretan origin. The son, born of the virgin by immaculate conception was believed to die and reappear again in life as does nature from summer to winter and from winter to summer. Here also we find the same notion evidently of the earth goddess producing harvests in different seasons. Anthropologists maintain that the Dravidians of India belong to the Mediterranean race and among them we have a reference to such a virgin mother goddess. Thus the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea, an anonymous Greek work composed between 60 and 80 A.D., speaks of the Cape of Comari where "come those men who wish to consecrate themselves for the rest of their lives, and bathe and dwell in celibacy and women also do the same, for it is told that a godddess once dwelt here and bathed." Cape of Comari or Kanya Kumarika, according to Indian tradition, is the abode of Kumari (virgin) or Durga. It is not unlikely that this virgin goddess may have been brought to India by the Mediterranean Dravidians and later on she came to be identified with Durga.

A virgin goddess should naturally be worshipped under strict celibacy, as the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea seems to suggest. In the Mediterranean countries also the virgin goddess was worshipped under similar fashion. Her male votaries were castrated and the female votaries had to ignore their married life but could observe ceremonial promiscuity which was looked upon as nothing impure. A virgin with her son forms the basis of the Christian religion, and this idea also came evidently from the Mediterranean region.

FERTILITY CULT

Among the Assyro-Babylonians who dominated Western Asia till the rise of the Median Iranians in the seventh century B.C. a Great Mother Goddess was worshipped who ultimately became the supreme deity. She was Ishtar-Nana. As in India, we understand by the expression Adya-Sakti all the goddesses like Durga, Kali etc. So Ishtar ultimately absorbed all the female deities of the ancient Semites and became the Adya-Sakti or the Supreme Goddess and her name came to denote any of the female deities. She was also originally a goddess of fertility and her principal seats of worship were Uruk (where she was worshipped as Nana), Akkad (where she was worshipped as Anunitu), Nineveh etc. It is apparent that Nana, Anunitu etc. were originally local divinities and were ultimately merged in Ishtar. A similar process operated in India as well. Uma was originally the goddess of the Himalayan region, Kali the deity of the Proto-Austroloids of the Vendiyan tract and Kumari, as we have already seen, a divinity of the far south, but they all ultimately merged into one Adya-Sakti. Similarly, Ishtar-Nana gradually rose in supreme importance and her temple at Uruk became a sanctuary of great repute. Besides various ritualistic practices, temple-prostitution was followed here and it is not unlikely that it developed under the influence of the Mediterranean mother cult.

Ishtar-Nana is described as a goddess of love and of the life of the nature in general. She was also a goddess of war and thus she became a favourite deity of the Assyrian Kings who were very much fond of war and chase. She was also connected with Venus and Sirius and thus she indirectly became the presiding deity of the Babylonian astrological sciences. Lion was her sacred animal and dove also was sometimes associated with her. In the various Ishtar hymns, we find her often described as a merciful goddess, forgiving men their sins, delivering them from different maladies and we often reach high ethical levels with them.

ISHTAR-NANA

Ishtar-Nana appears to have exerted a great influence on Indian religious thoughts. Thus we find on a coin of Huvishka, the Kushana King of North India ruling in the second century A.D., the figure of a male and a female with inscriptions which have been interpreted as referring to the male as Oesa or Bhavesa (Siva) and to the second as Nana, i.e., Ishtar-Nana. As again on some coins of the same king we have figure of Oesa together with another female figure with the inscription Omma or Uma, and as in later period we find that Durga absorbed many of the traits of the goddess Ishtar-Nana (c.f. lion-seat, warlike attributes etc.) it has been assumed that the cult of the Babylonian goddess introduced into India by the Scythian Kings became merged in the cult of India. Ishtar-Nana absorbed all the female divinities of Western Asia, but she failed in India. India has a peculiar capacity for absorbing foreign influences. Ishtar-Nana became merged into Indian mother goddess.

Let us now turn to the mother goddess of the Hittites. A branch of the Aryans, the Hittites settled in the Asia Minor region in the second millennium B.C. and founded city states of their own and followed a religion that was evidently Aryan in character. Each city State had a local shrine where a storm god and a goddess were worshipped. Whether the storm god was the husband of the goddess is not clear. In India, Sakti is regarded as the wife of Rudra- Siva who is sometimes regarded as storm god in the Rig Veda, the earliest literary document of the Aryans. When the different city States coalesced into an empire, naturally all the local goddesses were merged together and there arose thus a supreme Goddess. She was regarded as presiding over the production of the soil (cf. Sakambhari) while the male god came to be regarded as the tutelary deity of the army. This pair is represented in the sacred gallery of Yazzaly Qaya, the holy place of the city of Hatti. In the procession at Baghaz-Keui the goddess has a crown on her head, stands on a lion or panther, and bears a staff in one of her hands. There are two figures accompanying the goddess throwing some interesting light from the Indian point of view. One of them, regarded by some scholars as her son, is a beardless youth in masculine dress, having a staff in one hand and an axe on the other, while a dagger hangs in a sheath fixed in the waist. The other figure is somewhat an uncouth one, having the body of a lion with a human head. The first male figure naturally reminds us of Skanda-Kartikeya and the second one of Ganesa. There is no doubt much dissimilarity between these two classes of icons, but the underlying motif in both the cases appears to be somewhat the same. We do not know exactly what was the name of this Supreme Goddess, "though it seems likely that the original Cappadocian form was something like Ma, the name under which she was worshipped later at Comna".

Our knowledge of the early history of Central Asia is rather poor at present and we do not know exactly whether any mother goddess was worshipped there. From the writings of Herodotus, who lived in the fifth century B.C. we learn that among the Scythians of that place there was a supreme father god and a mother goddess. Later Indian works look on the region as a source of inspiration for their mother worship. Thus the Nilatantra states that the Devi was born in a lake called Collying to the west of Mount Meru. Meru has been identified with Pamir and to the west of it lie the Syr Daria and Amu Daria valleys where even at the present time the lakes are called Col by the local people. This may point to the fact that some form of mother worship prevailed in ancient Russian Turkistan. We know that the Indian mother goddess is associated with Sakinis and Dakinis. Dr. P. C. Bagchi has shown that the Sakinis refer to the Sakas and the Dakinis to the Dags of Dagistan. The Tantras further state that Lord Vasishtha went to Mahachina (Tibet?) and learnt there a peculiar form of sadhana—known as Chinachara which he later introduced into India. It is further stated that the goddess Tara was worshipped there after that fashion. Tara was originally a Buddhist goddess and later on came to be regarded as a manifestation of the Indian Divine Mother, the Adya-Sakti. The reference to the deity is found in old Japenese records and her worship was prevalent in Mongolia also where she was known as Dara.

third stages are kinetic the fourth again is potential for it may serve as the inspiration of a fresh artistic activity.

It has been stated already that all art has a perceptual and a conceptual element. The proportion of the two varies with the different arts.

In poetry the perceptual element which is primarily based on the senses, is the least. The sounds of the words of a poem and its audiel rhythm contribute to its enjoyment but both can be enjoyed mentally without reading the poem aloud. We have to consider how the appreciation of poetry is related to values, and to which category of values.

Value varies with people and all values are not perceived as such by all. There are the merely physical or sensory values whose scope is very limited for they begin and end with the physical entity and do not reach the higher cerebral processes.

Their influence in terms of instinctive gratification is confined to the cerebellum. But towering far above these are the conceptual values—aesthetic and ethical. They constitute the core of humanity's noblest striving. They are the outcome of Man's ceaseless cry to be delivered from bondage to darkness.

The highest poetry as essential literature embodies this urge, this ceaseless yearning, this unquenchable hunger and thirst for enlightenment's sake and not for the sake of any accruing benefit. In this sense all art is perfectly useless. Uselessness in this sense is the quality of real values. This uselessness is not a negative utilitarianism, for no real value can be merely negative. It means that real values are so completely full of essential significance that they need no adjunct of added quality beyond themselves. They are self-contained and, therefore, self-perfect. It also means that their significance or worth is not relative to the transience of flux; that in the midst of ceaseless change and decay they endure and that they are different from knowledge which is progressive and subject to change and modification, whereas value has the finality which knowledge lacks.

Value, therefore, is beyond knowledge. It is not perfect knowledge even, but an entity of a totally different category. "The world through wisdom knew not God;" this is also true of the highest values.

Values are subjective. The objective world of the cosmos can be conceived to exist without any life in it but values presuppose a subjective apparatus to make them possible. Values must be both valuable and valued.

TIME AND SPACE

Time is the evolvent of values and it is through Time that values make contact with the objective world. Time has been described as the mind of Space for without Time Space would cease to be Space and be reduced to mere extension. Time is the only point at which values may impinge on the objective world.

Values, however, cannot exist in a vacuum, for a vacuum, physical or mental, is a purely negative state which is repugnant to value. Value is significance at its intensest and significance must be positive or be a significance unrelated to itself, i.e., a significance, by inference, of something else, which is equivalent to saying that its significance has no significance.

Poetry is concerned directly and immediately with aesthetic values and with intellectual and ethical values only by inference, if at all. The highest values cannot be contradictory. The poet feels what the philosopher thinks and the unity of value is suggested by the harmony of the consciousness of values, but this is not to say that the values are identical. Aesthetic values involve an element of contemplation quite different from thought and not to be confused with it. It is not its core but its habiliment. That is what is meant by saying that poetry is emotion recollected in tranquillity. In aesthetic appreciation the immediacy of feeling is followed and modified by the solvent of recollection and contemplation. In rare cases, however, due to the integrity and strength of the feeling, its character is hardly modified by the second process, but in other cases the molten ore of feeling is cooled in the mould of contemplation. It is "the sense sublime of something deeply interfused."

We have seen that values have the completeness of finality, that is, we are aware of them as perfect wholes.

Now in poetry there are several elements or ingredients. There is the form, there is the matter, there is the scaffolding or frame-work of ideation or plot—but the mere aggregate does not constitute poetry in essentialness. Permeating and fusing these there is the quality of inspiration which transforms these various elements into an indistinguishable whole. It is the consecration without which poetry cannot be itself.

"The light, the gleam that never was on sea or land," transmutes the ingredients of poetry till these are fused, and glow with the prismatic colours of the poet's dream which also consecrates them.

The word consecration is significant. It underlines the spiritual element to which all exalted inspiration ultimately leads. Just as there is the rationale of feeling in poetry, so there is also the rationale of the spirit in poetry. The quest of poetry under the right conditions of inspiration becomes the quest for the Holy Grail. Just as there is ethical purity or holiness so, too, there is poetic purity and dedication in terms of the integrity of inspiration and its attendant corollaries. The Galahads of romance have their counterparts in the realm of poetry as revealed through the quest for eternal values, which form the house not made with hands founded on the certitude of realization and not on the shifting sands of transient awareness.

If values inhere in the mind and spirit then it is reasonable to suppose that poetry, which has the minimum of perceptual elements, is best suited among the arts to reveal to us these values at their best and clearest. In poetry we are in the midstream of pure imagination much sooner than in the other arts of motion and sound, which require a broader expanse of sensory bank before we can reach the depths of the stream. In poetry the transformation from perceptual to conceptual is quickest and the perceptual element, such as it is, most tenuous. In all true poetry the conceptual element has power to resuscitate the perceptual not through any sensory medium but by the intensity or concentration of mind which makes the perceptual element of a poem "flash upon the inward eye" which constitutes one of the most exalted and refined pleasures the mind and spirit are capable of experiencing. It is subtle as telepathic communication; it demands a rare intuitive sympathy with the pristine inspiration of the poet and is the highest form of communion between man and super-cosmic reality which men call by different names and pay homage to in diverse manners.

ESSENTIAL QUALITY

This brings us to the essential quality of all enduring values—mystery and wonder which become deeper the more we try to realize them, for they are the forms through which the quality of the Infinite is conveyed. The objective quality of mys-

SHAKESPEARE'S TRAGIC SOURCE

By Prof. JOHN J. PINTO

THE whole truth of Shakespeare's tragedies does not lie in the Renaissance world, the spirit of whose chivalry and the torch of whose culture set his imagination aflame; nor in the spring of Helicon of whose waters he drank deep; nor in the pages of Aristotle, whose definition of dramatic art he may have known, which he put into practice within reason; the truth lies, more than in any of these, in the palpitating heart of London, to which centre of fashion and learning he hastened, not entirely with the dreams and ambitions of youth, but chiefly with the hopes and fears of a fugitive, not from Justice but from an impossible situation. The heart of London where he lived and tasted the wine of fame, reaped the comforts of fortune, the heart that throbbed with pain and emotion, and felt the throes of birth of a new Age, this heart was the rich source of his tragic art. The sorrows of London, of England, of Catholics, wrung groans from his human heart, felt as a hidden spring, intimate, integral, personal for in and through them he voiced his solidarity with his people; their agony was his agony, their calamities, his calamities, for their country was his and their God his God. Here we must seek the deeper truth of his tragedies.

Every great poet is the child of his Age, not always in harmony with its spirit or in sympathy with its culture; often in antagonism bemoaning the tyranny of the present, recalling with nostalgic pathos and fervour the glories of the past, some order of society that reflects his Vision; or looking forward to the dawn of the future: so it is with Shakespeare. If we fail to understand and appreciate the conditions that governed his life and moulded his genius we do him an injustice and his work an injury, for that work is the urn holding not only the ashes but also the fire of his time; it is the mirror in which we can see the pageant of life, not shadowy figures but men and women of flesh and blood, in whose fate we read the destinies of nations. How can we understand the agony of tragic emotion unless we know the cause of Shakespeare's sufferings, for out of their womb came the child of his creation, Tragedy! His emotionalized thought took its fire from the temple of Society; with that fire Dante had set ablaze the regions of his Inferno! We can apprehend his thought and understand his emotion only if we study them in relation to his age, in relation to his sorrow, personal, social, universal, in relation to that religious movement which decided the fate of England, which found, not a mutual compromise, but an arbitrary settlement devised by cunning and imposed by force.

II. Its Basis: The State of England

"Something was rotten in the State" of England! It was the legacy of the Reformation which like a witches' cauldron had brewed a charm of many ingredients religious, political, social. A society in conflict, with no hopes of an honourable compromise as there was little promise of justice and freedom of worship! Ill gotten wealth from the dissolution of monasteries sharpened greed and hardened the lines of division. The Marian restoration, perhaps inspired by lack of wisdom, and the much exaggerated fires of Smithfield, kept fresh in the minds of men by Foxe's Book of Martyrs, the restoration made somewhat ineffectual by the shortness of Mary's reign, the loss of sympathy by her marriage to Philip of Spain—these were contributive causes of the Elizabethan predicament. Elizabeth quickly repudiated her virtuous avowal of loyalty to the Church made solemnly to appease the suspicion of her sister: "I pray God that the earth may open and swallow me up, if I be not a true Roman Catholic." She took off the mask from her face the moment the Crown was placed on her head and before the sound of her voice taking the Coronation Oath died in the ears of her audience.

The death of Mary Tudor marks the end of a civilization; the coming of Elizabeth marks the birth of a new Age. The creation of this Age was the deliberate work of a woman great in many ways, miserably small in others. But without the assistance, perhaps the inspiration, of William Cecil would she have achieved what she did, would she have realized her dream? To that no positive answer is possible.

The New Age, then in the making was shaped by religion more than any other single force, for experience teaches us with no little conviction that religion exerts the greatest influence, makes the deepest impressions; it moves men to hate when in their pride they dare to challenge God, and arrogating to themselves the prerogatives which belong to Him, deny His existence; it inspires men to sacrifice and self-immolation when out of love they surrender to His will and from the depths of sorrow, misery, misfortune lift the cry: Thy Will be done! So England learnt in all the bitterness of religious conflict, which like an explosive shattered the social order and destroyed national peace and harmony.

How many pens through the centuries have sung the praises of the Golden Age of Elizabeth! And yet, amidst its blaze of glory stands a pillar of smoke that darkens its skies and casts its black shadow on its brilliance: Persecution! Not since the days when the Romans shouted with drunken joy and frenzy: Christians to the lion! and watched with tense excitement crowds of men, women and children kneel in the stands of the arena with fear in their hearts, but prayers and psalms on their lips, waiting to be torn to pieces by wild beasts maddened by hunger; not since then was there such a Reign of Terror;—the fires of Smithfield cast but a pale glow on the Night of this horror which seemed to grow darker and darker as the years passed, as if Dawn would never break, peace and joy never return. Sad it was to live in fear-ridden England, sad for Catholics, and for those whose hearts were still human.

Over the people who once worshipped freely in their churches, their very persecutors kneeling beside them, hung the shadow of death. Their voices were hushed, their minds confused, but in their poor, afflicted souls there still flickered the Faith of their fathers. Fines, imprisonment, torture, death had done what they could to wipe out Catholicism; Mass was forbidden; the law compelled all to attend Protestant services. The rich were impoverished and the poor humbled. Gloom settled over the lives of the faithful. To be a Catholic was to be a traitor, a stranger to the land of his birth; so the Law decreed! In this situation only the brave dared to believe in the Old Faith.

The Elizabethan Age was boisterous in every sphere of life. It stirred men to their depths, excited their emotions, agitated their thoughts; it lifted their horizon and widened their imagination. Englishmen saw the beginnings of their Empire, of power and wealth, and the thought swelled their hearts with pride and ambition; they also saw and tested the bitterness of religious conflict, and the experience filled their hearts with shame and sorrow. And the duality of Life with its conflicting passions, dividing as it did their loyal ties, shaped two cultures; the Protestants found much to love and praise, the Catholics much to condemn and deplore; they walked different paths, they breathed the same mixed atmosphere. Those who could poured their dreams and hopes, their sorrows and fears in their passionate songs; because their emotions were inflamed, their songs are rich, because their thoughts were deep, their poetry is great. And the greatest singer of them all, perhaps because the most representative, deeply moved, profoundly impressed by the most moving and impressive pageant it was his happiness and misfortune to witness, the greatest singer was Shakespeare.

Into this world of storm, marked by fear, hate, misery, doubt and suspicion, fit nurse for a tragic poet, entered Shakespeare somewhere between 1585 and 1588, fugitive from the dangers of Stratford-upon-Avon. The time was auspicious from the viewpoint of creative Art, for stirring events leave on the mind a lasting impression, sad and turbulent conditions act like leaven on the aspirations of the poetic soul: Mary, Queen of Scots, was put to death in 1587. In 1588 Philip II's ambitious hopes were shattered, with the defeat of the invincible Armada began England's greatness at sea: and the persecution then reached a terrible intensity.

Shakespeare was no country bumpkin entering a world of fancy, to be too quickly lured by its fashions, too easily duped by its confidence-tricksters; he was perhaps lost in wonderment, but he was soon disillusioned for the impact of a rebellious life, where Rachel bewailed her suffering children, was too great, too insistent, too emotional for him to ignore it; he was too much of a realist to find peace and security in escapist literature; he was too much of an idealist to surrender to overpowering melancholy. The songs of the Sirens charmed his ears, the cries of the Catholics touched his heart; but the bud of genius opens slowly into a flower, opens slowly under the pressure of the winds that blow. The grapes must ripen before they are crushed into the chalice of Art!

If Shakespeare was not a Catholic the entire fabric of his thoughts is a Castle in Spain! His work is an eloquent testimony to his Faith, Orthodox conventions, ritual, practice, tradition meet in him; he speaks as one who is familiar with the liturgy and doctrine of the Church, with that naturalness and intimacy which could come only from one "to the manner born", for the beliefs he professes in his dramas are the habits of his mind; even pagan forms are inspired and sustained by Catholic ideas. Deny his Catholicism and his work is a contradiction; accept it and his work is coherent, comprehensive, expression of a system, and, read against the background of his Age, illuminating.

The Mass, Holy Eucharist, Confession, Grace! Anyone speaking of these with pious respect, understanding, and theological correctness is tainted with Catholicism; a better profession of his Faith is hard to imagine; Shakespeare does not only refer to their usage, but to their inner significance and meaning, he mentions and employs them with that appropriate exactness which in the fitness of things comes from knowledge, practice and conviction. In a thousand other ways does the poet reveal his Catholic Faith, always with propriety, reverence, affection. His marriages are sanctified, for marriage is a sacrament; his sin is born of the flesh that fails, destroys the beauty of the soul, dehumanizes, degrades; regeneration, redemption rises from the crucible of pain and suffering; or the whole person, body and soul, degenerates and becomes evil,—its greatest punishment. Shakespeare's friars are lovable because they are a happy blend of priest and man, who do not confuse their power and duty with sympathy for they feel like men and teach like priests. In questions of religion and morality he is orthodox, strictly conservative and distinct from the mocking spirit of the Reformation.

We are safe in concluding that Shakespeare was a Catholic from his birth. There is little doubt that his father was true to the Old Faith; father and mother kept the Faith alive and burning in his young heart, surely with greater care because of the dangers that would assail it. Generally speaking, he came under the influence of teachers who were Catholics or in sympathy with Catholicism. So educated, so trained he fled from Stratford, a refugee, to London, to a larger world full of difficulties and temptations, there to fall and rise through bitter experience and terrible knowledge. What if he began in a humble way, held the horses of the great outside The Theatre? he soon mounted Pegasus and scaled heights never before reached! He found a patron, the Earl of Southampton, courted his favour with VENUS AND ADONIS and THE RAPE OF LUCRECE? repaid his patronage and friendship with the SONNETS; gave him immortality for the benefits received. He may have met Fr. Southwell, —he certainly knew him in his poetry; during stolen hours in some crowded room in the quiet of the night, he may have listened to his sermons and, thus strengthened, broken away from the Dark Lady of the Sonnets, though his reformation was slow; the redemption of a soul lost in such circumstances is often a slow process, for the devil and the flesh are powerful foes, the battle long and fierce, but the cry of agony that came from that tormented soul found its echo in the world of his tragedies; how it blended and strengthened the lamentation of a Catholic who sealed his solidarity with the Church Militant by mingling his sorrow, his sighs, and his groans with the passion with those who suffered and whom he saw suffer!

Gentle Shakespeare, loved by all who knew him, was sensitive and affectionate; possessing a lovable nature who could resist the charm of his personality though some feared the edge of his wit, as his friend Ben Jonson had cause to know; but Ben, proud and learned, was at least an honest man, honest enough to love Shakespeare and praise him for what he was, man and poet. If he had but put wax in his ears or been more faithful to his God, he would have escaped the arms of his siren; but he heard her seductive song! Degraded by sin, covered with shame, he had the good fortune of opening his soul to grace: at last when hope was near to despair, he broke the chains that bound him, but the terrible experience left a deep impression on him, and he gave full vent to his wounded feelings and excruciating thoughts in the most tragic yet grandest poetry ever written; his tragic plays, like the Confessions of St. Augustine, are the autobiography of his hell-ridden soul, and the hell was not entirely of his own making, but partly of the persecution which he witnessed, which he escaped, the horrors of which filled his imagination with their ghastliness, with gloom, till despondency seemed to sink into despair. His personal sin, negligence of his Faith, brought the tragedy of his people closer to him till it bruised his heart, filled his bosom with agony, his soul with depression; was this the end of the world? Had God abondoned man to his folly, left him to his own devices? Then hope were dead and faith a vanity! But in this Night he saw a ray of hope,—the Counter-Reformation. He saw a change, religion was awakening in the breasts of many, as it revived in his own; he saw in a Vision Chaos gathering into peace and order, defeat yielding to victory, despair giving way to hope and faith; if the Night was dark, cold bitter the Dawn, warm, smiling, cheerful, was not far behind. This Vision he saw in the certainty of Truth and Beauty and unfolded in his tragedies all the bitter of it and the sweet.

Research has thrown light, rather indistinct, on the lost years of his life in London, on his haunts, friends, activity, making him a more familiar figure than he ever was; but silence broods over one aspect of it: his reaction to persecution, torture, priest-hunts: like impenetrable darkness it seems to desceand on these most vital and bitterest experiences of the life he was fated to witness and taste. But silence is often more eloquent than speech, and Shakespeare's silence is pregnant with celestial fire. Out of its womb came the bleeding child of his tragedy. When sin had done its worst, guilty conscience and repentance were already awakening his prodigal soul, the spectacle on which he gazed touched the spring of his deepest feelings filling him with desire to utter his Jeremiad on his Age; but prudence dictated caution. He raged in silence until speech became imperative and the pain in his heart was hidden yet expressed in the intensity of his tragic emotion. Silence speaking with the tongue of poetry contributed to the genesis of his tragic Art. A Catholic, alive to the gloom and misery of the painful situation, could not but feel for the sufferings of the members of his Church. till silence, imposed by the unhappy dilemma of the hour, became unbearable.

The mystery of this silence is provocative. Why was he compelled to hold his tongue and then to speak in parables? Was the motive purely selfish? The fear of recognition was real and reprisal a possible danger. He spoke of other matters, but he did not dare tear the veil from the face of things, though that veil concealed very little, though he did dare to be niggard in his praise of Elizabeth; his murmur, playing half-heartedly on a muted string, is deafened into uneasy silence by the blaring trumpets of other poets,—Spenser, Marlowe. "Discretion was the better part of valour". Moreover, open criticism may have condemned him to absolute silence, and he was most anxious to speak, to show the temper of the Age. And speech may have brought suspicion on innocent heads, suspicion, with its attendant evils, harassment, fines, persecution. Let us not forget that his spiritual and moral reformation was neither sudden nor easy. When he suppressed the urge to speak, for probable reasons, he did no little injury to his moral being; his gloom deepened, he brooded like Othello, Hamlet, Lear till a cry was torn from the agony of his heart, till he heard the echo and re-echo through the world of his creation. And yet the terrible irony: of his hope, fear, despair he might speak; speak too of the misery and agony, of the scandals of the hour, of tyranny, intrigue, treason; he might sigh for order, harmony, peace, for a strong and just monarch, a Henry V; but he might not speak of the horrors of the persecution, of torture, — he may have hidden Topcliffe in his villains! — of priest-hunts: over these he could only brood in silence, in anger, in pain.

IV. HIS PROPHECY

Shakespeare's plays are an insidious piece of Indictment: the sound of the wind that was to deafen the ears of the audience begins in an inconspicuous manner in the Comedies, gathers volume in the Histories, reaches its highest pitch in the Tragedies, lessens but does not fade in the last plays; insidious piece of indictment, but the spirit that animates and the meaning that inspires them are but "sickled o'er with a pale cast of thought."

We do not enter a closed world of personal feelings; we do not listen to the sad story of a lonely heart, grieved by sordid love, tormented by sin. His heart sighs in unison with the bleeding heart of the Church, and reaches out to the despondent heart of mankind sunk in the fury of hate and despair. We enter an open world, for the universal tragedy in which we read the destiny of a nation, the fate of Society, does not issue from the spring of personal sorrow, limited and separate in its finiteness.

The first period may be considered as the unconscious but congenital preparation for the great corner-stone of his work, the central piece of his Vision. As early as the first Comedies we feel the pulse of his discontent. Through his humour, refined or hilarious, rings the voice of his mockery, sounds the tone of his serious thought. He ridicules Court life and mocks courtiers with tolerant suspicion and humoured contempt. His disagreement, his resentment, his impatience, the deepening shadows of his fallen hopes, increase their pressure on his sorrowing spirit as we enter the world of his Histories: here he treads on dangerous ground, touches delicate points, flirts with ambiguous situations, but with the assurance and boldness of his growing power he revives the past to edify the present through pertinent themes, chosen with care and applied with a purpose. The Sonnets tell us a more intimate tale — they are not only an effusion of personal grief, they are also a lamentation of social wrongs. And then with a sudden rush — so it seems — comes the flood of his tragedies, like a great Deluge covering the shores of his Being with its violence; it is a cry out of the depths which rends the veil of the Temple of Jerusalem! The sound like a blast reverberates through the world till it fades and dies, till through the overcast skies we catch a glimpse of a breaking Dawn! The shadows shift, the skies fall, but the heavens remain, resting on Faith and Hope: the mist melts, disorder resolves itself into order, peace returns when over the raging waters is heard his voice in imitation of his Lord: Peace, be still! The last Comedies give us a glimmer of this Vision; they are an aftermath where emotions are still stirred, but the murmur of their waves makes sweet though sad, sad but sweet music in tired ears: we hear the Swan song of a great Singer.

Shakespeare went to Holinshed and Plutarch with deliberate purpose; he chose periods resembling and illustrative of his Age; he treated them with pointed argument, pressing home his moral if only they could understand his meaning: this is specially true of his tetralogy, RICHARD II, the two parts of HENRY IV and Henry V: "Know you not, I am Richard"! In their pages he found apt illustrations, in the spirit they breathed fitting analogies, in their very language a wonderful cover for his thoughts and feelings. It is suggested that in his close imitation of Holinshed and Plutarch he paid the highest tribute, one genius could pay another, for on the intellectual plane there are no national barriers, no shame in honest and artistic transcript; if he found it necessary to change the language of their 'inspired prose was he not expressing his artistic taste, acknowledgement, fellowship? With no stretch of the imagination can this be called plagiarism. There is a measure of truth in this conclusion. But is it not possible that there is a deeper reason? Is it not more plausible that in such open imitation Shakespeare found it expedient, prudent, safe to portray his Age in the recorded words of those who painted other periods, other scenes?

The liet-motif of his Histories is true kingship. He dreamed of a King like Henry V, uniting in himself the practical virtues of a ruler and the excellent qualities of a man. In the face of civil dissensions, social division, of differences that inspire misunderstanding, suspicion, hate he preached unity, trust, friendship, which could only flow from a stable government under the presiding genious of a just, good and strong monarch, deserving respect, love, loyalty. Again and again he insists on the need for a strong, good and just King who would respect the rights of his people giving them security in peace and freedom, for thus is the dignity of the Crown ensured and its responsibility discharged; he repeats this idea till it becomes an obsession, and the obsession is a mirror, not so much of Shakespeare's sentiment as of his ominous judgement. With Elizabeth and Cecil controlling the religious destinies of the country what hope could he hold out to Catholics but what true Justice can bring? No discriminating Catholic, however loyal to Queen and Country, could approve their religious policy, hostile to the freedom of worship, malignant in the execution of Penal Laws. One could admire her for her practical wisdom in the sphere of politics; none could respect her, for respect is attracted and held by character; one could give her tragic pity, nothing more: and Shakespeare did not see in her a ruler worthy of praise.

Across the dark and bitter world of his Tragedies there is no fatal inscription: Abandon Hope, ye enter here! Whatever the state of his emotions, whatever the condition of his mind, there was no pessimism in his soul, — there could not be or his faith would be an illusion and his repentance, inner conversion, a lie. As the horizon darkened, his mood changed, and his awareness of the Dawn beyond the gathered clouds moulded his thoughts and in spite of appearances gave him the Vision of the only possible hope for men caught in the maelstrom of terrible misfortune. In his Comedies and Histories he sought to reform his nation with gentle satire, with pointed criticism, with harmless scorn couched in a smile, with appealing sympathy in the heart of laughter for he felt that a little correction, a small warning, a fine example could save her from her degenerate course; but the little he did could not arrest her flight into disaster. Hope gave way to deep despondency, his imagination was haunted by spectral horrors; he wrestled with a night of fears, saw and felt the conflict between Good and Evil, played with the Supernatural as only a man full of faith could, with the assurance of a religion whose Temple was made not with hands but by the power of God, whose grace infused Eternal Life into the dust of its earth! In this mood he felt that Society must be destroyed before it could be re-built; it could only resurrect from its ashes; this Vision which he unfolds in the midst of the shadows, thunder and lightning of his tragic world could not come from the finiteness of Protestant belief which stripped the Church of her Divinity, but from the Infinity of the Catholic Faith. Here alone is proof enough of Shakespeare's Catholicism.

The Spirit that inspired his Tragedies is constructive; pessimism could not possibly envisage a world made whole, a Society cured of its mortal

A MYSTERY STORY

THE WAITING KNIFE

BY

BRUCE CASSIDAY

THIS late afternoon of a bitterly raw January day, fog lay thickly over the white patches of snow in the silent Connecticut woods. To Diane Andrews, peering out through the front window, it seemed as if the mist was woven in and out of the trees like streamers of gauze. She shuddered and drew back when she saw that Alec Bern had not yet arrived. There was no movement anywhere in the wooded area, and that was as it should be. Her nearest neighbour was half a mile down the road.

She thought again that Dr. Marcus might have been right: perhaps she should not have come directly home from the hospital to these lonely woods. Perhaps she should have spent a day or two in her New York apartment, getting used to being with people again after her long convalescence. But she had been quite insistent on coming to the Connecticut house immediately, and Sam Ward, her attorney, had gotten it ready without voicing any objections.

She went into the back bedroom to unpack Alec's portrait of her, and had just opened the closet door when the front doorbell rang. She turned, and, thinking it must be Alec, ran through the house and opened up.

A little old lady stood there. She was solid and determined, with gray hair and rimless glasses. She wore a neat dark suit and held a black leather purse in her hand, making a picture almost grim in its simplicity.

She smiled stiffly. "Is this 24 Cedar Glen?"

"Yes. Of course it is."

The woman looked expectantly at Diane, as if she were awaiting an invitation inside.

"What do you want?"

The woman smiled fleetingly. "Why, to look around." She moved forward, pushing rudely past Diane.

Diane stepped aside, unthinking. But as the aggressive little woman walked into the entryway, a wave of hostility rose in her.

"Of all the insolence!" Diane cried out, her voice trembling. "What's the meaning of this? Who are you?"

The little woman turned, solid and sturdy, staring blankly at Diane with bottomless gray eyes. 'I'm Mrs. Bernays", she said officiously. "I've come to look the place over." Her voice hardened. "I'd think you would at least offer to show me around."

"Show you around?" Diane cried, realizing with dismay that her voice was trembling, that she was almost shouting. "What are you talking about? Why are you coming in my house?"

The woman stood back, surveying Diane with the astonishment that only the very unimaginative can show. Then, without another word, she gazed about the living room impatiently.

"But all the things are still here", she burst out with annoyance. "I understood everything was in readiness for immediate occupancy". Her gray eyes swung back to Diane.

Diane stared, putting her hand to her throat. This woman was surely mad. Her visit made no sense. And yet, a strange foreboding of disaster rose in Diane.

"Immediate occupancy?"

"But of course!" the little woman said, standing there pouty and sprightly as a banty hen. Her voice took on an impatient, outraged tone. "They said there would be no delay. They said all the effects of the previous tenancy were removed." The woman seemed to swell up in ruffled anger. "But I can see that everything is still strewn about."

Diane, outraged, holding her fists tight to her sides, shook her head. "You've made a mistake. If someone told you this house was for sale, you've been misinformed. I'm sorry."

The woman's frown deepened. "But they said the owner had died suddenly, and that the house was on the market." The woman opened her purse and drew out a want ad. "Here, Look."

Diane, curious, took the clipping and read it.

> FOR SALE: 5 room cottage on 2 acre wooded plot. Exclusive residential area. Immediate occupancy. Must sacrifice due to owner's death. 24 Cedar Glen. Midland.

Smiling faintly, Diane handed the clipping back. "It's an obvious error. The wrong address, perhaps."

The little woman's face reddened. Her lips pushed together in a determined line. "But, see here, I've come all the way out from town, spent several hours in finding the place—"

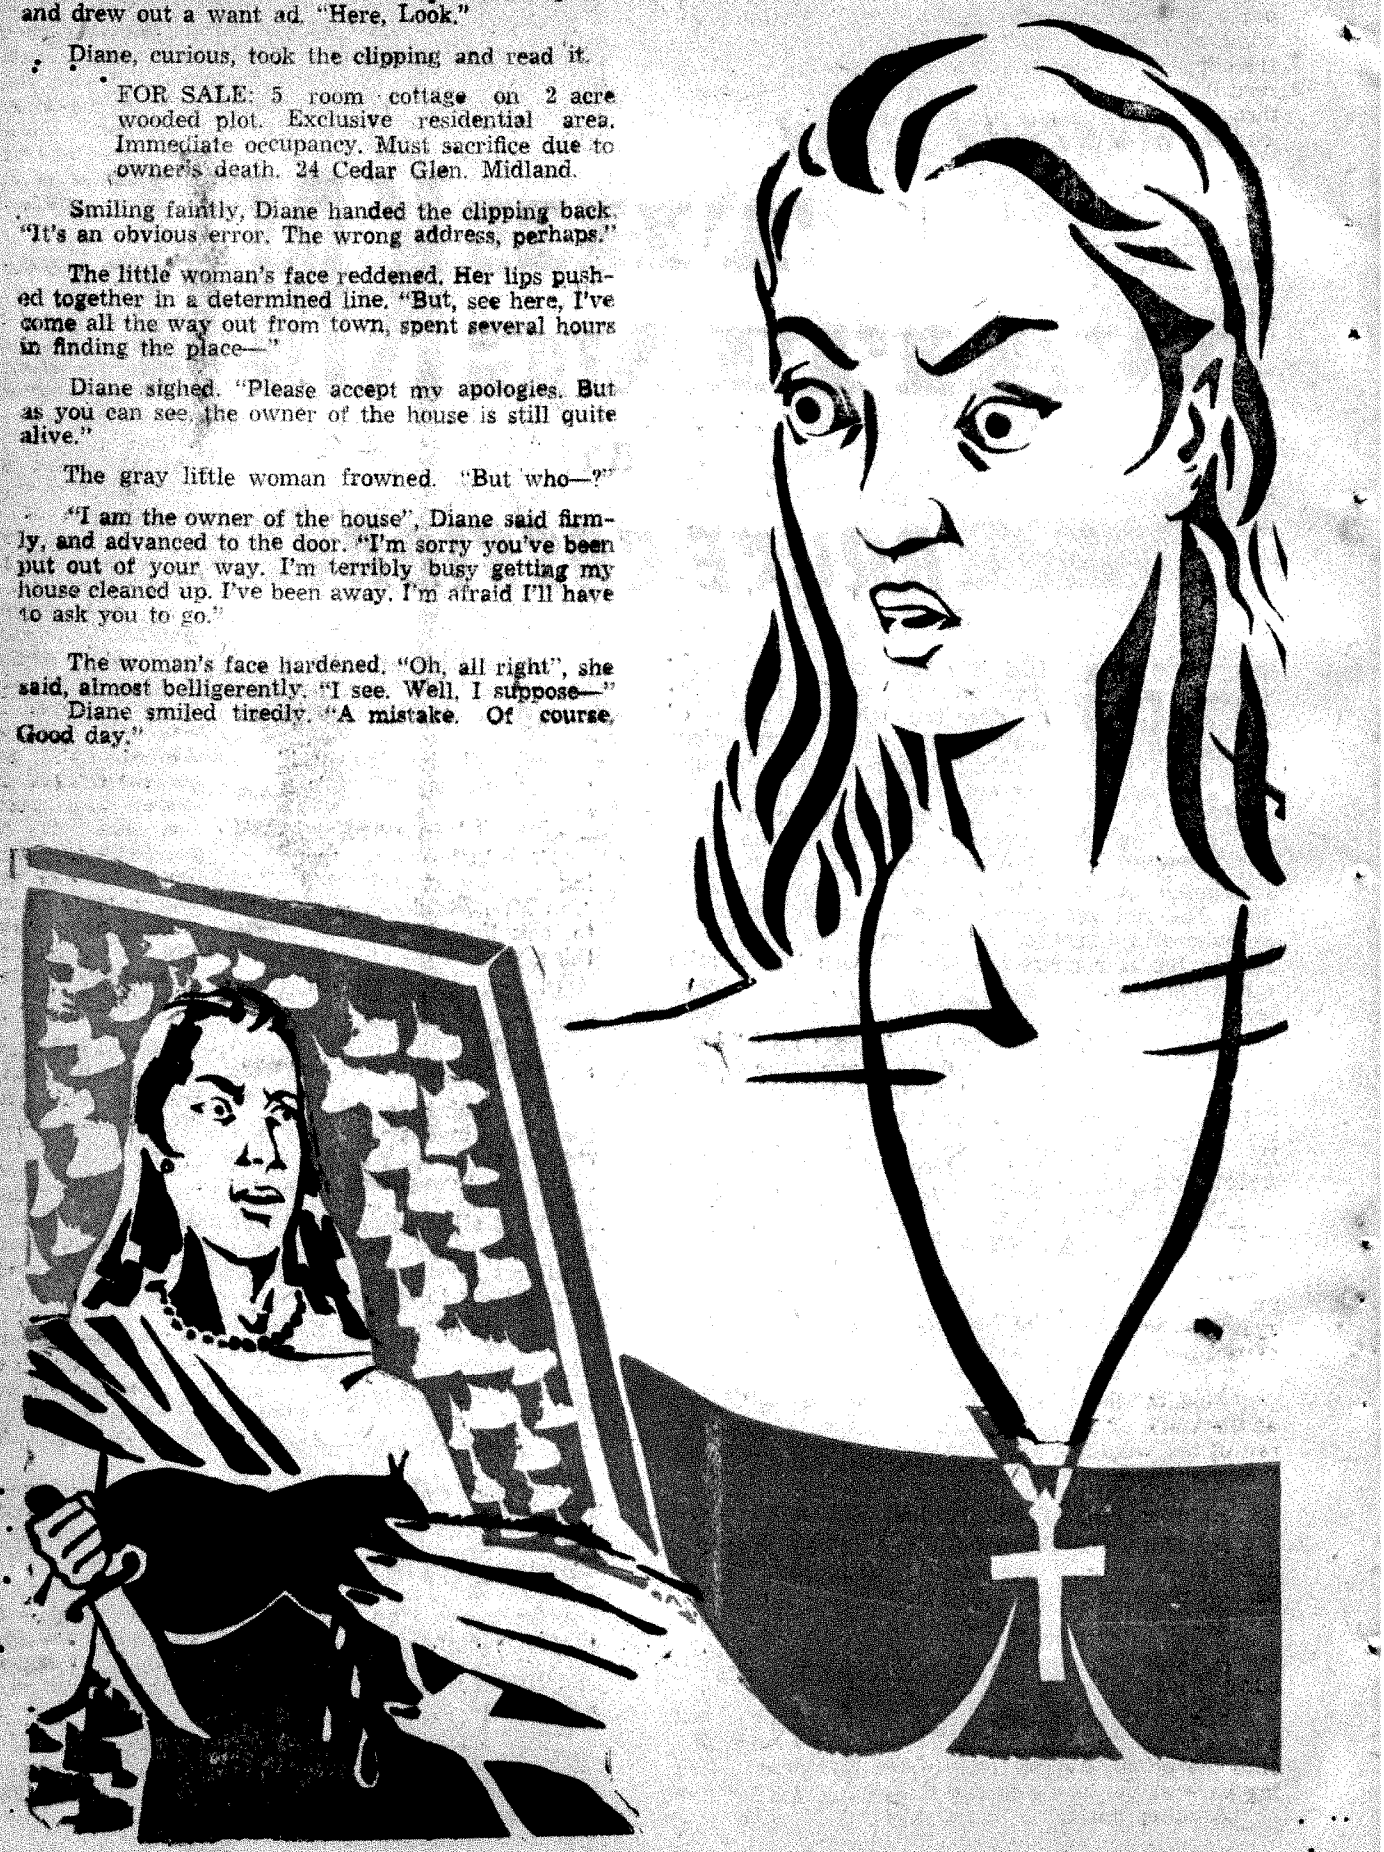
Diane sighed. "Please accept my apologies. But as you can see, the owner of the house is still quite alive."

The gray little woman frowned. "But who—?"

"I am the owner of the house", Diane said firmly, and advanced to the door. "I'm sorry you've been put out of your way. I'm terribly busy getting my house cleaned up. I've been away. I'm afraid I'll have to ask you to go."

The woman's face hardened. "Oh, all right", she said, almost belligerently. "I see. Well, I suppose—"

Diane smiled tiredly. "A mistake. Of course. Good day."



The woman, still shaking her head, walked out onto the front porch, gripping her black leather purse determinedly. Diane watched through the window. Halfway down the walk the woman took the clipping out of her purse and looked at it again, read it carefully, and stared back. Then she tramped through the patches of snow to the road, and went out of sight in the fog.

Diane sank into a chair. It was silly, but somehow her bizarre interview with that intense, aggressive little person had completely unnerved her. She leaned back wearily and closed her eyes. All the energy seemed to have drained out of her. She had seemed so good at the hospital, and certainly able to come home. But now, after one small, inconsequential encounter with a total stranger, she was shaky and jittery again. For no reason at all. Because of some stupid error a typesetter had made.

Sighing, she stood and walked into the bedroom again. As she passed the big mirror in the open closet door she saw the reflection of her pale face, her enormous eyes, her unpainted, pale lips. Her cheeks were almost gaunt. She started at that with a sinking feeling. But then, she told herself, she had been sick a long time. She put her fingers to her cheeks. Her skin was smooth and young. A little colour might help.

She put lipstick on, and looked again, and felt better.

Diane watched through the window.

Pushing the closet door open, she stared down at the stack of oil paintings on the floor. Alec's portrait of her would be among them. She bent over, and then she heard a sound at the door.

Another visitor? she wondered. Or Alec?

Hopefully she hurried out and pulled open the door. There was no one on the porch. But, behind her, on the door.....

She fell back, staggered at what she saw.

A large frighteningly beautiful funeral wreath hung there on her front door!

She tried to stifle her scream as she stumbled back against the door jamb. Dazedly she moved out onto the porch, staring into the fog, and then looking back at the door and the wreath.

Another mistake?

No. This time she had really had a visitor. Death.....

Then, with one of those curious emergences of faith that is the strength of the human race, she felt a surge of relief. Obviously someone had seen that foolish want ad in the newspaper and had mistakenly sent a wreath of condolence to 24 Cedar Glen. That was all there was to it. Diane touched the wreath. It was beautiful, expensive. Queer, she thought, how death always brought such expensive gifts.

Shuddering, she took the wreath down and carried it into the house. Now, she really must get Alec's picture out of the closet. She pulled the stack of canvasses out, calmed by the simple physical therapy in lifting and sorting.

As she looked at the paintings one by one, she was struck again by what a talented painter Alec Bern was. His native genius had been the first thing to attract her to him, of course. It was only natural that she, with all her advantages of money and position, should try to put him on his feet and make his art support him. He had no money, and no prospects of any outside resources.

What had begun as a casual arrangement had in time ripened into romance — a romance that had been ill-fated from the start. Diane's health, never too strong after her first breakdown two years before, had broken suddenly and she had been forced to spend months at a rest home. And now, once again, she was ready to take up where she had left off with Alec.

She found the portrait. It was number thirteen in the pile, lying face down. She lifted it, amused over the "bad luck" number, the "death" number, thirteen. She turned it over.

And all the life drained out of her.

What had been a portrait of Diane Andrews smiling and holding a bright red rose was now the portrait of a smiling, evil-eyed woman, holding a gleaming, curved-bladed dagger, dripping bright red blood.

And worse, than that, just over the woman's heart there was a jagged wound, freely bleeding, sending the red blood streaming down her defiled white dress in a cascade of sudden death.

CHAPTER—II

DIANE Andrews flung herself on her bed, sobbing brokenly. It was no use trying to get her mind off that ghastly picture. She saw it again and again, seared into her brain: the bleeding heart, the dripping knife, and the strange, half-mad expression in the eyes of the woman in the painting.

It had changed! It had altered all by itself! It was a portent. Or rather, the other two incidents had been portents, and this was a prophecy. Death was waiting for her here in this house. It was that simple, that horrifying.

She stopped sobbing. She lay on the bed and became calm suddenly. There must be some rational explanation of these three things, she thought reasonably.

She stared at the ceiling for a long moment, and then sat up on the bed. She had walked the tightrope stretched over insanity for so long, undoubtedly she was imagining all this. She was still in that twilight region where she could not trust her own judgment.

The painting was lying on the floor, near the other canvases, face down where she had dropped it. It must be, it had to be, the old familiar painting of her own face. With steadily mounting confidence, she reached out her hand and turned it over. Hoping against hope.....

The ghastly image of Diane Andrews with the dripping knife, with the bleeding wound, mocked her. She stared at it a long, trembling moment, marveling at the reality of the blood on the bosom, the slashed flesh, the curved blade of the knife. A craftsman had painted it. A craftsman every bit as good as Alec Eern.

As she stared at the canvas, a thought occurred to her. Suppose this was an earlier painting of Alec's that she did not know existed. Suppose her own remembered portrait lay at the bottom of the pile she had as yet not uncovered.

Eagerly, hopefully, she turned the rest of the paintings over, one by one. The old mill. The field of sunflowers. The red barn. The brunette girl. The old lady at the cider mill. And then she came to the last one.

She turned it over.

Her breath caught in her throat.

The last one was the old familiar painting of the brindle cows grazing in the green Connecticut fields.

The "bleeding" portrait must be the same one Alec had painted the year before. Strange, incredibly, it had altered itself and had turned into that ghastly painting of the mad woman with the knife.

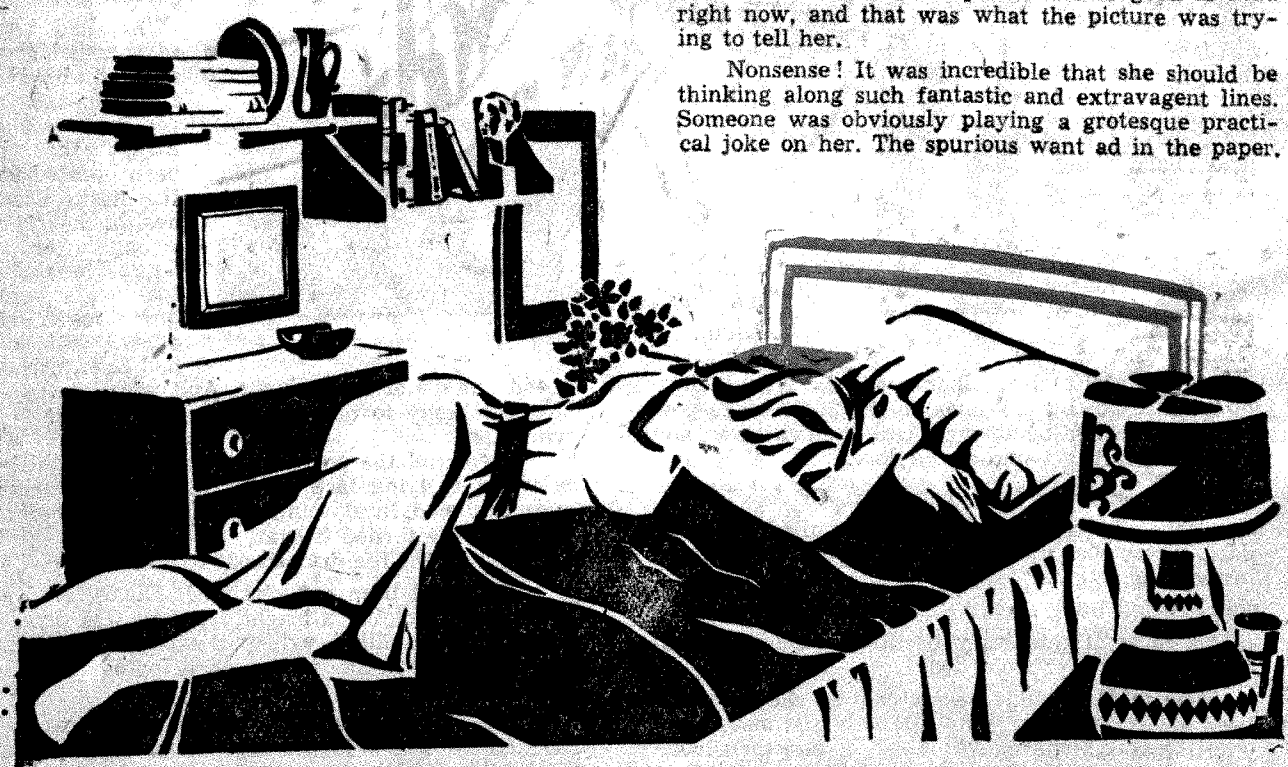
Stunned, light-headed, she piled the rest of the oils in the closet, leaving the damnable portrait of herself propped up against the wall. The half-demented eyes of the woman in the picture watched her unblinkingly as she went about her work.

Her own eyes.

She remembered vaguely a story she had read long ago—the story of an evil, lecherous man, who had retained his youth and his good looks through years of debauchery and vice, and his life-size portrait had slowly altered, revealing the ravages of time, and of the evil in him. It was a fable, but the story had stuck in her mind, had haunted her after she read it.

And now ,in her own home, perhaps the same thing had happened. Perhaps Diane Andrews had figuratively killed herself—through her own extravagances, her own squandered life, her own foolishness and mistakes. Perhaps she was as good as dead right now, and that was what the picture was trying to tell her.

Nonsense! It was incredible that she should be thinking along such fantastic and extravagent lines. Someone was obviously playing a grotesque practical joke on her. The spurious want ad in the paper.



Diane Andrews flung herself on her bed.....

The funeral wreath delivered to the wrong door. And now the substitution of this morbid portrait for the beautiful one of her.

She went into the living room again, opened the front door and looked out. It was still a gray January afternoon, with heavy mists woven in and out of the bare, denuded trees.

Through the long expanse of woods surrounding her house, Diane could see no movement. Several hundred yards away, through a sudden hole in the fog, she made out the dim shape of her nearest neighbour's house down the hill. But no one was in sight. To the north, of course, there was nothing but woods. And across the road, a steep hill, studded with huge trees, vanished into a thicket of cloudy mist.

There was not a sound.

She shivered, not so much from the damp, cold air, as from the loneliness about her. The sense of emptiness, the sense of wasteland, the sense of gloom that had oppressed her during her worst days in the rest home.

She should have taken Dr. Marcus's advice and stayed in New York before coming to Connecticut. She should not have let Sam Ward, her attorney, go about opening her home. Alec had been insistent, too, though. In his letter to her, he said he blamed himself as much as he did her for all that had happened. Now he wanted to patch up any misunderstandings between them. As if there had been any, Diane thought. It was just her accursed weakness.

So she had ignored Dr. Marcus's mild protests, and come into the woods the night before, to fix the house for Alec's arrival.

Alec would arrive sometime in the late afternoon—four-fifteen, he said. He was leaving Roanoke, Virginia, in time to get to New York in the middle of the day, and he should be coming to Midland a little after four.

That was why she had been trying to get Alec's portrait up. Now, she realised, she must put it away, and concentrate on preparing dinner. Sam Ward had hired old Mrs. Bowen to set the house in order. Unfortunately, Mrs. Bowen, who had stayed with Diane last night, would not be able to help out tonight. She had long ago promised to do a baby-sitting job in Midland.

She picked up the eerie portrait, pushing aside all the forebodings and ominous feelings that crowded in on her as she touched it. She put it in the closet on top of the other paintings, and closed the door tightly.

Closed out the memory of the horrid picture.

She strode purposefully into the kitchen, feeling as she did so that she must look quite like the little old lady who had pushed into her living room earlier.

Now, in retrospect, Diane smiled. It was an embarrassing mistake for anyone to make. It would put anyone's back up. She was a fool to have worried about it.

On an impulse, she turned and lifted the telephone receiver. She dialed the number of the Midland Gazette, the newspaper carrying the ad the woman had clipped.

She was referred to a nasal sounding girl on the classified ad desk.

"You've made a mistake in one of your real estate ads today", Diane said. "I thought I'd report it so you could correct it in tomorrow's edition."

The girl was silent a moment, and then she said: "Which ad is that, please? We're very careful with our classifieds. We seldom make mistakes."

Diane laughed tolerantly. "The house for sale on 24 Cedar Glen."

There was a long moment's silence, and then the girl was back on the line. "What is the mistake, please?"

"This house is not for sale."

"I'm sorry, but I have the insertion notice right here. What is your name, please?"

"Miss Andrews. Diane Andrews."

"Yes, ma'am, that's right. 24 Cedar Glen. Isn't that correct?"

Diane laughed again. "But that's incorrect, I live here. It's my house. But it's not for sale."

The girl sounded confused. "But I have the notice right here in front of me. It reads exactly like the ad. And the insertion notice is signed by you. Have you changed your mind?" The girl's tone took on an edge.

Diane was unable to speak for a long moment. "You say you have an insertion notice signed by me?"

"That's right. Miss Diane Andrews. We received this insertion notice through the mail. Along with a money order for the amount."

"An insertion order from me?"

After a short pause, the nasal girl spoke up. "Yes, ma'ma. Mailed in from you at Roanoke, Virginia."

CHAPTER—III

SLOWLY Diane Andrews hung up, keeping the handset clenched in her fist for a long moment.

Roanoke, Virginia, she thought, desperately. How could a communication have come in from Diane Andrews in Roanoke, Virginia? Obviously someone had mailed it in her name. Someone was playing a bizarre joke on her. Someone in Roanoke..... Roanoke!

And only one person she knew could be in Roanoke: Alec Bern!

She sat there, clasping and unclasping her hands. She must concentrate. She must focus her mind on this new problem. She must reason out why Alec Bern would be playing such a monstrous joke on her.

He had said he loved her. He had sympathized with the six-month stay at the rest home. He knew she had been dangerously ill. He knew she needed rest and relaxation. He knew that any disturbing thing such as this must surely upset her, and perhaps send her back into the care of Dr. Marcus.

Why, then, was he doing this to her?

On impulse she rose and walked into the bedroom again, opening the closet door. She pulled the top painting off the pile and brought it out into the bedroom. She leaned it against the wall, and stood back looking at it. The mad woman with the knife in her hand, and the slashed cut on her breast, stared back at her.

It was almost an inescapable conclusion that Alec had painted this over the original portrait. It could have been any painter, but it was probably Alec. Especially since it was Alec who had sent the notice to the Midland paper about the sale of the house.

But why ?

She stared at the painting. And got her answer.

Suicide. If Diane Andrews, stunned first of all by a newspaper item advertising her house for sale due to her own death, and then further depressed by the accidental placing of a funeral wreath on her front door, if Diane Andrews, barely through sustaining these blows, were confronted with the picture like this of a maddened woman mutilating herself—then perhaps Diane Andrews would slip back into that world of unreality she had just emerged from, and plunge a knife like that into her own breast.

But it didn't make sense, Diane realized, snapping out of her mood of depression and misery. Why should she want to commit suicide? Why should she destroy herself? She was going to see Alec tonight. Alec loved her. He wanted to marry her. It was all planned.

Unless.....

Unless Alec had changed his mind !

The thought struck her with tremendous force. If it were true that Alec had changed his mind about her, then perhaps he was using this method to tell her he was through with her, and give her the mad woman's way out.

Perhaps there was truth in Dr. Marcus's fears about her. Perhaps Dr. Marcus had told Alec something he had not told Diane. Perhaps she was still ill, sicker than she thought. Perhaps she was incurably sick. Perhaps Alec, in his love and sympathy for her, had decided to help her on her grisly way; perhaps he thought it was the best way out for her.

'Alec was a frequent escort of Mildred

She shook her head. It didn't make sense. Alec would certainly use a more direct method. He would speak to her. Tell her.

Or — would he?

Whatever his reason, it was almost certain that Alec Bern had inserted that ad in the newspaper. And that Alec had repainted that portrait of her, adding the knife, and the blood.

Had he also sent the funeral wreath ?

A moment later Diane was at the phone again, dialing the first of the three florists in Midland. From the first she got a negative answer; no wreath had been delivered to 24 Cedar Glen. From the second, the same.

From the third she learned that the wreath had been ordered the morning of the day before. And it was to have been delivered at four p.m. of that day. Had it been delivered ?

"Yes", Diane said weakly. "Could you please tell me where the order came from ?"

There was a short silence. "Yes, of course. Here it is. From Diane Andrews."

Her voice was barely a whisper. She had expected that, somehow. "Where ?"

"It doesn't say here, ma'am. I'll have to get the record book. The order was phoned in."

"Telephoned in?" Diane's voice quickened with sudden hope. "From Midland ?"

The man said, "Let me look, please. Just a moment." After some rustlings and murmurings, his voice finally came back on the wire. "From Roanoke, Virginia, ma'am," he said. "It was a long distance telephone call."

She nodded and slowly hung up. It was true, then. Both the want ad and the wreath were no accident. They had been the deliberate plannings of a methodical mind. A mind that was trying to build up an unholy terror in her. A mind that had clearly and coldly calculated the prospects of survival for a marriage between Diane Andrews and Alec Bern—and decided against it.

She rose and paced the room, her mind in a turmoil. She remembered Dr. Marcus's caution to her : Don't let yourself get upset, Diane. Once you begin worrying, once you begin probing deeply into all your motives and actions, you'll go completely back into the world of unreality.

She stopped abruptly, cleanching her hands at her sides until she could feel her nails biting into the plans of her hands. She must stop this ! She must think, think, think !

She peered out the front window, hoping that the sight of the gray, bleak world out there would at least bring her back to her senses.

Her thoughts turned again to Alec. And the first remembrance of Mildred. Mildred Canning.

Before Diane had met Alec Bern, he had been a frequent escort of Mildred Canning. Mildred had impressed Diane as a social climber, and a narrow-minded person at best. And apparently Alec had felt somewhat the same way. There had been less and less of Mildred Canning in Alec Bern's life, and more and more of Diane Andrews. Mildred and Diane had had several energetic scenes over Alec, Mildred accusing Diane of buying Alec Bern with her money and her financial support.

Mildred, for all her veneer of sophistication and delicacy, had the constitution of a horse, and was psychically sturdy. Perhaps in Diane's absence she had made hay while the sun shone, and had won Alec back.

That would account for a reason that Alec might have changed his allegiance to Diane. With Mildred continually nagging at him day by day, she might well have convinced Alec that life with a psychologically unsound woman like Diane might prove impossible. Even distasteful.

Yes, thought Diane, that would be like Mildred. That would be like her, through and through.

It was growing dark outside. Diane sprang up and peered out the window. Evening came quick in Connecticut in January. And with the darkness came a sense of depression and hopelessness that she could feel acutely.

She snapped on the electric light and glanced at her wrist watch.

Five o'clock ! Good heavens — Alec should be here already. And she hadn't made a move to prepare dinner. Luckily it had been all planned. She had only to put it in the oven.

She walked into the kitchen, and then stood stock still. If, that is, Alec was coming. Would he come ? If he had been responsible for the ad and the wreath, did he intend to come ?

She thought back to his last letter. He had mentioned being in Midland by four-fifteen. It was already five o'clock. She used the phone again. Yes, the four-fifteen had come on time. No, it had not been delayed. Yes, it had gone on through.

She moved out into the kitchen mechanically. Alec had been held up somehow. She had missed the taxi at the station. A thousand things could have happened.

She clung to that hope desperately.

Or, she thought wildly, he could have decided not to come at all. He could have decided that he was through with her, and that the best way out for her was the way shown in that portrait.

By taking her own life.

Absently she opened the drawer to get out a tablespoon, and she saw it.

It was a long-bladed knife, with delicate scroll-work on the handle, and a curved, cruel blade. The blade was honed to razor sharpness.

It was the model of the knife in the picture. And she knew what she had to do with it.

CHAPTER—IV

DIANE Andrews turned the knife over and over in her hand thoughtfully, studying it carefully. It was no knife she had ever seen around the house before. When she had gone to the rest home, and left the house in the care of Sam Ward, it had certainly not been there in the kitchen drawer. And yet, unquestionably, it was there now. And it had been placed there for one obvious purpose.

It had been placed there so that Diane Andrews could use it the way her twin in the portrait had used it.

But had it been placed there by Alec Bern?

She sat down by the window and stared out into the bleakness of the darkening woods. She didn't want to believe that Alec Bern could be doing all these dreadful things to her: trying to drive her mad and frighten her into suicide.

But who else could it be?

She sat bolt upright. Of course! There was one other person who might logically want Diane to destroy herself. Mildred Canning.

Mildred would believe, "All's fair in love and war."

She must have found out that Diane was coming back to Connecticut, and that Alec was coming up to join her. Mildred had ordered the wreath, had placed the knife in the kitchen drawer, had put the ad in the paper, had altered the painting.

She had wroked it all out to perfection. All she needed to do was sit back and wait for Diane to collapse from hysteria and plunge the knife into her breast.

Alec was innocent. Naturally. And the reason he hadn't come yet was because Mildred had detained him in some subtle, cunning way. Now all Mildred had to do was keep Alec away from Cedar Glen until Diane put the knife in her heart.

With sudden determination Diane stood and strode across the room toward the silverware drawer. She pulled it open and thrust the curved knife in on top of the silver. Then she pushed the drawer shut and smiled triumphantly.

Mildred Canning would get a little surprise! Diane Andrews was not going to do what Mildred had so cleverly planned for her to do.

With a start, Diane looked at the clock. It was now about six o'clock. Alec was over two hours late. Or had Mildred tricked him into not coming at all?

No matter what, she had better go ahead with the dinner as if nothing had happened. That would be Dr. Marcus's suggestion, she was sure of that. The activity of preparing food would certainly take her mind off the grisly series of incidents that had jarred her out of her convalescence.

Concentrating on the details of cooking, Diane Andrews moved about industriously in the lighted kitchen, and found that the mere fact of doing something with her hands did take her mind off the thing she was too terrified to think about.

It was at the moment she put the salad in the refrigerator that she heard the noise outside.

She went over to the kitchen window and looked out. But it was pitch black. All she could see in the long French-type windows was her own reflection. Her pale, drawn face, her slender body, her slightly awry hair. When she saw her hair she immediately put her hand to it, patting it in place.

There was no repetition of the noise. She shrugged and went back to work. She had already imagined too many things today.

She was setting the candles on the table in the dining room when she heard it again.

She stood there a long moment, staring toward the tall rectangular window in the dining alcove. There was nothing visible but the blackness of cold night through the glass, and a shimmering reflection of her own dress. But, unmistakably, she had heard some noise out there. She listened now, intently, but there was nothing. She lived deep in the woods. There were houses around her, but none close enough for any sound to carry. There were no automobiles to be heard. No planes overhead. Nothing which could have made the sound she was positive she had heard.

Imagination, she shrugged.

But this particular sound started a whole new train of thought in her mind. She was in an isolated section of the Connecticut woods. Residential, yes, but far off from other habitations. If anything were to happen to her up here, she would be helpless.

She had a phone, yes. There was no need to worry. She had never worried before. Why should she suddenly feel panic at the repetition of a strange sound outside in the dark?

Now, when she thought of it, it did not seem reasonable that Alec Bern should be trying to kill her. It did not seem reasonable, either, to suspect Mildred Canning. Mildred would be much more straightforward if she decided to get rid of Diane

It was a huge giant of a man.....

She would not use such a complex method. She would never think of a wreath, a want ad, a painting, and a knife. She would do it by taking the man she loved, and completely disregarding Diane.

Of course! That was the way Mildred would have proceeded.

Diane crossed to the phone and flipped through the desk book she had beside it. In it she had Mildred Canning's address in Roanoke. With the address, she could certainly get the telephone number and speak to her. If Mildred was guilty, Diane could tell by the sound of her voice.

It took several minutes for the connection to go through. And then after a moment's pause, she heard Mildred Canning's nasal, drawling voice.

"Hello?"

"Mildred!" Diane said. "This is Diane Andrews."

There was a stunned silence. "Diane!" Was it Diane's imagination, or did Mildred actually sound glad to hear her? "It's been years since I've heard from you. How are — feeling, dear?"

Diane frowned. Mildred's concern was genuine. Diane murmured something vague.

"But, Diane, it's so nice of you to call me up. Is Alec there?"

Diane stared at the receiver, as if it were a snake or a tarantula. Then she forced herself to speak. "Not yet."

"He must have been delayed. I know he's planning to be there. He was so excited. Honestly, Diane, I never saw a grown man so excited over a trip in my life!"

"You saw him today?" Diane asked hoarsely.

"But certainly! He came over to see Vic and me."

"Vic?" Diane repeated weakly.

"My husband, Diane! I'm married. Didn't you know? Oh but, of course not. Alec was going to tell you. Oh, yes, It's been four weeks now, and I feel like an old married woman."

Diane slowly held the receiver loosely, listening to the prattle of Mildred. It seemed obvious that Mildred had not sent that wreath. And, from Mildred's comments about Alec, it was just as obvious that Alec had not been trying to avoid seeing Diane. It was equally obvious that Alec had missed his train, or had been detained in some way.

Who then, had been responsible for the painting, for the wreath, for the want ad, for the knife?

She hung up and stood there, her body near to trembling again.

And the sound came for the third time. This time louder. A faint slithering and scraping.

Like a sleep-walker, Diane forced herself to cross the living room and approach the window. It was pitch black out now. The stars shone in the monstrously black sky. Her breath clouded the window pane in front of her. She looked to the left and the right, but all she was aware of was the reflection of the pale, jumpy, drawn face in front of her, the face of a woman driven past the brink of terror.

The sound came again, louder. Through the reflection of her own face, she saw the huge hulking shadow of something out there. A malevolent shape. A ghastly apparition.

Only the thin pane of glass separated her from whatever it was. And then in an instant of horror, the thing came into focus, and, looking through her own terrified expression, she saw what it was.

It was a huge giant of a man, a misshapen beast, crouched out there next to the house, a giant of a man with a huge moon face, with round goggly eyes, and the moronic grin of a mad man. His eyes were gleaming. He mouthed obscene words — or so it seemed to Diane — and pointed to the front door.

Then he disappeared.

Diane, frozen, remained glued to the spot.

She heard the door knob rattle. Rattle hard.

She ran for the kitchen, stumbled, and fell to her knees. The door continued to shake as if it would burst open.

CHAPTER—V

DIANE Andrews hung there, suspended in an eternity of fear, kneeling on one knee, trying to keep herself from collapsing. Shivers coursed through her whole body. Her stomach was knotted up into a tight ball.

The door banged and thumped, and then she heard a strange, eerie voice.

"Diane! Diane!" It came from far off. It called from another world, a world of distances and distorted sounds.

She half rose, crouched there, staring down ruefully at her nylon stockings, both out at the knees from her fall. Resolutely she stood, turning and facing the front door. Fear tugged at her but she moved forward stiffly.

"Diane!" the voice came again, louder this time, firmer. More human. More recognizable.

And then Diane realized who it was.

"Sam!" she cried, moving swiftly for the door, and pulling it open with a flourish.

The big man moved in from outside, holding out his hands to her. For an instance she could not make out his face, and she had a panicky feeling that it was not Sam Ward at all, but the giant of a man with babbling lips and mad eyes she had imagined through the front glass.

And then the light fell on the big man's face, and he reached for her, touching her shoulder.

"What's the matter, Diane?" the big jovial man asked, turning her face up so he could see her eyes. "I knocked and knocked, but you didn't answer. I got worried. I came around to see if I could find you. I knew the light was on. I got worried."

Diane frowned. "Knocked? But I didn't hear you, Sam. I really didn't".

The big man's eyes narrowed just the slightest, and a puzzled look came into them. He stood back just a fraction of an inch and searched her face. Then he threw his head back and laughed. He was a genial, hearty man, a man with zest and spirit. He was huge and rough, and yet at the same time his hands had a strange gentleness to them. The way they had now, touching Diane's shoulder.

Almost tender.

"This is a surprise, Sam. I'm expecting Alec—Alec Bern, you know", she said simply.

Sam Ward moved over to the big divan and sat down. He pulled a pipe out of his tweed jacket and put it in his mouth. He felt around in his pocket for matches, and brought out a small folder, applying one of them to the bowl of his pipe. He sucked on the stem and got it going and then grinned at her. He leaned back and crossed one big leg casually over the other.

"Don't worry about me, kitten. I won't stay around and hamstring your little tete-a-tete. I just dropped by to see if everything was in order."

She stared at him. She knew he was not trying to draw her out or find out if she was well enough to be left alone. "Of course everything is in order, Sam."

She felt his eyes on her.

"You'll pardon me for saying it, but I think you seem a bit jumpy, Diane."

She laughed fitfully. "I guess it's just getting back to the house after all that time away." She glanced around, trying to change the subject. "I think you've done a marvellous job of readying up for me."

Sam Ward smiled. "Mrs. Bowen is certainly a gem. But then, you know all about her."

Diane debated in her mind a moment: should she tell Sam Ward about the want ad, about the wreath, about the painting, about the knife? No. Common sense ruled it out. What good would it do? Quite possibly the whole thing was a ghastly mistake. A mistake like the one that had made her see Sam Ward through the glass as a grinning mad man with gleaming eyes and wet, slavering lips.

The big man reached into his breast pocket and pulled out a folded paper. He handed it over to Diane. It was a heavy legal sheet, folded in four places.

She looked puzzled. He pointed his pipe stem at it. "Your new will, Diane. The one you wanted made out for you."

She stared down at the papers in her hand, trying to understand. She could not honestly say that she remembered anything about it at all. But then, there were so many things lately that she couldn't remember. Or understand.

She looked up puzzled into Sam Ward's apprehensive face. "Diane. You do remember, don't you?"

She moistened her lips and smiled faintly. "Yes, of course, Sam. I remember." Even if she was lying, he must accept that as indication that she did at least believe him. She unfolded the papers and read them.

"The will", Sam explained, as he might to a child. "Your new will. You wanted to change your beneficiary to Alec Bern."

She frowned. "Before we're married? But is that legal?"

Sam's eyes suddenly flowed with compassion. He shrugged. "I did what you'd asked Diane. It is a little strange, but I understood you wanted it that way." He reached for the document. "If you've changed your mind..." His eyes searched hers.

Pride, or shame, prompted her. She shook her head, retaining the paper. "No. If I said to make out the will, I meant it." She looked it over. "Let me sign, and you can be on your way." Sam Ward grinned and puffed on his pipe. Then he took the pipe out, stared at it, found it had gone out again, got out his folder of matches. He lit the tobacco, puffed on it contentedly, and laughed. "Waste more matches on this thing."

Diane was rumaging through her purse for her fountain pen. She came over and signed the document on the divan's end table.

"I can't imagine why I shouldn't remember", she said finally, when she had finished and was putting the cap back on the pen.

Ward paused a moment and looked at her keenly. "Then you did forget talking to Alec about it."

She turned, startled. "Alec? But I thought you said I talked to you about it."

Ward frowned. "No I didn't say that. It was Alec. He came to see me in New York two days ago. He told me you'd have mentioned the change to him at the hospital."

She felt her hands clasp convulsively together. She bit her lip to keep from crying out. Shudders passed through the length of her body.

"Diane!" cried Ward, hastening to her. He took her in his huge bear-like arms and steadied her.

against him. The solid bulk of his body was comforting to her. He was like a father to her, a solid rock to lean on.

"Oh, Sam!"

And she broke down, crying and sobbing without end. She lay on the couch, and Ward sat gently next to her, patting her on the shoulder, soothing her, his pipe cold and forgotten on the end table, sitting just on top the paper that Diane had signed, the new will that told her exactly why Alec had painted that picture, why he had ordered that wreath and why he had inserted that ad in the paper. To drive her mad and get her money.

For a long time she lay there, shaking and unable to speak, but finally she got her tongue back, and in a few words she told an astounded, sympathetic, and then violently angry Sam Ward exactly what had happened to her on that strange afternoon.

The big man's jaw jutted out like a rock of Gibralter. "He can't get away with it, Diane! We'll prosecute him within an inch of his life. He's trying to unnerve you, to drive you back into madness, so he can gain control of your money."

Diane nodded. "I guess so. I never thought...."

"You're too trusting, Diane", Ward said solemnly.

"Yes, Sam. It was Alec all along."

Sam left the room and returned with a glass of milk. "Diane", he said. "I've warmed this up for you. The best thing for you to do is take a glass of it, along with a couple sleeping pills, to calm yourself."

Groggily, Diane nodded. "Yes, Sam, if you say so." It was hitting home now, the terrible truth that Alec Bern was trying to take her possessions, take her love, take her life, even. It was not a pleasant truth to face. She was tired, so terribly tired. One glass of warm milk and a couple sleeping pills would certainly help. On an empty stomach she felt weak already.

The glass of milk was set on the table. She reached out for it, took it in her hand, and then, just as she started to tip it up to her lips, she gave a sharp, pitiful cry, and slumped down inert on the couch.

The glass fell to the floor, and the warm milk spread out rapidly in all directions.

In Diane's white face there was a frozen expression of terror and hopelessness—the expression of a person driven quite past the point of no return.

Failure

BY

Rabindranath Tagore

IF the head and tail of a fish or Rahu and Ketu the baleful planets were placed side by side, what would they look like? This was the exact situation here. The aristocratic ancient Haldar family had split in two and lived back to back in their enormous family mansion, partitioning it with a wall through its centre. They did not see each other's face.

Nabagopal's son Nalin and Nanigopal's son Nanda were from the same family of the same age, they went to the same school and there was complete unity between them as regards family hatred and inter family rivalry.

Nalin's father Nabagopal was a very strict father. He scarcely allowed his son any breathing time from constant unalloyed study. All cravings of the son for games, fancy food or dress, he suppressed under school books and home work.

Nanda's father Nanigopal's discipline was very lax. His mother sent him to school most neat and well dressed. Besides she gave him about three annas for tiffin. Nanda became quite famous by using and giving away at will such luxuries as fried spices, "kulfi" ice cream, kite reels and marbles.

Feeling in his heart that he was defeated, Nalin often thought—If Nanda's father were mine and my father occupied the place of Nanda's father, then I could have taught Nanda a lesson.

But while such an opportunity was awaited, Nanda kept on getting prizes every year. Nalin came home empty handed and slandered the school authorities as partial. His father sent him to another school, engaged another private tutor, cut off an hour from his sleep and added it to his study but there was no change in the results. Nanda was successful in every examinations and went beyond the B.A. degree. Nalin failed and failed and remained stuck in the entrance class like a trapped rat.

At this time his father did him a good turn. He died. After three years of rigorous imprisonment in the entrance class, he was liberated. Free Nalin glittered, decorating himself from top to bottom with rings, buttons, watch and fob chain and tried hard to dim Nanda's lustre. The coach and pair and four-horse carriages of the entrance failed easily to outran the single horse buggy of the graduate. A university degree could not keep pace with Waler horses.

On the other side search began for suitable brides for Nanda and Nalin's marriage. Nalin had sworn that he would marry only such a girl as would be near impossible to duplicate. Nanda would surely have to be defeated by his carriages and his wife.

The man who wants the very best of all has perforte to discard many good ones. Nalin did not dare to select and complete his marriage with any girl near at hand, due to fear that some one even better may slip past him and go to another's destiny.

At last there was news of a Bengali gentleman settled in Rawalpindi, who had an exquisitely beautiful daughter. The distant beauty always seems more desirable than the beauty available near home. Nalin got intoxicated. The girl was brought to Calcutta at considerable expense. She was really a beauty. Nalin said that no matter what one did, none would have the capacity to find easily such good looks as could beat the Rawalpindi girl. At least no one would be able to say that we saw this girl already but did not select her for we did not like her well enough.

Negotiations were almost over fixing the match, arrangements for the engagement ceremony went on, when one morning rows of servants and maid-servants streamed out from Nanigopal's house, carrying varied presents on ornate "thalis".

Nalin said, "Go and see, what is the matter."

It was known that engagement presents were being sent to Nanda's chosen bride.

Nalin at once stopped smoking his hubble-bubble. Agitated, he sat up straight and said, "Information must be had."

Immediately a messenger went racing in a hired hackney carriage. Bipin Hajra returned and said, "It is a girl from Calcutta, but an exquisite girl."

Nalin's heart sank. He said, "What do you say?"

Hajra only said, "An exquisite girl".

Nalin said, "I have to see into this."

His hanger-on said, "That is not difficult." So saying he made an imaginary coin ring, using thumb and fore finger.

So saying he made an imaginary coin ring, using thumb and fore finger.

Nalin created an opportunity and saw the girl. The more he thought that this girl was quite irrevocably meant for Nanda, the more he felt that this one was better than the Rawalpindi girl. In a fever of anxious doubt he asked the hanger-on, "What do you think?"

Hajra said, "Sir, to our eyes she does seem good."

Nalin asked, "Who is better, this one or that one?"

Hajra said, "This one is better."

Then Nalin thought that this one's eye lashes were a trace thicker than that one's; her complexion was a bit too pale compared to this one. In this one's fair complexion a tint of yellow had blended with gold. One could not possibly let her go.

Nalin lay down flat on his back, very depressed, and while smoking his hubble-bubble said, "Oh Hajra, tell me what can be done."

Hajra said, "Maharaj, where is difficulty?" So saying he again rang an imaginary rupee between thumb and fore finger.

When in truth money began to jingle noisily, due results were not delayed. The daughter's father started a terrible row with the bridegroom's father on a slight pretext. The bridegroom's father said, "If I get my son married to your daughter, then..... etc., etc."

The girl's father redoubled his attack and said, "If I give my daughter in marriage to your son then.....etc., etc."

So Nalin cheated Nanda and without any waste of time quickly completed his auspicious marriage ceremony at an auspicious hour. Then laughing he said to Hajra, "This is what is really called passing in the B.A. examination.* What do you say Hajra? Now our Bara Babu of that other house has failed."

Soon after, one day drums and "sehnai" music began to play at Nanda's house. It was Nanda's turmeric bath ceremony before marriage.

Nalin said, "Look Hajra find out who the bride is."

Hajra returned with the information that the bride was that girl from Rawalpindi.

"The girl from Rawalpindi! Ha ha ha," Nalin burst out in hilarious laughter. "The Bara Babu of that other house could find no nther bribe but is marrying our discarded one." Hajra also laughed a lot.

But gradually Nalin lost the strength of his laughter. A worm entered into his laugh. A tiny doubt whispered in his ears in a sharp edged voice, "Alas! you lost her. In the end she was to be Nanda's!" The tiny doubt slowly became bloated like a swollen leech, its voice too grew strong. It said, "Now, she cannot be had anyhow. But really she is a great beauty. You have been badly cheated."

When Nalin went to the inner house of women for his meals, all the tiny blemishes of his wife loomed immense and mocked at him. He felt that this wife of his had swindled him dreadfully.

Nalin took out the photo he was sent when his marriage proposal was going on with

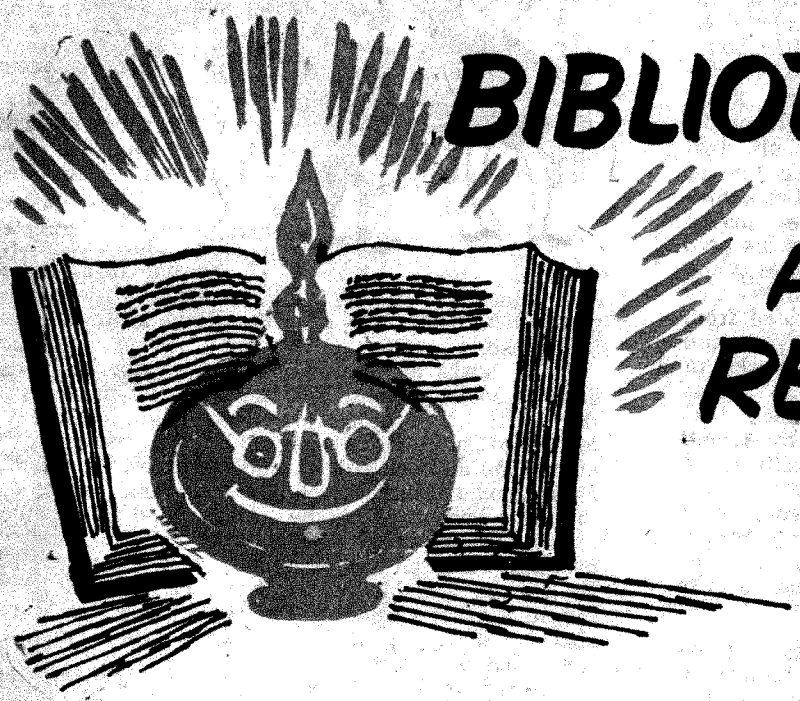
BIBLIOTHERAPY

A NEW REMEDY



By
C. R. BANERJI

SO far we have been reading books for acquisition of knowledge, recreation and attainment of professional skill. A new use of books is being gradually developed in the U.S.A. and in some European countries during the last forty years. It is the use of books for the treatment of the sick. Attempt to introduce this system in hospitals and clinics after the First World War was regarded as a fad. But today more and more librarians and physicians are becoming increasingly aware of the importance of books in the treatment of mental illness. Reputed hospitals have opened new departments for treatment of patients with books. Even well-known specialists are no longer sceptical about the success of this new cure.

This science of curing disease with the help of books is called 'Bibliotherapy'. Bibliotherapy is "the use of carefully selected books for therapeutic purposes". The relationship between our mind and body is very close. If the mental balance is upset we become ill. When the body is affected the mind suffers. Physicians therefore advise patients to keep their mind free from all cares.

Diseases which owe their origin to the mind are particularly amenable to bibliotherapy. Works of imagination have great influence on our mind. It is, therefore, nothing new to offer patients suitable books in order to make their mind cheerful. The doctor first investigates the reason for the loss of mental balance and then prescribes books which are most suitable for the removal of the cause. For example, a patient who has become ill after being frightened for some reason or other must be given books which will inspire courage and remove all fears and apprehensions. A patient who has lost all hopes and who is pessimistic about his future must be given books which will generate new hopes in his mind. There are again patients who suffer from unfounded jealousy and meanness of mind. To cure them of their disease they should be given books, the study of which will enable them to rise above all pettiness.

Bibliotherapy may be self-administered like aspirin pills; it may also be applied by highly specialised psychologists and physicians. The utility of books in curing disease was known even long ago. In olden times bibliotherapy was a self-administered cure. The person concerned selected his own book and derived benefit from it. But it has now become a specialist's job. About two thousand years ago Pliny said that there is no pain in the world which cannot be cured by a good book. Books also helped his digestion. During his meal someone would read out to him books of his choice. If on any occasion, there was nobody in the house to read out to him at the time of his meal he would inevitably suffer from indigestion. The famous Italian poet Petrarch read books everyday as a matter of routine. It was to him like a course of physical exercise for keeping fit. If, on any day he failed to read books, he felt indisposed. Petrarch's friends considered this as a very bad habit and they tried to break it for his good. So, one of the friends one day stole the key of Petrarch's book-case. Petrarch passed a very uneasy day without books. On the second day he suffered from severe headache. Fever developed on the third day. Seeing his condition the friend felt repentant and returned the key.

American author and physiologist Oliver Wendell Holmes regarded libraries as hospitals for the mentally ill patients. The English novelist Bulwer-Lytton realised that desultory reading cannot cure disease. Books must be selected with an eye to the nature of the disease and to the inclination of the patient. As an example he pointed out that a light reading should be prescribed for patients suffering from cold. When the mind becomes inert with deep sorrow inspiring biographies should be offered for study. Bulwer-Lytton believed that the Bible was the panacea for all types of disease.

Famous men have written their personal experience about cure of disease by books. We cannot ignore their testimony. Bulwer-Lytton has written that Dr. Johnson was cured of influenza after going through Piozzi's (better known as Mrs. Thrail) autobiography. In this autobiography there are many engrossing anecdotes about well-known personalities of the time. Hazlitt has testified from his own experience that Fielding's "Tom Jones" was one of the best remedies for indigestion. Robert Louis Stevenson was a tubercular throughout the best period of his life. He said that his tooth-ache and his pain in the lungs were temporarily relieved after going through 'The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes'. The British author Richard le Gallienne has stated from his personal experience that Tolstoy's "War and Peace" relieved asthmatic troubles. The works of Victor Hugo also has curative qualities as far as asthma was concerned. He further testified that reading of Shakespeare relieved rheumatism. Arnold Bennett noted in his diary that he was relieved of neuralgia after going through some dramas which he purchased from a secondhand book-seller at a very cheap price. The English artist Aubrey Beardsley was able to keep his mind cheerful in spite of serious illness with the help of Nietzsche's works and Stendhal's "The Red and the Black".

It has been explained above that careful selection of books should be made after examining the nature of illness and the mental attitude of the patient. Selection of wrong books may aggravate the disease instead of relieving it. Examples are not lacking in this respect. Le Gallienne has said that study of Shelley and Keats would aggravate rheumatic diseases; there is even apprehension of an attack of apoplexy; tubercular patients may yearn for Maeterlinck; but they should be given books by Fielding, Dickens and Balzac. Edward FitzGerald has stated from his own experience that his cure from influenza was retarded because he read Carlyle's "French Revolution" while in bed. Bulwer-Lytton became ill after he read Buckle's "History of Civilization". It was impossible for Coleridge read the Bible while he was indisposed.

The books mentioned above may not be beneficial to some persons. But this does not mean that they will not do good to others having different mental attitude. Donne has said : "To cast my eye upon good authors kindles and refreshes the mind." Here 'good authors' is relative. The same author or the same book may not be equally good to all. And for this reason careful selection by experts becomes necessary. But all are of opinion that the works of Dumas are suitable for all types of patients. It is indeed a great credit for Dumas that his works are also beneficial in case of patients whose disease has defied diagnosis.

Elizabeth Barrett was so ill that she could not leave her bed. A book of poems by Robert Browning kindled new hopes in her mind. Browning was a poet of hope and vigour. There was no shadow of pessimism or sorrow in his works. He wrote :

Elizabeth, who was unable to move out of her bed for many months, gained new strength born of hope after reading Browning's writings. She also had the good fortune of meeting Browning in her room. This personal contact with the vigorous poet made her even stronger. Her strength returned to such a degree that it was possible for her to elope with Browning and marry him far away from her father's house.

We have given above only opinions and criticisms regarding bibliotherapy by laymen, though they are famous as writers or artists. These persons used books like self-administered home remedies. But now qualified doctors and psychiatrists are practising this method of treatment in well-equipped modern hospitals and clinics.

Bibliotherapy is particularly efficacious in the disease of nerve, mental illness and in tuberculosis. Books have proved useful in the correctional methods applied to prisoners. Psychologists also believe that delinquent children can be treated with interesting books. Most of the modern hospitals abroad now maintain well-equipped libraries to serve the patients. Even if books may not ensure radical cure, they can help the patients to create a new world of imagination far removed from the world of disease and pain.

But patients should not be asked to read only

ELEPHANTS WILD and FREE

By AUGUSTUS SOMERVILLE

THERE are two species of elephant in existence, the African and the Indian. The Indian elephant is the only species of its kind found in this country, yet geological remains suggest that no less than seven species of elephant existed in India in remote periods.

The African elephant is bigger than the Indian. It has huge ears and the trunk is provided with two fingers at its extremity. The Indian elephant has only one.

Recent discoveries have shown that the Indian elephant is closely related to the Mammoth. This ancient animal was not the fabled "Mountain of Flesh" it was popularly supposed to be. The height of the better-known Siberian Mammoths was an average 10 ft. which is also the height of the Indian variety, while its concave forehead and smaller ears were similar to the Indian elephant. Under its tail and protecting its anus from the cold, was a thick flap of skin. The Indian elephant has a similar flap which acts as a protection against insects. This is not found in the African variety.

The Indian elephant rarely exceeds 10 ft. 6 ins. at the shoulder, the average height of an adult male being 9 ft. Females are one foot shorter. Twice the circumference of an elephant's forefoot gives a fair indication of its height. This rule however, does not apply to young and immature animals. The colour of an elephant is greyish black. The chest, forehead and ears are often covered with flesh coloured spots.

Usually, only the males have tusks. Tuskless males are called "makna" and are very large in build, with well-developed trunks. The size and shape of the tusks vary in individual animals. A length of four feet is considered quite a prize. With the price of ivory at a record height, the shooting, trapping and even poisoning of males with tusks of only a few feet, is quite common. Gone are the days of record tusks. The Journal of the Bombay Natural History Society records a pair in the Royal Museum at Siam that taped 9 ft. 10½ ins. Record tusks of this length are no longer found in this country.

MOLARS

While tusks are the main object for which elephants are shot or trapped in this country, the teeth are also of considerable interest to sportsmen. At its present stage of evolution, the elephant has discarded all its canine teeth and incisors, except the pair in its upper jaw. These have developed into tusks.

As to the grinding teeth, the elephant develops six molars in each jaw during its lifetime, but the grinders are so large and the jaws so short, that there is never room for more than two at a time, one entirely and the other partially exposed above the gums. As the new tooth forms in the rear of the jaw, it gradually replaces the preceding tooth as it wears away, forcing it out of the jaw.

This peculiar process provides sportsmen with a fairly accurate means of judging the animal's age. The first milk molar is shed at the age of two years. The second at the age of six, the third at nine, the fourth (or first adult tooth) between the 20th, or 25th. year, and the fifth at sixty. The sixth and last serves the animal for the rest of its life.

The appearance of these molars are peculiar, consisting of a series of ridges across the crown of the tooth. This is caused by the wearing away of the dentine. The entire molar is composed of a series of plates, each composed of a flattened mass of dentine, invested by a layer of enamel, the whole bound together in a solid mass of cement. As the softer dentine wears away, the harder enamel appears in a series of transverse ridges riding across the crown of the molar. The number of these ridges vary. In the Indian Elephant, the sixth or last molar may have as many as twenty-seven ridges.

Another interesting detail about elephants are their feet. The Indian elephant has normally five nails on its forefoot and four on its hind. These nails are comparatively small and crinkled, their impression only traceable on very wet soil, but the composition of the foot itself is remarkable. When placed on firm soil, the toes are splayed out and the circumference of the entire foot increased considerably; but when the animal is traversing soft mud or silt, where on account of his great weight he is liable to sink and be literally bogged down, the act of withdrawing the foot, immediately releases a pad of loose flesh, adhering to the base of the foot, which causes the entire foot to shrink and makes possible the withdrawal of the foot from the cavity made on entering. This accounts for the fact that so few elephants are ever trapped in marshy soil.

AGILITY

The elephant usually proceeds at a sedate walk, but when alarmed it is capable of rushing at quite 20 miles an hour, a speed that is not noticeable on account of its huge size, but as many a sportsman has discovered to his cost, it is capable of covering long distances in record time. At climbing up and down steep hillsides it is remarkably agile.

An excellent swimmer, it has one peculiarity that is seldom noticed. When compelled by circumstances to plunge from a height into deep water, the elephant will pause on the edge of the bank. Here after surveying the water for a moment or two, it will deliberately proceed to inflate itself. During this process its circumference visibly increases and when it considers it has reserved enough air to ensure its buoyancy, it will plunge into the stream and swim across. This is a process which the animal employs when bogged down in marshy soil or quick sands. This increased buoyancy enable it to free itself from the grip of the quivering sands. A personal experience will illustriate this.

Some years ago, I was with a hunting party in what in those years was the heavily wooded foothills near Angul. We were proceeding towards the Mahanadi River, intending to cross over to Daspalla, where rumour had it, a man-eater was terrorising the local folk.

As we approached the stream, through a cutting in the embankment, we noticed the fresh tracks of a small party of elephants. In fact, in some places the freshness of the droppings indicated that the animals had only just passed. The Shikari, sent ahead to spy out the land, returned within a few minutes to inform us that the animals were almost directly opposite us on the river bank. Fortunately, the wind was in our favour, so advancing as cautiously as possible, we crept up to the edge of the forest bordering the stream and peered over. Not more than fifty yards from us and standing right at the water's edge was a party of elephants about six in number.

The elephants were all watching the antics of one of their party who was standing in the stream and submerged to a depth of about four feet.

The animal was evidently in great distress. Making frantic efforts to turn round, it only succeeded in sinking deeper into the water. Finally, it threw itself bodily on to the water and in this position, floating partially, it managed to free its legs from whatever was gripping them. A few poserful lunges carried it to the bank where it emerged literally trembling with exhaustion.

All this time, contrary to popular belief, its companions made no effort to assist, but once it emerged from the stream, they gathered round in a body and moved off down the stream to another spo. where they entered the water and swam swiftly across.

Curious to learn what had happened, I walked down the bank to the spot where the elephant had attempted to cross. A warning shout from the shikari stopped me and that man came running up. Selecting a small rock from the many that lay around, he tossed it on to one of those 'churs' that form so frequently in these rivers. The rock landed with a splash and settled on the sand. For a moment nothing occurred then suddenly the entire surface of the chur became agitated. The rock, trembling like a sentient thing, began to sink and in a few moments disappeared from sight and I realized with horror that a few more steps would have taken me on to a belt of quick-sand, one of those treacherous spots that make of these rivers a living nightmare.

HABITAT

Elephants seem to prefer country where the terrain is hilly or undulating and covered with tall forests. As their main food supply is bamboo, they are always to be found in areas where bamboos grow in profusion. Intolerant of the sun, they sleep during the hot afternoons, coming out in the evenings and early mornings. During the night they leave the shelter of the forests and approach villages where they do much harm to standing crops, banana plantations and orchards. They have special liking for jack fruit, dorian and various tubers. An adult elephant may consume 60 to 70 lbs. of green fodder per day.

Elephant herds have one peculiarity which often results in their destruction. When undisturbed they follow a regular routine. Drinking and feeding in accustomed places, moving in single file, they are inclined to adhere strictly to a regular, well-defined track, which invariably follows the easiest and shortest path across country. These trails are known as elephant paths or elephant walks and it is along these trails that poachers await the oncoming herd with home-made guns, poisoned arrows and the like. These are the paths along which deep pits are dug and the animals, terrified into sudden flight with the aid of flaming torches, drums and gun fire, fall into these pits and are later destroyed.

In Burma elephants wander into bamboo forests at a height of 10,000 ft, while in Sikkim their tracks have been observed at 12,000 feet.

The elephant is a remarkably social animal. Herds of ten to fifty are frequently met with in the vicinity of tall forests. Extremely adaptable they are found in the cold, dense forests of Burma and Sikkim on in the hot, humid jungles of Orissa, Mysore and parts of Bihar.

CUSTOM

Most herds consist of family members. Led, usually, by an old and experienced female, they wander over a vast extent of land. It is remarkable how within the structure of their own herd, individual members will conduct themselves remarkably like the various members of any of our Social Clubs. The old and blase married members congregate and feed together, while the young bachelors spend the time independently. The very young, however, keep with their mothers or other cows, who appear to have taken on the task of protecting and nursing them, and this duty is not taken on lightly.

Some years ago, while in Mayurbhanj (Orissa), I was staying at a beautiful, little forest bungalow at a place called Lulung. Situated on the top of the hill, the bungalow was a favourite resort of fishermen keen on Mahasher, of which the stream that flowed at the foot of the hill, was said to be teeming. One evening, while resting on the verandah, which overlooked the adjacent stream, we were constantly disturbed by the trumpeting of a solitary elephant. Eager to ascertain what had disturbed the animal, we wandered down to the foot of the hill and led by the shrill trumpeting, passed through the forest to emerge on a sandy clearing on the banks of the stream. Here an amazing sight met our gaze.

Standing in the middle of the clearing was a young cow elephant. Between her forelegs and probably not more than six months old, was her calf, but this was not what held our attention. Crouched on the sand and not more than 20 feet away was a tiger. Every now and again a deep menacing growl would rumble up and the calf, terrified at the sound, would attempt to escape from between his mother's legs, but each attempt was firmly but gently frustrated by her trunk.

Although we had approached as noislessly as possible, the keen eyes and hearing of the tiger immediately detected our presence and with an angry roar it immediately bounded away into the forest. Frequent trumpeting from the adjoining hills, now informed us that others of the elephant herd were hastening to the mother's aid and so we retreated back to the bungalow as well.

The tiger had evidently come on to the elephant and her calf shortly before our arrival. Afraid to attack the calf while under its mother's protection, it had contented himself with growling and approaching the pair in short rushes, hoping that its approach would so terrify the calf that it would ultimately break away from its mother's side and so provide it with a very satisfying meal.

INSTINCT

Elephants appear to look after the aged better than most other animals. I have seen an old tusker in the Sambalpur Division, guarded and tended by a couple of youngsters of the same herd. At the first indication of danger, these guardians would sound a harsh warning and then hurry the old elephant off into the dense forest, prepared to defend him should any hunter dare to follow. Why this particular elephant was so protected I have no idea, but the local shikaris maintain that elephants know that they are hunted for their tusks.

It is significant how, as soon as they detect the presence of hunters, the entire herd turn and face in that direction. The old bulls, especially, those with valuable tusks, move into the centre, where the females would ring them, as if protecting them from the approaching menace.

Old hunters affirm that this is not done because the elephants know that their tusks are sought after.

but because the females, fearing the extinction of the herd if the males are killed, protect them, as well as, the young animals, by building a barricade of their own bodies round them. I have seen this done on two occasions. It was significant that the Maknas also took up their position with the females.

There is another and oft repeated tale, showing the sagacity of these animals, and the extraordinary social instinct that inspires the entire herd. When one of their members is dangerously wounded, two young males would force their bodies against each side of the wounded member and thus would lead him into the forest and away from danger.

In one instance in Africa a herd of elephants constantly harassed by poachers, with poisoned arrows, and realizing that only the males with large tusks were the target of oppression retreated into the dense forest accompanied by a number of wounded animals and that when these poor harrassed creatures succumbed to the effects of the poison, the rest of the herd, wrenching out the tusks from the jaws of the dead animals, shattered them to bits on trees and rocks, thus making the pursuit fruitless.

COURTSHIP

The elephant does not appear to have any fixed breeding season. Most elephants drop their young at the end of September and as the period of gestation is 20 months, it is apparent that the large majority of elephants mate in March or April. There is a belief that if you spy on mating elephants, the male becomes enraged and it will immediately charge. I do not know the reaction of wild elephants, but in North Bengal, where I had an opportunity to watch the elephants in the Tea Gardens, no such display of temper occurred.

Elephants are affectionate beasts. I have watched the male courting the female, rubbing its head against the cow and caressing it with trunk. During the actual act, the cow goes down on its knees and the bull covers from the rear. Their trunks are frequently entwined, but whether this is done due to sexual excitement or to ensure the stability of the bull, it is difficult to say.

Only one calf is born at a time, although there have been rare instances of twins or even triplets. The young calf would walk a few hours after birth. It averages 2 ft. 10 ins. in height and suckles with its mouth and not through the trunk as some people suppose.

. . . Wounded animals provide the most prolific source for rogue elephants.

Years ago, sportsmen and even those who had studied the subject, were convinced that 'Musth' in elephants was due to sexual frustration. The fact that this condition appeared during the months of March and April, a period that coincided with the mating period, seemed to indicate that this contention was correct. Subsequent observation has shown, however, that frequently the bulls in close contact with the cows during this period developed this condition; further observation led to the conclusion that 'Musth', while undeniably having some bearing on sex, was due to a specific disease, which appeared to attack some of these animals during this period, as flu' does in case of men at certain seasons during the year.

The physical manifestations of 'Musth' are very noticeable. With the onset of the disease, glandular enlargement beneath the skin, causes the entire temporal region to swell up, exaggerating the whole appearance of the head, particularly in old bulls. Subsequently a thick, oily and dark coloured exudation oozes out of the pores on either side of the face, between the eyes and the ears and flows down the cheeks. This discharge is of a caustic or irritating type, because it is noticed that when this occurs, the elephant would bathe the parts frequently, often applying moist earth to the cheeks for relief.

I have often heard sportsmen discussing how a wild bull in 'Musth' terrorised an entire area, killing people and raviging crops and villages. This is incorrect.

The wild elephant in 'musth' is seldom dangerous. Far from becoming a lone bull, it would frequently seek the company of the cows and it is noticeable with what kindness and consideration the cow elephants would treat the bull. During this period it possibly consumes some tuber or plant that has a soporific effect on him, because its whole demeanour changes and the animal appears to be in a drowsy, contemplative state, standing solitary and clam by some pool or stream.

If the water is deep enough it would sink into its cool depths and lie submerged often for hours at a time.

It is the elephant in captivity that is the most troublesome and treacherous. It will attack and kill his 'mahout' or anyone coming within reach of the trunk. It has to be firmly secured with ropes and chains and fed on a restricted diet. During the worst paroxysms of the disease, the animal is given large doses of opium to calm it.

ROGUES

Rogue elephants on the other hand are in quite a different category. They are seldom in 'musth' when start killing. Among the many rogue elephants I have seen shot, I invariably noticed that these animals had been suffering from festering wounds, inflicted by shot guns, light bore-rifles and in some instances, by arrows and spears.

It must be remembered that elephants are intelligent creatures, possessing a prodigious memory. When shot at and seriously injured, it would make off and hide itself in the most inaccessible places. The younger sportsmen, seldom follow up and destroy a wounded animal and this explains the source of rogue elephants.

It may be six months before an elephant, badly wounded in stomach or thigh, would succumb to its injury and during this period of pain and suffering,

THE GOD INTOXICATED MAN

By D. S. MAHALANOBIS

THE crimson sun was setting on the banks of the Ganges. I stood on the deserted strand, contemplating the fascinating tonalities caught on the river where it fringed an ancient townlet.

A stranger stepped up abreast of me and accosted, "Do you believe in God, Sir?"

I look askance, irritated.

He begged pardon, and with studied courtesy explained that he could not help the question because he was a God-intoxicated man.

"I don't see why I need be a connoisseur of your exalted infatuation," I said disapprovingly.

He seemed sadly disappointed, then glanced up and discreetly posed a question. "Can you believe a lame duck become an off-bird overnight? And that in a manner no human could ever have foreseen, far less got it up. A catena of events made it happen, as if every single link in it had been put in perfect gear to this end. Isn't it inexplicable except by the improbable probability of a blind set of chances, Sir? You need not take me at my word. It's in every man's right to satisfy himself, and if you do me the honour to pay a visit to my villa here, you will find material to interest yourself in my story and be more than repaid for your trouble, I dare say."

In spite of my initial frigidity at his unceremonious introduction, the man was holding me to his story. He suggested that we sat on a nearby bench provided for the strand-visitors by the town authorities. I assented.

We moved to a bench.

He was in his late 50's, 5 ft. 8 in. by my side, had remarkable features, which seemed somewhat mitigated by his neglige. He talked rather diffidently, as if uncertain of effect on his hearers.

"You will have taken me for a jobber, I suppose," he ventured, "but, believe me, Sir, I have never been a bull, bear or stag, or that sort. In fact, I have never been in business of any kind. On the contrary, I was jockeyed out of my rich bequest before I knew where I was."

The stranger stopped and asked if I would prefer to visit his villa first and then hear his story.

I told him to continue.

"It's not a pleasant story to tell," he remarked. "This strand holds tragic memories for me. My misfortune began one evening right at this place. I had come for my evening stroll and after a few rounds along the banks, settled myself on a bench. An hour later I was unexpectedly taken ill. Instinctively I started to walk the distance back as I am won't, and on my way turned to the main thoroughfare for a pick-me-up, which I imagined, would brace me up. I suddenly realized that I was in for serious trouble. An intense feeling of sickness staggered my gait and I was fighting to keep myself on my feet. Something was wrong in a vital part, somewhere the controls were failing, I sensed. I had to have a conveyance at once and looked about. There was none. Steadying myself at every step forward, I plodded on anyhow, now and again squatting on the kerb to avert a fall. Cold sweat broke out, I desperately hungered for fresh air. An acute perception of the embarrassing situation made me tense and apprehensive lest I created a scene, and strove hard to avoid it. A rickshaw was visible on the other side up the road, which was the great metropolitan artery flung here along for inter-State traffic. I was faced with the decision to cross it or risk an appallingly rapid bout of morbific spurt. My nerves insensibly taut, I clenched my teeth, looked ahead for a breach in the fast-moving vehicular line, crazily lugged myself to the far side where the rickshaw stood, then barely jabbered an order and was instantly blacked out. When I came to, I found myself seated on the pavement in the arms of the rickshaw-man. By an effort of will I levered myself up limply into the three-wheeled car and was rushed away to my place. Grimly I held on for a few precious seconds till I could hastily unlock my door and abandon myself to my bed, then began to belch out blood. The last thing I remember was an attempt to sit up, turn the light on by means of a bed-switch, ask the servant who had just brought my night meal to take it back, and then collapsed. The turned light leaped down on the ominous-looking fluid on the floor and flashed past through the open door. I lay under its lurid shine in a trance, unconcerned.

"My folk espied from their aloofness the dirty mess I had made of my room, but they concerted by a tragic decision to leave me to my fate. I languished under the darkening shadow of death for two mortal hours. No one called in, no one fetched a doctor. When I came out of that benumbing stupor, I was conscious of my utter helplessness and of the dire necessity of stopping internal haemorrhage that was still active. A medicine chest lay within my reach on a table, but I was far too mishappen physically and mentally to prescribe me a drug. Then came a profound little spell of suspended thought, followed by an impetuous splash of colour, a green signal fluttered, across my vision. Out of it blazed in clear outlines a name. I could not lift me up but extended my hand, got the named medicine vial from the chest and swallowed a dose. Slowly I felt I was rallying back, and was in better form in the morning to pull through to safety. But, it was my undoing in any case. I was left two-way broke. The bequest was gone. During my long incapacitation I was relieved of every farthing."

Something checked him abruptly. A puff of bitter resentment had darkened his face. He mopped his brow, waited a few seconds to study the effect on me, then asked, "Don't you believe my stuff, Sir ?"

'A green signal fluttered across my vision....

The mass of details he had packed into his narrative could scarcely have been all invented, I reviewed mentally, but kept the opinion back to myself and replied non-committally, "You know it that truth is stranger than fiction."

"That's true. My misfortune ended in a manner that, you will concede, is certainly stranger than any fiction."

I gazed critically at him, a scoff of disbelief quizzed in my brain for a long minute.

He perked up at my vacillation and resumed, as if to reassure me: "I was sitting one morning in my hammock chair, very much dejected. The town postman brought me a packet. It contained what seemed to me a set of shipping bills, which a friend had mailed to my address. In an ambitious deal he had imported a shipload of beet sugar from abroad, which he failed to clear. Ruin and dishonour staring him in the face, he took an ill-advised decision and hastily left the country never to return.

"I was in a sorry plight myself; the burden of unreleased documents on top of it, made me furious. I was just going to tear the bundle up when a telegram was put into my hand. It restrained my distempers. Little did I know that the mail packet was a windfall.

"At the end of a week," he went on, "news began to pour in of a sudden racket in the sugar market. That was a topsyturvy time years ago—the War had started. I had forgotten all about the mail packet. I now looked it over and without realizing the full effect of the bullish impact, announced the cargo at my disposal. Of that one deal my ship came home."

"There's nothing extraordinary in it," I remarked.

"No! Then what is extraordinary, Sir? May I tell you that the telegram too was a second windfall?"

I quieted down my resistance and awaited his explanation.

"The telegram," he continued, "was an anonymous message which disclosed clues to a diary incriminating the pretenders. And at long last I recovered my properties. What do you say to it, Sir?"

"I guess, you are a wealthy man now?" I evaded the question.

"Do I look it, Sir? I am what I ever have been—my naked self, not pegged to the illusive decore that fortune has cast about in the air, I have learned my great lesson in the Destiny's last sanctuary, that is, my sick-bed, which has been for me a unique clinic for post-mortem study. There I have had the rarest opportunity to dissect the individuated personality of flesh and blood, to lay bare the core of the 'self' and the 'not-self'—to gut the inside of everything I could lay hands on. I am no longer a cock-sure factor in my world."

"You mean to say you are not master of your own house yet?"

"In a sense, I am, I have come into my traps. With the harvested fortune on my hands, I could engage the best lawyers to snuff out the pretenders. It grieved me to do it, but I had to, in a tough legal duel that has this time ruined them."

He looked away from me for a while, then interrogated, "Can you see my point now, where I offended you right at the beginning by my first query? Who flashed the 'green signal' and spelt out the name of the drug in my crisis, Sir? You look up the catalogue of events ranged one after another for the geared action—the green signal, the shipping documents, the telegram, the sugar racket, and the restitution of the will-properties. Who, do you think, horoscoped this massive array of circumstances, each in its place and time? Who brought them to a finality to achieve one end?"

"Can't be dogmatic about it," I rejoined, then angled for a feeler to change the subject. "Did you say that your villa holds a secret?" I suggested.

He pondered over my question for a time and then remarked obscurely, "Do you think you could believe such a thing? Yet, if the secret is anything, the best part of it is that it is no longer my villa. I can use it, barter it, sell it, even demolish it, though."

I failed to see what he meant, but put no question. He tried to make an opening for me into his deferred explanation by a proposition: "Suppose you visit the villa. The game could be worth the candle."

Next morning I went to his place by appointment. As I came out of my house bound for the villa, I was surprised to find a car waiting outside, it had come from my host. I hopped in, wrapped up in one question—how the stranger knew my residence. Did he know me also?

The car dashed along a lap of drab road, flanked to the riverside. and then slowed down over a gateway giving on a well-kept garden. A marble slab at the outside announced it was 'Anand Villa,' and I instinctively associated it with my host's name.

I was received by a young lady of 22 and my host. She was elegantly dressed, her elderly companion in his free and easy attire of the previous evening. The difference was easily struck. I was further to be struck by the information that he and she were not father and daughter, who, none the less, admirably reciprocated the philoprogenitive and filial give and take on either's part.

I was at once smitten with her presence. Her physical attractiveness, charming deportment, cultured outlook and unassuming way of making her visitors feel at home—partnered in amity to completely win me over, and I felt an anxiety in my vision where I fancid a place for her in my home my son and heir had left, unhappy over a match I had overruled. I was ready to stake heavily not to let this chance slip. Now an irresistible curiosity and longing to know more of her kept me on the tiptoe to hear Anand's left-over story of the preceding evening.

"Excuse me for not formally introducing Monica to you," my host said as soon as the young lady discreetly left after tea. "She is part of my story, though not on the distaff side nor on the spear side, either. Yet, for her I hold the greater part of the property in trust. In such an intriguing situation, you could not have been satisfied by a brief formal introduction, I, therefore, desisted. If the story interests you, I could take it up where I left it yesterday."

"Indeed, it does interest me," I assured.

"Monica is my friend's daughter," he began. "Her father ran away leaving her with a relative when she was barely five, that is, at the time his shipping venture fell through. She has been homeless since, her mother having died earlier. I tried in vain to find her immediately after my lucky haul, and only discovered her by a coincidence a year ago. She is with me from that day. I am at a dead end of my ancestry, with no one to comfort me in my solitary life. That was perhaps in my subconscious mind a reason why I had kept on her trail through the years. But, in my conscious thought I was keenly eager to be fair to my unlucky friend. And I felt that the booty I had acquired in my unsweated enterprise in sugar

CHAPTER — VI

DIANE Andrews opened her eyes. Sam Ward was shaking her by the shoulder, calling out her name urgently. She stared at him dumbly, her eyes wide and vacant. She looked past his shoulder, and did not focus on his face.

"Diane", he said, his face tender. "You must get to bed. You must rest".

She turned to him, looking at him without expression. But she did not try to sit up.

Ward rubbed his hands on her wrists, and kept shaking her. "Diane! Diane! It's been too much for you. Let me call Dr. Marcus."

She stared back at him feebly.

He stood abruptly and moved across the room toward the telephone. Diane, her pupils pinpoints, her lids narrowed, sat up and slipped away from the divan and darted toward the kitchen. There was a slyness and a furtive quality to her motion, and Ward saw her out of the corner of his eye. She slipped through into the kitchen before he could stop her.

"Diane!" he cried, and came away from the telephone.

He followed her, and was just about to enter the kitchen when he came to an abrupt halt. He stared down at her, standing in the doorway, her eyes blazing half crazily at him, her face pale and blank, her body wound up like a too-tight spring.

"Stay away from me!" she cried, her voice a hoarse croak. She held her right hand in front of her, and in it she gripped the curved knife she had taken out of the kitchen drawer. She held it in an attitude of attack, as if she meant to use it on Sam Ward.

His mouth dropped open. His face drained of color. He stared stupidly at her.

"Diane," he said finally. "Whatever do you think you're doing? Put that knife down!"

She shook her head slowly, craftily, her eyes never leaving his face. They were unblinking eyes.

"You're unnerved, Diane," Ward went on, trying to make his shaking voice soothing. "You're overwrought. Put that knife down like a good girl, and get to bed. I'll call Dr. Marcus."

Diane shook her head. Her movements had taken on a sleep-walking appearance, and she moved her hands and body jerkily, like a puppet on a string. She advanced on Sam Ward, waving the knife menacingly toward his stomach.

He backed up, his face haggard and gray.

"You've gone mad," he whispered. "Dr. Marcus was right. He was afraid to have you come home so soon." Ward shook his head, "I told him I didn't believe it. I told him I could take care of you, that you'd be all right." Ward sighed. "I was wrong."

"In there," Diane said softly, indicating her bedroom to the lawyer. "Go in there."

Ward frowned. "But, Diane....."

"Hurry up!" Diane's voice was now firm and challenging. It was high-pitched and strained, and it held a high-tension warning. Ward moved.

"Well?" he said, as he stood in the middle of the bedroom. "What do you think you're going to do now?"

Diane pointed to the closet door. "Open that."

Ward shook his head in bafflement. "But why?"

"Just open it!" flared Diane, her voice breaking.

Ward moved toward the door. He opened it.

"Now go in there, Ward," Diane said evenly, her eyes gleaming.

Ward, his face like uncooked bread dough, cast one glance at her, another at the knife in her hand, and moved into the closet. Diane quickly pushed the door shut, turning the key in the lock.

A startled cry came from the lawyer. "Diane! What do you think you're doing? Diane! You're crazy! Do you hear me? Let me out of here. I have to call Dr. Marcus."

He pounded on the door, shoved against it, but it was strong and it held.

Diane stared at the knife in her hand, and at the door on which Ward was beginning to smash his huge fists, and she turned and fled from the room.

She ran to the front door and opened it and sprang out into the dark night. The mist of the woods swirled around her in eddies, and she plunged toward the roadway. The only thing she could think of was to get away from that terrible house, the house that had brought her right up to the brink of death.

She ran through the mist down the long driveway and then, as she stumbled along blindly, her world was made suddenly brilliant with a great flash of light. A monstrous noise filled the air, and the whole world shook to pieces.

Then there was only the bright light, and she was standing, panting and dizzy, in the middle of the road, staring down at her hand with the curved deadly blade in it. She could hardly breathe, and she saw the knife and she thought of the picture of the girl with the slashed breast, and she lifted the knife suddenly in a gesture of final despair, and as she did so she heard a cry from the darkness.

"Diane!"

He had followed her! She moved the knife down, down, down, firmly and steadily and swiftly, and she heard it clatter on the roadway. She slumped into a heap in the brilliant light and lay there quivering and spent.....

She came to quite suddenly. It was Alec Bern, bending over her and shaking her. She was back in the house again, and outside, against the house, she could see the glare of a pair of headlights. In the next room she heard the banging of a fist on the door panelling. But she paid no attention to it. And, to her relief, neither did Alec.

"Where did you come from?" she asked him.

"The car, Diane! I was driving up the road here to the house, when I saw you rushing toward me, waving a knife. What's the matter?" He looked at her closely. "Are you sure you're all right?"

"Car?" she echoed. "You came in a car?"

"Yes. But I broke down just outside New York. That's what delayed me. What's been happening? You don't look well, Diane."

Sobbing, she told him brokenly what had happened, from the time the peculiar little woman had come to look over the house. As she told him, he stared at her uncomprehendingly. And when she came to the last part, when she told him that it was Sam Ward locked in the closet of her bedroom, Alec's eyes were incredulous.

"But whatever for, Diane? Why did you do a thing like that? And then run out of the house, waving that curved knife?"

"Don't you see!" Diane asked eagerly. "It was all done deliberately. Done by one man, and for a reason I can guess."

Alec shook his head, holding her close to him. "Don't get excited, Diane. Just tell me when you think you can."

Diane smiled. She pointed to the end table, where the new will was lying, where Sam's pipe even yet lay, along with a folder of matches. "That's proof of it. Don't you understand?"

Alec stared at the end table, and shook his head. "Of what?"

"The match folder. Don't you see?"

Alec picked it up. He read the advertisement for a Bar and Grill just outside Roanoke, Virginia. He nodded. "I know the place. What's wrong with it?" He turned inquiringly.

"Roanoke? What was Ward doing down there in Roanoke, unless he was trying to make it look as if you'd tried to send me that wreath, and put the house up for sale? Don't you see? He was the one who put the painting here! He was the one who tried to make me drink that milk—and heaven kows what he'd put into it!"

Alec's eyes narrowed. "Why should he do all that, Diane?"

"I can guess. He's afraid what will happen once we're married, Alec. I'm sure he's not the first lawyer or trustee in charge of a big estate who has borrowed a few thousand here and a few thousand there to make life a little more comfortable for himself."

"I see", Alec said. "He realized once we were married I might take too much interest in the stocks, and find out what he'd done?"

Diane nodded wearily. "So he tried to put me back in the rest home, to keep us from being married. Failing that, he came here and tried to kill me with that doped-up glass of milk, but I pushed the glass onto the floor." She shuddered. "He lied to me about the new will, saying you'd wanted the change made. That was to make me suspicious of you. Later after it was all over, he could blame my death on you, as beneficiary of the estate."

Alec smiled, and leaned over her.

Alec stood resolutely. "We'd better call the police and let them take care of him.....He must be crazy."

"He almost drove me crazy", Diane said. "But I'm all right now, with you here. Aren't you going to give me a homecoming kiss?"

Alec smiled, and leaned over her. "This one has been a long time coming to you, too long."

the Rawalpindi girl. "Ah! superb! What rare grace there is in her enchanting beauty. I had this goddess Laxmi in my hands, and flung her away. I am such an ass."

On the evening of marriage the bridegroom went out in a carriage with band and illuminations. Nalin lay down and tried uselessly to draw a faint consolation from his hubble-bubble, when Hajra arrived grinning happily and was about to settle down with jokes directed at Nanda.

Nalin shouted, "Durwan!"

Hajra froze, scared he called the durwan.

The Babu pointed at Hajra and ordered in Hindi, "Catch hold of him by his ears and throw him out at once."

BIBLIOTHERAPY A NEW REMEDY

books: they should have other means of diversions such as music, film shows and games. This is necessary because patients cannot concentrate their mind in study continuously for a long time. The effect of books will be better if it is administered along with other means of diversion.

It must, however, be admitted that bibliotherapy is possible only within a limited field. Patients who cannot read well will find no benefit from books.

Will a time come when doctors will write names of books in their prescriptions instead of names of medicines, and special libraries will be established in every street and lane like dispensaries, which will supply books to the patients according to the prescriptions of the physicians? Books in these libraries will be classified according to their usefulness in a particular disease and not according to subjects as is done now.

its anger, and resentment against the assailant grows in proportion, till at last it emerges from the forest and creates horror and stampede in the adjacent areas.

SHOOTING

The act of shooting an elephant just for its tusks is to me a deed of unpardonable vandalism. It is true, there are instances when the destruction of the animal becomes unavoidable, as in the case of a proclaimed rogue and it is then that the hunter should know something about the anatomy of the elephant and the most vulnerable places in which a bullet will produce immediate and painless death. I will not attempt to describe the rifle, par excellence, as this is a matter of personal preference; any high class weapon, of .375 bore and above, throwing a bullet of 300 grs., will bring about the destruction of the animal.

The main difficulty is where to hit the animal. The majority of shots, in India at least, are taken when the animal is feeding in dense bamboo clumps. Once the direction of the wind has been ascertained, every precaution should be taken to approach the animal as noiselessly as possible. The bright eye that it turns so significantly in your direction, is miserably weak, so that objects barely 100 yards away, are seen only in blurred outline, but it is with its acute sense of hearing and smell, that the animal becomes aware of your approach.

Once the ears fan out and the trunk is turned rigidly in your direction, it is easy to see that your presence has been detected and located. The next moment, the trunk is doubled back behind the tusks and that thundering charge begins.

At the first signs of the charge, do not hesitate on the manner of your departure, but if your nerves are equal to the occasion, then select the boss, conspicuous on the forehead and just above the trunk, and plant your bullet there. Immediately after firing, spring to one side, as often the impact of the charge would carry the animal past the place where you are standing.

There are many other shots, the most favoured being the depression between the ear and the eye, but this depends on how the animal is facing. But never, on any account, shoot an elephant in the body. This type of shot, even if aimed at the heart, rarely proves fatal and an elephant shot in the body, even with a heavy rifle, is a rogue in the making and a potential killer.

GRAVEYARD

This is a legend that is common to both India and Africa. The Indian elephant, if allowed to live its normal life, survives for about 100 years. Considering our vast forest areas and that the elephant population is about one-fourth that of the African, it is not surprising that hunters in quest of elephant, rarely come across the bones of an animal that has died of natural causes. But the legend still persists.

When an elephant, or for that matter, any animal, has premonition of death, it would leave the herd and wander away to some secluded spot, where it would lie down and patiently await the end. To find this spot has been the ambition of every ivory hunter.

The natives aver that the craving for water, as well as for seclusion, drives these poor creatures to seek deep isolated swamps or dense forest retreats, but it is significant that the bones and tusks of these animals are seldom found. Occasionally, one comes across the massive head bones of an elephant buried deep in the soil. The smaller bones have of course been eaten by scavengers, but a careful examination of the skull invariably reveals that the tusks have been hacked out, showing that the animal had been killed by hunters or poachers.

The truth is that the elephant, like all other game animals in this country is being rapidly shot out. Herds of fifty or 100 animals are rarely seen and considering the length of the life span of the animal, the number of animals leaving a herd to die in some solitary, isolated place are so few that the creation of a regular graveyard to which these animals retreat is scarcely possible.

Mr. M. Krishnan, the well known writer on Indian Wild Life, to whom I referred this question, replies as follows—"Mr. K. Krishnamoorthy, of the Kerala Forest Service, a keen naturalist especially interested in elephants, has an interesting theory on this subject. He has shot a few rogues and twice he noticed that the mortally wounded animal made for the nearest stream which it entered, standing in deep water to die."

A similar preference is mentioned by Sanderson and by Sir Victor Brooke. Considering the number of deep, swift streams that intersect our forest areas and their ability to dispose of all elephant remains within a short time, the possibility of finding a regular elephant graveyard is remote indeed!

honestly belonged to him. I have, therefore, set apart the whole of it as Monica's share.

"I cannot hold Monica very much long now, I know. Her own destiny will have its fulfilment, which is in the making, in a separate home in any case. It's a painful thought but I resign myself to the will of the Almighty. I told you that the villa no longer belonged to me. Do you see the implication in that statement? I came into the villa; it was inconsequestial, Monica gave it a meaning. She will go. If the green signal part has been played out, can the red signal be far behind? Did I not invite you here to impress upon you what I meant by God-intoxicatedness—call it 'exalted infatuation' if you like,—to let you know at first hand a thing to know that life has a secret. Monica will tell you what she has seen of my life. I have the villa; it is not mine. I have the car; I do not use it to pursue a pleasure. I have the garden; I am only its gardener. I have Monica; she is my protegee, for her own sake. I have seen the world in all its nakedness from its utmost vantage-point than from where none surer sees—in the dying man's struggle. It is for you now to catch up with me in the know. Destiny is on your heels."

He stopped and looked at me thoughtfully, then deliberately surprised me by his last trump: "May I tell you, Sir," he said, "that Monica has provided a home for your son you had denied him and her when she was yet unknown to you. Now that you have had your feel of her, do you accept the inevitable?"

I was mystified for a minute, then accepted the [illegible]

Great Hunger

By JATISH BOSE

A winter evening. The sun has just set making room for the full moon to rear up her head in resplendent glory. There was no mist in the dark blue sky and no gripping cold in the earth below.

A pleasant time to stroll about, Ramesh Ganguly was having his daily constitutional along a Central Calcutta street. A sturdy fellow, he belied his age which was round about sixty. Suddenly he halted before a huge building in making, a near sky-scraper. He marvelled at its engineering jugglery for a moment.

In the twilight he saw a flitting familiar figure passing swiftly across him. In an instant he remembered Jatin Choudhury, his one-time chummy college mate.

Hello! Jatin, he called aloud. Fancy meeting you here.

The two friends locked themselves in endearing embrace.

The full moon, a silent witness to all the good and evils of this world, meanwhile had been running her upward course in the blue sky. She stopped awhile to shower her benediction to the embracing friends below.

They had their heart-ful of talks sitting by the side of the pond near-by and amidst very fine scenery. The ripples of water reflected in the clear moonlight to produce a silvery dream. It had a magic effect on the beautiful lights all around—somewhere efflorescent. And when they parted that night they were very much contented with having their jolly old days recapitulated and rehashed. Ramesh Ganguly gathered from his friend that he had knocked out his service some three years ago with a pension of three hundred rupees. He had now built a house of his own in Chandipur, a place about 14 miles away from Calcutta. A winding road links up Chandipur with a junction station on the Eastern Railway.

"Come along to my place one day," was his friend's pressing invitation before his hurried departure to catch the train.

Next Sunday. Winter morning mist had just cleared. The sunrise was breathtaking in its full splendour. Its glory and vivaciousness in most cases is hidden from the city of palaces. Not so is the case with man living in harmony with Nature. There the sun-god is all merciful and bountiful.

Ramesh Ganguly had a full view of the resplendent sun in all its glory as he was then on his way to Chandipur on a suburban train. The train was zigzagging its way down to destination. A motely crowd, mostly small holiday-hunters was his fellow passengers. But he was lost in the maze of thoughts hardly conscious of his noisy fellow-travellers.

Hardly an hour after, a cycle rickshawala was tearing down the kutcha road with his 'precious' passenger in the sunny forenoon. Jatin Choudhury was an affable personality and in no time the rickshawala knocked at his gates. His surprise and joy knew no bounds when his eyes caught the eagerly-awaited pleasant figure of Ramesh Ganguly; he hugged him so endearingly, and passionately as nothing in the world could give him such glorified vistas of unalloyed pleasure.

Ganguly was charmed beyond measure. What an ideal setting for a brooding, emotional and imaginative mind. A picturesque site for a lovely home.

Flowers have blossomed in gay profusion, a serenity pervades through the Nature in all its mercifulness.

Jatin Choudhury too was all hospitable; it seemed he had got back his youthful days. Buoyant and jubilant he had a real ring of sincerity and this touch he had passed on even to his usually sedate friend. He introduced his daughter Lila, a pretty girl in her twenties. But Choudhury was not his usual self, in fact he lost that buoyancy, when a few minutes later he called in Jogamaya, his consort. A lovely middle-aged woman she was a picture of sadness, and behind her amiable exterior lay an inert moroseness that is discernible even to casual observer. She made deep obeisance to Ganguly, but in between the conversations of the two friends she stood motionless as an image of priceless stone though modelled by an artist as an acme of perfection. Ganguly was perplexed. In his heart of hearts there was a nagging suspicion that all was not well with the Choudhury family. Somewhere there must have been a fly in the ointment.

Choudhury was not slow to understand it. He realised that his friend's lurking suspicion was getting better of him which might hasten to vitiate the air of mirth. He made up his mind to unravel the mystery.

"Ramesh," he told his friend after dusk when they were seated in the parlour, "it is a painful narrative. But I cannot ease myself until I share my sorrows with you.

I was the blessed father of two very lovely children, Ramen and Lila. Ramen was a boy of startling attractiveness, of a rare intellect and sparkling wit. He observed the utmost purity in life, an innate purity which was regaling. An ascetic bent of mind from his childhood he was the gem of his mother's eyes. The boy had an innate fondness for the wandering monks and would never hesitate to bring them down to his house even to the despair of his parents and to their loud protestations. As he grew older he devoted himself more and more to intellectual activity and serious meditation. But this also did not deter him from attaining highest success in the university examinations.

One evening toward the end of the summer Ramen returned home accompanied by an attractive-looking monk. He was then studying in the university but his mounting devotion to spirituality had been a deep source of concern to his parents, specially to his mother. The monk's charming physiognomy, his divine grace attired in flowing saffron robe, extorted admiration and respect but Jogamaya Devi, Ramen's mother, smelt in it an evil premonition. She shuddered if she would be her real self if it came true. She went to sleep that night with a perplexed mind.

Morning streaks of sunlight awoke Jogamaya Devi from her disturbed slumber. She jumped out of the bed to see the door of the room of his son wide open. A shiver ran through her. Where could his son go so early and where is the monk? Stung too deep she ran hither and thither, called out his husband and daughter. Soon a crowd gathered and search parties went about their task in right earnest. But Jogamaya could bear it no longer. The worst had happened, her premonition had come true. With a wild shriek she fell down on the ground to lose her consciousness and the thought of the miserable circumstances, she was in.

Choudhury continued: Jogamaya regained her consciousness the next day after very hard medical efforts. But from that day she stopped speaking to anybody. She has "sacrificed" her tongue for his son and one of the greatest weapons that most human beings would like to use it to swell themselves. Moving heaven and earth for my lost son last three years has not borne me any fruit.

Choudhury was in a trance. He could not reconcile himself to the position in which he had been placed by the Almighty.

After minutes of searching his inner self he went on: It would perhaps not be amiss to tell you at point something of our early life.

Though married in the fulness of time Jogamaya did not beget a son even after eight years. Her relations were almost convinced of her sterility. She had herself a great intense hunger to become a mother as is natural with in between the conversation of the two friends she stood motionless as an image of priceless stone...

A Railway Romance

By B. K. BOSE

UMLA GOPINATH of Delhi has been of late very much worried over the future of his only child, Kanta—a daughter of mature years. He has been in failing health since the passing away of his wife, a year back, and was anxious to see her married and settled in life, before the end come which, he felt, was not far off. His friend, Sohan Lal, had given him hopes that he would accept Kanta as a bride for his son, Manohar, who was then a mining engineer at Jharia, if he consented to marry.

Kanta had just completed her training as a nurse at a college in Delhi and wanted to get into the profession. But it was not so much to the liking of Gopinath who wanted to see her fixed up in marriage, first. And that was why he undertook the long and tiresome journey to Gaya with his daughter, not only to perform the last rites of his wife but also to meet Manohar who had been asked by his father to meet them at the Gaya Railway station and take them to Jharia for a short stay.

Kanta remembered having met Manohar before, but that was long ago in her early school days and her impression was that of a talkative young boy of bullish habit whom she did not like. And she said as much to her father, but he pooh-poohed her opinion of the boy, calling it a 'figment of her imagination' "These childish ideas of yours will go away the moment you meet him" he said "and I am sure you will like him" he added hopefully. "But father, dear, how I am going to look after you, if I have to live so far away."

"Do not worry your little head over these petty matters. It will all come out right in the end, if God is merciful. And do you think, dear child, I shall live for ever? Your mother has already left me stranded in this world" so saying he quietly turned his head and wiped his tearful eyes. And Kanta fell extremely unhappy at the distressful feeling she had caused by her talks.

II

Manohar Lal met them at the Gaya Station in all his splendour. He ran towards them with outstretched hands and 'Hullo, how are you all?' in his best English style to which however Kanta responded with a sober 'Namaste'. After tea they all got ready to start for Jharia, Via Dhanbad, and finding an empty first class compartment they all got into it for the first leg of their journey to the coal field.

It was the depth of winter and the sky was overcast with a strong gale blowing. By the time the train got a move the rain had started in torrents and they had to shut down all doors and windows of the compartment, Kanta was eager to see the sights from the bridge over the Falgu river but it was so dark and threatening outside that she could see nothing through the glass frames and Manohar would not let her rest at ease with his tiresome talks of jungles and hills and his unending adventures. He related how he had walked through miles and miles of the forests where wild beasts lived and was describing a hunting trip he had recently undertaken in one of the neighbouring jungles when the train came to a halt at the small station of Manpur. They heard an incessant knocking at the closed door and on opening the same a slim young man of rather pale appearance hastilly clambered into the compartment with a muffled apology and slumped into the vacant berth opposite.

As soon as the man took off his dripping coat and hat Manohar recognising his old friend jumped up with glee, shouting 'Hullo—Narendra, how did you turn out at such an outlandish place? Narendra smiled quietly and replied "I have been visiting my friend Khanna who is building a workshop here, and I am going back to my mica mine at Kodarma which I have recently joined."

Manohar explained that their meeting in the train was a happy coincidence and that he was taking his relations, Lala Gopinath and his daughter Miss Kanta (to whom he was introduced) to Jharia.

"But why did you join mica? Surely coal mining offered better prospects". To this Narendra did not reply beyond passing a low-toned cryptic remark that they cannot all have the best of every thing. So saying he quietly shrank into his seat and opening a book absorbed himself into the pages. But Manohar would not allow him a quiet rest which he so sorely needed, after a strenuous day visiting the works, but kept up his rambling talks of this and that sometimes addressing himself to his friend but mostly to Kanta herself in loud tones.

In fact, he was very much taken up by Kanta's serene beauty. He had no idea that she has grown so charmingly attractive from the lanky school girl he had seen before, and so he wanted to show himself off.

Yes, (so he mused) she would be a fitting mate for him and he had no doubt he could show her off to his friends who would then, he was sure, envy him his good luck for finding such a charming girl for his wife. And that was why he was so anxious to make a deep impression on her.

He told him the tale in whispers and beamed with happiness when he received his congratulations.

He quietly walked over to Narendra's seat and told him the tale in whispers and beamed with happiness when he received his congratulation.

III

By the time the train reached the foothills of Gujhandi station a regular blizzard was blowing. The incessant patter of rain and flying debris striking the shutters made further talk impossible.

The train however kept on moving slowly but fitfully with constant jerks. The fearful streaks of lightning blazing through the dark sky showed up the trees on the hills bent double in the storm. The atmosphere altogether was most threatening, reflected clearly in the anxious faces of the passengers sitting inside.

Suddenly there was a big jolt and the train jerked itself to a stop with such violence that the passengers were thrown off their seats. This was followed by a grinding of brakes and to make matters worse the lights all went off. Kanta quietly picked up her father from the floor with Narendra's help; but he was not hurt, while Manohar started shouting at the top of his voice demanding to know if a collision had occurred. Fortunately nothing more untoward happened and the bogie continued to stand quiet on its wheels in pitch darkness.

The gale had, however suddenly stopped and Manohar opened the doors to find out what was the matter. But nothing could be seen or heard except the general hullaballo from the passengers in the other compartments.

After what seemed a long time, guard came limping along the track with a light and seeing the door of a first class compartment open, with a torch light burning inside, hastilly climbed in and explained to Manohar and others that there had been derailment of the engine only owing to a big boulder having rolled over the line from the surrounding hills, but all bogies were standing safe on the lines.

"But have you a doctor here? One fireman who was leaning out of the cab has fallen down and broken his leg. He is bleeding profusely and must be attended to immediately, otherwise he would die. The driver is also severely injured and needs attention."

Kanta stood up and said "I am not a doctor but a qualified nurse. I think I can attend to the case till a doctor arrives. Have you a first aid box?"

"Yes, but it is slightly damaged. In any case, we might need some more medicines and equipment but Kodarma station is over three miles from this place. Can we get a volunteer to walk over to the station and bring the medicines and also to inform the authorities about the accident and bring 'relief'" the guard pleaded in halting tones.

"Why? Surely; Manohar Babu, you can go"

"What? In this beastly weather? And in any case it is the Railway's job."

entreated Kanta looking up at him with hopeful eyes.

"What ? In this beastly weather ? And, in any case, it is the Railway's job. You should have men for this work," Manohar said addressing the guard.

"I have already told you, sir, that the driver and a fireman have been seriously injured, and are lying unconscious. I myself have received injuries, though not much. I can spare only one fireman to accompany you. If you, sir, do not feel like going then I must go and find out some other volunteers to walk over to Kodarma for the 'relief'.

At this Narendra jumped up saying he would volunteer to go and bring the medicines.

"That's very good of you, sir," the guard replied and started getting down from the compartment.

Kanta intervened and striding up to Manohar said "But Manohar Babu, you were saying just now you were used to doing such things. Why should you fall back now ?"

"Oh, if Narendra is going I can, surely, go too. But the weather is so foul and especially we have a lady to look after".

"Oh, please do not bother about me. Please accompany Narendra Babu if you want to, without further delay" so saying Kanta got down from the compartment herself to attend to the injured persons.

IV

The trio started for Kodarma over the rain soaked sloppy track, the fireman leading, with Manohar following behind. His patent leather shoes got soaked through in no time and he started limping and grumbling blaming Narendra for this mad adventure, as he called it.

Half the way up he actually stumbled and fell in trying to jump over a ditch "Oh, I have hurt myself" he cried. The other two ran back to pick him up and to see what had happened. Manohar plumped flat on the line and declared his inability to proceed any further. Just then a bright streak of lightning showed a tumbled-down coolie shed just above the line by the hill side.

Manohar looked up and said, "I think I should take a rest up there" pointing to the shed. After a while he added "And if I do not join you shortly at Kodarma then please pick me up on your way back."

V

When Narendra reached Kodarma he was terribly exhausted. He hurriedly explained the situation to the station master (who was anxiously waiting for the news) and asked for a trolley to take him back immediately with a box of bandages and some medicines.

The station master first got busy in telephoning all around and then gave Narendra a trolley with half a dozen porters and a big box of 'first aid' equipment and medicines. He assured Narendra that a light train with a doctor and arrangement for transhipping passengers would follow soon.

The party with Narendra started back immediately on the trolley and reaching half way they saw a tall well-dressed man standing astride the line waving his torch light frantically. It was Manohar. He jumped into the trolley as soon as it came to a halt.

On reaching the train with engine leaning over sideways Narendra, who was ill and lying crumpled up on his seat, quietly made over the medicine box to Manohar asking him to hand the same over to Miss Kanta. He was extremely exhausted and his heart was beating fast after his exertion. It was not possible for him to talk to anybody. And so leaving his task to Manohar he somehow crawled into his compartment and then fainted on his berth, losing all consciousness.

VI

When Manohar came to Miss Kanta she was dressing the fireman's injuries. Seeing Manohar she was glad beyond measure and said "Oh Manohar Babu, you have come with the medicines. Thank you so much. Now my task will be easy. Kindly excuse me for the rude words used. I lost my temper and I am sorry for it. I knew you would do it." She smiled and busied herself with the dressing.

"But where is our friend Narendra Babu ?" She inquired after a pause.

Manohar would not let this opportunity go to re-establish his position in Kanta's estimation.

"Oh :" he said "I had great difficulty in procuring the medicines and arranging for other reliefs which will be coming shortly. As for our friend Narendra Babu, he has gone back to his compartment to lie down for a rest. He had even no time to see you" he added with a dig at his absent friend.

Only a simple "Oh" escaped her lips.

VII

It was past morning hours and the sun was shining brightly when Narendra opened his eyes to find himself lying in a hospital bed with Kanta.

all women of her age. She was gradually losing faith in the good human values.

I could still recall to memory her graceful figure with an impressive array of amulets swung round her both arms. She was an embodiment of penance praying to gods and goddesses both of higher and lower orders. Everything seemed to be subservient to this one passionate desire of her—to be a mother and that was the summum bonum of her life.

Fortunately, an elderly well-wisher relation of us wrote to me at this time to seek the blassings of a Sadhu residing at that time at Puri. That relative entertained a very high opinion about Jogamaya. Commented he" such a remarkably innocent, holy and pure girl should not taste mentally miserable life for long".

Choudhury continued: I was then in service in a Bihar district. I immediately hurried to Puri with my wife where I was awe-struck with magnificent temples and blue gorgeous sea-waves. They certainly presented evidence to show that there were spots of light even in wearisome life. I was delighted to find that my wife discarded her mental inertia for the time being.

After intensive search for about three days I got hold of the Sadhu in a corner of the Jagannath temple. It was a real hard task to find a genuine one in the midst of the preponderating fakes. An unostentatious person, his appearance showed that he was full of renunciation through contact with the Divine Being. I had no doubt in view of his extraordinary personality that he must have been a miracle-worker.

He surveyed Jogamaya as a loving father showers his affection to his daughter seen after a long time in the process. Meanwhile I told him the story of our mental misery.

'Mother', he bade her affectionately, 'you will bear this copper amulet the first thing in the morning after ablution in the sea. You will beget a holy son. A pure woman cannot ever remain mentally tormented."

Jogamaya could speek no words, so much was she overwhelmed with emotion. She fell flat on Sadhu's feet to be fondly touched on her head by him.

"Remember one thing, your son will be of great spiritual bent of mind. He may even run away from home to be ordained in the monks' order. But he cannot be away for long from a great mother. Your purity and sacrifice will cause him to return. That is my firm conviction. But your son's inner purity will sustain as a householder."

Choudhury concluded with a sigh. That was about twentyfive years ago. The Sadhu has been true to his words from the beginning, will he fail only in the latter part? This in short is the sad story of my family which is daily eating into my wife's vitals.

Ramesh Ganguly was stunned. How could he satisfy a mother's great hunger of getting her son back. A mother's unparalleled affection for her son lives through the ages, but does a son realise this always?

Before Ganguly left for Calcutta next morning he proposed his eldest son's marriage with Lila, the daughter of Choudhurys. His son is now in the provincial executive service. Like a shimmering crescent in the darkening sky, a subdued glee brightened the face of Jogamaya Devi. Ganguly was delighted. He would only pray that a mother's great sacrifice be rewarded one day in her union with her son.

RAILWAY ROMANCE

seated by his side. The happenings of the previous night came rushing to his mind but he could not remember anything after he parted from Manohar on getting down from the trolley in which he remembered travelling back from Kodarma.

He looked up enquiringly into Kanta's eyes. She smiled back laying her soft hands on his forehead and advised him not to worry about anything but try to get a little more sleep and drink the glass of milk she offered.

"But where am I? And what has happened to others?

"Well, when the relief train arrived and everybody had been transhipped we found you lying unconscious with fever on your berth, and the attending doctor advised your immediate removal to this hospital at Kodarma. As I am a qualified nurse he kindly allowed me to attend you. There is no fever now. Therefore don't worry and have a little more sleep."

But sleep would not come. He wondered why this charming young woman should be ministering to his needs in his illness.

When he felt a little better after taking the milk he persisted in making inquiries about others.

"Is the fireman alive and safe?"—He asked.

"Oh yes, I think he will come round. Thanks to your assistance, I could stop his bleeding and dress him properly."

"And where is my friend Manohar?"

Kanta felt she must explain everything otherwise he would remain restless with his unending enquiries.

"You see, we soon found out that it was you who, in spite of great exhaustion, made the tremendous effort to reach the railway station and then came back with the medicines after getting the authorities to arrange for a relief train to follow. Manohar Babu gave us the impression that it was he who did everything. We now learn from the other fireman that he broke off after going a short distance and refused to budge further. But for your glorious effort there would have been considerable delay in bringing the medicines and getting the relief train."

I told Manohar Babu to his face that he had been telling lies all the time and have since stopped talking to him. So he got very angry and left us in a huff without any explanation whatsoever."

"But are you not betrothed to him?" and is he not going to marry you?" he enquired anxiously.

"Please do not talk about it any more. I am so sorry Narendra Babu that I practically induced you to go in this errand in this weak state of your health. I have learnt since then how you have suffered.

"We now want to nurse you back to health so that you can go back home to your people."

"I have no people of my own to go back to except the owners of the mica mine, where I work as manager. I live in this very town and I shall write to them immediately.

"But you have been so kind to me that I can hardly find words to express my deep gratitude to you" he added in an earnest desire to draw her sympathy.

He continued to stare at her face with an imploring look. Her eyes were downcast. He quietly took her hand which she did not withdraw until her father's arrival with the railway doctor.

ONE, who have roamed far and wide in the country-side and have had an intimate acquaintance with the country people, must have failed to be won over by the delightful aroma of the raw but robust humour that effortlessly flow out of the country folk. Not tainted by any touch of sophistication nor camouflaged by any twist of malice, their wit has an innocent effervescence that is bound to provoke a line of smile even on taciturn lips. It is in the artlessness of their wit and humour that their irresistible appeal lies. It is their naivety that wins.

LESS ADVICE PER ACRE, PLEASE

In England there was once a drive for improving the agricultural production. The Ministry sent out its technical experts to the countryside to teach the farmers how to do better. Each of these experts gave advice. Some of them asked that more water should be used per acre. The fertilizer expert advised that more doses of fertilizer should be injected per acre. The third expert told them that whatever they might do, better results would not be forthcoming unless more and better seeds were sown per acre. At last, the Minister himself thought of touring the area to find out for himself what the experts had done. A large gathering of farmers greeted him.

"Have the experts visited you?" he asked.
"Yes, Sir, they have."

"And what they have told you?"
"They have asked us to put in more water per acre, more fertilizers per acre and more and better seeds per acre."

Apparently feeling very happy over the performance of his Departmental Officers, the Minister humbly asked what more he could do for them?

An elderly farmer from amongst the crowd, in his artless and naive manner, ventured: "We are grateful to you and your officers for the advices given. It would be really helpful for us if you would give us less advice per acre."

GO BACK BY THE SAME BOAT

An amusing instance of the country-peoples' misgivings in the efficacy of Government measures relates to a visit of a Committee of Experts to a riverain territory in Bengal. Under a wide canopy, richly decorated by local officials, the meeting was arranged and villagers from far and near were assiduously persuaded to attend. The Chairman of the Committee explained in all solemnity the anxiety and earnestness of the Government to do something to resolve effectively the chronic problems of the area. But, he pleaded, he must first have the advice of the local people and consult the local experience before any schemes were prepared. He requested those present to offer their views as to how best the Committee could be helpful to them.

There was silence for some time as most of the villagers fought shy of speaking in public. At last rose a voice from the distant corner.

"Sir, it is, indeed, very nice and thoughtful of you to have taken so much trouble to come to our obscure village. Many other Committees have preceded you but nothing helpful has come out of them so far. The boat which have carried you here is still steaming. You could do us really some good if you would leave us alone to our distress and go back by the very boat in which you have come."

Gladstone was once over-powered by the wit of a rural shepherd in a Tweedside country in Scotland. One afternoon he went out for a walk and came to a gate which gave upon the glen. It was late in November, a snowstorm was threatening, and the sheep, as is their custom, were drawing out from the barn-side to the barer hill where drifts could not lie. An old shepherd was leaning on the gate, and to him Gladstone spoke in his high manner: "Are not the sheep most foolish of all animals? Here is a storm pending, and instead of remaining in shelter they are courting the fury of the blast. If I were a sheep I should remain in the hollows." To which the shepherd replied: "Sir, if ye were a sheep ye'd have mair (more) sense." Gladstone had the heartiest laugh at the artless humour of the village shepherd.

WAGES OF SIN

Lord Tweedsmuir recounts a piece of delightful humour from a Scottish village in remote Ettrickhead. Lloyd George's Insurance Act had just then been introduced and a speaker was defending it on the ground that it was a practical application of the "Sermon on the Mount."

"Ye believe in the Bible, Sir?" a long-legged villager asked him.

"With all my heart."

"And ye consider that this Insurance Act is in keepin' with the Bible?"

"I do."

"Is it true that under the Act there's a maternity benefit and that a woman gets the benefit whether she's married or no?"

"That is right."

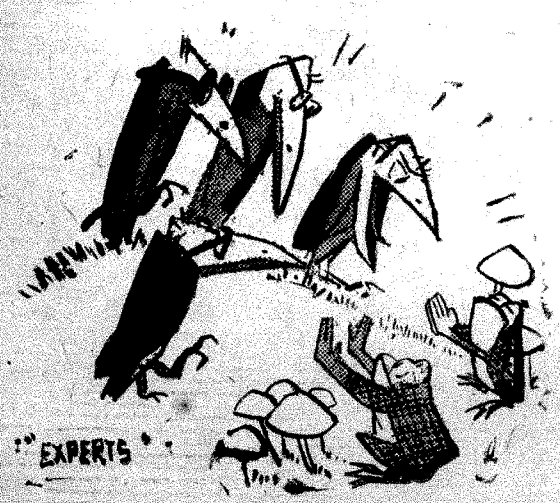
"D'ye approve of that?"

"With all my heart."

"Well, sir, how d'ye explain this? The Bible says the wages of sin is death and the Act says thirty shillin's."

BUFFALOS CANNOT BE PERSUADED

It happened in a Bengal village during the Second World War when there was a desperate demand for hair combs made from buffalo horns. Rigid specifications were drawn up by the Army authorities about the size, dimension, colour and workmanship of the combs. But the supplies were not upto the specifications. An Ordnance Officer thought it wise to visit the craftsmen who made the combs and advise them how to produce the combs according to the specifications. The craftsmen gave him a patient and courteous hearing but were not convinced as to how they could get rid of the defects inherent in the horns. At last one of them rose, thanked the Army Officer for his useful advice and then, almost innocently, said: "We shall try but the buffalos do not understand the war and, therefore, we wonder if we could persuade them to grow horns according to the Army specifications."



FOLLOW JAPANESE METHOD

Not many years back, the Japanese method of paddy cultivation was introduced in India. The Development Commissioner of a prominent State toured extensively in the villages with a view to explaining to the farmers the merits of the new method. Everywhere he received a co-operating response. But in one of the village meetings he was confronted with an embarrassing but delightful query. "We shall certainly act up to your wise advice. But, please assure us that feeding on rice grown by the Japanese method would not make our children short, squat and flat-faced as the Japanese."

MOSQUITO DE-CONTROLLED ?

It happened in a West Bengal village not long ago. The Malaria Eradication Programme was being introduced there. The Mosquito Control operations had begun. But, curiously, the menace of mosquitoes tremendously increased soon after the operation had commenced. The Mosquito Control Officer naturally felt considerably perturbed. But he had a lighter moment when an apparently simple villager accosted him: "Sir, have you de-controlled the mosquitoes?"

MINISTER REHABILITATED

Sometimes the rural humour smells of shrewdness too. The Rehabilitation Minister of a State shed copious tears in addressing his constituency which, incidentally, had a majority of refugees and displaced personnel. He confessed that he could not do as much as he desired for the relief of their distress. But he advised that in the larger interests of the country, everyone should be prepared for sacrifice of personal considerations. He spoke for well over an hour and when his torrential eloquence had ceased, one of the audience, who did not till then know who the speaker was, asked his neighbour about his identity.

When he was told who the speaker was, he asked innocently: "Is he not the same person who was a Minister once but lost his seat in the earlier election?"

"Yes, exactly so."

"I won't then dispute his rightful claim for inflicting the hour-long speech on us. He knows the mechanics of rehabilitation and can speak from personal experience."

There is abundance of regaling humour in the country-side. There may be rural odour about it. That makes it all the more relishable and delightful.

The Legendary Heroism of BAGHA JATIN

By

PRITHWINDRA MUKHERJEE

"YOU have heard of Jatin Mukherjee?" Sri Aurobindo once asked his disciples; and then he exclaimed in his unique tone, "A wonderful man! He was a man who would belong to the front rank of humanity anywhere; such beauty and strength combined together I have not seen, and his stature was like that of a warrior!"

Jatindranath Mukherjee is better known as Bagha Jatin because, as a young man, he had fought a royal Bengal tiger in his native village, and killed it single-handed.

Anecdotes of Bagha Jatin have become legends today. As a pioneer of our freedom struggle, his courage and ferocity in respect to the British could be matched only with a tiger's. But he had a softer side too. Giving away in charity the last piece of coin he had on him; day in and day out, nursing cholera and plague patients, cleaning their discharges by handfuls, with a smiling face; bringing home mad men from the streets, bathing them, treating them kindly with Ayurvedic oils and drugs, giving them good food and clothing; helping orphans and poor students, arranging for their studies and well-being; protecting everywhere helpless 'natives' against the wrath of the conceited 'white skins'; punishing the wicked and defending the weak and the victimised: such were the deeds attributed to him; and many of those who witnessed them, are still alive.

EARLY DAYS

Jatindranath Mukherjee was born in Jessore in December 1879. His father, Umesh Chandra, was a profound scholar, reputed for his strength of character and courage. His mother, Sharat-Shashi Debi, was a poet of considerable merit.

Jatin lost his father at the age of five and was brought up, along with his elder sister Vinodebala, in his maternal uncles' house in Koya, near Krishnagar.

At an early age Jatin showed a remarkable development of body and mind. He had physical training from an ex-service man from the North-West Frontier Provinces. Jatin caught a spark from the freedom-loving nature of his trainer. In studies as well as in innocent mischief-making, he was so brilliant that his teachers and fellow-students both loved and respected him.

As a student of the Calcutta Central College, Jatin came to know Sister Nivedita during the plague relief work. Nivedita was so impressed with Jatin's idealism that she took him to Swami Vivekananda. Swamiji liked him very much and is said to have become quite intimate with this young dreamer who was an excellent man of action as well.

During his conversations with Vivekananda, Jatin had the conviction that the spiritual regeneration of India would not be possible till India was politically free.

In 1899, while nursing a cholera patient, Jatin's mother caught the infection and succumbed to it. Soon afterwards, Jatin joined the Bengal secretariat as an expert stenographer, and had to spend half the year at Darjeeling and the other half in Calcutta. Wherever he was, boys and young men flocked round him, attracted by his personal magnetism. From a very early age, Jatin had a natural love of great writings. The Gita was his greatest inspiration. He could draw upon it at need. Wherever young men gathered round him, he would hold classes on the Gita and other sacred writings.

At the instance of his elder sister Vinodebala, Jatin was married to Indubala Debi in April 1900. Jatin's children Ashalata, Tejen, and Biren are still alive.

In 1903, at Yogendra Vidyabhusan's place Jatin first met Sri Aurobindo and J. N. Banerjee (afterwards Swami Niralamba). From that day, till Sri Aurobindo's coming to Pondicherry in 1910, Jatin was an intimate and esteemed friend of his, whom Sri Aurobindo once called his "right hand man" while he was in Bengal. At the same time Jatin had come to know other eminent men, like Barrister P. Mitter, Satish Mukherjee, Upadhyay Brahmabandhav, Sir Jagadish Bose, Suren Tagore, Sarala Devi and a few more.

Above all, Jatin was a man of inner spiritual attainments, and a seeker. An initiated disciple of the great Saint Bholananda Giri of Haridwar, Jatin's devotion to the Divine and to Mother India was hard to distinguish. His mission was to shake the country out of its sterile torpor, and make it poignantly conscious of India's freedom, since it was the Divine's will. Jatin's disciple Chittapriya, the unforgettable hero and martyr, was a descendant of a realised tantric sadhak, and himself a worshipper of Mother Kali from his early childhood. On his first meeting with Jatin, Chitta asked, "Dada, can one realise the Divine by serving the Motherland?" And Jatin, in his serious tone of certitude replied, "If it were not so, I would be the last person to follow this path".

SECRET SOCIETIES

Even before meeting Sri Aurobindo, Jatin had started organising secret societies and initiating young men of the country into the creed of an armed revolution whose aim was to overthrow the foreign Government. His acquaintance with Swami Vivekananda and Sri Aurobindo helped him formulate clearly his programme of action. For, Sri Aurobindo too wanted to start a secret revolutionary propaganda and organisation of which the central object was the preparation of an armed insurrection; next, there would be public propaganda intended to convert the whole nation to the ideal of independence which was regarded, at the beginning, by the vast majority of Indians as unpractical and impossible; and then, there would be the organisation of the people to carry on a public and united opposition and undermine the foreign rule through an increasing non-co-operation and passive resistance. "At that time", writes Sri Aurobindo, "the military organisation of the great empires and their means of military action were not so overwhelming and apparently irresistible as they now are: the rifle was still the decisive weapon, air power had not yet been developed and the force of artillery was not so devastating as it afterwards became. India was disarmed, but Sri Aurobindo thought that with proper organisation and help from outside their difficulty might be overcome and in so vast a country as India and with the smallness of the regular British armies, even a guerrilla warfare accompanied by general resistance and revolt might be effective. There was also a possibility of general revolt in the Indian army".

When in 1908 the "bomb factory" at Manicktola was discovered by Government, and most of the leaders (including Sri Aurobindo) and revolutionaries were arrested. Jatin managed to stay out in order to keep the organisation running. During the trial, the Public Prosecutor, was trying his best to get all the accused convicted. Jatin decided to put an end to this man's ignominious existence. On hearing this, young Charu Bose, one of Jatin's dearest disciples, volunteered again and again to take the job up. Charu's right hand was paralytic. Therefore Jatin repeatedly asked Charu to wait since he had reserved something else for him. But Charu's insistence prevailed; Jatin agreed, and tied a loaded revolver to Charu's disabled wrist. Concealing his right hand under cover of a Chaddar, Charu bowed to Jatin, took his blessings, and went straight to the court at Alipur, where the trial was going on. Before anyone could notice it, Charu lifted up his right hand with his left, and fired the fatal shot. Then, instead of trying to escape, Charu stood immobile, looking at the dead body with a smile of satisfaction. Arrested on the spot, and tortured, Charu boldly said, "No sessions' trial, but hang me to-morrow. It was all preordained that Ashu Babu should be shot by me, and I should be hanged". Charu went to the gallows with his unfading smile, as Khudiram, Kanailal and ever so many revolutionaries had done.

Next came the turn of Samsul Alam, the most notorious deputy Superintendent of Police, who dreamed of an ambitious future at the cost of the revolutionaries. Jatin's disciple, Biren Dutta Gupta, came forward this time and did the job well in the open High Court. But a sudden nervousness made his escape impossible and he was arrested.

Though Jatin was very much against terrorism, under unavoidable circumstances (such as need for raising funds to defend the accused revolutionaries) he had to consent to Swadeshi "dacoities", in which M. N. Roy was one of his main lieutenants; several such "dacoities" were carried out all over the country, and the police arrested Lalit Chakravarty, one of Jatin's disciples, at Darjeeling. Lalit turned approver, and gave away thirty-two names, stating Jatin to be the unanimous leader of the entire revolutionary movement. Young Biren (who had killed Samsul) too, in a moment of bewildered weakness, faltered under the devious machinations of the police and declared Jatin to be the supreme leader.

THE ARREST

After a good deal of vain attempts, on January 27, 1910, Government at last arrested Jatin who was till then, surprisingly enough, continuing in his high post in the Bengal secretariat, directly under the personal Secretary to the Governor of Bengal. During the search in his room the police discovered one of his manuscripts, "The Scheme and Formation of the Vigilance Committee".

After four days of starvation in the lock-up and the most brutal torture, when no information could be forced out of Jatin, the police went to try their usual method with him—that of temptation: large purse, palatial home, kingly situation, finest wine, prettiest women .....

"Shut up!" thundered Jatindranath's voice with such a bang on the table that it cracked and collapsed and the Royd Street police lock-up shook with its vibrations.

Then he was sent first to the Presidency Jail, and afterwards to the Alipore Central Jail, as a convict under trial. His historic trial began as the Howrah Conspiracy Case. After fifteen long months of rigorous prison experience, Jatin was acquitted in April 1911, since the police failed to prove the case.

Still, Government at once dismissed the entire 10th Jat Regiment under the charge of responding to Jatin's seductions.

Released Jatin saw that Sri Aurobindo had already left for Pondicherry, in the thick of the commotion following the assassination of Samsul and foiling the Government's attempt to arrest Sri Aurobindo again on the ground of his familiarity with Jatin. Motilal Roy of Chandernagore says that Sri Aurobindo had left word with the revolutionaries to assist Jatin in his programme of insurrection.

Except for a few centres under powerful leaders like Swami Prajnananda, Hemendra Acharya, Purna Das, Motilal Roy, Sashibhushan Roy Chowdhury and Jatin Roy—the revolutionist organisation seemed to have been paralysed by the two great blows from Government.

But set-backs, however shocking, could not upset Jatin's plans. Through various secret sources, Jatin's conviction grew firmer than ever that Germany would be helpful to the Indian freedom fight during the World War, when the British hold on India would no doubt slacken on account of their pre-occupation with the "front". Therefore Jatin set about reviving the whole organisation by galvanising the centres.

H. W. Wilson, in his monumental history, The Great War (Vol. III, p 348) writes, "Bernhardi, the prophet of the New Germany, forecast: 'There is another danger which concerns England more closely, and directly threatens her vitality. This is due to the Nationalist movement in India and Egypt, to the growing power of Islam, to the agitation for independence in the great colonies .... The danger is imminent that Pan-Islamism will unite with the revolutionary elements of Bengal' ". According to Mr. Wilson, for years even before the partition of Bengal, German leaders had made a minute study of India. They knew all about the secret societies plotting against Britain.

Leaving the charge of the Calcutta centre in the hands of his able lieutenant, Atul Ghose, Jatin went to Jessore and, apparently, led a peaceful existence with his family and children, and became a very busy contractor to the district board and Government, running a prosperous business with its head-office at Jessore and two or three branch-offices here and there. But very few noticed that most of Jatin's employees were his own associates and disciples in the revolutionist movement. Under cover of his contractorship, he started moving from district to district on cycle or on his favourite horse, Sundari, at such a dizzy speed that often he was seen covering more than a hundred miles a day. Government could hardly suspect that Jatin's motive could be anything else than a serious desire to earn his livelihood and feed his family and children. And, as a proof of his bona fides, big bridges and new public roads were seen springing into existence under Jatin's creative hands, as had done mills and factories during the boycott days in 1905. It was all too late, however, when Government discovered what Jatin was really about.

BUSINESSMEN

In Calcutta and elsewhere too, Jatin's associates and disciples were all seen engrossed in business, but secretly continuing their real work. Amarendra Chatterjee and Ram Majumdar had opened a big cloth-shop, the Shramajivi Samabaya in Harrison Road. Hari Chakravarty had opened the Harry and Sons in Woodmund Street, to receive and supply orders. In College Square, Suresh Majumdar had started the Gouranga Press (from where, a few years later, journals like the Ananda-bazar Patrika, the Hindusthan Standard and the weekly Desh came out). Kaviraj Bejoy Roy opened his Ayurvedic dispensary in Bowbazar. Bejoy Chakravarty was sent to Chakradharpur (B. N. Rly.) to start another cloth-shop, and Saileshwar Bose to Balasore (Orissa) to open the Universal Emporium, dealing in cycles and watches. Similar shops were opened nearly everywhere in the country. They served as shelters and underground meeting-places for the revolutionists. Among other important shelters were the Shobhabazar home of Dr. Hemanta Chatterjee (Jatin's uncle), Dwarika Vidyabhusan's house at Mirzapur Lane, Dr. Nilratan Dhar's hostel (where Jatin would often spend his nights, and where brilliant scholars like Dr. Meghnad Saha, Jnan Ghose, Dr. Satyen Bose, Dr. Nilratan and Jibanratan Dhar first came in contact with Jatin).

On the occasion of the flood in Burdwan and Contai, in June 1913, revolutionists from all sides flocked there ostensibly for the relief-work. There, in a secret meeting, Jatin clearly stated his future plans in regard to an armed insurrection at the outbreak of the World War. All the parties assembled under Jatin's banner. The Anushilan of Dacca too promised their collaboration.

In August, 1914, by looting the Roda Company of Calcutta, Jatin's associates and disciples got hold of a good number of Mauser pistols (made in Germany, and well-known as very powerful arms), and distributed them to all the important centres of the organisation. Quite a few years before that, Jatin had thought of importing arms and ammunition from abroad and, accordingly, had sent out his emissaries (mostly as students) to Europe, America, and other parts of the world in order to arrange for foreign aids.

In the very early years of the century, Swami Niralamba (J. N. Banerjee) had gone to the Punjab and spread there Sri Aurobindo's revolutionary ideals. Freedom-loving Punjabis had at once welcomed these ideals, and men like Sardar Ajit Singh, Kishen Singh (father of the Martyr Bhagat Singh) and so many others embraced this new movement with all their ardour. It was this ardour that had kindled a flame in Lala Hardyal too, who, in 1911, carried these fire-seeds to San Francisco and, with the help of revolutionaries like Pandit Ramchandra, Barkatulla, Bhai Paramanand, Panduranga Khankhoje, Kashiram, and Sohan Singh Granthi, sowed them among patriotic Indians by founding the Yugantar Ashram. Soon after, he started publishing the historic journal Gadhar (which too means "Yugantar" or revolution) and had an immediate appeal to lovers of India all over the world. In no time, the powerful Gadhar Party came into being.

In the meantime, in London, Zurich and Berlin too Indians like Maratha, Paranjape, Suktankar, Dr. Dhiren Sarkar, Siddiki, Dr. Jnan Dasgupta, Soven, Biren Chattopadhyay (Sarojini Naidu's brother), Champakraman Pillai, Savarkar, Dhingra, Shyamji Krishnavarma, Madame Cama, and others had started organising secret societies to work for India's freedom. Among them too, there were a few of Jatin's emissaries. In course of time, Hardyal went to Berlin and met Biren Chattopadhyay who had already established an excellent relationship with the German Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Germans had definitely promised to help the Indian insurrection against the British Raj, in form of money, arms and ammunition. That the Kaiser himself was directly interested in the Indian freedom fight has been clearly stated in The Great War by H. W. Wilson: "About 1909, he (the Kaiser) opened relations with seditious Indians, and a bureau was established in Berlin to promote Indian plots ..... The Crown Prince followed faithfully in the footsteps of his father. During his visit to India persons in his suite were able to meet on the spot Indian sedition-mongers". (Vol. 10, p 387).

During the "Maniktala" years, Rashbehari Bose had occasions to become intimate with Jatin and his doings. For some time, however, Bose dissociated himself from the revolutionary activities. But when, released from prison, Jatin once more invited Rashbehari to come and work for the imminent insurrection, he could not but join him. The way Jatin influenced Rashbehari is clearly shown by Dr. Jadugopal in his autobiography. He writes that in a secluded garden at Dakshineshwar, Jatin, Rashbehari and Amarendra Chatterjee were busy discussing the planned insurrection when, suddenly, Jatin looked straight into Bose's eyes and asked, "Fort William has to be captured. Possible ?" As though spell-bound, Bose immediately replied, "Yes. I shall do it". And he actually went and settled the whole matter with Genda Singh, the Sikh in-charge of the Fort, so that all the Indian soldiers agreed to participate in the revolution.

The first All-India direct action was to take place on February 21, 1915. But the plan fell through owing to Kirpal Singh's turning King's approver. Though a failure in India, this direct action was a unique success in Singapore where the entire 5th Light Infantry and the Malay States Guides (in all, a thousand soldiers) joined the insurrection, attacked the fort, and kept it under siege for seven long days. But getting no reinforcement from India, they had to surrender. "Probably the seed was sown by Indian agitators", writes H. W. Wilson, who returned from America at the beginning of the War and visited Singapore on their way. That the German intrigues in U.S.A. were responsible for the return of these dangerous conspirators to the East during the critical period of August, 1914, there can be little doubt". (The Great War Vol. 6, p. 159).

At this juncture, one of Jatin's emissaries, Satyen Sen, returned from America, via Japan where he had met Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen who showed a genuine interest in India's freedom struggle and promised active support. Along with Satyen, came two bright young revolutionaries, Pinglay and Kartar Singh (the latter was equipped with knowledge of aircraft-making), and four thousand members of the Gadhar Party. Twenty thousand more, as Satyen reported, were to join them soon, and German ships too, loaded with money, arms, and ammunition, were coming.

With the hope of collecting more money and arms, Rashbehari sailed for Japan in May 1915, while Jatin started preparing the organisation for another decisive action. Expecting the aids to come, he arranged for distributing the Gadhar members all over North India.

The 'Berlin Committee' of Indian revolutionists decided that, aided by the German Foreign Ministry, they would collect money, arms, and ammunition and send them to Count Bernstorff, the German Ambassador, and to Captain Von Papen, German Military Attache at Washington. Bernstorff and Papen together would arrange to send them to India by chartered ships. All the German Ambassadors and Consuls in the European and Asian countries had already received instructions to help the Indian revolutionists as best they could, thanks to which, Jatin's emissaries had always received most cordial welcome especially in Bangkok and Batavia.

In March, 1915, Jatin's emissary Jiten Lahiri returned from America with the news that the German ship Maverick was going to leave San Francisco on April 22, and that on its way, two more ships, Annie Larcen and Henry S, would join it, all loaded with valuable material for the Indian insurrection.

THE PLAN

One of the ships, it was decided, would stop either at Noakhali or Hatia, another at Raimangal (Sundarban). Bepin Ganguli and M. N. Roy were given the charge of taking delivery and, on the fixed date, marching into Calcutta where all the Indian soldiers would join the revolutionists, capture Fort William and all Calcutta, and hoist the Indian Tricolour. Phani Chakravarty and Bhupati Majumdar were in charge of dynamite and other explosives. The third and, if possible, a fourth ship would contain the most important consignment of materials, and anchor at Balasore (Orissa). Jatin himself took the responsibility of taking the delivery and proceeding towards Calcutta through Singbhum and Midnapore where, on his route, waiting revolutionaries would join him. Jatin would also destroy all means of communication between Bengal and Madras. Bhola Chatterjee and Satish Chakravarty were to destroy the Bengal-Nagpur and the East Indian railway lines. In response to this direct action in Eastern India, other centres all over India and the Asian countries would simultaneously join hands. The whole British Raj would be paralysed in India and, on top of it, troops of Indian revolutionaries would enter the mainland from outside. In India there were only twelve thousand British soldiers then and there was no possibility of bringing in fresh troops, since the British army could not be moved away from the frontier.

Aided by his brilliant associates, Jatin, the master-mind, had even chalked out a plan for the administration of free India. It was from the British rulers that he had the privilege to learn the secrets of administration, while he was holding a high post in the Bengal secretariat. Also, he had the prudence to forestall any possible entry of the Germans as new rulers.

At such a critical moment, towards the beginning of 1915, when the British Government had set a high price on Jatin's head, and issued his photographs in their circulars in order to help his identification and arrest, Jatin could often be seen in crowded streets. When one of his disciples protested against such recklessness, he smiled and replied, "If we should be hiding for safety all the time, why on earth did we venture upon this path ?"

One day, while Jatin was in a secret meeting at a Calcutta centre, a shadow suddenly loomed up outside the room, aiming at which Chittapriya fired a shot. It was a spy, who lay prostrate and bleeding. Immediately Jatin ordered the meeting to disperse. But the spy did not die before he could name Jatin as responsible for his death.

As soon as news arrived that the ships were coming, Jatin decided to go to Balasore. Towards the end of March, 1915, while he was leaving for Bagnan on his way to Balasore, he was told that Mother Saradamani (the Holy Consort of Shri Ramakrishna) happened to be present at the Howrah Station. Jatin hastened to receive her blessings. In a closeted compartment he met her, took the dust of her feet, and exchanged a few words with her. When he left, someone asked the Mother, "What was the talk about?" She replied, a melancholy look in her eyes, "I saw him as a blazing fire!"

After leaving necessary instructions with Saileshwar at the Universal Emporium in Balasore town, Jatin and a few of his associates went to Kaptipoda, thirty miles inland, in the dense forests of Mayurbhanj, and waited for the ships.

Among the local people Jatin became very popular as Sadhu-Baba, and his dwelling came to be known as Ashram. Sadhu Baba became their idol in their weal and woe, joy and sorrow. Jatin was good at homoeopathic and allopathic treatments, and would often bring serious cases home and nurse them for days and nights. Also he had opened a grocer's shop for the poor villagers, and most often the sales were "on credit". Moreover, every evening, Jatin would hold a class for the illiterate villagers.

Leaders from various centres came regularly to meet Jatin in Kaptipoda, discuss current topics with him, and take his instructions. In June, 1915, M. N. Roy returned to Kaptipoda after a month of tour of a few Asian countries, and after contacting the German Representative, Von Helfferich, at Batavia, on Jatin's behalf. As token of German collaboration and friendship, Roy dramatically placed a heap of sovereigns at Jatin's feet, and also a map of India with spots thereon, where the Germans indicated important revolutionary centres and other spots where the ships would anchor. Roy also reported that the German ships were already on their way. Jatin broke this piece of good news to his disciples and associates. Everybody eagerly looked forward to the arrival of the ships.

The Maverick had punctually left San Francisco. But by the time it neared Mexico—after an unusual delay due to its attempts to avoid the American sea customs—the Annie Larcen was captured by the Americans. Therefore the Maverick had to proceed all alone.

THE LEAK-OUT

It was the time when the Czech revolutionaries were hiding in America and attempting to rid their country of the Austro-Hungarian domination. The Czechs were apparently interested in the Indian insurrection, and had managed to become intimate with the Gadhar members. But when they came to know that the Indian revolutionary effort had advanced so far, they grew jealous and passed the information on to the French Intelligence Department, from where it promptly reached the British spies. As an emergent measure, under the Defence of India Act, the police started arresting Indians indiscriminately. The Central Intelligence Department girded up their loins to arrest Jatin. At the same time, British spy ships started following the Maverick. Desperate, it threw away all the important documents, arms, and ammunition into the Pacific, and was captured in Java.

The Singapore press-cuttings of this news were sent to Jatin. Without feeling the least depressed, he at once sent Phani Chakravarty and M. N. Roy to Batavia again, in August, 1915. From there, Roy and Chakravarty went to Sanghai, met the German Ambassador, and made arrangements for two more ships. In Sanghai, Chakravarty found Rashbehari waiting for them with plenty of money and material, some of which he had already despatched to the Shramajivi of Calcutta, through two young Chinese friends. Also he had sent another lot of arms, some important names and addresses, and valuable documents through Abani Mukherjee, a member of Jatin's party. But unfortunately, all three of them were arrested in Singapore. Seeing Chakravarty too under arrest, Rashbehari again fled to Japan.

On one of such stormy days, Jatin had a vision of Sri Krishna appearing before him. The sun was setting. The entire Kaptipoda forests seemed to have been touched by a meditative calm. Manindra Chakravarty of Kaptipoda happened to have gone out to see Jatin at that auspicious moment, and finding him in an indrawn state and tear-filled eyes Manindra quietly sat beside him. He has left a soul-stirring decription of Jatin's state: seeing him, Jatin suddenly clasped his hand and exclaimed, "Look, look there!" The touch was thrilling. Currents of lightning flashed through his limbs. But his eyes failed to see Sri Krishna. He has written, "Where shall I get such eyes ? .. In spite of Jatin's eagerness to make me see, how could a miserable person like me deserve to see Him ? But I was thrilled to witness Jatin altogether lost in ecstasy ... So many cares he had! Ever so many problems weighed heavy upon him! But he seemed to have forgotten everything ! .... He kept on sitting in that trance. We sat side by side, as though in another world, until it was dark .... Such was the trance of this great devotee ! Blessed be you, Jatin! Blessed be your name!"

THE EXPEDITION

Unable to trace Jatin's whereabouts, G. C. Denham (D.I.G., Intelligence Dept., of the Central Government), along with Sir Charles Tegart (Deputy Commissioner of Police), and L. N. Bird (Assistant Superintendent of Police) went to Balasore on September 4, 1915, pursuing a faint clue. On the 5th morning, while searching the Universal Emporium, a scrap of paper with the word 'Kaptipoda' written on it, fell into their hands. With a great deal of suspicion, they proceeded towards Kaptipoda, accompanied by R. G. Kilby (District Magistrate, Balasore), Sergeant Rutherford (Proof Dept., Chandipur) and E. C. Ryland (D.I.G., Bihar and Orissa), both with their contingents; also, at Tegart's request, a company of armed police from Balasore joined them.

They reached Kaptipoda on the evening of the 7th. Informed of their arrival, Jatin personally went to see and make sure that they were really his "friends", and made up his mind about what steps to take. Only Chittapriya and Manoranjan were in the 'Ashram' then. Returning there, Jatin explained the matter to them and asked them to get ready without delay. But Chittapriya and Manoranjan repeatedly requested Jatin, "Dada, don't bother any more about us. If you decide to go away all alone, who on earth can ever guess your whereabouts? If you kindly care to save yourself now, any number of insurrections can be hatched and organised at your bidding. Don't worry about anything else, Dada!" But, without uttering a single word, Jatin went to his host, Manindra, informed him of the coming of the police, and moved fast towards Taldihi, twelve miles away, where two more of his disciples, Jyotish and Niren, were waiting. When they too entreated him again to escape, Jatin replied, "I had an impression that by this time you at least knew your Dada pretty well. But is this the proof of it? To save his own life from danger, could that be the leader's first concern?"

Chitta, Niren, Manoranjan, and Jyotish—four young hero warriors, silent and resolute—moved forward, following in the footsteps of their revered leader, their loving brother and beloved guru who, according to Amarendra Chatterjee, "can be compared with Napoleon alone, as a warrior and a general. Had he been born in a free, Western country, he would have left an immortal name in the history of mankind." Or, in Atul Ghose's words, "A consummate military leader and devoted lover of the country like Shivaji and a sea of compassion like Chaitanya: these two together would make a Jatindranath."

On the night of the 8th, Jatin returned to Manindra's house. It was drizzling, and the sky was thick with clouds. All day long, the police had searched the entire area minutely, tortured Manindra, trying to squeeze information out of him, and kept a strict watch all around after sunset. "In spite of all these obstacles, how could Jatin come to me? It was really a puzzle!" Manindra wrote later. He briefly told Jatin about the day's experience and warned him to be more cautious, since the police had promised to the public a prize worth a few thousand rupees, if anybody could capture Jatin or his followers. And then Manindra added, "Still there is time. If you go away in the direction of the Meghasani range across the dense forest, you'll very soon be out of danger. Please don't delay, for the country's sake at least."

"NO!" replied Jatin in a firm tone, "It is no more an occasion to keep in hiding and save our little life. The crucial moment calls for a show-down!" Then, taking some money from Manindra (out of their funds), and a rifle, Jatin went away to join his four disciples.

Early next morning, Jatin and his party reached the bank of the river Bura-Balam, near Balasore town. But no ferry agreed to take them across, since it was raining. All of a sudden, one of the boatmen shouted, "Well, these must be the dacoits. Hurry up! you'll get thousands of rupees: Dacoits! Dacoits!"

At once a terrible row shook the banks of the Bura-Balam with excitement. In vain did the revolutionaries try to convince the villagers that they were not dacoits. But, when the crowd desperately rushed to catch them, Manoranjan fired blank shots to keep them off. The crowd retreated. But, as Jatin and his party swiftly ran past village after village, the pursuers increased in number. When they were near the village Kamtana, two daring villagers pounced upon Jatin, but only to be hurled off in a split second. They, however, managed to stand up with difficulty, and urged others to run after the fugitives. None dared; and yet none gave up the chase.

After a while, when some fellows mustered courage and tried to seize the revolutionaries, Manoranjan killed one of them and injured another. At last the mob, demoralised, shrank back, and went to inform the police. Taking advantage of the position, Jatin and his party reached the Mayurbhanj Road, and moved fast in search of a vantage-point.

For a few whole days, the five heroes walked without food and any kind of rest, not to speak of sleep. Jatin realised that this could not continue for long. Something had to be given to the boys. On their way, when they found a village sweets shop, they bought a rupee-worth of muri and having no change on them, they gave the shopkeeper a ten-rupee note, and left the place.

"Mukherjee, tell me what can I do for you?"

THE ENCOUNTER

It occurred to the shopkeeper that probably these were the much-spoken-of dacoits. Again a crowd gathered. Again the chase began. By the time they reached Sahupara, they saw a company of police rushing towards them. Encouraged by the sight, the crowd grew so excited that the revolutionists had to fire blank shots again in order to scare them away. Then they jumped into the river, swam across, sped through a big paddy field, and entered a forest at the end of the village Chasakhand. Niren was ill. So Jatin selected a hillock skirted by a tank on one side and surrounded by ant-hills, climbed it up with his disciples, and asked them to be ready with their Mauser pistols and long-range rifles, and wait for his orders to fire.

Through his binocular, Chittapriya saw the British army advancing rapidly towards them in the manner of a pincer movement, on one side of which was Major Freath (Superintendent, Defence Dept.), while on the other, were Sergeant Rutherford, Sir Charles Tegart, Bird, Ryland, Denham, Khudabox, and Khasnobis (a CID Inspector).

Suddenly Manoranjan noticed a man waving a piece of white cloth from the top of a tree. The revolutionists understood the signal and shot him down. In the meantime, realising where the fugitives were, the police opened fire as they charged towards the hillock. But there was no response from the hillock.

Jatin, the strategist that he was, had deluded his enemies into thinking that his party had no long-range fire arms, and so drew them well within his firing-range. When the soldiers were about to climb the hillock, he riddled them with a volley of bullets. The firing continued from behind the termite-hill, decimating the enemy ranks, till the struggling survivors were forced to retreat. The bewildered officers sharply ordered the soldiers to lie prone. But the relentless rain of bullets gave them no respite. The regiment tried hard to advance, crawling up the muddy slopes. The British officials, struck by awe and admiration for Jatin's military tact could find no way to save their men who were falling by the dozen.

After three hours' constant firing Jyotish murmured, "Dada, the bullets are running short!" Firing with both hands equally steady, Jatin gave them the last bag of bullets. But its key could not be found, and the leather was so thick that while they tried every possible means to open it, a sepoy had already climbed a tree and fired from there. The shot whizzed past Chittapriya's head. Next moment, when the brave young hero lifted his head, a second shot hit him dead!

Jatin had received a bullet wound in his left thumb; yet he continued firing with his right hand. Seeing Chitta's tragic end, he drew the body on his lap. The stock of bullets almost over, and Chitta dead, the four heroes desperately fired

REPRIEVE

By Dr. NABAGOPAL DAS

As the train steamed out of the Howrah station, Pranab took out Ila's letter from his pocket.

His eyebrows puckered with annoyance as he read it once more. "It is nearly four weeks since you last came here. I know this is the busy season in your office, but Dipu refuses to comprehend. He is all the time crying for you and I am at the end of my tether. Do please come this week-end so that Dipu may feel reassured. As for me, well, I am not in the best of health these days, and you know the reason. By the way, do bring a Ludo set for Dipu ; no good set is available in this god-forsaken place !"

It was this last sentence which was now disturbing his equanimity. He had clearly forgotten to buy the set ! It was not entirely his fault, though. On his way to the station, he had to drop in at Queenie's place, and everything got upset there.

His eyes lit up as he thought of Queenie. He couldn't recall what her real name was (did she have one ?), but, to him, she was, and would always remain, the queen of his heart.

Poor Queenie ! As on other Saturdays, she was looking forward to spending this Saturday also in Pranab's company. It was a great disappointment to her when he announced that he was going out of Calcutta for the week-end on urgent business of his firm. How could he leave her abruptly and rush to the New Market to buy a Ludo set for Dipu ? He had to spend some time with her—to help her wipe away her tears. At the station, however, he had bought a box of toffee : this should do for Dipu for the present.

He stole a glance at the only other passenger in the first class compartment in which he was travelling. The innocent-looking elderly gentleman was immersed in a monthly magazine : he did not appear to be the sort of person who would go on chattering and jabbering until sometimes you felt like shrieking. Pranab could weave his own dreams without being interrupted.

His thoughts again went back to Queenie. A really wonderful girl—unlike any he had met so far ; full of the joy of life, and yet blissfully unaware of their difference in age. Yes, Pranab was at least fifteen years older than she, but Queenie did not seem to care. And she had told him on at least two occasions (or was it three ?) that she felt so exhilaratingly close to him, that she was never happy in the company of young, frivolous men.

But I am not old, argued Pranab with himself. Thirty-six—that is just the age when one can regard people with greater sympathy, when one can project one's personality into (and so fully comprehend) the object one is associating with. And, oh, it is so refreshing to spend even a few hours with a lively young girl of twenty-one—particularly when that girl accepts you without question, almost with a deep sense of fulfilment.

It all happened so swiftly and suddenly. When he first met Queenie at a party, he had never imagined that he would get emotionally involved in this fashion. He had felt sorry for this girl who had to support her bedridden mother, almost a permanent invalid, with whatever she could earn. By current standards, she was well paid by the European firm in which she worked. She, however, had to spend quite a sizeable portion of her salary on her clothes and accessories and, with the recurring drain on her purse on account of her mother's illness, it was hard going for her. But she managed everything so neatly that Pranab was full of admiration for her. After he had known her for a few night, he had offered to help, but she politely refused. Her refusal was, however, so graceful that it almost lit up his face.

Sometimes he wondered whether Queenie had not been drawn towards him on account of his social position, the job he held and his money. Once he had dropped her a hint to this effect, and, by God, he could never forget the tears that it brought forth. And she would never let him remind her that he was thirty-six—fifteen years older than herself. She had made him take an oath that he would not even mention his age so long as he was with her.

No, there was no room for doubting Queenie's love for him. How very much she looked forward to the few minutes talk she had with him every day over the telephone. At first she used to phone him up during the lunch interval when her boss was away, but Pranab was not always available then. Subsequently, it was arranged that she would give him a ring at tea time, but even that was not smooth sailing always. So Pranab had to devise a different routine. Every evening he would pick up Queenie from her office and together they would come to the flat where she stayed with her mother.

The routine was something like this. Pranab went to Queenie's mother first, enquired how she was feeling and, after exchanging a few words, came to the small living room. Meanwhile, Queenie got out of her office sari, had a wash and put on the kettle on the gas ring. When the tea was ready, she took it on a tray to her mother first. She then came back to Pranab and had tea with him. As the minutes ticked away and dusk fell, she would often forget to switch on the light. When the clock struck eight, both of them would wake up as it were and, mumbling an apology and an 'until-we-meet again', Pranab would hasten down the stairs to his car.

Queenie had never asked him whether he was married nor had he thought it necessary to bring up the subject. His wife Ila was away in Bolpur with their son Dipu: she had gone to stay with her parents, particularly as, on the eve of the arrival of a second child, her health was none too good. Pranab, however, had no difficulty in keeping company with Queenie whenever he wanted. Complication arose, however, during the week-ends when Pranab was expected to pay his scheduled visit to Bolpur. At first he excused himself to Queenie saying that he had urgent business out of town. But when she pouted her lips and seemed to miss him terribly (with a shock he realised that he missed her too), he decided to give Bolpur the go-by. He wrote to Ila that, as it was the end of the financial year, he was required to work even during the week-ends, and so, much as he regretted it, he would not be able to come to Bolpur for a couple of weeks. And now this had been stretched to nearly a month and hence this complaining letter from Ila. He was not looking forward to the impending meeting with Ila. Why couldn't she leave him alone even for a month? Doesn't every man have a right to his own life, to his own particular destiny? Must he be constantly reminded of his so-called duties and obligations?

Perhaps he was becoming a little too harsh to Ila. After all, they had been married for ten long years, she had borne him a son (his heart softened as he thought of young Dipu) and another was on the way. She did have some rights as his wife and as the mother of his children, didn't she? Oh, hell, thought Pranab, why must life be so complicated?

The sight of Ila anxiously watching him get down from the rickshaw, did not particularly gladden his heart. He replied briefly to her greeting and asked: "Where is Dipu?"

—Dipu has got a touch of fever since this morning. He is in bed.

Pranab followed Ila into the inner apartments. He first went to his parents-in-law, asked them how they were and then came to the room where Dipu was anxiously awaiting the arrival of his father.

As soon as he saw Pranab, he sat up on his bed and asked: "Have you brought the Ludo set, daddy?"

Pranab stammered in reply: "I forgot all about it, Dipu. I have got a nice box of toffee for you, though."

But Dipu was not at all pleased to have the box of toffee.

Pranab continued: "I shall bring the Ludo set the next time I come".

Dipu remarked: "That means not until another month!"

Pranab was stung to the quick by this remark of Dipu's. He said: "No, no, it won't be another month—I shall bring it next week."

Dipu did not feel convinced, but was too tired to argue. He lay down on his back and closed his eyes.

Just before dinner, Ila asked Pranab: "Is the work very heavy these days?"

With a wry face, Pranab replied: "Oh, it is hell! The new Managing Director wants everything to be done in record time and so we all are being made to work like donkeys!"

—You do look tired. Why don't you take a few days' leave and come over to Bolpur for a little change and rest?

—Impossible! My boss would not even hear of it, certainly not until the annual general meeting is over!

Ila could not suppress a sigh. That meant that her husband would not be near her when the new one arrives. She looked pale and dejected.

Pranab felt a slight irritation travelling through his nerves. Why must Ila make all kinds of impossible demands? And look at her! She was meeting her husband after a month and yet she had taken no pains to groom herself. Presenting herself as a tragic figure, she sought to invoke his pity, his sympathy. This was what Pranab hated most—this kind of subterfuge. Why couldn't Ila be more direct and straightforward?

Ila continued: "Even conceding that you are unable to come every week-end to Bolpur, can't you at least write regularly? Poor Dipu so looks forward to his daddy's letters!"

Pranab protested: "But I have been writing to you twice a week. Isn't that enough? And what can I write? That I am simply choked with files and statements, that, even so, I am doing well? One gets tired of writing such hackneyed things."

"But even two years back you used to write every day," Ila said feebly.

Now, this is nothing short of blackmail, thought Pranab. Why must he write everyday when there was nothing special to say? After all, they had been married ten long years. In such a situation, one didn't write to his wife even once a week. By comparison, he had been almost an angel—he had been writing at least twice a week.

He, however, did not wish to enter into an argument with Ila. He simply said: "Let us go and have our dinner."

Throughout the following day (Sunday), he avoided Ila as much as possible. He talked for a while with his father-in-law and devoted a good bit of his time to Dipu who was already feeling better. Towards the evening, he went out for a long stroll: he could not stand the close atmosphere of the house any longer.

By the time he returned home, it was well past eight. He was to catch the first train to Howrah in the morning. So he had an early dinner and retired to his room.

As Ila came to share his bed, she asked: "Don't you love me any more?"

Pranab almost sat up.

—Why do you ask this question?

—You know why. You have come after a month, but not one kind word, not one word of affection has slipped out of your lips! Have I ceased to be your wife, the mother of your children?

Ila was on the verge of tears.

—Now, now, please try to understand, Ila.... Pranab pleaded....Believe me, I have been up to my neck in work and too tired to think of anything else. I am really sorry if you have found me a little cold, but I tell you I am as fond of you as ever.

Pranab put out his hand over Ila and gave her a pat of reassurance. In a few minutes, Ila was fast asleep.

Sleep, however, seemed to have deserted Pranab. As he looked at Ila lying by his side, in calm content, deep pity arose inside him. He wondered if he should not cut off all connection with Queenie.

But the very thought of saying good-bye to Queenie made him smart with pain. How could he be so utterly selfish when the poor girl depended so much on him? Would it not simply break her heart?

And yet facts must be faced one day. Sooner or later, Queenie would come to know about his wife and children. With this knowledge, would she love him still? Certainly not!

For hours Pranab tossed about in bed, but could come to no final decision.

He was woken from sleep by Ila.

—Do get up. It is past six already—time for you to start for the station.

Pranab got up in haste, quickly brushed his teeth and collected his week-end suitcase.

—I have already called a rickshaw to take you to the station.

"Thank you, thank you so much, Ila," stammered Pranab.

Dipu came up rubbing his sleep-laden eyes. He said, "Please don't forget to bring the Ludo set next Saturday."

Ila asked: "You are coming on Saturday, aren't you?"

Pranab had no time to make a reply to either of them. He hurriedly got into the rickshaw and asked the puller to run as fast as he could.

That same elderly gentleman was in the compartment again. As Pranab got in, he took his eyes from the magazine and nodded to him in recogni-away, with all their might. In a quick succession, Jatin received a few bullets in the abdomen and armpit. Hot blood gushed out and streamed down on the soil of Chasakhand, the blood that sanctified the spot into a centre of pilgrimage for generations to come.

Niren, Jyotish, and Manoranjan too were badly injured. But, unable to bear their beloved Guru's fatal wounds, they quickly tore their dhotis into shreds and sought to give him some first aid. Looking at them, Jatin said, "I am leaving you three behind. Before you die tell the people of our country that we were never dacoits. Let them know about our unfulfilled mission, so that posterity may take it up!"

In the meantime, British officers and soldiers gathered around and captured them! Hats off before Jatindranath, the officers bowed in respect, and arranged to remove him immediately to the Government Hospital at Balasore.

Before the operation, Jatin said by way of a dying declaration, "I alone am responsible for all that has been done till now. My associates are mere boys and they are innocent, mere tools in my hands. . . . . Please see that they are acquitted."

The operation was successful. But on the morning of September 10, 1915, while Mr. Kilby was busy nursing Jatin with a brotherly care, Jatin tore off all his stitches and bandages. And again blood gushed out. Jatin smiled and exclaimed, "So much blood left still? . . . . Fortunately, every drop of it has been shed in the worship of the Mother!".....

Jatin's elder sister Vinodebala had once written to him, "Jati, take care that we may never have to hear of the lion being caged."

No! stone-walls could not make a prison for him, nor iron bars a cage. He smiled at all the care the alien Government were taking to keep him alive.

Charles Tegart, who had known Jatin for years, eagerly came to him and asked with all his sincerity, "Mukherjee, tell me, what can I do for you?" With a beaming smile Jatin replied, "Thanks, Charles. All's over. Good bye!"

And he passed away.

Such love for the country, such a great sacrifice moved the British officers so much that, with tearful eyes, they stood round Jatin's bed. Sir Charles Tegart later said, "I have high regard for him. I have met the bravest Indian. But I had to perform my duty."

The glorious death Jatin died at the end of a glorious life of 35 years, made all the lovers of freedom weep for him. Men like Deshabandhu C. R. Das and Rabindranath Tagore (who knew Jatindranath personally) joined in the country's silent homage to the memory of this invincible harbinger of national freedom and glory. Poets and bards down the decades sang of the deeds of Jatindranath Mukherjee; and inspired patriots like Bhagat Singh of the Punjab, Suryya Sen of Chittagong, and Netaji Subhas Chandra Bose followed the trail he had blazed, and carried on the torch of Revolution right on to the portals of our Independence.

tion. For some inexplicable reason, Pranab blushed to the roots of his hair.

Throughout the journey, Pranab made no attempt to strike up a conversation with his fellow passenger. He remained immersed in his thoughts —about Ila, Queenie and himself. He had made up his mind: he would not see Queenie at all—he would speak to her over the telephone and say good-bye to her.

But his determination slackened as soon as he entered his familiar office. And when the expected phone call from Queenie came in the afternoon, he readily agreed to pick her up from her office as usual.

The atmosphere in the flat was certainly soothing to Pranab's jaded nerves. What exhilarated him most was Queenie's obvious pleasure in his company. She behaved as if she had met him after a long separation.

Playfully, she said: "I have found out where you were during the week-end."

Pranab's heart started thumping against his chest.

—I met Mr. Roy of your office on Saturday evening. He told me that you had gone to Bolpur. Then I saw in the Sunday papers yesterday that they were having the new year mela there. At once I knew that you had gone to see the mela. I am very annoyed, though—for your not having even offered to take me with you!

Pranab breathed a sigh of relief. It had been a narrow shave, indeed!

But shouldn't he avail himself of the opportunity to make a clean breast of things? Pranab was half inclined to go right ahead.

He said: "You are right, Queenie. I did go to Bolpur, but not to see the mela....."

Queenie nestled against him and said: "I know, I know. A busy man like you would never make a trip all that way to Bolpur just to see a mela: of course, you combined business with pleasure. And that is why I have forgiven you this time."

Reflectively, she added, "Can't you ever get away from work? I warn you, you must give the whole of the next week-end to me—I shall simply not stand any excuse!

As if to seal the arrangement, she brought her lips closer to his.

Is it humanly possible to make a confession in such a situation? Pranab stopped deliberating and gave himself up to Queenie's embrace.

No, he would not say anything to Queenie, certainly not today. Let events take their own course. He would much rather have his sweet reprieve than rudely tear asunder the veil of the future and step into the harsh world outside.

The Golden Phantom

By DEBESH DAS

"FOOLISH girls keep diaries, clever ones don't."

I immediately turned sideways to notice who made this bright statement. You too would have done the same.

But it is not possible to glance sideways for long. This is not done. In England the conventions amount to tyranny. This very moment I keenly missed the element of individual freedom we enjoy in India.

Why should I not be able to cast a longish glance towards the glamour girl sitting at the next table? Anyhow, I was all attention.

Her companion, I guessed, was on the right side of forty. I have been noticing him for the last few days occupying the table next to me in the banquet room of the hotel. On his very first appearance here he had broadcast a bland genial smile towards all and sundry in the hall. He alone knew what percentage of that smile was intended for me. But the pleasant old waiter who looked after my table credited the whole of it to my ledger.

After collecting his tips from the next table Joe came over to mine. While discreetly arranging jam and croissant for my coffee he said, "Sir, did you notice his moustache?"

"Noticed indeed! A lot of planning must have gone into this cultivation on his lip."

"You are right, sir. Your description is as typically Indian as his moustache is typically American in its forward look. Seems to fly forward like the latest model Cadillac."

A very nice metaphor indeed. Hotels in Mayfair have a reputation for the frozen attitude of their formal waiters. Nothing but heavy tips would melt it. But Joe here was oozing with admiration for this mustachioed John Bull.

I am a foreigner not used to talking in measured phrases and with cold intonations. Every Saturday I leave a decent tip by the cup of my morning coffee on the breakfast table. So the famous Joe of Mayfair has a special fondness for me but my moustached neighbour has won his heart at the very sight. Probably even without tipping.

Joe said, "Sir, have you noticed his suit? It must have been stitched by the best of the Saville Row tailors. It fits him like a pair of gloves. Or like the skin of a snake as you may describe it in India.

Yes, your description is admirable indeed!

I started wondering why Joe brought in the question of a snake's sheath. Was it because India is supposed to be a land of snakes, mendicants and Maharajas?

The waiter was bubbling with enthusiasm and remarked, "Not only that, Sir. He is so full of life. I'm sure he goes out riding every day in the Rotten Row.

The Rotten Row is the famous riding spot in Hyde Park. I was wondering whether next week I should increase Joe's tips or reduce them.

Next morning Joe again perched near my table as soon as the neighbouring table fell vacant. He brought his mouth near my ears while trying to polish the spoon hard. He whispered, "Sir, you don't come in here either for dinner or supper. That's why you don't know. But last night I got all the dope about the Colonel."

A hard day's work lay in front. These few minutes I could take easy. So let me hear his story.

Joe's eyes almost closed in admiration as he said, "The Colonel had earned a military cross during the war. A real combatant. Not only brave but very rich also."

I commented, "Sure! Why else would he come to this hotel? After all he isn't staying here on Government account but on his own. . . . . ."

Joe cut me short.

"No, no, the Colonel's also staying here on Government account. Last evening, while he was mixing soda with his whisky he whispered a few words while it was bubbling over. But I heard them. He operated in the secret service. Has a top secret assignment. That's why he is putting up here for a few days and not in the hotel run by his own Company."

I now got up. I had to attend a conference in time.

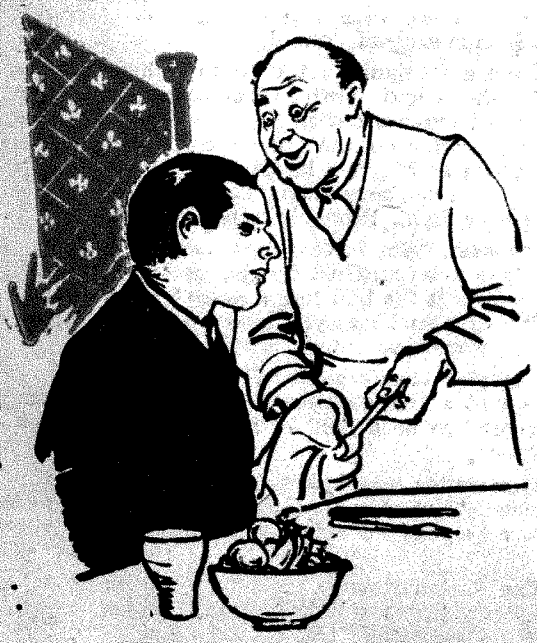
Next day I saw this lady coming to the breakfast table arm in arm with the Colonel. At first I didn't pay much attention. But her smart comments came to my ears. "Foolish girls keep diaries but clever ones don't." After that, how could I be inattentive to her?

I was all ears.

The Colonel was telling her, "Even then, darling, as you are now my Private Secretary and are going to be my wife you have to keep a diary. Oh, the number of engagements, the races, the boat race, the fashion parade, the hunts. You have to go to all these. If you don't note them in a diary you might miss some."

The girl replied, "You bet I won't miss anything when I am no longer a miss."

"Even then you have to note down things. Just see, you are in love with your hats. In one week you have bought no less than five hats from the same shop but not one of them fits you well. I mean none of them has returned your love."



"I got all the dope about the colonel."

"But you have. That's all I want."

"You are right, darling. In the Ascot races I meet so many ladies and countesses near the royal box. I don't make a mistake about them. But the first mistake I made was about you."

"Even then, darling, as you are going to be my wife you have to keep a diary."

"Amazing! I am a very ordinary girl."

"No, you don't know how extraordinary you are. The first evening I met you your conversation was stunning. I had never come across a sophisticated girl like you. The next day on my way to your flat I went to a florist for a bouquet. He picked out two, one for a blonde and the other for a brunette."

"And what did you say?"

"I was not sure what the colour of your hair would be that evening. I bought both."

"No, no. You're just kidding me. When did I become so clever? Of course, I have in stock a few catchy expressions and phrases. But that's merely for table talk."

"To me and to all connoisseurs you are extraordinary. That's why I want to marry you quick. Before other connoisseurs discover you."

"But where's the hurry, darling? I have agreed to all that you want. I have even come to stay with you in this hotel. But you mustn't spend like this after marriage. I don't like wasting money.

"Don't you worry, darling? Only the expenditure is a waste which isn't useful to your wife or sweetheart."

I could hardly resist the temptation to steal another glance towards the girl who was thus stumped by such protestations of love.

Next day Joe again came up to my table. He had some hot news to whisper. The Colonel and his girl had been out on a driving spree yesterday. A brand new car of champagne colour awaits their pleasure twenty-four hours. Its polish is as shiny as her beauty. They are going to wed very soon. To-night one of the well-known jewellers of London was coming to have supper with them. The menu ordered by the Colonel would be a matter of envy for even a Maharaja of my country. Would I care to go through the menu?

"No. It doesn't interest me in the least."

In the meantime, the Colonel occupied his chair with such a benign smile that it was not possible to continue the narration of their story. Eavesdropping might be more rewarding. I kept my ears pricked.

The girl was saying, "Yes, darling. It was great fun indeed. The entire day seemed to be on the wheels. And how fast you drive. Only one thing I didn't care for much."

"Which one. My moustache waving with the breeze?"

"Good Heavens! Your moustache is the right expression of your personality. It goes well with your big business. The only thing I didn't like were the curious looks of the sentries when we were passing that big jail. Why did they wave towards you?"

"Oh, only this much! You know, I often go there for welfare work. You know I like to reduce the burden of the people afflicted."

"I hope, darling, you won't consider me a burden."

"You? Never, never, dearie Other girls are attracted towards me for what I possess, not for me. But you are not that type. We two are meant for each other. I have got nobody to call my own; nor have you."

"Only that I shall become yours. It's said that the mother-in-law is the referee in the fight between a wife and her husband. The M-i-L naturally sides only with one party. We won't have any such handicap. No relations to cast their shadows on us."

"That's why I am telling you. Probably a very big jeweller is coming to dine with us to-night. He is a connoisseur of both jewels and beauty. Last night I told you stories about a lot of historic jewels known all over the world. Don't forget to garnish your conversation with them now and then. For instance, the Kohinoor, the Cuilinan and other diamonds."

"But why?"

"You know these big brass are rather high-brow. But you must impress them that you know all about the best of their wares. I am going to buy jewellery worth so much from him and he must understand that you appreciate their value. Of course, your value cannot be judged in terms of diamonds and rubies, my dear."

Putting the brooch in his pocket, the colonel held the lady's arm tenderly.....

"Oh dear, both your glamour and flattery are equally irresistible."

I fully agreed with the lady. I had no doubt the Colonel would beat hollow all other men in the smart set.

I was in a hurry for two mornings and finished my breakfast in my suite. I didn't know how far this drama had progressed. As I was going to undress at night there was a knock at the door.

Joe looked both sad and excited. Something dreadful has come to light. The moustache of the Colonel was not genuine. Joe was speaking in riddles. I asked him to cough it out straight.

The Colonel's private party last night was stunning. Champagne and chicken were served in the most exclusive fashion. A statuette of a fairy was set on the middle of the table for three with a fountain of golden light streaming out of her lips. They had their supper in mellow light and the dinner for three ran up to nearly fifty pounds. The waiters got a cash tip of five pounds while other diners looked on.

Next morning the Colonel and the young lady went to the jeweller's shop and made a special selection of jewellery worth fifteen thousand pounds. Ultimately jewellery worth twenty thousand was purchased. But the Colonel would take delivery of the stuff in the hotel only after the cheque had been cashed by the jeweller.

But there was a select lunch party at the Dorchester and could the lady put on the diamond brooch for the party? The cheque could be cashed in a matter of hours and the brooch was valued at only about one thousand pounds. One thousand only out of a lot worth twenty thousand.

Now everything depended on the jeweller's chivalry. A business-man has hardly an opportunity to show such chivalry. Besides, the golden hangover of last night's champagne was still there. Putting the brooch in his pocket the Colonel held the lady's arm tenderly and put her in the swanky car. Back in the hotel she was dressing up cheerfully. The Colonel would himself put the brooch on her when she was dressed.

In an hour's time the jeweller came running to the hotel and stormed at her door. In his hand was no casket of jewellery but only a cheque. A cheque dishonoured at the bank.

A few minutes later somebody called from the motor car people. Such an expensive car and its hire for the second week had not yet been paid. As things got doubtful, the hotel bill also was presented to her. A bill for both of them. Everybody knew that she was due to get married to him.

I was completely taken aback at this development. Of course, I thanked Joe for having taken the trouble to tell me such an interesting story so late at night. I even thought that it would look nice if this week's tip were made a little bigger.

But Joe didn't move away and kept standing. Probably he had got something more up in his sleeves.

Ultimately he coughed a little and said very plaintively, "Sir, can I say something?"

I immediately became cautious. The sentries at the jail had waved at the Colonel. He might be one of the jail birds. The way he had led this girl up the garden he was a clever man indeed. Why was Joe asking for permission to say something while telling me story of such a scoundrel? Probably

Justice

By
SYAMAPADA CHATTERJI

IN an interior village in West Bengal Harihar lived peacefully with his small family. He had a few acres of land which he cultivated with great care, and was satisfied with what he earned by hard labour. He had a native sense of justice, and it was his own. He did not meddle in others' affairs nor did he like that others should poke their noses in his.

But the world is not always what one likes it to be. While Harihar loved peace there were others whose love lay elsewhere. Anybody else's peace may sometimes become their eye-sore.

Banamali was Harihar's cousin. He was junior to him by five years. The scarcity of food and other necessaries of life during the last decade opened the gate of fortune to some people, and Banamali was one of them. He had earned a lot of money during that period. He came back to his native village with the money, began to purchase the land of distressed cultivators, and soon had a brick-built house of his own by the side of the mud house of his cousin. He had his well-wishers in the village, who brought to his notice that grave injustice had been done to his father by his grand father. The paternal property that had fallen to the share of his father and had been inherited by him was less than the share Harihar had been enjoying. And one day Banamali called upon Harihar and told him that their paternal property must be divided afresh.

"It was grandfather who divided the property and not we," said Harihar, "so we have no right to undo what had been done during the life time of our father and uncle."

Banamali left the place without any comment. He forcibly took possession of some portion of the land so long occupied by Harihar. Then suits and counter suits were filed. First criminal, then civil. Both of them had friends and well wishers who proved extremely faithful in keeping them excited.

That day was fixed for hearing. Banamali was seated under a tree near the Court with his witnesses. He distributed some bidis among them, lighted one himself, and puffing out a coil of smoke said, "This is not an age of fair deal, Uncle Sripati. I went to Harihar with a proposal for compromise. But he won't give me an inch of land, he said."

Sripati was a professional witness. One who was in need of a witness and had none was sure of his help for an adequate fee. He could break through the cross-examination of the shrewdest lawyer. "Harihar went to me," said Sripati, "he requested me to be his witness. He thinks that everyone is a rogue like him. Haven't I taken money from you? Can an old man like me leave the path of virtue?"

"The day will soon come when he will repent," said Nitai. "He has already mortgaged a portion of his holding to meet the expenses of the suit."

At that time came the pleader's clerk with a paper in his hand.

"Babu wants some money," he said.

"How much?" asked Banamali.

"Rupees thirty for today's expenses," answered the clerk.

Banamali's face became dark. "But are you sure that the case will be heard today?" said Banamali hesitatingly. "I've brought so many witnesses."

"Why not?" answered the clerk. He pocketed the money and went away. Harihar was also waiting under another tree.

"You're the lion of our village," said Panchanan, one of his witnesses. "He thinks he can do whatever he likes with money. He has seen the dove, not the trap."

"What a man!" said Harihar, "No respect for his father and uncle and grandfather! He has got some money, and thinks the world is nothing but an earthen pot. I'm not a man to tolerate this."

"You're the true son of a good father," said Bipin. "He'll soon learn what it is to tread on the tail of a cobra."

A good amount had been spent at the hotel for the mid-day meal, and pans and bidis were supplied liberally, yet the court did not call them out during the first half. The judge left the court-room and entered his cabin for tiffin, and the witnesses were also to be served with tea, sweets etc. At last they were informed that their cases would not be heard that day. Sihipur, their village, was thirty miles from the town. There was only one bus to their village in the afternoon. So both parties had to board the same bus. The bus was not overcrowded, and all of them had ample space to sit comfortably. In spite of this Banamali and Harihar picked a quarrel over a trifling matter. Uncle Sripati came to the bus late. He was going to take his seat by the side of Bipin, who told him tauntingly, "Why by me? Go and take your seat by the side of your boss."

Uncle Sripati did not take it seriously. He smiled and sat down by Bipin as if he had heard nothing. But the words pierced the heart of Banamali. "How can I be the boss," he replied in an angry voice. "I'm an insignificant man. One who can falsify the truth and can't suppress his greed is fit to be a boss."

Harihar was smoking. He threw away the half-burnt bidi, and cast an angry look at Banamali. "Everybody knows how you have earned money. Every brick of your new building is a proof of your dishonesty."

Banamali sprang up from his seat and sat down again. "I know you have not a wink of sleep since the day I began the building. You may make your own building if you can. Who obstructs you?" Saying this he remained silent for a few seconds and then said, "Or you may sell your mud house to me, and make your house elsewhere to keep my house out of sight and feel no sting of envy."

The bus had left the town. It was running at great speed. There was no chance of their having a hand to hand fight. But as soon as the bus stopped at Sihipur, and they got down from it, Banamali gave vent to his subdued emotion. He gave a good slap in the face of Harihar, who sprang upon him like a tiger. Banamali fell down upon the ground and Harihar sat upon his chest gripping his neck. It was very dark there, and none could see what was really happening. When they fell upon the ground some men tried to separate them. But they held each other so firmly that they could not be separated. Just at that time came a boy about twelve years old with a lantern in his hand. "Where's father?" he asked one of the bystanders. "Mother has been attacked with cholera."

His words had magical effect upon the fighters. They left each other and stood up abruptly. Banamali moved towards his son and said anxiously, "When?"

"In the afternoon."

When Harihar reached home he found his wife seated in the verandah surrounded by her children. A dim lamp was burning there. Kali, his wife lifted her eyes and looked at him gloomily. Rabi, his eldest son said to him, "Has Uncle Banamali come?" "Yes," said Harihar dropping the bundle on the floor. The two houses stood side by side, and there was only a low partition wall between them. It would not take much time for the disease to scale that weak barrier, and enter their house. "I'll start for my father's tomorrow morning," Kali said gravely. "You should also go with us." Harihar glanced sadly at his wife, but said nothing. It was true that Banamali's wife was not a very good woman. She was proud and ill tempered. And Banamali was henpecked. It was she who instigated Banamali to bring a suit against Harihar. In spite of all these Harihar could not but feel for her. After all she was a woman, and his brother's wife. Harihar knew how helpless Banamali would be without her. He had a number of children. There would be none in the family to look after them if she died suddenly. Sudhir, his eldest son, was only twelve years old.

"You are the lion of our village," said Panchanan, one of his witnesses

Rabi did not like the idea of leaving the village. "This is the time for cultivation. Who will work in the fields if we go away from the village," he said.

Kali knew it. She cast her pensive glance at her son and said, "Who knows what will happen tomorrow? Live we must, then we'll think what we should do to live."

Harihar and his wife could not sleep. They only drowsed. That spell was broken by the loud wailing which came from the adjoining house.

"Do you hear?" said Harihar to his wife.

Kali left the bed and lighted the lamp. "She is dead, I think." "What should I do?" asked Harihar.

"I'm arranging everything," replied Kali. "We must leave the village before dawn. Go and ask the carter to be ready with the bullock cart."

Harihar was annoyed. "I'm not thinking of how and when we'll leave the village," he said, and then muttered as if to himself, "Banamali is in distress. Should I keep aloof from him? He is my near relation and junior to me. I should have endured his slap."

Kali was astonished. "How is it? Did he really touch your body? Are not you older than he"? She concluded her speech saying that no wrong remained unredressed in the kingdom of God.

"The question of right and wrong may be decided afterwards," said Harihar in a firm voice. "I must go there and see how the matter stands. The dead body should be removed without delay."

Kali stood in front of the door and obstructed the passage by stretching her hands. "No need of showing any compassion. I can't allow any one to go to that cursed house." It was nearly midnight. The night was dark, and not even a soft breeze was blowing. The wailing in the adjoining house was heard no more. An ominous silence seemed to reign in the village. Harihar and Kali sat upon their bed silently and uneasily. The children were sleeping, but Rabi could not sleep. He once wanted to go to the house of his uncle, but his mother said sternly, "Do lie down," and he lay down at once. "No sound is heard in the house," said Harihar breaking the silence. Will not Banamali make arrangement for her cremation during the night?"

"Who will come out of their house in the midnight?" said Kali.

Then another period of silence. Harihar pricked his ears for any noise to indicate a funeral march. Suddenly he heard his name called out in the adjoining house. It was the voice of Banamali. "Are you awake, Haridada?" he said in a trembling voice. "Yes, I'm," replied Harihar softly. "How is your wife?" "Oh, she's no more," wailed Banamali, "and two of the children have started vomiting. Will you not kindly call in the doctor?" Harihar wore a worried look, and said, "Don't be anxious, my brother. Nothing will happen to them. I'm coming."

He sent Rabi to call in the village doctor, and entered Banamali's house himself.

The wife had died first, and then one by one all the children except Sudhir, the eldest son. The outbreak soon took an epidemic turn and many died. There were new cases every day.

"My end is drawing near. See if you can save the boy."

Kali had gone to her father's with her children. Neither Harihar nor Rabi accompanied her. "How can I leave my brother at this time," he said to Kali. "And Rabi? No, he'll not go. I don't want that he should leave his father and uncle and flee away to save his own life."

Harihar remained in the house of Banamali, nursed the patients, and did whatever he could. Rabi helped him calling in the doctor, bringing medicines and preparing food.

At last Banamali himself was down with the fatal disease, and before death could relieve him from the sorrows and sufferings, his only son Sudhir was also infected. Two patients, and Harihar was alone. It became difficult for him to look after both. He had no sleep, no rest. He could not leave them even for a moment. The boy groaned with pain. Banamali was always wanting water. "Haridada," said Banamli in a feeble voice when Harihar was trying to feel his pulse, "my end is drawing near. See if you can save the boy. And I've some thing to tell you. Grandpa was not inconsiderate. He did justice to both his sons. He gave some money to my father in consideration of the larger share of land he had given to uncle without the knowledge of others. It was with that money that father started business in the town. I knew this. But I was misled and have done great injustice to a brother like you. And what do I gain? The curse of God. Who knows whether Sudhir will survive me to light the lamp of the family, or—or—" his voice was choked with emotion.

"No, no, both you and Sudhir will survive me," said Harihar subduing his tears.

"I want to execute a will. If God be so kind as to spare Sudhir's life then think him as one of your sons. You have four, and he will be one more. I want to bequeath four-fifths of my property to you and the remaining one-fifth to Sudhir if he survies you."

Harihar burst into tears. "Both you and Sudhir will survive me," he said. "How can I live if I lose a brother like you?"

Banamali breathed his last, and Sudhir recovered slowly. The disease withdrew its claws, and at last disappeared.

Weal and woe, hope and fear are the concomitants of life. Love, hatred and all other emotions are concentrated to it. We have nothing to do with death. Death is the thing of the past, and life is concerned only with present and future. Grief does not last long, and nature does not like it. So in course of time the village became normal again, and people got time to think of worldly affairs, both good and evil. Kali had returned with her children. After all she was a woman and a mother. Her motherly feelings overflowed at the sight of Sudhir. She took him in her lap and wept.

Harihar sighed a sigh of relief at this sight.

Everyone in the village heard of the will of Banamali. Some admired Harihar for his tactfulness, others blamed Banamali for his foolishness. There must have been some foul play, said uncle Sripati. The compounder was the writer of the deed, and the doctor was the witness. He was sure that they had got a good amount of money from Harihar for what they had done for him. He, however, consoled himself by thinking that things might turn otherwise when Harihar would apply for probate. Sudhir had his maternal uncle, who must come forward to take the side of his minor nephew. He would see that Harihar did not enjoy the property peacefully.

Day after day, month after month passed, but there had been no change in the financial position of Harihar. He did not redeem the mortgaged property, but sold it. This astonished everybody. But people were not fools. They soon discovered that Harihar was no other than a hypocrite. In order to hoodwink others he had sold a portion of his property. He had been now in possession of all the property of Banamali:; what if a portion of his own was sold?

Sudhir and Rabi read in a High school, which was situated at a distance of three miles from the village. Sudhir had a bicycle on which both of them rode. When they passed the Matriculation examination Harihar said to them one day, "'Tis beyond my means to bear the expenses of higher education for both of you. Sudhir should go to a college, but Rabi, you're to seek a situation." "I don't want to continue my study if Rabi does not," said Sudhir. "But where shall I get money?" said Harihar helplessly. "And you? I can't allow you to discontinue your study. People are apt to think otherwise if you discontinue."

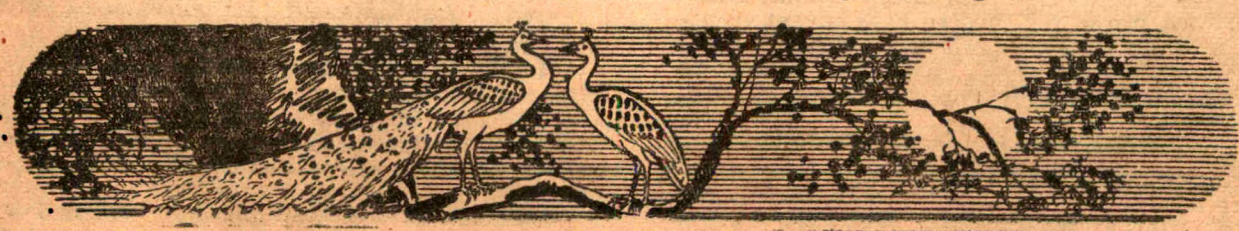
But Sudhir could not realise the difficulty of his uncle. He meant what he said. So both of them were sent to college, and Harihar again sold another portion of land without the knowledge of others. Years rolled by and in course of time their college education was also over. But Harihar's health broke down in the meantime. He lost his appetite, and was growing weaker and weaker every day. In spite of this he had to work hard in the fields, and drag his body homeward towards the evening. One day he returned from the field and said that he was feeling unwell. He lay down on his bed. Kali felt the temperature of his body and said, "You've got fever again."

It was not their practice to call in a doctor or take medicine as soon as one fell ill. The doctor was called in on the fifth day. He examined the patient and said gravely, "'Tis a very serious case. Let me, however, see what I can do." "You may do whatever you like," said Harihar to the doctor, smiling. "I also have something to do, and this must be done with delay. You were one of the witnesses of the will executed by Banamali. I've executed another. Please put your signature in it."

Contents of the will and a sale deed surprised everyone. The property which Banamali had bequeathed on him was returned to Sudhir, and the land which Harihar had to sell for the education of his son was sold to Sudhir by a registered deed. Harihar gave Sudhir the will, the sale deed, the Pass Book of the postal savings bank and an account book, and said to him, "You'll find everything in the account book. The cash left by your father was spent for your education. There had been suits with your father for a portion of my land. The land really belonged to me. I have, however, sold it to you."

Sudhir was puzzled. He remained silent for a few moments and then said with tearful eyes, "Am I not like a son to you? Why should you behave with me in this way? What right have I to take back what had been given to you by my father?"

Harihar smiled. "What your father did he did with due deliberation, and I'm not less considerate than your father. Do you think that you've any right to judge the action of your father and uncle?" Sudhir was going to say something in reply to this, but had to stop by the direction of the physican. "Oh, what a relief," said Harihar as he closed his eyes never to open them again.



STRIP-TEASE

A STORY BY PARASURAM

"WHAT's your intention, Urvasi ?", enquired Lord Indra. "You are quite hale and hearty in this heavenly abode enjoying a well-furnished house, beautiful gardens, costly dress and a high salary. Discarding all these, why do you like to go to the world of mortals below ? King Pururaba is no longer there to adore you. In heaven you are blessed with eternal youth. Here you are admired and worshipped by gods. But on earth you will very soon grow old. Nobody then will take notice of you despite your carefully done toilet".

"My Lord, I'm disgusted with life here"—Urvasi replied with a bow. "I have won the heart of all the males in heaven. I am now fed up with their hackneyed flattery and constant adulation. The moment I shall land on earth, numberless admirers would flock round me. Money too would start pouring in. If I ever grow old and infirm, I will come back again".

"Are you so puffed up with pride ? Is there any dearth of such admiration here ?"

"Men will surely receive me more warmly", said Urvasi. — "A poet of the mortal world sang in praise of me: Munigan dhyan bhangi deyae pade tapasyar fal, Tomari Katakshapate tribhuvan Yaubanachanchal (Ascetics wake up from their divine contemplation and offer at your feet the fruit of their austere penance. And the three worlds are thrilled with a glance of your eyes)! Can any poet of this heavenly abode write a poem like this ?"

"Poets use to write a lot of lies. If you can prove that you have won the heart of all the males here, I am then ready to let you go. Can you overcome the great rishis among gods and men?"

"Pooh ! they have long been overcome".

"Well, let me test you. Have you ever heard of any men with god-like powers ? I mean those who move freely from heaven to earth and earth to heaven ? Sanatkumar, Sanatan, Sadananda, for instance, who are known as the spiritual sons of Brahma ?"

Lord Indra went on: "I am not going to disturb them, as they are extremely hot-tempered munis (ascetics). But three other ascetics have recently come here on a visit. They are Kutuka, Parvat and Kardam rishis. They are very calm and quiet. Can you win their heart ?"

"If they are males, I can win them."

"They are no mere males, but males extraordinary".

"Then I will overpower them extraordinarily".

"Very good. They are the friends of sage Narada," Lord Indra said. "I'll tell Narada to invite them to my court to witness your dance performance."

* * * *

On receiving Narada's invitation the three rishis were very pleased. They said. "So long we have seen only peacock-dance, wagtail-dance and also dance displays by monkeys and bears of the forest. But never in life have we witnessed any dance performance by the fair sex. So we are very eager to see the dance of Urvasi.

"But, is she a woman?" enquired one among them. "We have heard she is a celestial nymph?"

Narada replied: "Yes, she is a woman for whom 'one's heart suddenly loses itself in the bosom and the blood begins to dance in veins'. You will simply be charmed by her dance. So please be prepared to visit the court of Lord Indra."

Rishi Parvat's beard dangled down to his throat, that of Rishi Kardam to his breast and of Rishi Kutuk up to his knees. They put on as far as possible their best attire and got ready for the journey. Parvat was clad in bark; Kardam had no garment of bark. So he put on merely a Koupeen (loin-cloth), Kutuk the great sage had renounced everything. He had no bark nor had he a piece of loin cloth. So he remained stark naked. Looking at him Narada observed:

"Well, Kutuk, you had better wear a girdle of of hay".

"No need," replied Kutuk. "My knee-long beard will surely serve the purpose of my dress!"

Indra welcomed the three newly arrived hermits. With due hospitality he was all attention to them. He offered water to wash their feet and requested them to take their seats. Addressing the three revered ascetics, who had attained great spiritual heights by austere contemplation and subjugation of the senses, he humbly said:

"Today Urvasi, my chief court-dancer, is going to display a unique dance for your entertainment. It is a "slough dance" which is called "strip-tease" by the 'mlechhas' (non-Hindus) of the western part of the earth".

He then turned to gods like Agni, Vayu and Varuna, the divine sage Narada and the like, great hermits like Agasthya and others and said: "You have all assembled here. Celestial nymphs Menoka and others also are present. We are gratified by your presence. Now would you please permit Urvasi to begin her dance performance?"

As a spokesman of the three rishis, Kutuk, the great sage, spoke out:

"Oh yes; be quick, we are eager to see her dance".

Suitably dressed for the lascivious dance and covering herself with an outer garment, Urvasi then presented herself at the court of Lord Indra. She bowed to the audience with folded hands and said:

"Gracious gods and fiery rishis, I am today presenting to you the 'Strip-tease'. In course of performance I shall have to cast off my dress by stages. I hope, you will not object to it".

"Why should we?", said Kutuk shaking his long beard: "Like the bodies of other creatures, yours too is a compound of five elements. We are eager to see wherein lies your womanhood?"

Urvasi again said with all humility: "If you find anything indecent or indecorous in my dance display, please tell me. I will stop the performance then and there."

Urvasi then cast off her cloak and showed her bright, gaudy and dazzling dress studded with gold, emeralds and jewels. She then started dancing. After a while she slipped off her loose scarf.

Sage Parvat raised his hand in protest and cried out: "Stop it. I find your dance lacks very much in decency. We don't like to witness such heart-afflicting dance performance". The great sage Kutuk snubbed him.

"If your heart is afflicted, what is that to us? "You may shut your eyes. But let the dance continue."

Urvasi said to Indra aside: "My Lord, Sage Parvat is floored".

The dance went on. Sage Parvat closed his eyes

In Quest of Beauty

By
NARENDRA NATH MITRA

IT was a year since Satadal had started a correspondence with Roma. Satadal Chakraborty was the assistant editor of "The Bloom," a monthly published from Calcutta. Roma was a teacher in a girls' school in Basirhat, Nivanani Girls' School to be exact. Though teaching was her line, Roma also tried her hand at writing verse which Satadal was kind enough to publish in his magazine. What is more, he had written a little note of encouragement to the aspiring poetess from which grew a regular exchange of letters. Satadal was the only editor to favour her so, Roma wrote, full of gratitude. The poem he found worthy of publication had been on an unsuccessful voyage among many periodicals — she confided. Satadal wrote back, an even more encouraging letter, expressing his sympathy. Do not give up — he advised. Proceed with patience and perseverance, for life itself is a long struggle. You have to work your way upwards — which is not an easy thing to do, but that is why it is worth the try — don't you agree? Roma wrote, "Your notes are absolutely enchanting. Are you sure you are not a writer?" To this Satadal philosophised. "Some write for millions of readers, some to please a particular person. All of us are not destined to be writers. Some will write while others would correct the proofs — such are the ways of the world."

Roma thought this was evading the question. "It is no use trying to fool me", she wrote. "I can see quite plainly that you have the makings of a writer. Do you write under a pseudonym? Or perhaps you have stopped writing. Why did you do so? Are you unhappy? But isn't sorrow an incentive to creative writing?"
So the letters went on.

The editor and owner of the Bloom was a man of considerable means. Satadal took care of the editing part though technically he was only an assistant editor. The publishing concern had among its other employees, a few proof-readers, a cashier, an accountant, two salesmen who worked at the counter. A partition stood in the middle of the room. Everybody in the office knew about the letters and joked about the blue envelopes which arrived at regular intervals.

Jatin Dutt, the young proof-reader, teased Satadal about the appearance of a certain poetess's work in the monthly almost every other month. Very often he mockingly threatened to tell his wife about those letters.

Satadal was forty, not particularly young or romantically inclined. A married man with a family of three children he had to look for sundry other occupations. The pay of an assistant editor was not enough to keep them going. So he took part time jobs such as writing notes for school texts or articles on the international situation in the yearly almanac, not respectable pursuits, but the money always came in useful. To make both ends meet was a constant struggle. Beset with domestic and financial worries Satadal had at least found a temporary respite. In his busy schedule he made time to write to this girl he had never met, twice or thrice, a month, four times if he felt particularly gay. He would be sentimental and philosophic in these letters, but carefully keeping away from the dangerous ground of love. No, on no account must they contain anything identifiable as love, it might mean losing his job. Satadal was not unaware of all the implications of corresponding with an unknown lady who was not related to him in any way. The maturity of his forty years sat heavily on his conscience. Passion must be given the innocent look of friendship. He was not the daring type who challenged the norm or took undue risks. Safely, he chose the middle path. At the same time he hungered for whatever happiness could be extracted from life without going to extremes.

And the girl was careful not to say anything which might excite unlawful emotions. In carefully chosen words she advised him to resume writing. She was sympathetic but showed no inclination to become more than a friend. Still they kept writing. Satadal kept a part of himself in the background. Satadal the family man did not intrude in the letters. He wrote about the unrealised ambitions and little failures of a mildly frustrated man — vaguely impersonal, yet not without charm which the young lady found difficult to resist. "I do not know what I have wanted to be. I do not suppose I tried hard enough for any definite end so who can I blame except myself? Only I wouldn't like to admit it. Were I an old fashioned fatalist I would have blamed my stars and got some peace of mind that way. I could very well blame society, but I'm no political thinker. I don't believe in heredity. So the question of accusing my ancestors is ruled out. Alas, I don't even believe in the theory of rebirth. What is the way out for a non-believer like me who have even lost faith in himself? I have a horrible feeling that ground is slipping from under my feet. I'm now floating, now sinking, groaning all the time. You see I am never the same person, I change. My letters mirror those various transformations of my personality."

Roma was not so nebulous in sentiment. She knew perfectly well what her trouble was. For instance she realised she could have got a better class in her Master's examination if she had not been sick just before it. She was really not stupid enough to get a third class, but it was her misfortune to get an ill tempered man for her examiner. With tolerable grades Roma was sure to get a teaching job in a college somewhere in the suburbs of Calcutta, or for that matter even in North Bengal, her home. Nothing worked out for her, so here she was rotting in a girls' hostel in a small provincial town with a batch of vicious females as co-workers. There was absolutely no scope for ambitious girls here. The meanness of everybody around was stifling to her spirit. Even the letters Satadal wrote did not escape criticism. They provided a good source of entertainment to the gossip-mongers. Inquisitive and meddlesome, these peeping Toms even opened her letters. This was what women were really like, for the information of chivalrous and ignorant poets. You have to be a woman to know them through and through. Roma was thoroughly disillusioned by now — she understood her companions for what they were — combined products of hatred, greed and jealousy. No wonder Roma never got along with them. She was different. All she wanted from her companions was to be left alone, but would her two room-mates ever let her rest in peace? Thrust in the same room with two of the worst specimens of humanity she suffered silently. When school was over, work had to be brought home, heaps of excercise books for grading. On top of that her two room-mates made life unbearable for her. They were always teasing her for her weakness for writing. The poetess — they call her, Satadal's sweetheart, Satadal's darling — there was no end of their vile talk. Roma would very often laugh matters away, but these silly jokes got on one's nerve. Placed in her position Satadal babu might have found these too trifling to care. Perhaps Roma annoyed him with her common tales of woe. But even flea-bites can drive one mad. Whether physical discomfort or mental anguish — one suffers just the same. Roma could not very well complain to the headmistress like a school girl. Neither could she pray to god for vengeance on the evil-doers, as her grandmother might have done. What was she going to do? Could Satadal babu help in any way, like taking her away to the city? Roma was willing to take any job provided she could live her own way, undisturbed by stupid people. There she could write to her heart's content.

Satadal had once enquired about her family, showing curiosity unbecoming in a man; oddly enough Roma was never keen to pry into his domestic life. Roma came from a family of means, her father being a lawyer who owned house and property. But Roma was much too independent to stand the affectionate interference from her parents. Against the wishes of her parents she took a job, for she wanted to be on her own. Her parents insisted even now, that she should come home. But what did they know of her needs? The trouble was they didn't even know that they didn't understand her. Besides, Roma had opinions of her own in certain matters, not to be disclosed in a letter. If they ever met she might let it out, but what was the use. There was nothing Satadal could do about it. And it would be wrong to bear the burden of the whole world, the very idea is foolish. When her burden grew too heavy she secretly wept. Then realising the futility of it she poured her grief in verse, in weak, old fashioned lines. She knew she was a bad writer, but she could not help. If she did not write she would die.

These outbursts held something special for Satadal. He wondered if these letters could be published in The Bloom, of course after careful editing. Not the ones where she complained about her colleagues but when she wrote about her mysterious grief and of seeking solace by writing. On those occasions she suddenly excelled herself. Her writing and the bluish paper she wrote in were equally impressive.

From her letter he tried to figure what she looked like. Young, unmarried (the letters showed) a slim and dark beauty of twenty-four or so, from the year of her graduation it was easy enough to calculate. And just a shade of sadness in her big dark eyes. This was the general picture gathered partly from the letters but coloured a good deal by his imagination.

The time soon came when the question of a possible meeting was brought up. Invitations were followed by counter invitations. Finally a date was arranged. Roma had an aunt in Tollygunj. She always stayed with her when she came to Calcutta. But she would not dare to meet Satadal in his office. Too many people, Roma was afraid of the stares, so could he kindly come to the bus-stop at 3-30 that Saturday afternoon? She would recognise him at once. Wouldn't he? She felt they knew each other well enough by now — so finding each other out should be no problem. Roma would have a couple of hours at her disposal. She hoped Satadal babu would be willing to waste that much time for her. They could go to a tea-shop and from there to a lonely spot in a park where she would read some of her poems to him. If Satadal babu could bring some of his poems, she would be doubly grateful.

Satadal found the prospect of meeting a new face most exciting. He felt like an explorer voyaging to an unknown destination. He at once wrote back his approval of the plan. Though the situation did not necessarily call for amorous sentiments, Satadal felt the inner thrill of a young lover. During the day he was excited and nervous, which he had no reason to be. Arriving at the meeting place he searched among the passengers. They were dispersing quickly. Two women got down, their faces hidden in veils. No, they could not be she. Then a woman appeared, dangling a handbag with Manipur designs. She stood uncertainly, casting little sidelong glances like Satadal. Then boldly she strode towards him, "Excuse me, are you — ?" "Yes". Satadal stared at her in disbelief, "And you — ?" "Yes, you were looking at everybody else", she said a little reproachfully.

His disappointment was immense. Satadal said not a word. This was not the girl of his imagination. Hefty for her age, and quite plain — her features were a practical joke of the creator.

"Let us go", he finally managed to say.

"Where to?"

"To a tea-shop for the present. From there wherever you wish". He tried to put a little warmth into his voice but it did not come off.

"I am not particular about any place", Roma said. "I leave that to you. After all I came to meet you. I am your guest".

They entered a crowded tea shop. The small enclosures were all occupied, so they waited outside. Roma said, "I often think of making a trip to Calcutta but this crowd is what keeps me off. But what's the matter with you? You look so passive. You know, that is not at all the way I pictured you."

That was an exact description of his feelings. How did she know — he silently wondered.

In about ten minutes a cabin was vacant. A young man came out wiping his lips, followed by a girl, quite strikingly dressed. She looked attractive nevertheless. Her clothes looked well on her, Satadal could not help noticing. An unfavourable comparison with Roma came to his mind.

They entered into the curtained privacy of a cabin. He ordered cutlets. "Is there anything else you would like to have?" He asked her.

Roma said, "I've lost my appetite. You don't have to order, I don't think I want anything."

"Why" Satadal demanded, but he was visibly hurt.

"I haven't come here to be fed. But you don't seem to be in a talkative mood."

"What rubbish, we'll talk as we eat. But first let me have your poems," Satadal said with forced gaiety as he held out his hand.

"Some other time," said Roma. "I'll send them to you".

"You suddenly look spent out, what is wrong'? asked Satadal.

"I am always spent out," Roma smiled wanly.

Suddenly Satadal was seized with remorse. He felt angry at himself. Why did he make his disappointment so obvious — she must have understood. All right, she was plain, but Satadal was not a handsome hero either. Middleaged, grown old before his time, temples turning gray—was he such a pleasure to the eye'? Besides, they had no right to expect looks — among friends, beauty should not be a deciding factor.

Determined to make amends, he spoke up energetically, "The last poem you sent was rather well-written. It was appreciated here. One thing strikes me as odd. The cult of unhappiness you have built round yourself — you seem to luxuriate in it — somehow it seems all wrong." Roma looked up.

"Why do you think it is a luxury?"

"What else? You could not have known much unhappiness at this age". "It is so difficult to make with both hands. But he could not check his curiosity. He began to look at the performance stealthily through the chinks of his fingers.

Urvasi began to strip the upper part of her body. Sage Kardam closed his eyes now and cried out: "Stop Urvasi, stop your very seductive dance. Otherwise, we would lose our asceticism".

"Why should she stop?" Kutuk took him to task: "If you can't stand it, you better quit the place".

With smiling eyes Urvasi signified to Indra that Kardam too had been overwhelmed by her dance.

Urvasi then stripped body completely of her dress and ornaments and cast them off on the floor. At last she stood still like a marble statue baring her 'jasmine white body'.

"Bravo! Well done!" exclaimed the gods and, sages, divine and great, assembled at the court.

"But, why do you stop, Urvasi?" spoke out Kutuk: "Go on dancing. Cast off more and more slough." "Where will she find any more slough?" exclaimed Narada: "Urvasi has already cast off all her covers". "Why, don't you see that reddish white slim covering all over her body like lotus-petals?" enquired Kutuk.

"Well, that is nothing but the skin of her body" Let her cast off that skin too".

"Have you gone mad, Kutuk?" Narada questioned. "Skin is a part of one's body. That is not her cloak."

"May be, but is it not a slough? Let her cast it off also. Let me see what is inside it".

"Listen, then," said Narada. "Under the skin there is fat, under the fat there is flesh and under the flesh there is the skeleton".

"What is there inside the skeleton?"

"Nothing".

"Wherein, then, lies the womanhood of Urvasi, under whose magic spell the heart of the male loses itself all on a sudden and the blood begins to dance in the veins?"

"Her womanhood lies in her dress, in her ornaments, in her body, in her gestures and in the heart of adorers. You are a passionless fellow, Kutuk,— free from all attachments. You have eaten your heart and soul. How would you see it?"

"Have you invited me here only to deceive thus?" Kutuk, the great sage, flared up. "That Urvasi is an animal having no substance within. Is there any difference between her body and the body of a she-goat?" He then turned to his companions:

"Well, Parvat, well Kardam, let us go. There is nothing here to see."

Menoka, Ghreetachee, Mishrakishi and other Apsaras (dancing nymphs of the heaven) clapped their hands in glee at the discomfiture of Urvashi.

Kutuk, Parvat and Kardam walked off the court of Indra. Urvasi then cried out and said: "Lord God, why did you insult me this way? I will not stay here in this abode of the immortals. Neither shall I go to the earth. I shall practise religious austerities."

* * * * *

Thereafter Urvashi shaved off her head, put on a wreath of holy basil, wore marks of sandal-paste and went to the holy Golak in order to take shelter at the feet of Lord Hari.

others see your point. I told you so already. Remember the famous lines we read in School — you don't know until the snake bites. It is perfectly true".

Satadal was speechless. After a while he changed the subject. "Have you made up with your father?"

"It is beyond that."

"Why do you say so?"

"Father wants to marry me off to anybody. A fat bundle of money goes with me. I would never marry someone who would take me for the sake of my money. Why, he'll run away even before our honeymoon is over."

Satadal felt amused at the way she talked. "But you are so talanted, what are you afraid of?"

hardly gets to see the other things. People only go in for looks. But it's no use blaming others — have I not suffered enough for these demanding eyes of mine?"

"What do you mean?"

"You see I am always running after people I don't deserve. But I can't compromise for less. I couldn't marry any blind, lame or pudgy old gentleman who came along. I just couldn't."

Her words cut him like a sharp knife. Satadal sat mute, not knowing what to say. "Isn't it strange," she went on, "people like us have absolutely nothing to offer, yet there's no end to what we expect from others, by way of looks." When she looked up her eyes were moist. For a moment Satadal forgot they were round and small and ugly.

Noise wafted from other cabins. Voices, laughter, clatter of plates. "Two curries in number three, two omlettes in number four," shouted the restaurant boy from somewhere. In the tiny den sat two people facing each other, so unequal in age and experience, mourning for a common human failing, yearning for perfection to which it did not have a claim, and the uselessness of it all.

When the boy entered with the food the spell was broken.

By SWAMI PRAJNANANANDA

MUSIC is a fine art, because it awakens aesthetic consciousness in the depth of man's mind and bestows on him unbounded joy and happiness which enable him to enjoy the intrinsic beauty of Nature and the transcendental calmness of the Soul as well. The sweet and soothing vibrations of tones and tunes of music bring into him the glorious memory of man's real entity and nature at once immortal and changeless.

Music as a fine art unlike literature, sculpture, painting and architecture employs sound as the medium of artistic expression. Though literature, sculpture, painting, architecture and music fall within the category of Fine Arts, yet the art of music excels all other arts as a mode of man's response to the call of the Beautiful. Well has it been said by Prof. Sir George A. Macfarren: "Music, then, is that one of the fine arts which appropriates the phenomena of sound to the purpose of poetry, and has a province of its own in many respects analogous to but yet wholly distinct from that of each of the other arts".

MUSIC EXCELS ALL OTHER ARTS

Prof. Macfarren has beautifully differentiated music from other arts because of its highest art-excelling quality. While comparing the art of music with other arts such as literature, architecture, sculpture, acting and painting, he says: "Whereas literature, whether in verse or prose, describes or states emotions or perceptions, or impressions; whereas sculpture imitates the outward forms of animated beings, and physiologically, either in the face, or to speak more broadly, in the moulding and attitude of the entire figure, displays personal character and the effect of passion upon it; whereas painting vitalizes with colour the forms of sculpture, and extends its range of subjects from animate to inanimate nature; and whereas acting adds speech to the written words of the dramatists and enforces or even qualifies their meaning by vocal inflexion, and illustrates it by changeful gesture, thus giving mobility of life to the forms of sculpture and painting; music embodies the inward feelings of which all those other arts can but exhibit the effect. * * In the matter of expression also, architecture may be compared with music in the earlier stages of its development, since representing and also prompting a general idea of solemnity, or grandeur, or gaiety, but music left architecture far behind when, in later times, it assumed the power of special, individual, and personal utterance of every variety of passion. The indefiniteness of musical expression furnishes no argument that music is inexpressive, but is one of the qualities that places it on the highest level of art-excellence, enabling it to suggest still more than it displays, and to stimulate the imagination of the writers as much as to exercise that of the artist".

But, though music in essence transcends the limitation of phenomenal changes, yet its gross and earthly form or expression is subject to evolution which means growth and decay, and from this viewpoint it is phenomenal. In the most remote past, it existed in the primitive society in a very crude and gross form, carrying with it the power of charming, healing and pleasing. The primitive and savage tribes of all countries of the world loved dances and songs and those were their means of rest, consolation and peace. Men on the march, says Prof. J. A. MacCulloch, used to keep time to the songs sung. "All feasts partake largely of a musical character, whether at marriage or funerals or upon other occasions. At all these feasts, and, indeed, at many religious ceremonies, dancing occupies a prominent place, and it is accompanied by singing, playing of instruments, rhythmic, clapping of hands, and movements of the limbs and head".

RHYTHM & MELODY

The rhythm is undoubtedly the first element of music, though melody or raga is recognised as the vital part of music. The concept of rhythm evolved perhaps from the clapping of hands and stamping of feet, which were common in the primitive music. The Sanskrit word tala seems to be derived from tala or karatala or the beating of the palms. The large family of drums, cymbals and bells is the logical development of the concept of keeping of rhythm by clapping of hands or stamping of feet, or striking of wooden or bamboo sticks. Different units of duration or time between the clapping or stamping gave rise to the concept of tempo or laya which was divided into three, slow, medium and rapid (vilambita, madhya and druta). In truth, the principles of rhythm and tempo are the controlling as well as balancing factor of music of all nations of the world.

Religion, magic and music went hand in hand in the primitive society. The religions of the primitive tribes all over the world were very simple and crude in form and connected with their domestic and daily life. "As many savage dances," says Prof. MacCulloch, "are of a religious or ceremonial character, it is obvious that music, even on this ground alone, must play a large part in religion. The words of the songs or hymns and the swell of the music, as well as the rhythmic motions of the dance and the fact that so many are taking part in the same action, heighten the religious feeling. Other ritual acts of a communal character e.g. processions round fields and the like —are largely musical".

MUSIC AMONG THE PRIMITIVE TRIBES

There was a great variety of songs among the primitive tribes. There were songs for dances and feasts, for funerals and wild processions, for war and chase. There were also love-songs, songs of labour, songs in praise of the Nature and the supernatural, and the like, and the themes of their songs were woven round the trifle and simple events of their daily life. Their gods were either the wind or the sun, the forest or the sky, and the forefathers or the ghosts. Sometimes their dances and songs were accompanied by crude forms of drums or flutes, sometimes again, they used to sing without any musical instruments. The rhythms of the dances and songs were kept by mere clapping of hands and nodding of head, beating the ground with feet or striking the sticks together, and sometimes by beating of the drums. Their dances and songs naturally differed in character, some being more elaborate and some simple in design, 'and were mostly of rhythmic or recitative nature, the same line being constantly repeated by the bard and then sung by all in a kind of chorus.' Profs. Hose and McDougal have said of the Purans as for example: "The finest songs are sung without accompaniment, and are of the nature of dramatic recitals in the manner of a somewhat monotonous and melancholy recitation."

DRUM, BOW & FLUTE

Prof. MacCulloch has further said that in the primitive society, the undeveloped musical instruments were divided also in three classes,—percussion, wind and stringed. Regarding the evolution of crude forms of musical instruments he says: "As the instances among peoples without musical instruments would seem to show, instruments of percussion—some form of the drum, which is well-nigh universal—may have been invented first. Stringed instruments probably came next—the hunter's bow, as with the Damaras, being easily convertible into a primitive form of these. Wind instruments, at least in their more elaborate forms, were probably invented last".

Such is also the opinion of J. F. Rowbotham. While speaking about the three stages of development of music in the prehistoric times, he has said that music passed through three stages of development each characterized by a separate class of instruments, and the analogy of existing uses in barbarous nations tends to confirm the assumption. "Instruments of percussion are supposed to be oldest, wind instruments the next in order of time and of civilization, and string instruments the latest invention of every separate race".

In India, the bhumi-dundubhi or the drum, carved on earth in the form of a pit and then covered with the skin of the wild animal, was very primitive. It can be assumed that this method was in practice among the primitive tribes of all the countries of the world. The drum, dundubhi was somewhat a developed form of the bhumi-dundubhi. There were also some primitive percussion instruments like bhanda-vadya panava etc. The puskara form of earthen or wooden drum came next, and pakhwaj, dholaka, tabal, and bayan, mardala, etc. came last. Different kinds of veena (lute) were made of bamboo and wood, and they were fitted with gut strings, made from the entrails of the wild animals. The primitive forms of veena were of the bow-shaped type, shaped after the hunter's bow. Gradually their shapes were somewhat developed and shaped in the form of the Western harps, the representations of which are to be found depicted in different cave-temples of India. The whistles, pipes or flutes were made of bamboo, wood or animals' bone, the evidence of which were found in the prehistoric mounds of Mohenjo-daro and Harappa.

FOLK MUSIC : EVOLUTION OF SCALE

It should be remembered in this context that the folk music of different nations of the world are very ancient. We find also some strata in the evolution of folk songs. The most primitive type of folk songs were possessed of only one high note, or two notes, high and low, and they were monotonous. The evolution of musical notes was undoubtedly in the descending order, and the order of evolution of notes was from the high to the low. Gradually the folk music with three notes evolved, and they were high, medium and low. The same also happened in the case of evolution of the high type of classical music. Most of the folk songs of the present time of many countries are to be found with three or four notes which go to prove that they are persisting in their old type and pattern.

The music with five notes certainly evolved afterwards. The scale of five notes are to be found in both folk and formalised classical music in most of the music of ancient nations of the world. In India, most of the Vedic music (samagana) were in pentatonic form, possessing the scale of five notes only. The six notes and sometimes seven notes were in use in the Vedic music. In the music of Mongolia, China, Japan, Cambodia, Siam (Thailand), Burma, Java, Sumatra, Bali and other countries tunes were mostly pentatonic, although some of the tunes of some countries were hexatonic or heptatonic in nature having the use of semitones. Regarding the origin or evolution of music, myth first prevailed, and then it was replaced by history.

ORIGIN OF MUSIC

In India, we find, the myth about the origin of music first evolved in connection with science, and then was garbed by religious myth. As for example, it has been described in the ancient scriptures like the Siksa and the Pratisakhya, that the friction of air (vayu) with heat (agni) is the cause of the sound, both musical and non-musical. The first originated sound (nada) is the basic and causal one, and when after evolving gradually through the plexus of the spinal column manifested through mouth as gross but sweet and soothing one, it is known as the 'musical sound' (svara) or tone. As the musical notes are sweet and attractive, they are known as 'tones'. The tones are the outcome of soothing vibrations of the sweet musical sound-units. In the Epic period, the mytho-philosophical conception evolved in connection with the theory of origin of sound, and the conception centered round the prime principle of Siva-Sakti or Laksmi-Narayana. Certainly there were influences of both Saktism and Vaisnavism upon the conceptions of the prime principles, Siva-Sakti and Laksmi-Narayana.

NOTES OF ANCIENT TIMES

It has already been said that in India, the Vedic music—samaganas—were sung in different modes with different notes. In the Sama-pratisakhya, Puspasutra, it has been mentioned that there were different Vedic recension: sarvah sakhah prthak prthak, and the followers of those different recensions used different numbers of notes in their songs. Specially the followers of the Kauthuma-recension (Vedic kauthuma-sakha) used in their songs seven notes.

In ancient Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Chaldia, Assyria, Greece, Egypt, Rome, Arabia, China, Persia, England, America and other civilized countries, music with four to five and sometimes six notes were in use. And it is the opinion of many of the historians and scholars that the scale with seven notes are of later origin. Though we find, in different countries, various types of lyres and lutes, possessed of four to sixty-four strings, yet four, five or six notes were used in them.

The evidence of culture of music in the most ancient times is to be found through the medium of musical instruments, and ancient sculptures and paintings of musical instruments are found in the tombs and cemeteries. Well has it been said by Prof. Carl Engel that not only "have we become better acquainted by means of sculptures and paintings, with the musical instruments of several ancient nations, but in some instances the actual instruments have been discovered in tombs or other places, where, protected from the destroying influences of air and damp, they had remained almost unchanged during a marvellously long period".

Concerning the music of the Assyrians, Egyptians, Chaldians, Mesopotamians, Romans, Greeks, Persians, Arabians, Hebrews, and other ancient nations, little or no genuine evidences are forthcoming regarding the musical literature excepting the names of a few musical instruments. Very few musical instruments have also been excavated in Mesopotamia, and most of them, says Curt Sachs, were found in the royal cemetery at Ur, Abraham's native town. However, there are many reliefs and plaques, seals and mosaics, from a period extending over three thousand years, that depict players with musical scenes. The cuneiform written texts in Sumerian contain a number of names of musical instruments. Regarding the most ancient music of the Indians, the same statement holds good.

Most of the discovered monuments of the Assyrians, whereon bas-reliefs of musical instruments are represented, are at present exhibited in the British Museum. "According to the opinion of the most competent judges of Assyrian history," says Prof. Engel, "the period in which these monuments were executed commences about 1000 years B.C. The musical instruments represented thereon must of course be older, and may have existed many centuries before that time. This appears the more probable when we consider that they were used at religious and popular ceremonies, and in representations of historical events of earlier times."

But vocal music, regarded historically, takes precedence over instrumental music, says Prof. Engel. Because there "exists even at the present time a few savage tribes who, though possessing a number of songs, are almost entirely unacquainted with musical instruments. If they accompany their vocal effusions at all, it is only with the rhythmical sounds produced by clapping of hands, or by beating pieces of wood together". Generally, however, the most primitive peoples, at present existing, employ for their purpose some rhythmical instruments, specially the drum and the rattle, and it has already been said that the earliest musical instrument almost of all the nations of the world was the drum.

A BATTLE STIMULANT AND PRAISE-SONGS

Curt Sachs has said that the drum was indispensable in the life of the primitive tribes; no instrument had so many ritual tasks, and no instrument was held more sacred. Finally, the drum became the warrior's instrument. It has already been said that in India too, the most primitive drum was the bhumi-dundubhi and the dundubhi which were used first for the purpose of signalling the imminent attack of the enemies, and were afterwards used as a stimulant in the battle fields among the savage warriors. In ancient Korea, hymns for 'the sacrifice to Confucius' were in practice. In ancient Mesopotamia, psalms and lamentations were sung against gods for scaring and flooding the land, for the thoughts of the people, says Dr. Farmer, were with their herds and harvests. This kind of psalms in the form of hymns were also in use in India in the early Vedic period. In early Egypt, we find the 'Songs of Lamentations of Isis and Nephthys'. From Dr. Birch's Introduction to the Study of the Egyptian Hieroglyphs (London, 1857), says Prof. Carl Engel, "We come to know that the existence of a considerable number of works in the native language was not unknown to the Greeks, with whom they passed under the name of those of Hermes." Clement has mentioned two books of Hermes, one of which contains a series of hymns to the gods. "There were also ancient lyrical poems, containing the praises of the gods and ancient heroes, and sung at ceremonies and entertainments, and deaths, when "therenes" or funeral dirges, composed in rhythm, were chanted for the deceased. Among the encomiastic odes is mehtioned one in honour of Sesostris, which differed from the historical accounts. Hymns were also addressed to the rising and the setting sun, and to Amman, to obtain his oracular responses in the Oasis. Of these the most important were the Therene, i.e., the dirge or lament for Maneros; another addressed to Saturn; and a chant called the Genethlia, or Birth of Horus."

The hymns, addressed to the rising and setting sun, and to the sky, known as Varuna in the Rigveda, and Kshiroda-samudra i.e. 'the ocean of milk' in the Puranas remind us of the daily religious prayer of the Hindus in the Vedic time, in India. In the music of Bible too, we witness mainly three kinds of songs; (1) Songs of Praise; (2) Songs of Partition, and (3) Songs of Thanksgiving. These three types of psalms were used to be sung in the Solominic Temple in Egypt. Prof. Henderson says that in early Greece, music used to be practised as an ingredient of magical medicine, and its festival occasions and formal conventions were often religious. In the Iliad, music had the status of an art, and over and above it was in the character of mere ritual. In the Odyssey, we find the apotheosis of the professional kitharoedic bard. In the archaic community as a whole, we also find professional bards, who used to recite or sing the songs of lamentations. In India, the professional bards used to recite or sing the songs of laudation and lamentation, and they belonged mostly to the Suta class, the historical tradition of which is maintained to this day by the Kathaka class of priests or singers, who relate the religious and mythological episodes of the Great Epics like the Ramayana, Mahabharata and the Puranas and Bhagavata in the form of songs.

Prof. Macfarren says that the classic Greeks used music in rhapsodising or chanting with vocal inflexions the epic poems. They used to employ it in religious rites and to accompany military evolutions, and prizes were awarded for the performances of music, both vocal and instrumental at the Olympic and other games. "It belonged essentially to the drama, which had its origin in the dithyrambic hymns; these were gradually developed into the tragedy, which took its name from the tragos (goat) that was sacrificed to Dionysus during the performance." In ancient Rome, the choristers in tragedies were numerous and included both male and female singers, and they used to be accompanied by a large number of musical instruments of which trumpets were most conspicuous.

RELIGIOUS PRAYER-SONGS

The ancient Jews were also accustomed to singing the psalms like al-hizana, hallel, etc., which were sacred and religious. They were, in truth, the religious prayers or prayer-songs with tunes. Regarding the Jews in Palestine and Babylon, A. M. Rothmuller has written that they composed many tunes to the customary prayers, and they bound themselves to come together at prayer-times, to sing and read those prayer-songs. "The difference between the hizana and the enjoined prayer (salat) is that the enjoined prayer is rendered without a tune ; it is read by the synagogue reader alone and no one accompanies him ; but during the hizana, many accompany him with shouting and singing, and help him in the tune."

Much earlier St. Hieronymus (330-420), who knew the Jewish service of Palestine, relates that in their worship the Jews have a solemn singing of psalms, namely the group of the 'Songs of Praise' (Hallel-Psalms 113-118). "Singing was prominent feature of other ceremonies of a religious nature, as we learn from Nathan ha-Babli, a Babylonian Jewish savant who went to live in Africa about 950 C.E. * * He relates that in this ceremony, 'a choir, of noble youngsters, endowed with musical voices,' took their places, 'the chazzan (cantor) of the synagogue struck up the devotional hymn."

It should be remembered in this connection that throughout the period immediately following the destruction of the Temple there was a continuous tradition of vocal music as a prominent feature of the synagogue service among the ancient Jews, and that in particular many of the traditional tunes for the psalms and prayers and reading of the Torah were passed down from generation to generation of worshippers in the synagogue and religious students in Chedarim and Yeshevot."

Thus from a comparative study of the religio-mythological accounts of the early civilized nations of the world we learn that the socio-religious character of their songs and hymns were almost identical, and there was an uniformity of tunes, temperaments, melodic forms and rhythms among them. Dance invariably accompanied music, and musical instruments were invented to follow the tunes of music. In the classical as well as in the mediaeval period, music of all civilized nations was developed in form, quality and technique, and was systematically recorded in the history of their culture, and was scientifically analysed and explained. The innovation of new types of dance and song upon the frameworks of the old ones marked different epochs of renaissance of music culture of the nations. In fact, dance and music were regarded as the indispensable factors in the lives of the peoples of all countries, as they used to derive sublime inspiration, joy, consolation and peace of mind through its pursuit.

CRISIS

By MEERUTLAL

SATKARIBABU had a really happy family consisting of his wife Anandamayi and his only son of twenty-five, Panchkari.

He was in his fiftieth year. Somewhat quick-tempered, he was, nevertheless, a tender-hearted man. He might be called sentimental. If he received any severe shock, he was disturbed even during his sleep. His sentimentality and quick-temperedness conspired to create great havoc in his otherwise peaceful life.

Once at night, while sleeping, Satkaribabu started to murmur deliriously, 'Sabitri, do not misunderstand me; dear Sabitri, please. . . . .'; his wakeful wife, lying by his side, was fanning her delirious husband amidst the sweltering heat of the Jaisthya night. The devoted wife's ears immediately caught the words of poignant entreaty of her husband,—'Sabitri, do not misunderstand me.' She sat up and straightened herself; she was struck by his enigmatic utterings.

Repeatedly she pronounced within herself—Anandamayi—Anandamayi—Anandamayi. She wondered,—was there any similarity in sound between the names Anandamayi and Sabitri? No. So what?

The whole world seemed to land its weight upon her head; "Is my husband, then, devoted to a girl, Sabitri?" Her nerves were strung with excitement. "Am I to shake off, now, the belief,—that I have hugged so long,—that my husband is absolutely faithful to me, for which I have adored him so much? My beloved! Has he transferred her affection to a girl at this age? She sobbed silently.

The husband slept quietly innocent of this all. His wife shed tears that moistened the bed. She was so chaste and loyal to her husband that she concealed her sentiments from him and did not ask or even complain of anything. Her wounded feelings and sorrow, kept within herself found an outlet only in her convulsive sobbing in the loneliness of the night.

Her face mirrored her mind in distress. She was always sullen. It was painful to Satkaribabu more so because he was unable to trace the reason of her sorrow. Son Panchkari was also worried about it. He tried his best to soothe his mother with gentle words, but nothing came out of it. He was an emotional youth. His emotional nature found expression in everything—in his way of talking, in his manners and even in his examination scripts. One or two emotional poems were often discovered in his college notebooks. This attitude of his added much to the family crisis.

Once in the morning, Satkaribabu discovered the cause of his wife's melancholy in a letter that was lying on the table in Panchkari's room. Panchkari was sleeping at the time. Satkaribabu hurriedly read the letter.

My dear Jyotsna,

I do not know the language to express, in this brief letter, how admirable is this combination in you, of an unthinkable sweet nature and a flawless demeanour. I cannot describe the great pleasure your companionship gave me.

I shall never forget you, however remote you may be from me. I cannot be ungrateful and I shall wait to see you again.

Please do not forget to send me a reply.

Yours lovingly,

Panchkari.

An open envelope was kept beneath a paper weight by the side of the letter.

After reading the letter Satkaribabu flew into rage. With his eyes fixed on the envelope, he thought, that the son must have felt too much sleepy and so could not put the letter in the envelope and write the address on it. He went straight to his wife and gravely commented, "I have realised the cause behind your anxiety. When you found that your son had gone to the dogs, why did you not inform me, instead of spoiling him by indulgence through your false pretence? I would have thrown him out of my house and seen how he carried on his love affairs!"

Anandamayi was dumbfounded. Satkaribabu showed her the letter from a distance and said, "Look here, he has written a love-letter." With this, he ran into Panchkari's room, pulled him out of his bed and burst out, "you wretched, idiot, scoundrel, I am maintaining you and giving you education by my day's toil and labour, and you are wasting your time on love affairs? Clear out of my house at once."

Panchkari dropped from the heavens, as it were. What is all this about?

Anandamayi rushed in with tears in her eyes, "What are you doing to my darling? Is he alone to blame? Think over quietly once more."

Just then, a friend of Panchkari was knocking hard at the door of the outer room. When it was opened, the young fellow breathlessly gave out, "Panchkari, I am finished. Jyotsna, after entering my house, has suddenly bitten his tongue so that a fleshy part of it is dangling out."

Satkaribabu interposed in solemn tones, "Who is Jyotsna?"

The friend was startled by the grave voice, and answered, "Well, he is our great friend Jyotsna Mohan Chakravarty, recently introduced to us. I mean, he is in service at Lahore, but suddenly on leave has come to my house and this incident occurred within half-an-hour of his arrival."

Thus Satkaribabu discovered his mistake and stammered out, "Then, then, let me also go with you to meet Jyotsna." One hour after they had left, there came a letter addressed to Satkaribabu. Anandamayi was still suffering from that pain in her heart that had started since that fateful night. The affair of her boy had increased her anxiety but that was over. She opened the letter and went through it—My dear respected Satkaribabu,

I was discourteous to you. Other people misled me. Kindly forgive me. You are superior to me in age, service, everything, still I failed to show you due respect. On the contrary, through inducements I had taxed your patience and exploited your goodness.

When the boss refused to grant my application for leave extension sent from the mofussil, I had to come back. A colleague of ours induced me to believe that it was you who influenced the boss to refuse the same. This made me behave awkwardly with you and I talked a lot of nonsense. But when you went away on leave, I came to know you had no hand in the matter.

I have realised my mistake. When you come back I shall throw myself at your feet and seek your forgiveness.

Yours affectionately,
Sabitri Kumar Basu.

Anandamayi regained all her joy and melted into tears.

not just an innocent request. I was not sure what was cooking in his mind.

"Sir, the young lady is in tears, crying hard."

With a show of indifference I replied, "Only natural."

As Joe still kept standing I added, "Those who run after a golden phantom have little to worry about themselves."

Joe, of course, did not know the reference to the golden stag of the Ramayana, how the phantom of a stag deceived Sita, Rama and Lakshman and decoyed the latter two. But Joe found some inspiration. He broke into a smile and said, "Right, you're, sir. A golden phantom is all that's required. Do, do some magic, sir. Astrology at least. Kindly do take pity on the girl and tell where that rogue of Colonel could be got hold of. She may be saved all this trouble."

I kept quiet.

Joe probably sensed some glimmer of hope in my silence and said, "Kindly at least read her palms if that helps."

I laughed. There was an appeal in his eyes but laughter on my lips. Poor Joe. He was trying to come to the rescue of a damsel in distress. He was ready to take the help of anybody from India whether a palmist or an astrologer or even a magician. It was hard to disappoint him bluntly.

I only said, "Golden phantoms have vanished in this age. That's why palmists and astrologers also have forgotten their art. Just see, even the live and loud moustache of your Colonel has disappeared.

"Then, sir."

"Then I can only say good night."

"Good night, sir."

Poor Joe went down the corridor with drooping shoulders. Suddenly I had some compassion for him. I opened the door of my suite and watched him going away. In the dim light of the long corridor the bald patch on his head was shining like varnished gold. Put him in touch with the golden hart I could not, but I came across a golden heart.

AN important Railway Junction Station. Time—Present. A busy scene. Just now a train has left the station. The sound of its whistle is still audible. In-coming passengers are leaving one by one. The cries of the vendors are gradually dying down. There are four of them now—Purbaprasad, Paschimkumar, Uttarlal and Dakhinranjan. They live on the four sides of the Station—Purbaprasad in the East, Paschimkumar in the West, Uttarlal in the North and Dakhinranjan in the South. In fact, they belong to these zones of the country. They have however come to this Railway Junction at the Central Part of India to earn their living. Purbaprasad is a vendor of tea. Paschim Kumar sells Puri and sweets. Uttarlal carries a basket of Chanachur on his head while Dakhinranjan's stuff is Dahibarah. Often they quarrel among themselves over the sale of their respective stuffs. One's prospective buyer is snatched away by the other leading to a violent clash. So they have now decided to mark out their respective areas beyond which they would not go. But this agreement is not always scrupulously observed. It has not been observed this afternoon at least and there is a fresh outburst.

As the train steams off the vendors' cries are heard for the last time—

Purba—Tea! Tea! Hot Tea! Hot Tea!

Paschim—Puri Mithai—Puri Mithai—Rasgulla—

Uttar—Chanachur — Chanachur 'garam'—Fresh stuff—Come along—

Dakhin—Dahibarah—Come, have a taste of it—Dahibarah!

The Station is now quiet. Others have left.

Dakhin—Hey! Pubprasad! Again you encroached on my jurisdiction!

It's only yesterday that I asked you not to do so—didn't I?

Purba—That's all right, my dear friend! But why did Uttarlal enter my area?

Dakhin—That's his affair—ask him. Why should I bother about that? I'll only see that none sets his foot on mine. I will not allow anybody to come South.

Paschim—That's exactly what I am determined to do. No violation of my territory! How strange! It's not yet one full day that we all agreed among ourselves that we shall sell our stuff within our own jurisdictions and none will enter another's—and even now we break the rule that we ourselves made! Now I tell you for the last time—I belong to the West. The western side of the Station is mine and I mean to keep it to myself. I declare solemnly that I shall not enter any other's area and I will not tolerate any body's encroachment on my area either. You may make a note of that—I tell you—

Purba—Then you mean to say that a passenger in the western zone of the station will have no tea!

Paschim—No.

Purba—Good heavens! What will he do, poor fellow, if he is tea thirsty?

Paschim—How do I know? Let him take something more substantial — the stuff that I sell in the west — let him buy Puri — as many as he wants—and then I have sweets to offer—Mithai—

Purba—Yes Mithai! Your hard Mithai...that refuses to go down the throat. Two nice things that hang midway and block the passage! Cold Puri and hard Mithai! Now, look here—when these would get stuck in the poor passenger's throat what would he do to clear the blockade?

Paschim—Why? Flush it with water . . .

Purba—But who is to bring that water to your reserved southern kingdom?

Dakhin—Why? It's the old Bharatram that has been supplying water to the thirsty passengers in this station for the last 50 years or so! Bharatram will bring water as usual...

Purba—How can he now—after you have divided your zones? Ask him where is his home—in the East or in the West? Where does he come from—ask him. Is it North or South? Only then would you allow him to enter your area to carry water for passengers. Isn't that so?

Uttar—Certainly. But the difficulty with Bharatram is that he listens to nobody. He goes everywhere and brings water to all who are in need of it . . .

Dakhin—Where does he come from?

Purba—Strange—he never tells it! When asked he simply laughs. I asked him yesterday . . .

Paschim—What did he say?

Purba—Ask Dakhin. He had heard Bharat's reply. Tell it Dakhina. . .

Dakhin—What shall I say? Bharat said nothing but just started a song with a smile . . .

Bharatram's song is heard at a distance.

I have my brothers everywhere
My home is Hindusthan
I go and seek and find my friends
And love them as I can . . .

(Bharatram enters singing with Bharati, a young girl following)

Purba—(Interrupting) Yes, go and seek your friends where you can. But be sure of one thing. You have no place here . . .

Bharat—(laughing) No place here? Why? Strange to hear that after having spent fifty years of my life here! Listen Bharati . . . listen to their wild talks'!

Paschim—(Protesting) Wild talks?

Bharat—Certainly. For the last fifty years I have been bringing water to the thirsty passengers here in this Junction Station. My father did the same for a still longer period—seventy years, if my memory serves me all right! And now you say . . .

Paschim—Yes, now I say that you shall have to leave this place and go . . .

Bharat—Where?

Paschim—The place you come from . . . where you were born . . . you understand, old fool? Declare your home, your birthplace and go that way. If you are from the North you shall have to confine yourself to the North. If you belong to the West you are welcome to my side. Here in the west will you live and work . . . Come with your water jug and all that.

Purba—But if your home is in the East cross over to this side where I am standing. Here you and I shall work together. You will cool the passengers with your water and I shall warm them up with my hot tea . . .

Dakhin—Tell us old man, where is your home?

Bharat—(with a smile) I don't know. Do you, Bharati?

Bharati—(confidently) Yes, I do.

Bharat—(expressing surprise) You do? How? How do you know where my home is?

Bharati—Why? You were telling me the other day, grandpa'....

Bharat—I? I was telling you? I don't remember.

Bharati—(laughing) Forgotten so soon?

Bharat—(laughing) No wonder. After all I'm getting old . . . Tell me what I said.

Bharati—You said that your home is everywhere . . .

Uttar—(protesting) How can that be? One man and so many homes? Nothing can be more absurd than that . . .

Dakhin—Mean to bluff us, you rogue? We are no children. Bluff that girl there, but not us . . .

Paschim—Old hypocrite! Is it a clever trick or just a sign of senility?

Purba—Home everywhere! That's well said, yea! Trying to have the best of both worlds! Excellent! So much intelligence inside that small head?

Bharati—Why not? My grandpa' is not so empty-headed as . . . as (looks round and then pointing to Uttarlal) . . . as Uttar Kaka . . . (laughing loudly) . . . nothing there except a big patch of baldness . . .

Uttar—(taken unawares) How? How is that? I have my cap there . . . I mean . . . on my head . . .

Bharati—(still laughing) Yes . . . yes . . . certainly the cap is there . . . but only to hide your baldness . . . (clapping) The cap suggests baldness and . . .

Paschim—(taking the cue) . . . and baldness suggests money . . .

Purba—(taking the cue) and money suggests cleverness. A clever fellow that Uttarlal, indeed! Has made enough money by selling Chanachur . . .

Uttar—(angrily) What of that? You may as well earn it—nobody has prevented you! Petty jealousy! Failing to make money yourself you now find fault with others that have earned by the sweat of their brow!

Paschim—Excuse me friend, not by the sweat of your brow anyhow . . . but by a clever blending of sand with your chanachur . . . Is it not?

Uttar—(protesting) Who says that? Who mixes sand?

Purba—Uttarlal. Who else? And why sand only? There are so many other things to mix . . . you know that . . . .

Uttar—(challenging) Hold your tongue, Purbprasad or you shall rue it . . .

Purba—Whom shall I fear so long as I speak the truth?

Uttar—(Ironically) Truth? The very embodiment of truth is here standing before me . . . Yudhistir in this Kali Yuga! What does this Yudhistir mix with his tea?

Bharat—(jokingly) Only water . . . and nothing else! And this water . . . I mean, plenty of water, he takes from my drum . . . and that in my absence. (Everybody laughs) . . . Did I know it? No, I only noticed that my drum of water placed there, you know, in that corner (points) became empty rather too soon. How it happened I couldn't understand. Anyway, this old man had to go to the tubewell once more and fetch water to fill up the drum so that he might help the thirsty. This went on for a pretty long time . . . till at last (looking at Bharati) one day. . . . .

Bharati—(laughing) I caught Pubkaka redhanded.Isn't that so? As Pubkaka was drawing water stealthily with his back towards the door I entered quietly and while his kettle was filling up I shouted . .

Purba —(gibing at her) Shouted! And who asked you to do that excellent piece of work? But can you tell me, you pert girl, how can you have tea without water?

Paschim—Is it only water that you mix with your tea, nothing else?

Purba—(with injured innocence) What else? What do you mean? (fumbling) Granted that in my preparation of tea the proportion of water is slightly more than what it ought to be. But then, Paschim Kumar, I do not mix either stone powder or bone-powder with 'Atta' before preparing 'puri' for hungry customers! You can take good credit for doing double service to your buyers, your patrons . . . You are breaking their teeth with stones and robbing them of their pride of caste-purity by a judicious supply of bones of animals, who knows of what particular variety?

Paschim—So I am a villain and you a saint: But may I ask them who is it that mixes leather-powder with tea-dust? Is it Bharatram?

Bharat—Excuse me Paschim Kumar. The only thing that Bharatram mixes—and knows how to mix—is camphor, with water and nothing else. As for leather-powder, your friend, I mean our Pubprasad, makes a double use of it. After using it to increase the weight of his tea what little remains of the powder he makes good use of it on his face. Don't you see how his face shines . . .

(Everybody laughs)

Purba—(Angrily) Put a check upon your tongue, old man. Don't you tell an outrageous 'lie. Still the sun and the moon rise in the sky. Don't you forget the punishment of God. If you tell a lie you will soon cease to speak. Remember that.

Bharati—This is no lie, Pub kaka—and of all persons you know that best—is it not? Is it not a fact that only last Monday I found you mixing some blackish powder with your tea? And didn't you try to bribe me with a few pieces of biscuits —(laughing) and they were not good at all, appealing to me not to divulge the secret to any one?

Purba—(outwitted and angry)—And so you ate the biscuits all right and then carried the tale to your grandpa,! Thou little scorpion. . . . .

Dakhin—Then you admit that after all! And yet so long you were posing innocence! That's what you are . . .

Purba—Brother, why see the mote in other's eye not seeing the beam in your own? Thou can't afford to throw stones at others living in a glass-house yourself. Pub Prasad knows well how Dakhin Ranjan prepares his Dahibarah. Shall I expose you? Come, shall I?

Dakhin—What is there to expose me? Instead of indulging in useless talks mind your own business. Protect your own area. Look, Bharatram is already there. Beware, that old man would upset everything. I give you this timely warning.

Uttar—That's true. Just see how he has not yet told us where his birthplace is. Very shrewd, isn't it?

Paschim—You are perfectly right, Uttarlal. Look, as we are quarrelling the old man is just laughing!

Uttar—And why are you laughing, Bharatram?

Bharat—And why should I not when you say something which naturally provokes laughter? I have not yet forgotten to laugh though I am over sixty. And look how Bharati too is laughing—and she is only sixteen . . .

Uttar—(to Bharati) And what makes you laugh?

Bharati—(laughing) I don't know. I am laughing because Dadu is laughing—that's all.

Purba—That's funny! The grand-daughter laughs because the grand-father laughs. Then if I laugh Uttarlal will laugh. And if Uttar laughs Dakhin will follow. And seeing Dakhin laugh Paschim will roll in laughter. So the wheel of laughter turns and turns and turns . . . Laughter all round!

Paschim—But the question is why this laughter? Why should Bharatram laugh at all? We have marked our respective areas so that none may encroach upon it. This is a life and death question for us. And that old fool laughs . . .

Purba—True! Now Bharatram, tell us seriously why—you are laughing!

Bharat—Just because you have asked me a funny question the answer to which is not known to me. You have asked me where is my home. Now the fact is that I do not know. Had I known it I would have told you.

Paschim—Strange! You don't know your own home! And you say that you are over sixty. ....

Bharat—Perhaps just because of that I have either forgotten it or I do not bother about it. The only thing that I am concerned about is the supply of water to the thirsty passengers in this station—and who is there that does not feel thirsty? When in the scorching heat of Chaitra or Baisakh passengers get down here and look for water to quench their thirst and call out 'Hey, where is the water supplier' and so on, do I first ask them as to where do they come from—East or West, North or South —and then give them water only if they happen to be from my native district or village or do they ask me similar questions before accepting water from my jug?

Purba—There, of course, you are right.

Paschim—Still you must have home somewhere, —I mean your birthplace where your father or your grandfather . . .

Bharat—(interrupting) My grandfather was in the East but married a girl of the West. My father was brought up in the West in his maternal uncle's house and then married in the North. I was born in the North but came to the South to earn my living. I have been nourished with the food of the South. Now tell me how can I say that I belong to this or that zone exclusively. Then look at that girl (pointing to Bharati). She is known as my grand-daughter. How absurd!—grand-daughter of a life-long bachelor! You know that I just found her. A gem of a girl as she is, she is unfortunately a foundling. You remember Uttarlal how she met rescued from among the debris after that serious railway accident that year.

Uttar—Yes. That we all know.

Bharat—I don't know whose daughter she is. I regard her as the daughter of you all. Isn't that so. Bharati?

Bharati—Exactly. I like Puri and sweets and yet I cannot check my temptation for Dahibarah. And as regards your Chanachur, tell me Uttar Kaka where have you seen a girl who does not love to munch it. And what is Chanachur worth if it is not accompanied with tea? Don't you agree, Pub Kaka?

Uttar—She speaks very fine . . .

Paschim—(Ironically) Only she is ripe beyond her age . . .

Dakhin—And talks at random . . .

Purba—Not she, but you. And now, will you go and enquire why is the train so late? It's already half-an-hour passed and no sign of it! What's the matter? In the meantime my tea is becoming almost ice-cold.

Bharati—Why don't you give me a cup before that, Pub Kaka? I admit I can't drink cold tea—a bad habit certainly! But I can't help it. Give me your glass, Dadu. That will do in the absence of a cup just now. Tea is the thing, not the cup . . .

Purba—And you want it free? That's very clever of you . . .

Bharati—How clever? After sometime you will have to throw away your tea. None will pay for it. Isn't it better that I drink it before that?

Purba—That's true indeed! Come, bring your glass . . . have it. . . '' (pours tea)

Bharati—No more . . . no more. That's all right. (To others) Won't you have your tea?

Uttar—Certainly it would be very nice if we can have it after so much of waiting. As for me, it would be thrice welcome since I have a head attack of cold. Hot tea would be very refreshing.

Bharati—Then help yourself without making further delay. All right, wait. I am pouring it out to you. Hold that glass . . . (she pours tea)

Uttar—(after one sip) Ah! very cheering. (To others) Come, have it. . .

Paschim—Yes, but not before you distribute your Chanachur . . .

Uttar—(laughing) My Chanachur, you want it? Here it is . . . come take, as much as you like. . . Why hesitate? Have more. Come, Bharat Maharaj . . it's as fresh as anything.

Bharat—Alas . . . also! How shall I manage your Chanachur without teeth? Don't forget I am over sixty now. I have left my Chanachur days long behind . . .

Paschim—Then have my Puri and Mithai and after that drink a cup of tea. You can take your own time. There is no hurry. The train is running late. Come here is my Puri . . .

Bharat—No, my dear friend. Even that will be difficult for me to negotiate. I would rather satisfy myself with the soft stuff of Dakhin—his Dahibarah, soft and manageable . . .

Bharati—All right. Then all of you please sit down. I shall serve (They all sit and begin to eat together).

Bharat—(while eating) But what has happened to the train?

Uttar—It's never so late . . .

Bharat—Any further delay would very much affect the people of the North, you know. You all know about the flood-havoc in the North. About one thousand villages have suffered from the ravages of the flood. People are in terrible distress, without food, without clothes, without the other necessities of life. These were due to reach the North by this train that we are expecting here now. People would die of starvation if the train is held up anywhere for any reason. . .

Bharati—(much concerned) Suppose the train does not arrive—what would happen then?

Bharat—That can never be, my child. It will come no doubt, only it may be a bit delayed. Consider the long journey, from the farthest South to North and there are rocks and rivers and forests and thousand other things. . .

Bharati—But suppose the engine has gone of order. Then?

Uttar—Don't worry. The mechanics are there to set it right. Moreover before the train starts everything is thoroughly checked. . .

Purba—Still you never know the vagaries of machines and engines. They have a peculiar knack of going wrong without notice. . .

Bharat—No, no. The engine of a running train does not behave so oddly as you sometimes do.

Dakhin—But how do you explain the delay in its arrival?

Paschim—There may be many reasons.

Bharat—Whatever that may be the people there in the North are anxiously waiting for food. And you know how to a starving man an hour seems an age.

Purba—Don't I know that? Have I not myself experienced the pinch of starvation? Having lost everything as a result of the division of the country I was going about from door to door for food and shelter. Then I met Uttarlal by pure accident and he it was that brought me here and helped me start this tea-vendor's work at this Junction station. He advanced money from his own pocket. Thanks to Uttarlal that I am still somehow maintaining myself.

Bharat—Why then do you lose your head and quarrel over what you call encroachment on your respective areas? How foolish!

(The sound of a train coming is heard)

Bharati—(elated) Listen. There comes the train. Can you hear it, Dadu?

(The whistle of the train is heard)

Uttar—Yes, we can all hear that. Look, the signal too is down. . .

Paschim—Ah! There comes the train! Clear the platform . . . Quick!

Purba—(starts his usual cry)—Tea! Hot Tea!

Uttar—(following) — Chanachur! Fresh Chanachur! Come one, come all Paschim—Puri Mithai . . . Rosgulla . . . Puri . . .

Dakhin—Dahibarah! Dahibarah!

(All cry at the same time—Noise)

Bharat—Look here! Why are you shouting like that for nothing? Have you forgotten that it's a goods train and there are no passengers to oblige you by purchasing your stuff?

Dakhin—It's just a question of habit, old man, The very sound of the whistle is our signal to begin the cry; and if we don't we feel rather uncomfortable. Isn't it?

Purba—Don't worry Dakhin Ranjan. There comes your customer Chotelal, the driver. I know he is very fond of your Dahibarah coming as he does from the South. He is your kin. Entertain him.

(Chotelal enters)

Come Chotelalji, refresh yourself with Dakhin's Dahibarah .....

Chotelal—Stop all this nonsense. I am in no mood for your silly jokes .....

Purba—(still jokingly) Temper? Hot? Hotter than your engine?

Chotelal—Don't talk rubbish. What do you know of hot engine, hot tea being your limit?

Bharat—(trying to pacify) May be. But what's wrong with you Chotelal? Why so out of temper? Must be very thirsty! Come, have a glass of water and cool yourself. Then tell me what has happened...

Chotelal—What else? Have worked for ten hours continuously instead of the scheduled sight — and even then I am now asked to continue for two hours more. Why? Isn't an engine-driver a human being? I don't care whether your train runs or not. Somebody was to take over from this station and now it appears that somebody has not put in his appearance .....

Purba—Why?

Chotelal—How do I know? The excuse is that blessed fellow is out to enjoy a holiday. This is, so I am told, Viswakarma Puja day and none is in a mood to work. In fact, none is willing to work lest Viswakarma, the lord of machines and all that should be angry! A fine excuse for holidaying! And if anybody is to suffer, well poor Chotelal is there! But I too know my job! I have told them straight that I am not going to work a minute more. Let the train have a perpetual halt here. I am not concerned.

Uttar—Why so angry, my friend? Come, you must be hungry — have some fresh Chanachur and then refresh yourself with a cup of Pubprasad's tea and then drive the train to its destination. Come .....

Chotelal—Well said! I have a severe headache and I feel feverish. I cannot work. Besides, the engine of the train requires a bit of repair here and there and there is not one mechanic present here.

Dakhin—That's rather odd. This is a Junction Station and everything and everybody is expected to be in readiness for all eventuality. Where are they gone?

Bharati—I saw all the workers going that way on the other side of the dam, all in a crowd, singing and shouting .....

Uttar—That's right. There they will have their Puja this night; and then entertainments — songs and dances and all that, you know .....

Bharat—Yes, I know Uttarlal. But without the help of the mechanics how will the train run now? How will it take its food-consignment to the hungry North? How many men, women and children are in anxious expectation of its arrival! What to do Chotelal?

Chotelal—What do I know? Ask the Sardar. He is just coming there. See how he has freshened himself with a bottle even now ..... Ask him how the wheels of the train will turn .....

(Sardar enters. He is slightly drunk)

Sardar—No ..... no ..... no turning of the wheels to-day! To-day is Lord Viswakarma's own day ..... and we are his devoted subjects ..... loyal and faithful to our Master! No work to-day. This is our holy day and this is our holiday. Glory be to Lord Viswakarma .....

Purba—Drunk even now? Couldn't wait for the night?

Sardar—That I do everyday, my dear friend. A long waiting for the whole day and then a little drinking at night! That's a routine affair. But this is a special day ..... a day of festivity ..... and hence a little early start. Don't you see that? Have I done anything wrong, Bharat Maharaj? This is a day of merry-making .....

Bharat—May be for you. But what about others who are facing a disaster?

Sardar—Disaster? What disaster? Whose disaster? Come, have just one peg and you will forget everything. Everything will be all right.

Bharat—Stop all this wild talk, Sardar. The engine requires a repair .....

Sardar—Quite natural. engines are meant for repair. Do away with the engine and you won't have to repair any more. No engine, no repair! No head, no headache. Cut off your head and there will be no headache, no trouble ..... Cut off your head first .....

Bharat—What nonsense are you talking, Sardar? Call your men; start your work and let the train begin its journey, please .....

Sardar—You are forgetting Bharat Maharaj that this is a holiday. This is Lord Viswakarma's day. No touching of instruments to-day. We can't afford to antagonise our Lord. Can we? Viswakarma will be angry. Don't you see?

Uttar—That I know Chotelal. But on the other hand, if the train does not carry the essential foodstuffs and all that to the North immediately thousands will die there.

Sardar—Doesn't matter. Let them die. Those who are destined to die let them die quickly. That will solve all problems. After all, they will die once, not twice. The quicker the better ..... (laughs)

Uttar — Listen Bharatramji, listen to his drunken ravings .....

Bharat—Look here, Sardar, please talk sense; otherwise I shall pour this cold water on your head and your drunkenness will end forthwith. There, on the one hand thousands are dying of starvation and here on the other one man is enjoying himself with a drink forgetting his own work. This is the way of the world! Why don't you speak to him, Chotelal, and try to make him see reason?

Chotelal—That's no part of my job.

Uttar—Don't you see so many men, women and children are on the point of death as a result of the terrible floods that have swept away everything they had? These people .....

Chotelal—(interrupting) Belong to the North. How am I affected if they die? I belong to the West. I am not concerned with what happens in the North.

Sardar—Well said, Chotelal! I come from the South. I shall see that everybody is quickly despatched to the southern gate of Yama, the Lord of Death. That will easily and quickly solve the problem of rise in prices. Why have the prices, of all things and of drink in particular increased? Increase in population ..... greater demand, but no supply! And everybody wants to drink—but there is shortage of the stuff itself. Let the North be empty. Let there be less of men and the prices will come down.

Purba—Do you hear that Paschim Kumar? What do they say — this Chotelal and this Sardar? Have they no human feeling in them?

Bharat—Sardar, I appeal to you, please set your hands to work. Please call your men and see that the train runs again. For heaven's sake, let not these unfortunate people die of starvation with plenty of food rotting in the wagons there. Please see that the food reaches those who need them so urgently. Those starving men and women ..... some are perching on the tree-tops, some hanging perilously on the roofs of crumbling huts ..... many have been already swept away by the mad rush of the water ... please think of them ... have pity for them, Sardar. Try to save those who are still somehow alive. They are your own ..... They belong to your country. They are not different from you in any way. Nor are they distant from you. They are your own brothers and sisters, your own children ..... Save them, Sardar ..... Sardar, save them. There is yet time .....

Sardar—Please stop babbling like that, you old and garrulous fool! Don't disturb me. Let me enjoy my tipsiness. I had to spend for it.

Bharat—Chotelal!

Chotelal—What can I do?

Bharat—You are the driver of the train. You can do much. Just imagine how many people are looking forward to you ... waiting for you to drive that train into their station, fully loaded with food and clothes and medicines and so many other things that they need .....

Chotelal—But why should I take the trouble for them? I am suffering from a severe headache. I feel I am going to have temperature soon. Who are they to me that I shall forget my own pains to be of help to them?

Sardar—Yes. Who are they?

Bharat—They are your brothers, Sardar. They are your brothers .....

Sardar—Brothers? (laughs cynically) Brothers, you say? What kind of brothers? Chanachur fraternising with Dahibarah? Neck-tie calling Dhoti as brother? Pooh! No. I have no brother. I am alone ..... I have no brother, I say. I have none. Only: myself I know. I am here and I have no one else.....

Bharat—What do you say Sardar? Have you forgotten everything under the influence of drink? Have you no brother?

Sardar—No. No.

Bharat—You have forgotten everything. You are drunk.

Sardar—May be, but I have not forgotten anything. I remember everything.

Bharat—What do you remember?

Sardar—Why shall I say?

Bharat—I challenge you that you have forgotten everything.

Sardar—No. I remember everything.

Bharat—I say you do not. You cannot tell anything. You are drunk.

Sardar—I can tell everything. I can tell you, you old fool, that I had everything but ..... but now ..... now I have nothing. I have lost them all ..... all those who were by my side once. One by one they fell ..... In just two days' time all was over. All lights were extinguished ..... and I was left alone in the midst of darkness. In the wake of flood came epidemic in our village. No house was immune. Lamentations were heard here, there and everywhere. Whole families became extinct in the course of a day or two. Many fled away to save themselves. I could not. There was my old and invalid mother. There was my old father who had lost his eyes in a mine accident. I could not run away leaving them to their fate. Then there was my ..... my wife who was expecting a baby any day — a sick woman. And ..... and ..... (looking at Bharati with tearful eyes) there was my daughter too ..... my only daughter. And one day they all fell victims to that fell disease ..... cholera ..... I too was no exception.

Yes, I had a brother ..... a sturdy young man. I had nourished him myself and built him up, ... and that brother ran away to save his own life! He turned to nobody — not to his old parents, not to his own brother. He fled away. I remained with those helpless unfortunate beings ..... all of us sick, all of us helpless. In silent agony I stayed alone in that dark room. None came to our rescue. Lying there, too weak to move, I could perceive people evacuating the epidemic-ridden village. Those who could leave the village perhaps saw life again ..... I don't know. Those who remained, died. Before my very eyes I saw all my dear ones dying one by one ..... my mother, my father and then ..... then my wife too. I took my daughter ... my only daughter ..... I took her from her mother's lap and clasped her tightly to my breast as if to hold her back from death. I tried ..... I tried to hold her back ..... I was determined to struggle ..... but then ..... I found her gradually falling asleep in my arms ..... Yes, falling asleep ..... but she woke no more ..... she woke no more. .....

(In the meantime Bharati has come forward and held his hand)

Who is there? ..... Who touched my hands? Who is it? I felt the same soft touch I felt many years ago? Who is there?

Bharati—I am Bharati ... your daughter .....

Sardar—What? My daughter?

Bharati—(softly) Yes. Your daughter.

Sardar—My daughter? No. I have no daughter. My daughter is dead. I have none who is my own ..... no daughter, no brother .....

Uttar — (interrupting) I am your brother, Sardar.

Sardar—You Uttarlal! You are my brother?

Bharati—And I am your daughter.

Sardar—You Bharati! You are my daughter? No, no ..... you are none to me. Leave me alone ..... What is this? What are you doing? Why do you come so close to me, Bharati? Why do you hold my hand? Leave it. I say do please leave it ..... Ah! what has happened to me? Am I breaking down? Why do I feel so uneasy at heart? What a wave of new feeling sweeps my barren heart? Bharati, please let off my hand ..... Uttarlal please let me go .....

Bharat—None will let you go, Sardar. None will leave you. They are all your own. Look who are around you .....

(Purba Prasad and others have all come close to Sardar)

This Purba Prasad, this Dakhin Ranjan, this Chotela! ..... they are all your brothers.....

Sardar—No ..... no ..... my brother left me

IN THE JUNGLES OF MAMUNDI

By

DHIRENDRA NARAYAN ROY

IT was a winter evening. A round of tea had already been served. Arjun Sen lighted his Burma cigar and began to tell his shikar experience. Among the interested listeners were Valtu, his assistant, myself, and Acharya Mahashya.

Sen went on: That year, when my leave fell due, I planned a trip to the Jaintia Hill. But Valtu put in his objection. He put forward an uncalled for suggestion:

"Sahib, why not go to the Dooars? It is rich in forests as well as wild games."

At first I was inclined to ditto his proposal but then I remembered the tedious journey to Dooars now-a-days. So I dismissed his proposal summarily.

A Marathi friend of mine was at that time in Mamundi near Shahjehanpur. He was writing to me frequently for a visit to his place where games were abundant. I at once made up my mind and said:

"Do away with your Dooars—we shall go to Mamundi and there shall see plenty of wild life."

Valtu knew what to do and when. He did not say anything but held before me the Railway time-table.

Within a few hours, we sped for the railway station, got in the train and reached Shahjehanpur via Sitarampur. From there we had to take a jeep for the next thirty miles for our destination.

I had already sent a wire to my friend Jaswanta Rao who along with his wife gave me a rousing reception. He had reserved a full suite of his spacious bungalow for me and I felt very comfortable there.

At the tea table, Mrs. Rao provided us with frequent bursts of laughter. She was a smart young lady, very sprightly and was unsophisticated in her manners. When I enquired of Mr. Rao the cause of the laughter, he winked at his wife and in reply Mrs. Rao whispered something in his ears.

With a subdued glee Rao said:

"My wife is rather charmed by your unwieldly moustache and she is enjoying it very much."

It was not only at the tea table that Mrs. Rao enlivened us with her hearty laugh but next morning she also showed her worth in other fields. She had been up from bed very early in preparations of our shikar. She also managed to rouse Mr. Rao from bed. She knocked out slumber even from the bearers, the cook, the Mashalchi and in fact from all the inmates and attendants of the house.

I heard the thumping steps of Valtu on the verandah in front of my bed-room. He too seemed to be very busy. When asked to explain the cause of hurry, and whether he had heard the call of the tiger, Valtu stood before me saluting and replied:

"There the Memsahib is coming."

I looked forward and saw that she was comming to me.

"Good morning, madam."

"Good morning. But do please hurry up, we are all ready."

I was astonished. There was no news of any shikar, neither any arrangements had been made now there comes the call for a march.

I enquired where her husband was, to which she replied:

"Well, he is already up and is now busy dressing himself. We shall start after breakfast. We have got three horses and two elephants. Do please come to the table as early as you can.

We decided that Mr. and Mrs. Rao and myself would go on horseback. Valtu and Jamadar Damu would ride one elephant and the other one would be occupied by the bearer and the boy servant with our lunch.

We started in a few minutes. My rifle was fastened crosswise on my back. The two elephants followed us in a leisurely fashion. Mrs. Rao took her position between me and Mr. Rao and exuberantly went on chatting—she was so full of life. Her husband had scarcely any chance to utter a word.

About a mile from the Bungalow, there was a rivulet with sandy tracts of land on the bank overgrown in places by long grass. I was first disappointed on coming to the spot. There was no such jungle as to harbour our much expected game. I told Mr. Rao about my reactions at which Mrs. Rao vehemently put in a protest:

My wife is charmed with your unweldy moustache and she is enjoying it very much.

Oh no, no, don't you think so, Major Sen. The beasts of these places are sufficiently cunning and deceitful. You can never be sure about their sudden attacks.

Mounds of sands were noticed here and there overgrown with shrubs. There were of course a few tracts of cultivated land and at that time maize and tobacco were the crops. Foot marks of wild boars and deer were also noticed besides various kinds of birds. In front of us there was a sand-hill around which bush and thickets were having luxuriant growth forming a real approach to the jungle which indeed had been selected for our hunting campaign.

Gradually we came to a spot where the rivulet was flowing in a serpentine way on the other side of which was the dense forest. Sunlight seemed to be totally absent there.

I felt a queer sensation all over my body. The air had a peculiar smell and an uncommon grimness. My experience at once made me realise that there was a big game near about, and that game could not but be a tiger.

Jasowanta Rao looked at me and made a definite gesture to assure me of the spot where big games would not be lacking.

That I had to admit but where were the arrangements for shikar? The tiger won't come if we did not beat the jungle.

So let us wait till the elephants come. The peasants too might be called in the meantime if they would like to join us.

We three got down from the horses. Beside us there was a big pipul tree with an extensive shade below. We went to rest under it as also to have a talk on what we should do then. A few cultivators also, out of curiosity, left their work and assembled near us. I was going to light a cigarette when I noticed that a peasant boy, out of fun, stood near the forest and began to throw stones at the same.

No sooner had the young boy thrown three or four stones at the forest, than we heard a loud roar from there. We were much agitated and we found that the peasants who had assembled there were greatly terrified, they began to tremble and were dumbfounded.

The incident was so sudden and unforeseen that for a second, I too was puzzled. Without losing a minute, we hid ourselves behind the tree. In a moment, a tiger jumped out of the jungle. It was almost a grown-up animal though the dark patches on its body were not yet very vivid. In the twinking of an eye the tiger pounced upon the wretched boy who at once lay prostrate on the ground.

Mrs. Rao began to shout from behind me: Fire, Major, hit the tiger at once. Please don't delay.

Jasowanta Rao was rather in a fix—he was hesitant to use the gun lest the boy was hurt. Further if he missed it no body would be spared.

Strange. The tiger did not pay any heed to the boy but instead, like a cat playing over a mouse it began to look this way and that as if to take stock of the surroundings. Its long tail moved in the air and a pungent note of angry disapproval was heard.

We too could not for a couple of minutes decide what to do. But then it was time for me to rise to the occasion and my gun did its work. The shot was direct and pierced the bosom of the beast. Like a black of stone, it glided aside and lay on the ground.

Mr. and Mrs. Rao were greatly excited and their congratulations at my superb performance were really difficult to bear. The villagers also congregated around me. I rushed towards the tiger but very cautiously. It was well-known that one should not go near a cunning tiger without being fully assured of its death. I picked up a lump of earth and threw it on the tiger which however remained still as before. Coming near it I saw that the peasant boy was senseless. I pulled him out and soon he came to senses. He had not been seriously injured, only scratchings made by the paw of the tiger were to be seen on his body which was besmeared by the blood oozing out from the tiger.

Just at this time, the two elephants were seen hurrying towards us. As they came near us, Valtu jumped down from the back of the elephant and running straight to me gave me a hearty salute which was his habit after a big 'shot' of mine.

Then the necessary works were done to bind the tiger on the back of the elephant.

Mrs. Rao proposed, "We shall have our lunch on our return to Bungalow."

No sooner had she finished her words, than a second roar from the jungle was heard. The peasants began to flee hither and thither. Jasowanta opposed any further move that day, saying:

"Let us stop now. We shall retire to-day and take our chance later.

But this was another challenge to me—how could I leave it behind? I prayed to my friend to return with Mrs. Rao and others. For me there remained the only way and that was to follow the track of the tiger and meet his challenge.

Mrs. Rao implored me in her sweet voice:

"You have not yet taken your lunch, that would certainly cause you enormous hardship. How I feel for that!"

"Oh, that's nothing. It would be quite nice if you kindly give the tiffin-carrier to Valtu."

I called Valtu who at once got upon the elephant with the tiffin carrier in hand. I too followed him. Mr. and Mrs. Rao got upon their horses and I took leave of them and started on my mission.

Soon we were lost in the jungle.

Our elephant was well-trained in hunting but in the absence of the usual driver he was reluctant to follow our advice. But, perhaps, there was some reason behind it. As we proceeded a few yards in the jungle, we heard another deep roar. Instantaneously the elephant became exceedingly restless and swinging its ears on both sides, raised its trunk and wanted to flee away. The mahout tried to control him with all his powers, goading it with the hook, uttering unintelligible words of remonstrance but the elephant paid no heed to these at all.

But how could I blame him? Firstly, he was a brand new hand and was hardly acquainted with the ins and outs of the elephant. Secondly, the elephant was alone in the jungle confronted by the roar of the tiger. It is extremely difficult for even a trained elephant to move in cool brain in that situation. So our carrier also went straight out of the jungle.

Coming to a comparatively open space, the elephant sighed a relief. I too got down from the elephant and began to caress him on his trunk but still it seemed to be in the grip of fear that was so vivid in his eyes.

Now listen to me what happened next. Naturally I was not a man to let matters go so easily. Valtu was also my able lieutenant. I asked him: "What should now be done?"

He was very prompt with his reply: "I always agree with whatever my master wishes."

"Then, come with me".

We two proceeded on foot. We had to stop for a while for there was a huge ditch caused perhaps by earthquake or any such freak of Nature. Through it flowed the river, having very scanty water, not even knee-deep. Beyond a large tract of sand rose gradually high up to the plains from where the jungle had again become dense.

Holding the rifle in hand, we two marched ahead laying a close scrutiny on our surroundings. Suddenly, through a thick bush by the side of the river-bed, something striped flashed out with the brilliance of a velvet. I spoke in the ears of Valtu:

"Let us go down."

We advanced a few steps on tip toes when the tiger slipped out from the other side and attempted to cross the river. Just on getting him within range, I fired and the tiger toppled down in the water and then again rose up from it and began to run along the sandy river-bed.

Just on getting him within range I fired . . . . . .

I too lost all balance of mind and was seized by a peculiar craze to run after the tiger. But I was mistaken for I soon realised what penalty I had to pay for this folly. I thought that as the tiger had been hurt, it would not be able to go far. We had gone a great length extremely hungry, the tiger still eluding our grasp.

I was going to suggest something to Valtu when suddenly he dropped down.

The day in the meantime, had come to a close, and evening darkness was fast enveloping us.

What was to be done now?

Valtu began to pant asking for water.

I had really fallen into great trouble. A decision was very difficult under the circumstances.

Still I tried this way and that to find if any locality was nearby but no trace of any human being could be had. So it remained for us to depend on fate. I returned to the spot and attempted to rouse Valtu to some sort of activity. After a few minutes' effort, he somehow managed to stand up and cried pitiously.

"Let us go!"

"How's that', It is getting all dark. To advance that way is nothing but inviting death."

A pale smile was noticed on Valtu's lips. He looked at the sky and showed me that the moon was up in the sky and suggested that in that pallid moonlight we would proceed on.

We went on reeling and on reaching the river, Valtu pointed out to me,

"Look there, the elephant—the mahout must have come in search of us.

There was water in front of us. Valtu quenched his thirst with it and seemed as if to drink it to the lees. I too had a hearty drink.

As we reached the other side of the river, the mahout remonstrated us severely, saying. "How strange!. Have you indeed no fear of life?"

Valtu has got to be given a credit. In that condition, he most easily contrived to get on the back of the elephant by crawling on his hind legs and signalled the beast to sit down.

The elephant too was sympathetic and sat down immediately. I got upon the animal but suddenly felt a severe shivering as if the malaria of the Dooars had caught me in its grip.

I had to suffer a lot that time and could not leave my bed before three months.

Bharat—And would you do the same thing, Sardar? Would you leave your brothers in the same way and stand still here to see them die. You are so angry, so upset because your brother did not stand by your side in times of crisis. Now think of the crisis of hundreds of your brothers in the North, poor and helpless victims of flood. Think of the starving men, women and children. Think how they are waiting eagerly for you in the hope that you would help the train reach their food and clothes. The train will move only when you set your hands to it ..... you and your fellow-workers. You are so upset just because you lost your one daughter. Now think of hundreds of fathers like you who are holding their daughters tightly to their breasts to save them expecting a providential rescue every moment.

Philosophy of Clothes

By BASANTI SANYAL

MY aunt's philosophy of clothes was no mere abstraction but a practical principle of which her own life had been a standing example. Irrespective of what prof. Teufelsdroch would have had to say on the matter, she firmly held that in the present century it was clothes that made the man. The old adage of a person being known by the company he kept had had to give way to the new one of his being known by the clothes he wore, what with the science of psychology coming to the fore and the company kept being no longer a matter of volition but determined in strict accordance with one's station in life.

As an example of what a judicious application of her philosophy could achieve she was never tired of relating the circumstances that led to her marriage to uncle. Of hundreds of girls it was she alone who achieved the miracle of conforming at once to both uncle's and my grandfather's conceptions of a bride, which meant performing a feat of no less a magnitude than bringing the Poles together. All she did was to appear before the old man in a simple, white saree with broad red border—an apparel so strongly reminiscent of the household goddess Annapurna—that it almost brought tears to the old man's eyes. Subsequently, however, when she was meeting uncle and his friends, she had changed into a borderless georgette and a blouse cut low, an ensemble which showed her curves to advantage and proclaimed her to be the then last word in modernity. So it was that the choices of the orthodox father and the modern son tallied wonderfully.

Even as she was being interviewed aunt had noticed that uncle needed some education in clothing to which task she set herself assiduously even before the echo of the wedding bells had worn to silence. To quote her very expressive terms, she had his "pillow-case" Kurtas replaced by gailyprinted Hawaii shirts, and his "maternity" bush-coats by streamlined lounge-suits. His "shopping-bag" corduroys were given away to the sweeper, while his "pyjama-cord" neckties were made use of as such. Shortly afterwards uncle got a raise in office. The good luck was attributed to the bride's auspiciousness. But my aunt herself modestly declined to be associated, however favourably, with anything that smacked of the superstitious, and, scientifically, ascribed uncle's promotion to his smart turn-out which carried an impression of efficiency.

Thereafter she tenaciously adhered to her philosophy of clothes applying it in all vital matters in life like making friends, choosing tenants and lending money. And when, in spite of taking every precaution, friends betrayed, tenants gave trouble or borrowers did not pay, she went to a lawyer who wore the most tattered gown—a sure pointer to his long experience in the line.

When I took to her my problem of choosing a groom from amongst a number of equally eligible suitors aunt's method of tackling it was characteristic. She invited all the suitors to dinner, an occasion, she maintained, which called for the best in a person's clothes' sense and hence gave him away the most. The idea also appealed to me. It was to

IN THE LAND OF NO SERVANTS

By AN AUSTRALIAN CORRESPONDENT

THE question was first asked by a special Bengali friend in Madras: "How do your Australian women manage without servants?"

I have been often asked the same question by Indian friends. There is a short, easy answer: "Australian homes manage to do all the work themselves because employment is so high that servants are either too difficult to obtain or too expensive to maintain."

Indian friends feel the question is partly unanswered, or not to their satisfaction.

This, I suppose, is because the servant has become such an important unit in the Indian home, even of those in the lower middle income brackets, that they can hardly imagine a home able to afford servants being without one.

But it is a fact that the average Australian family, including those in high income groups do without servant help of any kind, whether washerwoman, cook, sweeper, gardener, message boy or any other domestic help.

The Australian housewife, except in rare cases where the family is very large or her husband is compelled by his position to entertain a lot, can get along without servants.

I have discussed the social implications of such a phenomenon with Indian friends (although Australians, I must point out, do not regard it as a phenomenon).

A servantless country surely must reflect the natural ability of its people to manage with a little bit of extra industry and organisation. The fact is that Australians have never been used to servants. The society is more or less a servantless society. There is no sign of class barriers, although the men in richer incomes prefer to mix with those enjoying the same high income, they do not regard salary grades as measures of inferiority.

That is why I am so proud to be an Australian, to have been brought up in a home without servants (although we could have afforded to) and to have developed our parents' view that there is a lot that can be done by oneself, and with advantage to the soul. "God helps him who helps himself" has application in this servant question.

There is an economic factor which has important bearing on the servant question in Australia.

Australia has a high living standard, and the laws lay down a minimum basic wage of round about Rs. 300 a week to any worker skilled or unskilled. There are, of course, gardeners who are employed on a day-to-day basis and naturally enjoy a high measure of comfortable living. There are also domestics attached to hospitals and other public institutions. But the average home couldn't see its way to paying such an amount for work which they feel can very well be done by members of the family.

This, in turn, has reduced the number of people seeking work as servants in private homes. They prefer to seek other work, just as highly paid. There are exceptions. Elderly couples sometimes employ a domestic help, but these people class themselves as good as their employers.

The position in India could not be more different. Here the servant, or servants, would seem to be indispensable. There is underemployment, and servants are easy to get, and their wages are low. It appears to me that in many Indian homes, one servant could quite easily do the work of three or four, but here again there is the Indian custom or tradition or unwritten law that the work of the cook must be strictly separated from that of the sweeper, or the nursemaid.

What effect does all this have on the resourceful attributes of the Indian girl? Indian society accepts the servant, so the daughters of the house naturally refrain from doing work that can easily be done by the available servants. And why do they work, if you employ servants to do it? It is a fair question, but has it any application to the changing times?

An Indian girl when she marries expects to have the same servant attention as she did before she left her parents' home.

Indian husbands have discussed this problem with me on the grounds that their wives are sometimes too demanding in their servants' requirements. One or two have even hinted that it would be better if their wives were more occupied in household chores than have such time to fret and complain about their hard lot. The husband must sometimes look to the economic costs. If he could cut the servants' bill, it could mean money spent to better advantage elsewhere—better schooling for the children, perhaps, or a better holiday.

I marvel at the ability of the Australian women to manage without domestic help, and yet not suffer physically or temperamentally. It is a question of all members of the family doing their little bit. The husband will cook and help with shopping. The daughters of the house will do the household washing and cleaning and dusting. They'll clean their own shoes, iron their own dresses.

Certainly the high standard of Australian living includes quick washing gadgets. But the washing has to be placed on the line, and the household linen has to be ironed.

The marvel of it all is that the Australian housewife having done without servants has time to spare from household duties. If she is not gardening, she is out playing golf with other housewives.

She can find time for a round of golf, and get back to prepare the evening meal for the family.

After the meal, she settles down to watch the television, while other members of the family, including Dad, wash the dishes and tidy the kitchen. They will even prepare the next day's breakfast.

So the Australian housewife doesn't miss servants. I would say she enjoys doing the work herself. Admittedly, she likes a rest from household chores now and again, with a holiday at an hotel or guest house for instance.

But she loves to get back to her home and household duties.

Indian husbands sometimes doubt, sometimes express wonderment when I discuss the servantless Australia.

Some have even said that India, in her ultimate planning, will become less dependent on servants. It could perhaps be something good for national morale.

As I said before, "God helps those who help themselves."

be something of a modern version of the time-honoured Swayamvara.

My aunt's silence when the guests had left was ominous.

"The businessman's son was very well-dressed." I remarked, wanting to draw her out.

"Over-dressed," she pronounced, "Which means over-anxiety to display wealth. Even if you were to laze all day like the princess in the fables with body on a gold bed and feet on a silver one, you surely couldn't marry a person who showed lack of culture."

"The Zemindar's nephew, then ?" I asked hopefuly.

"His suit looked good."

"My dear, you are too simple," my aunt laughed derisively. "Didn't you notice it sat clumsily on him, and he seemed to feel awkward in it, the way he kept shrugging his shoulders ? He had evidently come dressed for the occasion in borrowed plumes. It was more than probable that at home he went about in shabby pyjamas, good for nothing except puffing at the hubble-bubble."

"Over dressed" she pronounced.

"The I.A.S. ?" I asked, somewhat dubiously this time. "Well, he.....he was too correct," aunt returned. "He had dressed too carefully to be convincing, as though he was afraid of giving himself away. He certainly hasn't an aristocratic background."

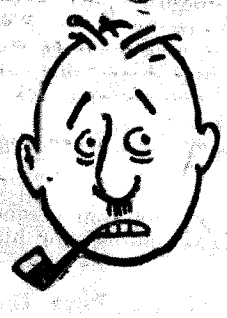
"The Army Officer," I said, nervously now as I came to the end of the list, trying not to sound like a person snatching at a straw. A uniform, at least, which had to be strictly according to regulations, could, by the very nature of the case, afford no loopholes.

Aunt was silent once again, but I failed to interpret the silence.

"Why should he have come in a Battle-dress," she rapped out at length, "if it wasn't that he couldn't afford a Barathea ? Plain as water, he has relatives to support and, very likely, sisters to marry. A husband with extra-marital liability is worse than one who has extra-marital affairs."

A wise spinster, saved from committing a life-long folly, I am now an ardent votary of my aunt's philosophy.

SRIPATI SAMANTO



By BONOPHUL

HE overcrowded train had hardly a breathing space inside any of its compartments. Passengers were practically huddling inside the Third-classes; Inter-classes were packed to suffocation; all the berths of the Second-class compartment were occupied. Only a First-class compartment was empty, except for a gentleman dressed in the European way occupying one of its seats.

The train halted at a station; it was about eight in the evening. Sripati Samanto shuttled from one end of the platform to the other in a futile attempt to manage even a foothold. Yet he was determined he would travel by that train in a sleeping state, and he had a ticket for the third class.

Everyone is not a Napoleon, and Sripati was not even a scratch of that great hero. He therefore could not make what was 'impossible' possible. Failing in his attempts for some minutes to mange even a grip on one of the handles, Sripati Samanto gave up the idea of travelling to Calcutta by that train with a sleeping accommodation. But he was badly in need of sleep that night, as he had not a wink of it during the past three days. Two days were fully spent in supervising the marriage ceremony of the grand-daughter of an intimate friend. And the third night was the hottest in the season. Replacing the dislodged eye-glasses properly Sripati Samanto suddenly shouted at the coolie—"Look, stop there!"

It was true that Sripati was not Napoleon, but he was the illustrious son of late Chhidam Samanto, the most venerable personality still remembered by the old as well as young of the locality.

He abruptly stopped there. Within a second he felt a spur to apply his practical common sense and intelligence. He walked up to the assistant station master talking to the guard of the train and solicited with some hesitation—"Really a problem, Sir, to travel by this train . . . . of course, if you kindly permit, Sir, I may occupy just a corner of that compartment", and he pointed to the Servants' compartment attached to the First Class.

At first the assistant station-master felt confused at the impertinent desire of a haggard-looking aged Indian, but later he felt pity for his utter ignorance, when he reminded him smilingly—"Well, my dear old man, you're mistaken, that's a First class compartment!"

Sripati however was not a fool who could not distinguish a First Class from other classes. He therefore begged more humbly—"Not that one Sir, I mean the smaller one adjacent to the First Class. There is neither cushion nor anything of the kind; if your honour be so kind....I mean, I'm a poor old man and physically unwell....upon God, Sir, I'd no sleep for the last three days....

The gentleman of the First Class Compartment was watching through the window and was enjoying the conversation; he had a burning pipe gripped between his teeth.

Sripati Samanto did not look at all smart, rather he was niggardly looking; a shabby short dhuti, bare body, a pair of slippers made by some local shoe-maker, a pair of spectacles with glasses cracked and set obliquely on a nickel-frame with only one hand and the other replaced by a piece of twine. His neck was slightly slanting at one side, eyes crimson and without lashes, a beardless face saturated with politeness, a wide bald and a normal tropical complexion. He carried a country-made Hukka in one hand.

"Well, ask that gentleman," the assistant station master pointed at the person in the First Class Compartment, "That compartment is meant for his servant. If he does not object, I've nothing to say—"

The gentleman in the First Class Compartment was a Bengalee by birth, though European in outfit. He however grunted with the stub of the tobacco-barrel chewed between his teeth—"No! that can't be. I can't allow that."

Sripati implored with clasped palms—"I'm also no better than your servant, Sir! If you kindly permit me, Sir . . . . . "

The highbrow passenger perhaps felt it beneath his dignity to prolong the discussion with an apparently rustic fellow and immediately withdrew himself from the window and switched the fan on to full speed.

The first bell rang. Once more Sripati helplessly looked at the third class compartments. Passengers swarmed just in a bee-hive even on the foot-boards. He hesitated for a moment, but instantly fixed up his mind.

"Please listen to me, Sir," he addressed the railway official, "I'm boarding this compartment. Kindly send the crew here, I shall pay him the fare," and immediately—"Come here, coolie, keep the luggage here beneath this bench. Yes, all right!"

"Look — stop there!"

he called his attendants to stow all the articles he was carrying inside the First Class Compartment. The articles of course included a few bundles of sal-leaves, a bundle of empty hessian bags, two big earthen jars of molasses, a large melon, a fish-knife, a fishing-line, two enormous baskets full of various packets and packages and a half-maund tin full of ghee. His attendants got down after settling his master and the articles securely inside the Compartment. The old Samanto then said to his personal attendant with a smile—"Well, Banchha, now you stay at the attached compartment and make another Hukka ready. Right!"

"All right, Babu," Banchha got down and slipped inside the servant's compartment. Meanwhile the train began to move.

Stripati Samanto then kissed his Hukka with a long breath, whiffed off a clot of cough through the window noisily and then observed as if addressing that Anglo-Bengalee gentleman—"Excuse me, Sir, I must require a sleep this night to keep my brain cool and active, because I'm to make a very brisk business transaction to-morrow morning."

In due time a T.T.I. with beard and moustache, appeared and asked for the fare. Sripati squatted on the bench with his back obtusely at the ticket-checker and took out a long cotton-purse from his waist. He then turned it upside down on the cushion of the bench, paid off his fare including charges for the articles and again kept it secured in its proper place together with the receipt. If anybody would have a chance at that time to count the contents of his purse, he could discover that it contained besides small coins and currency notes of small denomination a few bundles of currency notes amounting to ten thousand rupees.

"Your ticket please!" the ticket-checker turned to that First Class passenger.

"My ticket is in my suitcase, you may take my word for it," the gentleman replied.

The ticket-checker insisted—"I cannot punch your word; my duty is to punch tickets."

Ultimately it could be discovered that excepting a match-box, a tobacco-pipe and a cinema-weekly, that First Class passenger had nothing with him.

An altercation ensued. In a few minutes English turned its tail and the national language came to reinforce the guttural strength of the two oral fighters.

Sripati was drawn to a dozing which was abruptly shattered. He sat up erect.

What a damnable trouble! Would they not allow him an undisturbed sleep!

Sripati Samanto gaped his mouth in an enormous yawn. Suddenly he came to be alert at the ticket-checker remarking that he was quite familiar with the habits and manners of the Bengalee people, so . . . . . .

His hairless brows wrinkled in a frown. He again squatted on the cushioned bench and drew out his purse—"Well, Mr. Ticket Checker, there's no good arguing uselessly. Waste of energy! Better tell me what's the fare, I'm paying it off.

I must sleep this night at any cost. A few coins will make little difference."

Both the ticket-checker and the First Class passenger were dumb-founded. What an unexpected proposal!

Samanto Babu dispensed with the railway official and told that First Class passenger—"Are you not going to Calcutta, Sir? That's it. Please therefore return the money to my gaddi according to your convenience," and he gave him his address.

Thereafter he turned to the checker and remarked in distorted national language—"Listen, Sir, how many Bengalees have you actually come across? Let me ask you what sort of etiquette is ". . . how many Bengalees have you actually come across?"

this to call the whole race by name? Durga Sreehari . . . Durga Sreehari . . .

Sripati Samanto again lay flat on his bench.

I do not know whether that First Class passenger paid off his debt or not, but he did not dare to light his pipe during the rest of his journey.

THE EXPECTED MOMENT

By MANABENDRA PAUL

THE morning bus on the Kalna-Burdwan route pulled on leaving behind the railway level-crossing at Dhatrigram.

The road cuts straight through rich paddy fields. The young rice plants now bright green in the morning sun waves with gusts of north wind. There is a nip in the air.

The passengers feel it and looked about with lively eyes. They started very early from their villages either to attend the district court at the first hour, or to consult their pleaders, or see a doctor for some difficult case. The weather and the landscape cheer them up.

The decrepit bus proceeds wearily, bumping and jolting along the potholed road, at ten miles per hour. Not that it cannot run faster, but the passengers won't be happy with the jerkings. The costly nuts and bolts also may give way.

The bus leaves a storm of dust behind.

The conductor approaches the passengers for fares.

— How far do you go?

— Ainapara.

— Ten annas, please!

He counts the money and gives a ticket.

The man scrutinises the ticket with a frown of disbelief. He shows it to his neighbour and asks. — Is it all right?

The neighbour assures him with a smile. But his suspicion is not allayed. He asks — Is it ten annas?

The gentleman smiles again and says — Yes. it is in order

The passenger carefully wraps the ticket in his napkin.

The driver is a slim person with long back-brushed hair. He has tucked up his dhoti above the knees. While driving he frequently smokes a biri and blows the horn whenever a stray bullock cart is seen on the road. At the sudden shriek the bullocks get scared and wildly run towards the side ditches at a tremendous speed. The driver laughs heartily at the plight of the cartman.

Sometimes there is a timid goat or a Santhal boy on the road, very close by. The driver stops the car at once with an abrupt brake action. At the sudden jerk the passengers lose balance and tumble over one another. But they do not take it amiss. They are used to it. They rather praise the driver for his promptness which saves a life.

From Kuchut, the bus speeds up. They think that this is to make up for lost time. None can guess the reason for the sudden acceleration, and in this particular area. Only the conductor knows the cause. Near the next stoppage he smartly pulls the cord of the stopping bell, and cries aloud with some mystery in his voice — "Hatgobindpur, Hatgobindpur".

A happy smile sights up the driver's face.

The bus stops at the bend of the road near a pucca well. Waiting passengers hurriedly come forward with their small suitcases made of coloured tin, wearing half-dirty dhoties under new shirts still showing the maker's name-stamp. Others carry some documents under their armpits—litigants with grave anxious looks.

A teen-aged bride walks under a veil behind her young groom. She is going to her father-in-law's place probably for the second time after marriage, her frightened eyes full of tears. She looks at the bus and recognises it—it is the same vehicle that carried her back to her father's place only a few days ago, and now the same vehicle will snatch her away from her loving parents to some cruel fate of merciless trials.

The driver of "Aparupa", which is the name of bus No. 14, looks at the weeping bride, and is full of sympathy and pity.

Leaving Hatgobindpur the bus soon reaches another junction of the road where stands an old and broken temple of the deity known as Trilochan Shiva. The deity is absent, the temple is overgrown with snake infested bushes. A sturdy banyan tree has grown over the temple spreading its zigzag roots into all cracks and crevices winding round the temple.

The girl has come again with a lantern in her hand anxiously waiting for the bus.

Here the driver slows down and for no apparent reason starts hooting the horn repeatedly, although no cause of alarm is in sight. Of course there was a sad accident here long ago, when a drunken driver ran over a girl causing her instantaneous death. But that is no reason why a careful driver should become nervous and stop the car dead.

Yes, the bus has stopped here, although it is not a regular stoppage.

Ah, there! a girl is seen standing alone at the corner of the road. Her face is suddenly lit with joy, and with one bound she runs up to the footboard of the bus and straightway mounts the driver's seat, saying "Oh! my father, you have come, you have come !"

This was her expected moment, and now she has completely changed the atmosphere with her happy voice, chirping like a bird.

Some of the daily passengers are amused, they know this mid-journey secret of the father and daughter's meeting. But others get impatient due to the unnecessary delay. they begin to clamour.

But the driver is now deaf to all remonstrances, the girl has already climbed on to his lap, and is talking to him eagerly.

— Now, what have you brought for me father?

— Just get down from my lap and I will show you.

He brings out from under the seat cushion two oranges and some coloured lozenges and hands them over to her.

The girl begins to dance and clap in joy.

— But where is my pretty doll ?

— That will come to-morrow.

The girl now tries to pull him down, saying — Come home, once only for a second.

— No, no, that can't be. The bus will be very late.

— It is not for me, but for my mother, she asked you to come.

The driver does not reply. He calmly resumes his seat.

Without further request the girl gets down and stands on the road. She knows quite well that her father won't come, although their home is so near. Yet she can't help begging for it everytime she meets her father.

The driver starts the engine, the bus begins to move. He has still to go far, and is already somewhat late.

In the afternoon the bus comes back through the same route, now from Burdwan to Kalna

It stops again at the same place near the broken temple. But now it is dark. Jackals howl from a distance, and mosquitoes hum in the air. The girl has come again with a lantern in her hand, anxiously waiting for the bus. Though she has no watch to go by, she knows the exact time when the bus will return.

The bus stops as usual. The girl runs to her father. She says. —

— Now you must get down. Mother had made some Dalpuri for you.

The driver fondles the girl with tender caresses, and patting her on the back, says, — Now go back, it is getting dark.

The engine starts. With tearful eyes the girl holds on to the handle of the door and asks piteously—Just wait a moment.

From under her frock she brings out an aluminium casket and handing it to him says—Here, mother has sent Dalpuri for you.

The driver takes the casket from her hand and looks rather wistfully towards a small hut that is their own home. Only a little distance apart by the side of the road, on the other edge of the small

MURDER OF CHHABI

By TUSHAR KANTI GHOSH, W. B. C. S.

IT is exactly eleven months from today that I came away from you all. This is the last letter that you will get from me. No, no, I am not leaving this world for good—I am leaving this sordid place and soon I shall join Santu and you once again. Coming away to this distant land, I thought I would earn some money and along with that, spend some months incognito. Money I have made to some extent, but the supposed happiness of living incognito has vanished completely. Now I am thinking, it would be more tolerable to live with you, in spite of my poor earnings there and your consequent discontentment.

This letter will be a bit lengthy because you will find elements of a short novel or a story in it. Oh, no, in this stage of my life I do not look for any new romance. Some thrilling incidents have occurred here which I have encountered in the course of my service. I shall try to give you in outline a picture of those happenings.

Away from human habitation, in the middle of a forest is a leprosy home where I am working as a doctor. I did not tell you of that earlier, intentionally. The salary is lucrative and the quarters a pretty one, overlooking a small, blue hill. I have done a bit of gardening, and set up a poultry. In the beginning, while puffing my cigarette on the corridor with red tile-shed, I thought I had no further needs — I forgot all of you, even Santu. The patients would disperse by 11 o'clock and from then on I had perfect liberty. From that sense of perfect freedom I got a desire—to do some work for those poor lepers. What work? — To provide them in such a manner that they could earn their living. Our leprosy home only supplies medicines and similar benefits to them. With my own eyes I saw their misery. Some used to go to beg, others starved. They stayed in their small huts about half-a mile away from our home. The subdivisional town was eight miles away. From there officers would come once in a month and distribute money and wheat by way of relief. I thought there was some scope for arranging better living for them—particularly those lepers who had become negative. The name of the doctor in charge was Mr. Hart. You will hear more of him later on. He was a bachelor and would not mix with anybody cordially, not even with me. I then thought he had some mental agonies. I was thinking whether I should chalk out a plan to rehabilitate the lepers, when things took a sudden unexpected turn.....

At about midnight one day, I was relaxing on the easy chair in my room and going through a journal when I heard an excited voice outside my room, I got up and said, "Come in." A young man of twentythree or twentyfour came hurriedly in. He wore rayon trousers; on his body there was no shirt but there was only a torn vest; his hair was dishevelled; on his wrist there was no watch, a few scratch marks were seen on his arms. A number of explanations flashed in my mind. On seeing me he said, "You are a doctor? Save me please, please." He narrated the entire episode to me. I gave him an anti-virus lotion and a strong soap and sent him to the bathroom, asking him to have a thorough wash. I gave him my dhoti and punjabi. When he returned from the bath, I gave him some pills. I went to give him an injection but he politely refused to take one in the night, saying he was too much allergic to injection.

It did not miss my eyes that he did not swallow the pills but only feigned having taken the same and gulped in some water. I also did not understand why he was looking at my things. However, I did not attach any importance to that. Keeping him seated in my drawing room I went to the kitchen and lit the stove. I prepared two cups of coffee and when I brought the same to the drawing room I saw him looking into my drawer. On seeing me he placed a newspaper on my drawer as if he was reading the newspaper. I thought due to nervousness the gentleman was behaving in that restless way. After drinking the coffee he seemed to warm up. He gave me further details. He had a big amount of money with him—but everything had been taken away—including his terylene shirt and watch. I told him to come with me and point out the house he was taken in. He went with me and the house which he pointed out was quite known to me. I was wondering how Chhabi could do such thing. Hardly a girl of 19 or 20, she had by her behaviour commanded my respect. Her brother was a leper and in that connection I knew her. They lived in thousand miseries, there were many inmates in their house—but amidst all this shone her youth like a blooming rose. I could never imagine that this youth was her source of income. She had gone to the town and had the young gentleman accompany her to her house and the gentleman had discovered at a much later stage that there was stinking leprosy in her body. He was not so much worried about the loss of his property as about the possible contact of the disease; and he confessed that he had a loving, charming wife at home. I suggested the police be immediately informed; but he shudderred at the idea, lest it should make everything known to his wife. I then went straight into the house. On seeing me at that late hour, Chhabi seemed to have understood the purpose of my visit. She fell at my feet. The money was returned along with the shirt and the watch. I handed over the same to the gentleman, who at once stole away in the dark, saying that he would later return my dhoti and punjabi.

Next morning I reported the matter to Hart. Immediately he took out his motor cycle and started for the town to return in an hour along with the Subdivisional Officer. We held a conference. It was felt that due to poverty, some of them were led to that extreme path. The S.D.O. said he would arrange monthly payment of cash and wheat to each of them if they gave up begging and that evil trade. Hart said he would start a large poultry with them and they would each get wages. On that very day an association was formed, consisting of about fifty women. I was given charge of management. Wheat poured in from Sadar. The association went ahead with its work smoothly. I was also feeling satisfaction at the work.

But the trouble came from another direction. It was about a fortnight afterwards. The time was about midnight. All of a sudden I heard sharp whistle notes and saw torch light dashes in the leper colony. There were a police van and some motor cycles. There was no doubt that the police were raiding the place. After a while a police officer came to me and requested me to help them in their search. I went there. All the huts were surrounded and on search a huge quantity of illicit liquor was recovered. Those who were arrested could not

I prepared two cups of coffee and when I brought the same to the drawing room I saw him looking into my drawers.

Tantric Elements IN BENGALI DURGA PUJA

HE Durga Puja is today, and has probably been always, observed by the Bengalis as a national festival centring round the worship of the Goddess Durga. Whatever may be the ancient and classical origin of this worship—the untimely invocation of the Mother by Sri Ramchandra on the eve of the war with Ravana or the autumnal worship of the Mother by King Surath on the restoration of his lost kingdom—the Durga Puja as an annual celebration in Bengal is not older than 1581 when Raja Kangsa Narayan of Tahirpur performed this worship for the first time under the guidance of the famous Tantrik Ramesh Saraswati of Burdwan. A century and a half later, Maharaja Krishnachandra of Nadia lent added prestige to this worship when he organised it about the mid-eighteenth century on an extended scale. Since then the vogue has gained ground of every Bengali family of means performing the worship with all the trappings of a local community festival. Over the last quarter of a century even the worship is being organised on a local community basis—a fact which accounts for the Durga Puja having developed into a more vigorous national institution than before, even though during this period other religious worship of Bengali Hindus has progressively decayed.

There is a good deal of popular misunderstanding not only about the historicity of this worship but also in other respects. There is a facile impression that the Durga Puja is a Tantrik worship derived from the Chandi in the third episode of which the Goddess Ambica assured the prayerfully assembled Gods that someday She would appear on the earthly scene as Durga. The Durga Puja is no doubt a Tantric worship, as in fact all ritualistic worship of Gods and Goddesses is. But basically, it is more Pauranic than Tantrik. The Goddess in Chandi, the Tantric source of the Durga cult, is the Supreme Mother. She is Mahamaya, the manifested Reality of the Absolute. She is all; but She has no husband, no sons, no daughter. But the demon-killing Mother (the same demon whom She killed in the second episode of Chandi) as we have in our annual festival is the centre of a family. Tradition in fact regards Her as the married daughter of Himalaya and Menaka being on an annual visit to her parents' home along with her husband and children. The whole drama is Pauranic and has little to do with her Chandi role making her appearance on earth "for the purpose of fulfilling the task for the Gods." Ramesh Saraswati, it seems, in introducing the worship in 1581, deliberately toned down the Tantrik significance of the Mother in order to make her worship or popular one, tuned to the emotional key of the average man and woman of Bengal. It is noteworthy here that the great Tantrik Krishnananda Agambagis of Navadwip about half-a-century before the first Durga Puja in Bengal performed by Raja Kangsa Narayan composed his famous book "Tantrasar". But there the pride of place is given to the worship of Mother Kali. In spite of much attenuation in her worship, it is Kali who is the more basic Tantric diety and not Durga.

THE SHAKTI THEORY

There is a second popular impression that the Durga Puja of the Bengalees is par excellence the worship of Shakti. This is so much magnified a view as not to be correct. All Vedic and Tantrik conceptions of Gods and Goddesses are that they are consciousness-facets of the Supreme, and Tantra having identified consciousness with force all Tantric worship is nothing but the worship of Shakti. The Durga Puja has no singular distinction in this respect. What has specially influenced such an interpretation of Durga Puja is the custom of Bali or sacrifice associated with it. Bali, it is thought, symbolises self-sacrifice vicariously made. The late Swami Saradananda of the Ramakrishna Mission in his book Shakti Worship in India while fully identifying all Tantric worship with the worship of Shakti has emphasised that abstinence and self-sacrifice are the key-stone of an effective invocation of Shakti by a worshipper. This I venture to believe, is Vedantising all Tantric worship and in effect, suggesting that the worship of Shakta Gods cannot be efficaciously offered by an average householder with his propensity for enjoyment and self-fulfilment. Such a view is hardly correct. For, it is the essence of Tantric worship that it is legitimate for a man to crave egoistically—"Give me beauty, give me victory, give me reputation, give me mastery over the enemies"—so long as he recognises all these as flowing from the gift of Gods. Abstinence and abnegation follows from the effect of worship and are not a condition of it, as Swamiji inclines to think. Or in other words, the worship of Shakti is not the exclusive privilege of an ascetic. As already stated, much of the popular misunderstanding about Tantric Puja stems from the institution of Bali or goat-sacrifice. It is not an act of violence or a matter of sentimental ethicism. Like Tagore's Raghupati in his melodrama Bisarjan, the Tantrik believes that "each particle of dust of the earth is studded with elements of destruction." Spiritually, every raise their heads; but I could very well recognise them. In one corner I found a girl. After carefully looking at her I found she was Chhabi ! Incorrigible were they, I thought. Suddenly I found that gentleman there who had come to my house at midnight after being robbed of his money and other things by Chhabi and her party. I could not understand why he came there at that late hour of the night . On seeing me he respectfully came to me and handed over a packet to me, saying he had come to return my punjabi and dhoti. He thanked me and went away suddenly as he came. I finished signing the seizure lists.

After carefully looking at her I found she was Chhabi !!

Thereafter some cases were started. Some were gaoled, others were fined. But Chhabi was never found after that night. Nobody could say where she was.

Perhaps you are feeling bored at my long narrative. It is not my intention to parade the good work done by us. The object of this letter was made known to you at the beginning. I am sending you the materials of a novel—of course very briefly.

The real mystery was clear to me about a month later, and after that I also tendered my resignation. Listen. I have already told you about Mr. Hurt, the person who runs this leprosy home. The finance comes from outside and it is Hart who is the sole local authority. Everybody used to have great regard for him as a man. But why did he murder Chhabi all on a sudden ? I have already told you that since the liquor case, Chhabi had been untraced. The span of this letter, like that of our life, is small. I am, therefore, telling you everything in brief, giving you the bare facts only, like a journalist. Intentionally I wanted to keep back certain facts from you, to sustain your curiosity and produce an effect of slight suspense, but my plain-speaking pen is completely devoid of any diplomacy and is disclosing every bit of information. The pleasant thing is this—since my pen cannot weave the yarn of unreality and imagination my story ends in a short time.

Hart had a large-scale business of of illicit distilation elsewhere. He not only befooled us, but also his financier. He failed to mislead only two persons; one was deceased Chhabi, the other was —I shall not tell his name now. The vast money received for the Leprosy Home went to Hart's personnel account. Only a portion was spent for the institution. Besides, he amassed a large fortune through illicit distillation. He had several associates who acted on his behalf. The machinery was so perfect that one could ever sense anything wrong with him. Paced in tin cannisters, and under the label of milk-powder, huge quantity of illicit liquor was despatched to the city. Large quantities of Government wheat for relief were used for illicit distillation. All this would remain unknown for ever—unless that girl with uncommon intelligence Chhabi—saw through the game. And for that reason Chhabi had to lose her life.

There was nobody to shed tears for Chhabi—hence none noticed her sudden disappearance. Only one man with sharp intellect noticed this. Could that villain. Hart, be unmasked but for his intellect? Could the world know the facts of Chhabi's disappearance but for him? Hart is now in prison, either death of life imprisonment is awaiting him. Part of Chhabi's limbs were recovered from near Hart's bed room; other parts were concealed beneath earth at distant intervals. The entire body was reconstructed. That clever man found these out like a deft magician. Various deeds and letters were discovered by him. He thoroughly scanned Hart's bank accounts and discovered his fabulous treasure. He sent information to the police station concerned. A gang of men with the leaders was caught there red-handed. Now the final curtain is being drawn over all this. Now a very lengthy chapter is being finished—for that reason I am not getting release soon. The management wrote to me requesting me to remain in charge till the final accounts were audited and the balance struck, and till the troubles of the police-investigation and lawyers were over. I wrote back to them to accept my resignation and release me soon. They have accepted my resignation—and for my 'immense service'—of which I myself am not aware—they enclosed a cheque for a handsome amount for me. For the scandals, the Leprosy Home was ordered to be shifted to the city. One officer will be arriving early next month. I have decided to close my bivouac here after making over charge to him and I shall return to Santu and to you thereafter. It is no use avoiding you all. I have understood this with tears. Excuse me for my peculiar and cruel sojourn over here. Tell Santu that his daddy is soon coming

And

VISHNUPUR GHARANA

By BIRENDRA KISHORE ROY CHOWDHURY

THE last glorious episode of the music of Delhi Darbar was over with the end of the memorable career of the Emperor Mahammad Shah and with the sabotage by the Persian invaders under Nadir Shah. The court of Delhi lost its fabulous treasures after the middle of the 18th century. The representatives of Hindusthani music adorning the Darbar left Delhi one by one to seek fortune in other semi-independent States. The descendants of Tansen divided themselves into two groups, the western and the eastern. The musicians of the western group belonged to the lines of Surat Sen and Sarat Sen, both being Tansen's sons. The eastern group consisted of the descendants of Tansen's youngest son, Bilash Khan surnamed Tan Taranga Khan and the descendants of Misri Singh Vunkar, the son-in-law of Tansen.

The western group made their home under the ruler of Jaipur and flourished in different States of Rajasthan as singers of Dhrupad and exponents of the Masidkhani style of sitar. There were also renowned Veena players within this group. The eastern group settled at Varanasi as the Raja gave them enough land and house property to stay there. Nirmul Shah represented the Veena Gharana of the line of Misri Singh. The musicians of the line of Vilash Khan excelled in the vocal music of Dhrupad and the instrumental music in Rabab and Surasringar.

Three famous brothers Jaffar Khan, Pyar Khan, and Basat Khan were the founders of the Rababi School and spent most of their time at Varanasi and Lucknow. Bahadur Khan and Haider Khan, their cousins, made their mark in the style of Dhrupad singing. Haider Khan adorned the court of Betia and had many disciples among the Kathaks or the priests of the Betia Raja, who subsequently formed Betia Gharana. Bahadur Khan on the other hand, was invited direct from Delhi by the ruler of Vishnupur of Bengal and stayed there for ten years before his departure for Mecca to spend his last days there.

The second Raghu Nath Singh, the then ruler of Vishnupur, not only posted Bahadur Khan as the head of his music darbar, but also engaged some other outstanding musicians there including Pir Bux, the Mridanga player, and some exponents of Kheyal and Tappa. It was his intention to form an ideal centre of music at Vishnupur and train up young scholars of music. As Bahadur Khan was a liberal-minded musician and had no son to inherit his treasures of musical knowledge, he had no hesitation to fulfil the request of the Raja to train up young musicians.

Among his disciples, the most noteworthy were Gadadhar Chakrabarty and Ramshankar Bhattacharjee. As Ramshankar was the younger of the two, he continued his studies from Gadadhar, after the departure of Bahadur Khan. After Gadadhar's death, he visited some other music centres in Northern India including Benares, Agra and Gwalior. He collected more than two thousand songs, mostly Dhrupads, but also Kheyals and Tappas.

Besides Bahadur Khan, he had a few other Gurus also notably a Sadhu of Brindaban, who came to Vishnupur on his pilgrimage to Puri. It may be said with certainty that Ramshankar was the founder of the Vishnupur Gharana. He enjoyed a long life and after finishing his musical studies trained up a band of high-class musicians at Vishnupur. Among these musicians, three names are outstanding, (1) Khetramohan Goswami, famous for propagating "Danda MATRIK notation system", a lifelong colleague of Raja Sourindramohan Tagore, a scholar and writer of a valuable treatise on music in Bengali. (2) Jadu Bhatta,—a great vocalist of unequalled melodiousness of voice, a high-class composer of Hindi songs, a rare genius who won laurels and titles from various music darbars and ever remembered as inspirer in music of Gurudev Rabindranath. (3) Sangeet Keshari Ananta Lall Banerjee,—the head of the music court of the Vishnupur Raj after the death of Ramshankar, a high-class Sanskrit scholar, music scholar of great reputation, a composer of Hindi and Bengali classical music and a great devotee.

Sangeet Nayak Gopeswar Banerjee was the second son of Sangeet Keshari Anantalall. The eldest son was the late Ramprasanna Banerjee, the famuos Surbahar player and a writer of the very valuable treatise "Sangit Manjari". The youngest son Sangeetacharyya Shree Surendra Nath Banerjee is still living among us together with his elder brothers and has contributed immensely in the building up of music traditions (classical) in Bengal, besides his superb demonstration in Surbahar and vcoal music. Anantalall should always be remembered as the chief custodian of the Vishnupur Gharana, as he gave up all ambitions of life for the preservation of Ramshankar's musical treasures at Vishnupur and to keep the traditions of classical music alive there in spite of the gradual decadence of the Vishnupur darbar for financial difficulties. He not only built up the musical career of his own sons by the gifts of his theoretical and practical knowledge, but also was responsible for the flowering of the musical genius of the late Radhika Goswami as his most favourite disciple.

When we speak of the Vishnupur Gharana of music we naturally mean the musical teachings connected and preserved and propagated by Sangeet Keshari, Anantalall Banerjee. Both Jadu Bhatta and Radhika Goswami increased their musical knowledge by thier lessons from other Gharanas like those of Gawalior, Benaras and Betia. But Anantalall's knowledge was typical of the Vishnupur Gharana. He never left Vishnupur to seek knowldege, money or fame from other sources. Some people say that the music of Vishnupur was simple in character. But this assertion is made without thorough enquiry. It is true that Anantalall based his music on the Sudha Bani style of Dhrupad characterised by simplicity and purity but Gurudev Rabindranath himself was an ardent admirer of this style of classical music and had no liking for over-ornamentation or exaggerations of TANAS, GAMAKAS etc. Nobody can deny the fact that the great Tagore had atleast a superior aesthetic sense of melodies and notes to that of average musicians, who condemn the Vishnupur style. It should also be remembered that the immortal Tansen himself was an exponent of the Suddha Bani which has all embellishments required to make the representations of Ragas in a most melodious manner. By careful study of the style of Anantalall we will find plenty of instances of the uses of Meed, Gamak, Chhut and other Alankaras.

Dr. Gopeswar Banerjee with his elder brother spent his early years in thorough study of the theoretical and practical classical music from Anantalall. Both had natural gifts of extraordinary melodious voice and intelligence to grasp and demonstrate the teachings of their father. They also had natural aptitude for skilful display on the Sitar. Thus they had not only accumulated and absorbed the teachings of their father in the vocal music but also advanced a lot in the displays of Sitar. After the end of their studies they started to frequent Calcutta to see Kheshtra Mohan Goswami in the court of Maharaja Jyotindra Mohan Tagore. Under the patronage of the Maharaja they were initiated by Sayeed (Sajjad) Mahamed Khan, the great Surbahar player. Both of them attained mastery in Surbahar in a short period of coaching.

At that period the famous Kathak brothers of Betia, Sibnarayanji and Guruprosadji distinguished themselves in Dhrupad and Kheyal respectively at Benaras. They used to be invited by the Maharaja Tagore off and on to visit Calcutta. At the instance of the Maharaja, they gave valuable collections of Dhrupads and Kheyals to be notated by Raja Sourindra Mohan. Radhika Goswami and Gopeswar Banerjee both got valuable lessons from them. After the death of Anantalall, Goswamiji was retained by Maharaja Tagore and Cossimbazar Raj. Ramprasanna Banerjee settled himself in the darbar of Raja of Narazol. He was the author of a very valuable book of practical music "Sangeet Manjari" which contained collections from Bahadur Khan and Sibnarayanji. Many noteworthy compositions of Dhrupad and Kheyal are found in this script. However, with all his knowledge of Dhrupad and vocal music, Ramprasanna shone mostly in Surbahar and acquired name and fame even in the darbars of western India including Gowalior. Following the syle of Sajad Mahammad both Ramprosanna and Gopeswar reproduced Alap and Tar-Paran of the Veena in Surbahar. They also played on Sitar exremely well.

But Gopeswarbabu gradually bestowed more concentration on the vocal music, specially on the Dhrupad. He joined the Darbar of the Maharaja of Burdwan and received the title of "Sangeet Nayak". Having been stationed there, Gopeswar Babu was not only content with his superb demonstrations of vocal Alap, Dhrupads and other types of classical songs, but also embarked on a new mission to propagate classical music throughout the country by the publication of songs and Tanas with notations, and also to train up young artistes in the purest style of music. He continued to publish notations in the music magazines like "Sangeet Prokashika" and "Ananda Sangeet Patrika", and also published some important music scripts including the famous "Sangit Chandrika". Simultaneously he started giving private lessons on music (both vocal and instrumental) to the girls and boys of cultured and aristocratic society of Bengal. Thus he did yeoman's service to the cause of classical music by spreading it among the members of the educated community.

During the first World War, he permanently settled in Calcuttta as the principal of "Sangit Sangha", founded by the late Justice Asutosh Chowdhury and Lady Chowdhury. This institution represented classical and high-class Bengali music in Bengal and was guided by the principles of music advocated by Gurudev Rabindranath. Gopeswar Babu continued to propagate classical music through the memorable institution and other musical circles in Calcutta, besides giving training in music not only to the members of his own family but also to many of the aristocratic families residing in Calcutta. After the death of Lady Chowdhury, "Sangit-Sammilanee" followed the examples of "Sangit Sangha" under the guidance of Indira Debi, the niece of Rabindranath. Surendranath, the younger brother of Gopeswar Babu became its first principal. Gopeswar Babu looked after all these institutions and conducted many music competitions to encourage young artists to shine in music. Before the outbreak of the second World War, he was regarded as the most venerable leader of music in Bengal and Rabindranath demonstrated his sincere appreciation for Gopeswar Babu as he gave him the title "Geet-Saraswati". Earlier, Gopeswar Babu distinguished himself in the All-India music conferences organised by Pandit Vatkhandeji at Lucknow and Benaras and was received with high respect in the Darbar of Alwar, where the immortal Dhrupadiya Alabonde Khan highly praised Gopeswar Babu's music. He also gave superb demonstrations of Alap and Dhrupad in many music conferences in Calcutta.

During the second World War, Calcutta's cultural life was upset by a general fear of aerial bombing as many aristocratic people left the city and the music schools were closed down. From this stage both Gopeswar Babu and Surendranath left their permanent residence in Calcutta and re-settled themselves in Vishnupur, Bankura. Gopeswar Babu founded there a music college to perpetuate the memory of his elder brother, Ramprasanna Banerjee. As the principal of Ramprasanna college of music, Gopeswar Babu spent the last part of his life in his own home. But his zeal for practising and teaching music was retained up to the last breath of his life. After independence of India he received high honours from the Union and State Government. He was invited by the A.I.R. to give demonstrations of the Dhrupads of his Gharana in company with his illustrious son, Shree Ramesh Chandra Banerjee, Sangeet Ratnakar, Head of the Department of music. Rabindra Bharati University. Gopeswar Banerjee was honoured by the Visva-Bharati University with the title "Deshi-Kottam" which means Doctorate and lastly he was nominated by the Central Sangeet-Natak-Akadami as a Fellow of the Akadami.

He passed away at the age of 83 with the highest glory of his career survived by his younger brother, Sri Surendranath, his son Ramesh Chandra Banerjee and his disciple and nephew, Shree Satya Kinkar Banerjee to keep the high light of the Vishnupur Gharana of music intact and to propagate the teachings of this Gharana to the young aspirants of music in and outside Bengal.

I would request you to give this effort the solemn reception it deserves and not to treat it with levity. There will be no "joke," no "wit or humour" intended in this article. This caution is necessary. There are, alas, still some innocents at large who have a notion that the "patter" columns are supposed to be "humorous" columns. I am glad to note that there is a much larger number who differ vehemently. Sensible men.

The warning is specially necessary because I am going to talk on the subject of "wives." Only a bachelor can try being funny about wives, — not knowing what they are talking about. Well, I am not a bachelor, and, I am assuming,—neither are you.

Day before yesterday, August 19, at an Anglican Congress held in Toronto, African Bishop, Rev. S. O. Odutola, put up an impassioned case in support of polygamy as practised by his non-Christian countrymen. He said: "When missionaries speak of 'one man, one woman' to us, well, we say, you are not all that good to preach it. We have honest polygamy. The African practice of having three or even more wives is more honest than the Western practice of taking one wife, divorcing her, taking another and so on."

Well, all this is nothing new to me for I said that,—publicly,—thirty years ago, and the Bishop's homily is only a variation on the same theme. What has happened since has only lent more power to my thesis. The Profumo case is the latest of these happenings. In fact, the Bishop admitted that it was that affaire which spurred him on to speak as he did.

Come now. Let us get down to cases. We had polygamy once. Why did it stop? Why should it? I ask that because I believe seriously that it was a mistake. I believe strongly that polygamy in certain cases is not only a necessity,—but a blessing. And I believe fervently that a revival of that ancient system will purge this country of most of its social disorder and help in leading it back to its one-time eminence,—what you call "her pristine glory."

Sorry! Now, note. I said specifically that it was good "in certain cases" and I would like you to remember that distinction in your examination of the case. It cannot and should not be a universal, or even a general practice.

For, I am quite aware of menages where two hearts beat as one,—in Love,—and the intrusion of a third into that Eden can only mean another "Fall." I am also painfully alive to cases where two hearts beat as one,—in Fear,—of the wolf at the door and an extra stomach to fill,—pardon the language,—can only mean destitution. I am certainly not recommending polygamy in such cases.

But,—when you go further into the question, you will see that for every ten such cases, there is always one exceptional instance where such conditions do not obtain. In such a case, polygamy, — I submit,—is definitely indicated. I shall come to the merits of the medicine later. Let me dispose of the objections first.

The leading theology-cum-sentimental argument is that marriages are "made in heaven" and two hearts made one should never permit the butting-in of a third. Right. But how about the "butting-in" when one of the hearts has parted company and gone somewhere from where no wife returns? You can marry them one after the other. Why not several at the same time?

Then it is said that it is nothing short of imbecility to ask for more trouble,—reading "trouble" for wife. "It is all one can do to keep one's end up with one of the species. It is sheer madness to talk of it in the 'plural'." I agree that my recipe will be too "hot" for folks who talk so. For, I am talking of men, not worms.

Incidentally, however, I have to point out that that argument may not work even in the existing order. One solitary wife can give as big and blazing an Inferno to his "man" as three other wives may not. It is all a question of your individual "guts,"—of the punch you can pack in your "mitts." You know what I mean. If you are a worm crawling on two legs,—well, well, I'll say no more.

But look at Ramamurthi,—any Ramamurthi, any of those musclemen. I understand, gold and silver form regular courses in their breakfasts. It does them good, I am told. Now, can you include the metals in your morning bite,—even Morarji permitting? No, you can't. They are "for Princes and Rich men only." Exactly.

That was exactly what I meant. For every ten, —or even hundred,—of "Mrs. Caudles", — or shall we say, "Mrs. Soshi's" husbands,—I can show you one of these "princes and rich men" who appear to have been born for a plurality in wives. Physically, financially, psychologically,—I say, morally,—it would be, in a well-ordered society, their sheer duty to have more than one wife.

I urge with all the solemnity I can command that it is a sin not to propagate polygamy among such giants. It is a duty which they owe to themselves,—and to society. It is the duty of the society to see that there is no waste of such rich material. And it is for the giant to see that he does not miss the happiness which is his due,—as a married man.

To the Mussolinis of marriage, the prospect of "risk" is not alarming but only stimulating. Whereas, the nightmare of two of them pulling at one husband would frighten minnows like you and me, it may provide more "fun" of the fight to the Triton. More, he can, if he is a good player, set one against the other, and have his mid-day siesta when his weaker brothers are sitting up.

Personally, however, I would suggest not two but three of them. You know why? Two against each other can only provide respite. But the third can,—in the meantime,—I say, in the meantime,—provide comfort,—what they call in the novels,—"consolation." On the terrace or the Lake side,—as exigencies permit.

The secret is DISCIPLINE. That is the only word for it. I concede freely that with the milk-and-water kind of life which the average man lives, a second wife is unthinkable. There is no Form no Law, no Order,—in a word, no discipline in an ordinary household. And there is, therefore, no room in it for a second wife. And I would never suggest it.

But think of the "rich men and princes," of the "Profumos" and "Wards" of Society. The Bishop was thinking of them when he spoke. Were our Kings and Maharajahs particularly unhappy in the "good old times",? History does not say so. Nor does Mythology. Today,—on the other hand,—would it not be a solution of the too-many-daughters problem, too? Think all that over.

* * * *

By the way, perhaps, you are wondering why I dubbed this article "Spice." I will tell you. Look. When you have too many "mouse," you call the lot "mice." And when you have too many "louse,"—hypothetically, I mean,—you call them "lice." But when you have got,—or manage to get after reading this article,—too many "spouse,"—you call them "spouses." But why? Why not "spice"? Think that over, too.

pool where a curved and crooked date tree is drooping down its thorny head, a room of the hut under its tiled roof is plainly visible. Its two small windows are wide open even at this hour. All the terrible jungle mosquitoes must be entering through them,—won't they sting on the bare skin of his newborn child !

But through those open windows are seen a tiny flicker of a small hurricane lantern from amongst the surrounding darkness—that light which is reflecting on the surface of the pool in shiny sparkles —and all this seem like consolation to the tired and hungry man.

The girl has gone back by this time. Monorama, her youthful mother looked at her with questioning eyes, but could not ask anything lest the mother-in-law should overhear, and that would be shamelessness on her part. So she keeps silent.

But the mother-in-law asks — What did your father say ?

The girl replies — No, he won't come.

Yes, Monorama knows it very well, he won't come and can't come even if he wants to.

Yet it hurts her with a pang, she feels the twitching of the heart as none else can feel.

She counts her days. Although her loving husband passes by the door twice daily, yet he cannot cross the threshold even for once, as it may lead to serious consequences. Monorama understands it very well.

What can the poor fellow do! His passenger-carrying service has much responsibility and leave is very scarce, only for a day in a month.

Still she thinks herself lucky, she can see him daily at the expected moment, although from a distance. Their eyes do not meet, but her silent and eager eyes peeping through the windows can see him in a flash, and she is consoled. (Translated from Bengali by P. Bhattacharya).

back. Has he grown up by this one year? How is your teaching in the college going on ?

Let me satisfy your curiosity before I finish. My pen is—I have already told you — extremely frank in nature. Do you know who was that man with sharp intellect ? He is that stranger, who came to my room at midnight—that gentleman of twenty three or twenty four—with the rayon trousers and vest on. He is the best detective Inspector of the State. Chhabi was his informer. He was not really robbed of by Chhabi and her associates that night—he came to test me in collusion with Chhabi and also to search my room, to verify whether I was an associate of Hart or not. Hats off to that intelligent girl Chhabi, and to that wonderful detective.

Durga Puja of Santals

By

CHARULAL MUKHERJEE

WHEN one considers the multitude of spirit-deities, the Santals have in their pantheon, the inquisitive student of their religion finds himself in a bog.

The early Census reports of the British times cut the Gordian knot by describing the religious beliefs of the Santals and other Prto-Australoids as "Animism." Risley in his People of India said, when a Santal thinks of a tiger-spirit (Baghut Bonga), he does so from the "vague dread of a mysterious tiger-power or tiger-demon, the essence and archetype of all tigers, whose vengeance no man . . . . could hope to escape." (P. 225). But when the anthropologist goes deeper, does he not find that the concept of an abstract power, in itself independent of a material vehicle, is very difficult for the aboriginal mind ?

To the Santal, "Thakur Jiu" (Supreme deity) is a real entity and the name connotes a moral order of things. Emotion and thrill play a conspicuous part in Santal religious practices. So perhaps, the Census authorities of our time have dropped the term "Animism" in describing their religion and Sarat Chandra Roy, the doyen of Indian anthropological thought, characterised it as "Spiritism" in describing the religion of the Kharias, a Munda tribe like the Santals.

BELIEF

On the other hand, during our investigations at the Santal Parganas and Mayurbhanj, the Santals were heard publicly declaring, "Sri Ram Chandra used bows and arrows as we do. Sri Krishna played on the flute like us and tended cattle which is our avocation. Why are we not Hindus? We are." One witnessing the Santal Sohrae festival (The December Harvest Home) can hear such songs sung on the "Gohal Puja" nocturnal vigil:

Gaini colilo Siribrinda bone ho,
Mahisini earae ganga para jo yo re,
Mahisini carae ganga para jo.

In another song on this occasion reference is made to "Kanu Gowala" who used to feed cows in the east. Kanu is asked: "Where have you lost your flute?"

He replies:

Batehin heralon
Danda ka basi ho;
Gotehin heralio
Gaia jo

It means that he lost his flute in yonder field; he lost his cattle in yonder pasture.

The use of the words "Bat," "Got", "Kanu Gowala" and his "basi" carries its own tale of the idyllic life of Sri Krishna at a Santali "Siri Brindaban."

The Santals have their own Charak festival (Pata), they worship the goodess Kali and their folk-songs are replete with references to Hindu religious culture.

PUJAS

We knew so far. But a shock of mild surprise lay in store for us when we heard that they have their own Durga Puja festival, in the Dumka subdivision of the Santal Parganas.

Just as a will has a codicil, the festival at Dumka, Santal Parganas, has an appendix viz. the Santal melas at their own Durga Puja. The immersion ceremonies take place at different dates in the Dumka sub-division and huge Santal rallies congregate at Mahulbani, Pipra and Barahat. Mahulbani is 10 miles from Dumka on the Deoghar road. From its etymological meaning one might expect a forest of Mohua (Bassia latifolia) trees. But we saw one at a distance bearing company with a few date-palms to break, I should say, "the silence of the seas"—the far-off that lured Tagore. A few telegraph posts were the only signs of civilization.

We reached there by our car at 3-30 p.m. on the 24th October 1950, as my log shows. Pipra is about seven miles from Dumka. We visited the fair (the next year) being held on a rocky upland shaded by a few trees with intervening shrubs and bushes.

IMAGE

I vividly recall the image of Durga, crudely fashioned after the prevalent Hindu model, I saw at Mahulbani, standing on a pedestal in a straw-hut in the low land below. The evidence confirmed the information that the puja was organised by the Santal sardars with the subscription raised from the tribe. A special Santal priest worshipped the deity. The immersion, postponed till the full-moon of October, is according to the calendar of the area varied to enable the Santal masses to take part in the festivities.

The goddess Durga at Pipra was also worshipped in a thatched cottage specially made for the purpose. There was Lakshmi, Saraswati, Kartick and Ganesh to complete the picture. We wanted to have a peep at the deity. But it was impossible. Huge crowds of Santal men and women in mute adoration had queued up near the image; and to elbow through the bevy of belle proved a task indeed! And we dropped the idea like a hot potato, although, with the help of a Santal chowkidar, my daughter Esha, had a glimpse of the holy mother Durga.

But herein (both at Mahulbani and Pipra) hangs a tale. Durga Puja is a purely Hindu institution and although for centuries, the Santals have been joining these festivals, the idea is common that it is merely a tribal urge on a festive occasion.

Enquiries revealed at Mahulbani and confirmed later at Pipra that this was a puja of the Santals, by the Santals and for the Santals. The money for the image and the rituals was subscribed by the tribe; the worship was performed, not by a Brahmin priest, but by a Santal, and it was an exclusive religious observance confined to the tribe alone.

ATMOSPHERE

In such a fair as this, you might feel like Alice in Wonderland. Can you imagine yourself marooned in a fairy land for a moment? The flecked sky of the autumnal afternoon arched over-head and caging you before a wonderous panorama. The fleecy clouds overhead with tints of vermilion here and there match with the yellow and pink saris of Diku (non-Santal) women.

Dark grey hills encircle you on all sides at a distance. The rocky table-land at Mahulbani seems to be an islet in a ocean of infinity, the characteristic beauty in a Santal Pargana landscape. Long streams of Santal men and women wend their way to the Durga Puja fair in files of five or ten. A subject indeed for techni-colour photography.

At Pipra, all roads led not to Rome—but to Pipra, hectic with dreamy anticipations of songs, dances and mirth. The joie de vivre of tribal life pulsated through Santalia. . . . . Where were they going? They seemed so glad. The women were merry and the men voluble with an extra dose, yes, of rice-beer. . . . . Bevies of Santal maidens with arms inter-linked with the shoulders of their friends tripped on playfully like the fawn at large in the wide expanse of the Santal Parganas.

SPLENDOUR

They crooned tunes and then broke into a teasing laughter. You look to the left and whole village would seem to move on—men, women and children. The youths tied turbans on their heads and stuck peacock feathers in them. The girls had tucked flowers of all hues in the mass of their raven-dark curly hair. Their bronzed bodies sparkled in the sun.

Dancing parties encircled by huge crowds of spectators are usual features in such Durga Puja rallies. There was the Dasae dance going on. This festival with its etymological resemblance to the Hindu Dasahara, starts on the Durga Puja eve and concludes with the immersion ceremony of the goddess. All these days the Dasae dancers, all males, wearing peacock feathers and dressed in white with triangular red scarves hanging from their necks, can be seen going round the Santal Parganas singing special songs:

To whom are we offering Puias?
To Kamru Guru—

comes the reply.

The traditions and institutes of the Santals (Mare hapramko reak katha) say that the Santals learnt magic and witch-craft from Kamru Guru, a word with an etymological affinity with Kamrup, the special land of the lore. If the reader cares to open an almanac, he will see that the Kamrupiya Sankarabda (the Sankar era of Kamrup), starts with our Bijoya Dasami.

The fair at Mahulbani and Pipra contained several such parties. I saw a man playing a buan (one-stringed harp) and carrying a rope of bachkom grass; the majority had tinkling leather bands fastened to their hands. Another carried a garland made of palm-leaf with a brass-bowl containing sal (Shorea Robusta) leaves and vermilion. He struck it musically with an iron stick from which was suspended a flower-like thing made of hemp.

DANCES

The dancers all stood in formations of five in a line. The first man in the first row had a cymbal, while the second had a brass bowl. At times, they seemed to make movements like prowling cubs, again they lay on their backs with their heads on their neighbours' laps and sat up again as they made spectacular movements with the five in each row linked together.

A special item was the Bonga enec (Godling dance). Here a dancer fell into a frenzy of spirit-possession and danced to kettle-drums, cymbals and pipes giddily till he was whipped back to consciousness with the bachkom (made of a hill plant called Babui) rope by his fellows. I saw a Santal had at least fifteen stripes which he bore without any sign of pain. Custom requires that the bachkom rope would be ceremonially immersed after the Goddess Durga.

But the centre of attraction was the "Lagren" dances, to which whole villages gravitated. This was the moon-light dance of the Santals and they danced the whole night. Of all the Santal dances,

AYURVEDA

Its Evolution And Decline

By JAPESH DAS GUPTA

HINDUS believe that the Vedas, were not written by man. They were the voice of the Divine Soul, and so too was Ayurveda which is included in the Vedas. We get a few mentions of Ayurveda in the Rig-Veda. But there are quite lengthy dissertations about many aspects of it in the Atharvaveda, so much so that Sushruta considers Ayurveda as a part or upanga of Atharvaveda.

"Ayus" is the Sanskrit word for span of life and root "Vid" means "to know". "Ayurveda" is the science that gives one the knowledge to live a long life healthily and happily. It is believed that Ayurveda had its first dawn in the conception of Brahma who put it in verse (Sloka). From Brahma, Prajapati Daksha learnt Ayurveda and imparted it to the Aswinikumaras. Tradition goes that Aswinikumaras attained such high skill in the healing practice that they could substitute an iron leg in place of an amputated leg. They could even give vision to the blind. It was, however, Indra the king of Gods who learnt the science from the Aswinikumaras and propagated it for the benefit of mankind.

A believer divides the evolution of Ayurveda into three periods:

"Daivakal" or the period during which Ayurveda was in the hands of the gods, that is, from the period of Brahma to that of Indra. Prajapati Samhita, Aswisamhita, and Balavid Samgrahita are the treatises that belong to this period.

"Arshakal" or the period when Ayurveda was practised by the rishis. Bharadwaja and Dwibodasa are the two rishis who learnt Ayurveda from Indra and imparted the knowledge to their pupils and disciples in two parts. Bharadwaja particularly developed the medicinal aspects of Ayurveda. His principal disciples were Punarbasu, Chandrabhagi and Atreya. Dwibodasa on the other hand developed the surgical aspects of Ayurveda and his disciples maintained the School. The disciples of Bharadwaja and Dwibodasa later became authors of various books on Ayurveda. This whole period comes under Arshakal. There are treatises on treatment of plant-diseases (Brikshayurveda) as well as diseases of horses, elephants and dairy animals.

"Samgrahakal" is the period starting from Bagabhat. This period belong Bagabhat, Sharangadhar, Bhabamisra, Madhab, and Chakrapani, and they compiled a complete treatise of Ayurveda.

Later on Alchemy (Rasa-Sastra), became a complete and separate branch of the science. It modified the Ayurveda of Arshakal. It is indeed a fact that so profoundly did alchemy exert its influence on the Ayurveda of Arshakal that one may say without any hesitation that the Ayurveda that has come down to us is the end product of the complete fusion of Ayurveda and Alchemy.

ELIXIR OF LIFE

Mahadeva, it is said, was the first to conceive of Alchemy and it came into being in man's endeavour to find an "elixir of life" that would enable him to defy age and ills, to be immortal, in a word. Byadi, Nagarjuna, Dattatreya, Anantadeva, Sadananda, Yasodhara, Shalinath, Chandra Sen, Lankesh, Matta, Mandabya are the most famous ones who specialised in Ayurvedic Alchemy (Rasa-Sastra). They carried it to such an acme of skill and perfection that it is said that they discovered processes of preparing gold and silver from copper with the help of mercury etc.

The division of Ayurveda into the following eight sections shows it to be the elaborate and exhaustive science that it is. The sections are:

KAYACHIKITSATANTRA (Ayurvedic Medicine) It is concerned with the symptoms, etiology, prognosis treatment dietetics etc. of the diseases like fever and dysentery as well as tuberculosis and other consumptive diseases which can be cured by medicine.

SHALYATANTRA (Ayurvedic Surgery) This has two sections:

(a) General Surgery (Sadharan Shastra Chikitsa) includes etiology, symptoms and treatment of diseases which can be cured by use of Surgical methods like blood letting, cauterization, leeching and use of surgical instruments.

(b) Prasutitantra (Obstetrics & Gynaecology) deals with conception, care of the pregnant, treatment of diseases of the pregnant, delivery, prenatal and antenatal care.

SHALAKYATANTRA (Ophthalmology & E.N.T. Diseases) restricts itself to the symptoms, etiology, treatment etc. of diseases of eye, ear, nose, throat etc.

BHUTABIDYA (Nervous Diseases) for treatment of the insane, epileptic etc.

KOUMARABHRITYA TANTRA (Children's diseases) deals with child care, treatment, etiology etc. of children's diseases (Pediatrics).

AGADHATANTRA (TOXICOLOGY — describes all sorts of toxins and poisons etc. [illegible] symptoms, treatment of snake bite, general toximia, and poisoning etc.

RASAYANTANTRA deals with "Rasayans," medicine which is supposed to prolong man's life, enabling him to overcome the ills of age, sharpen one's intellect and memory, keep the body free from any ailment, give it grace and complexion, deepen voice, accentuate the senses and emphasizes in one's personality, politeness, purity of speech and self control.

BAJIKARANATANTRA deals with treatment of the imbecile or impotent and methods of increasing potency of healthy individuals.

Now I shall quote a few instances to show what a peak of skill and perfection our ancient savants reached in this system of Ayurveda in treatment of human ailments. The Tridosatatwa or the theory of wind, bile and phlegm in Ayurveda is indeed sparkling example of their love and it is this theory that was later developed by ancient Greeks as the Humoral Theory.

The advance that the ancients made in Anatomy is well illustrated by the precise description of Adult and Foetal circulation in Sushruta Samhita.

In surgery too the healers in the days of yore achieved the same perfection. They successfully carried out amputation of limbs, operations on intestines and other abdominal organs, as well as on uterus, and bladder. Instructions and indications are still to be found in the treatises of Sushruta and others. The treatment of rabies, and snake bite as given in "Kalpasthan" section and Sushruta Samhita show how marvellously advanced Ayurvedic toxicology was.

THE RECESSION

Ayurvedic medicine also records none-the-less brilliant successes in the cure of piles with the help of a liniment or cure of complaints of paranasal sinus with the help of a snuff. However, the short space would not permit me to cite more such instances which hold us spell bound even today. Thus different branches of Ayurvedic medicine and surgery were improved and evolved and Ayurveda flourished supreme.

This was followed by the period when things turned absolutely the other way round and so started the recession of Ayurveda which can be said to be the mother of all healing sciences. The causes that account for this decline are not few. First Sanskrit gradually ceased to be the popular language it was and the medium of teaching, and on top of that the ancient texts became rare. In the Buddhist period application of instruments to the human body came to be a cognizable offence and gradually Ayurvedic Surgery came to be relegated to the hands of the untrained barbar and obstetrics became the profession of illiterate lower class women. With modern civilization opening up newer vistas of life, and due to lack of public sympathy and various other demands and strained conditions, very few people went to Ayurvedic practice and there were many who gave up this profession of their fathers for other means of livelihood. Besides, during the Muslim period the Yunani System under State recognition came much in vogue. Even the public hospitals that were established by the Hindu, and Buddhist Kings gradually dwindled away and everybody knows how with the coming out of the English the Allopathic system gained ground in this country. The above are just a few of the causes that advanced Ayurveda fast on its decline.

But Ayurveda has stood the test of time and has survived the ravages of foreign invaders and sceptics and it has been able to retain the soul that was in her, the first beat of the throbbing pulsation of a mighty science buried in dregs so to say without research and almost without practice, decayed and sinking but still retained. And so ebbing away is that pristine glory of India. Ayurvedic surgery is practically lost to India and her medicine is struggling just for existence.

Ayurveda is India's own, and unique treasure. What our Rishis contemplated and discovered in those days of yore hold as good even today defying all the glare of our modern civilisation. Ayurveda is India's own, and most perfectly suited to the constitution of her people and it is no wonder that the sylvan wealth of a country should have the intrinsic cure of the maladies of its people.

So the duty is ours—one cannot overemphasise the responsibility of our people with the help of the Government, to revive Ayurveda, with research and sympathy, to make it the living science that it was, and one is sure that with all our best and united efforts, the goal would not be far to be sought.

the "Lagren" is the most stimulating and the youths and maids of the tribe find here plenty of opportunities for love-making as it is a mixed dance of the two sexes.

The very steps of the dance provide facilities for courtship, as the couples face side-ways and can talk as they trip. And if they feel like it the girls can slip off pleading an aching limb to meet their lovers, perhaps playing flutes like a serenade in the fields near by.

A sample of such a folk-song sung on such occasions may be thus translated for the readers:—

On the banks of the river,
Whose lute plays?
Alas the heart weeps.
I haven't seen with eyes,
Nor heard with ears,
Alas my heart weeps.

Col. Dalton in his Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal commented on this dance. He says: "It is singular that in this national amusement of the Santals, we have handed down to us a most vivid living representation of one of the prominent scenes in the sports of Krishna in Braja and Brindaban. There is nothing in modern Hinduism that at all illustrates the animated scenes so graphically delineated in the Puranas; but the description of the Rasa dance in Chapter XIII, Book V of the Vishnu Purana might be taken literally as an account of the Santal Jhumur". *

As we left the Durga Puja fairs (both had a strong family resemblance), the devotion in their faces became a Wordsworthian treasure to ruminate upon "in vacant or in pensive mood" (so familiar to all). Here was, we felt, the "giant heart" of Santalia quaking in unison with the heart of Aryabarta.

* Jhumur—The term is used for a dance of the non-Santal population of the area, but it is not an orthodox Santal dance. It is certain that Col. Dalton was referring to the Santal "Lagren" — Author.

THE PROBLEM OF CALCUTTA AND A SOLUTION

By BHASKAR MUKHERJI

LET us see first how the problem has arisen. Forty years ago the population of the city was about nine lakh. To-day it is close upon three million. Yet the growth of the size of the city within these forty years has been disproportionately low. The area of the city has grown from 23 to 37 square miles only, and the number of premises from 60,000 to less than a 100,000. If the growth of the city has been disproportionately low, those of the essential and chief Municipal services has even been lower. By essential services is of course meant water supply, drainage, length and maintenance of roadways, lighting, etc. The result is the present day squalor, congestion, confusion and contrast which is a feature of this greatest city in India. The influx into the city chiefly during the last few years is composed of men with outlooks rural rather than urban. They add considerably to the problems of the City.

The solution is obvious. It is to increase the size of the liveable space with corresponding increase in local services.

The obvious way to do this is to spread the confines of the city far out into the districts surrounding it. In fact, if we examine comparable world cities we notice that a city with the same population as Calcutta is spread out into an area of at least 400 to 500 square miles. Tokyo and London are both spread out over a distance of 600 square miles, New York over 400 square miles.

It is thus in dispersal and resettlement that the hope of Calcutta lies.

Calcutta and the outlying areas as we all know are spread North and South. The dispersal, therefore, should be towards the East and the West. Virgin areas are available particularly across the river to the West of Calcutta, as well to the north-east of the city.

There is, however, a basic difficulty which was first pointed out several years ago by Governor Casey. The access from the surrounding districts into Calcutta at almost every point is narrow and, therefore, difficult. To spread out the city the first task should, therefore, be to increase, broaden and ease the access to the city to all kinds of traffic.

Obviously the access is meant for the use of those who live in the districts and come to Calcutta for their daily work. This daily travel to and from the city should be made as quick, cheap and easy as possible; otherwise it will hardly be popular. In fact, this is the principal aim of all world cities where hundreds and thousands of workers daily travel into the places of their work in the city.

There is, however, another mode of dispersal which obviates the need of daily travel and which is now being followed more and more in all progressive world cities. It is the establishment of complete new cities within the 400 or 500 square miles, complete with housing, places of work and recreation. Such a City is a civic and economic unit, dependent, no doubt, on the main City, but otherwise self-sufficient. These are known as satellite cities, and these have the great advantage that its citizens do not have to go through a vexatious time-consuming and fairly expensive daily travel to the main City. This method of dispersal is followed practically in all the larger concentrations of population in the world, chiefly under the leadership and on the initiative of Professor Sir Pattrik Abercrombie, a leading authority on town-planning.

I think the best way to explain what I mean is to quote a modern authority on town-planning.

"One of my purposes is to show that building new towns (satellite towns) is not an evasion of the problem of making the best of existing towns; but is indispensable to the solution of that problem. In Great Britain and in other countries where the aggregation of population has gone too far and the central parts of large cities are, therefore, grossly congested, you simply cannot reconstruct the old cities on decent human standards without at the same time building new towns or extending the smaller towns; and in nearly every region you must do both the latter things.

"We shall need both country town extensions and new towns. London, on the lowest estimate, must disperse over one million people, Liverpool 250,000 people, Manchester 150,000 people, and other cities large numbers."—F. J. Osborn.

Thus, to improve Calcutta, the first thing to do would be to draw off and resettle the surplus population to centres of population outside Calcutta; and you cannot so draw off until you can provide not only homes, but also work for the displaced population in their new locations.

I would now describe in a few words one of these extension or satellite cities built under the scheme of Sir Pattrick Abercrombie to relieve the population pressure on London. The new town is Crawley, and has been planned and built by a Development Corporation with the object of creating a self-contained and balance community. The factories and houses are designed to receive a population of 50,000 from London:—workers with their wives and children living their congested London homes.

TWIN EVILS

The twin evils of slums and over-crowding in large cities have their roots in the unregulated and excessive growth of towns during a period when the health of the people, no less than their spiritual and social well-being, were sacrificed to industrial needs. Men and women must live near their work. Yet only in recent years has come a full realisation that the solution to many of the problems to which these evils give rise is by setting some limit to the haphazard sprawl of existing cities and by providing in new towns, wisely and skilfully sited and planned, a proper balance between housing and industry.

The new factories, for industries which are being shifted from London to Crawley, are all located in the industrial area north of the town. Eighteen London industries have already found Crawley an outlet, with promise for their future well-being. Buildings are light and airy, and near enough to the residential part to eliminate the tedious journey to and from work, so much a part of the life of the town dweller.

Many families have already moved into their new homes. They are the vanguard of the many who will bring Crawley's ultimate population to between 50,000 and 60,000.

The new tenants find living in Crawley very different from the crowded streets of London. In the general layout of the residential neighbourhoods, an endeavour has been made to preserve as much open space as possible, and careful planning has been undertaken to preserve trees, hedges, and attractive natural features.

Crawley is one of at least 12 new towns built under the Abercrombie plan to relieve the population pressure on London within the 600 square miles forming the greater London area. Round Calcutta ample and cheap space is equally available for the siting of similar satellite cities. If Barrackpore and Barasat are linked by an 8 mile long railway we get an area of at least 60 square miles bounded by a circular railway. Dum-Dum, Barrackpore, Barasat Dum-Dum, comparatively undeveloped are ideal sites for the location of such overflow cities. Similarly across the river there is a large tract of developable land between the two arms of the Eastern Railway forking out from Bally. Aerial Survey may disclose other suitable areas.

But the point of utmost importance is that the access from these areas to the heart of the City must be both easy, quick and cheap.

OVERNIGHT CONSTRUCTION

How to build cities in these vast extension areas? Enormous strides have been made in mass-building within the last 7 and 8 years, chiefly in Soviet Russia. The basic material is of course reinforced concrete, of which there are 2,500 plants in that country, against only about 50 in ours. By the method of vibration rolling of concrete, in special conveyor plants, articles of concrete come out of the mill in a continuous stream, which are converted into all kinds of structures, chiefly needed in building multi-storied flats. This technique has been developed chiefly by Engineer Kozlov. Large house panels are produced which are bolted together in the sites to make liveable flats. A multi-storied flat can be erected in this manner inside a week. Extensive cities all over Soviet Russia are being built or rather mass built on this process both cheaply and quickly, and the results are astounding. In 1961, 2,200,000 flats were built in the cities of Soviet Russia, and 500,000 houses in the countryside all in this way. Nearly 10,000 modern flats in the cities and 2,500 rural homes are being built in a single day, all on Kozlov's principle. In the current 7-yearly plan period a total of 15 million flats are to be built. To-day a quarter of Russia's immense population is housed in modern flats, for which the rents inclusive of services do not exceed 4 to 5 p.c. of the family budget, and by 1980 every single family will have its own flat to live in, and free of charge. Such is the miracle of the technique of mass building.

We could do no better than send out a study team to investigate these methods of mass-building. In our poverty-ridden land there is no poverty more abject than poverty of space to live in. It demoralises on a mass scale; it makes beasts of men. To solve the problem of living space should be the first task of a Welfare State.

action entails destruction of something, of a kind of "atomic disintegration". The goat-sacrifice in a Tantric Puja is a symbol of human action, of every item of sense-experience with which man continuously lives his life. To re-spiritualise every mundane experience is the teaching of Tantras and the object behind Shakti Puja. The goat-sacrifice dramatises such an experience challenging the worshippers to re-establish spirituality in an act of overt destruction.

The Shakti Puja, as taught by the Tantric philosophy, is in essence a spiritual striving after self-divinisation. Such an objective is no doubt a common ground of Shaktism and Vedanta. But such a force-development is more obtainable in Tantric Sadhana, e.g., the esoteric Shata-chakra-ved than in the Tantric worship. The latter more frankly connotes a dualistic position where the basic man-God relationship is not one of identity but one of giver and the gift-taker, the crucial Tantric element in Shakti Puja being thus not the emphasis on self as the fulcrum of all spiritual power but the faith in the efficacy of mantra, mudra and karma (goat-sacrifice). The average Shakta worshipper is indeed so much removed from the Tantric emphasis on spiritual self-reliance that there is not much distinction in the attitude of a Shakta and a Vaishnava worshipper except what the technique of the respective worship makes it. Even Chandi in course of their prayer makes the Gods say "all men in the world are like women." At the same time, it is wholly uncritical to think that Durga Puja in Bengal is a sociological relic of the Mother-worship in primitive tribal society. The Tantric Durga has been conceived as a mother as a pattern of closest human relationship thinkable in a man's or woman's life. She that is in the form of eternal cosmic Reality is also the source of that Reality—hence the concept of motherhood. According to Tantric absolute idealism, all creation is of the staff of God's mind, we lie in His womb; what else can It be except being the Mother—the Mother of mine and the Mother of the Universe (Jagadamba)?

LADY OF THE LA

CROSS CURRENTS

By Major T. C. GHOSH

HULLO!

"Is that you, Gita ?"

"Yes. What is it Shanker ?"

"Gita. I am frightfully sorry. I shan't be able to make it."

"Oh!" She controlled a sob.

"There is such an amount of work in the hospital, I just can't leave this place. I thought I would be able to get away by five thirty but some new casualties have just been admitted. I would not be able to leave this place at least before eight."

"I knew this. This is not the first time."

"Gita. Please try and understand. I am really feeling miserable that I can't make it."

"Anyway, what do you propose I should do with these tickets?" She suppressed her rising anger.

"Why don't you go and see the picture with your friend Mohini or somebody else ?"

"Yes. I think I should find somebody to take me," she said in bitterness.

Gita hung up the receiver or rather banged the receiver in a huff. Yes, he always did this sort of thing. How often did he let her down ? Everything else seemed to have higher priority than she. She could not control her tears. They trickled down her cheeks. She locked herself up in her bedroom and threw herself on the bed.

The whole afternoon she was thinking of going to see this picture. It is a long time since he had taken her out. When two days ago he proposed to see this famous film together, she was so thrilled that she immediately went and bought the tickets. The whole afternoon she planned and matched the sari she was going to wear. It could not be pink or maroon because he did not like the colours. What should she wear, cream coloured Kanjivaram or should it be the sky blue Kashmir silk ? No, plain colour would not be suitable, she must wear that new sari with the abstract print. She had not worn it even once. This would be a surprise for him. But would he notice ? He hardly ever complimented her on her clothes. This time he was bound to notice. She had not worn any abstract coloured print before.

It took her nearly half an hour before she could finally decide on the clothes she was going to wear. Even the afternoon siesta was disturbed. She could not relax lest she was late. Shanker always complained that she was not punctual and took too much time in dressing. She made up her mind to give him a surprise by being ready when he arrived. But all was in vain. What an anti-climax and disappointment. She was lying there with her face buried in the pillows. Her best sari was getting crushed under her. The sari which had been so carefully selected was now as neglected and unwanted as she was herself. Her thoughts went back to such similar instances Yes, he never paid any attention to her. Right from the beginning he was neglecting her. Every time a past episode of a similar hurt came to her mind, fresh tears welled up in her eyes and she gave in to fits of weeping.

"Memsahib ?" There was a knock at the door. She jumped from her bed. Has Shanker really changed his mind ? She rushed to the door and opened it. It was Shanti the maid servant.

"Biren Sahib has come."

Gita was not only disappointed but got irritated. "Tell him I am not well. I can't see him to-day," she cried. Shanti got afraid seeing Gita's mood and wanted to make a quick retreat. Suddenly Gita had a brain wave. "Wait!" she called Shanti back. Why should Gita pay so much importance to Shanker. There are so many admirers running after her. She could easily choose any one of them. What's wrong with Biren? He is reasonably handsome, well educated and the son of a rich man. Too much attention had spoiled Shanker. He had become swollen headed. Gita must make him understand that there were more than one fish in the pond. Yes, she would go to the pictures with Biren. That will teach Shanker a lesson. She was shocked when she looked in the mirror. What a miserable state she was in. Her clothes completely crushed, dishevelled hair hanging over her face. With the tears the mascara had run and there were black streaks down her cheeks. Lipstick had been wiped away. No, she could not possibly go out to-day. She said to Shanti.

"Please go an tell Biren Sahib that I am not well to-day. Ask him to come tomorrow."

She looked the door again and sat on the edge of the bed. She looked at her watch and saw it was half past six. It is already late, she could not possibly go to the pictures. She opened her purse, took out the two tickets and casually but deliberately tore them into pieces, got up and threw them away into the waste paper basket. That was the end of her eagerly awaited evening.

What she did not know was that Shanker did not even go for lunch trying to finish his work before five thirty.

Shanker was the class mate of Kiran, the elder brother of Gita. From her very childhood Gita heard so much praise of Shanker that before she could develop the power of judgement she made a god out of him. Kiran was devoted to Shanker, the best boy of the school and there was not a single day when he would not say some praise about this brilliant boy. If ever Gita tried to say anything against Shanker or tried to criticise him in any way. Kiran would get annoyed, and in their younger days had even thrashed her once or twice. From Kiran the infection of hero worship gradually spread to Gita. Shanker and Kiran were good friends and he used to come to their house quite often. Shanker on his side had very little time to devote to girls and the only pretty one he met often was Gita. It was when he was in the final year of the medical college and Gita was in the first year that they exchanged their innermost thoughts, and it was more or less accepted that they would get married as soon as Shanker was settled in his profession.

In the next six years many changes had taken place in the small world of these two families. Kiran went to United Kingdom along with Shanker to study for the Bar. He married there and did not return. Gita's father had died leaving a reasonable amount of fortune for Gita and her mother. Gita after her graduation had more wealth and idle time on her hands than she knew what to do with. After her father's death she first let herself go with her newly found freedom but soon she got tired of the aimless, sophisticated social life. One really gets tired of whirlwind parties. She gradually settled down to a comparatively quieter life and waited for Shanker to come back.

Shanker had also had his share of misfortunes. While he was studying F.R.C.S. in London his father died. He lost his mother in early childhood. Now he was faced with the problem of supporting his younger brother and sister. His father did not do well in life. They were practically living from hand to mouth. It was his scholarship which helped him for higher studies. As soon as he returned home he plunged himself in earning money which was so much in need. Gita offered financial assistance but he refused. The marriage had to be postponed for a couple of years until he got the permanent appointment of a surgeon in the Government Hospital.

Gita could not understand him. He seemed to be perpetually busy with his work. After the working hours he would spend the rest of the time either at his studies or attending to his private practices. Even though he made it a point to meet her every day, he never stayed long. He rarely took her out. She thought that he came to meet her as if to perform another duty. It did not look as if he had a personal longing to see her. All this seemed so unreasonable to Gita. What was the point in living this way if life meant only work and no relaxation? Why was he so adamant about earning a few rupees to maintain his younger brother and sister when Gita had so much surplus money? All her money was also his money. Why could not he understand this simple fact ?

Shanker was not like this before. He was so gay and full of fun that he was really bubbling with life. Within a few years what a change had come over him. Is it the higher studies or the responsibility of work or the ambition of fame as a surgeon which had changed him completely ? He became so grave and always so materialistic in his outlook on life. But then he was not really wordly-wise. He need not slave so much for a little money when so much was available with her.

She also failed to understand why he had to become financially well off before he could marry her. Their married life would never be in want of money but he refused to touch her money. He wanted to earn enough on his own to be able to marry. If it was his professional success that he was after then why was he slaving away in a Government job. He could easily open a nursing home with her money and could become more successful. No, she just did not follow his point of view. He was certainly nothing more than a uselessly vain person.

In the beginning she did not protest to whatever he wanted to do. She was so happy when he came back from England that she was prepared to make any sacrifice. In spite of his regular letters she was worried that Shanker might also settle down in England like her brother. Quite often she thought of going to England to make sure that he was not lured away by some enticing woman. After all Shanker was not experienced in defending himself against the spreading nets of those foreign women. It was her father who did not agree to her going and after his death the thought of leaving her mother alone ultimately stopped her from going. Gita was constantly apprehensive that possibly the next letter would bring the news of his new attachment. Thank God nothing really happened and when he eventually returned to her she was so overjoyed that she agreed to whatever suggestions he made.

But as the days and months passed her patience was coming to an end. The initial excitement was over and even after his return she found herself as lonely as before. She hardly got any company from him. She tried to explain once or twice about her lonely life but he always advised her to read books or take up some social work. How could she make him understand that a woman's heart was never satisfied with somebody else's work. It was to make her own home that she was craving.

As she lay on her bed her whole life with Shanker unfolded before her mental eyes. Yes, she had always been made use of. It was she who, out of hero-worship, ran after him and was so much in love with him. Just because he got her without the slightest effort he really never understood her value. She was even wondering if he really loved her. Not that there was any rival but he must be one of those prosaic men who had nothing called emotion. But then he was so attached to his brother and sister. For them he would take any amount of pains and trouble but for her he just had no time.

No, she was of no value to him. To him, she was just a piece of inanimate object. Did he ever bother to look at her heart ? Did he ever try to understand how miserably she was spending her days ? He did not even bother to ask how she was or what she was doing or if there was anything she wanted. What a self-centred, selfish man he was. She felt her humiliation was unbearable. Her whole mind revolted against this neglect and indifference. She could not bear it any more and must do something even if it meant her destruction. It was better to die than to be a nonentity. Her cup of bitterness was full.

Next morning she rang him up and asked if he could go to the pictures as it was the last day. His reply was as expected.

Yes, it was true, she was really there.

"But didn't you see it yesterday ?"

"No."

"What happened to those tickets ?"

"I tore them up."

"Tore them? But why?"

"That's besides the point," she replied suppressing her annoyance at his lack of grasping emotional feelings. "Please tell me now if you can come to-day."

"I am sorry. I just can't make it to-day. I can try tomorrow".

"To-day is the last day."

"I am sorry. It looks as if I shan't be able to see this picture I so much wanted to see."

"Well in that case, I think I shall go with Biren."

"Yes, that's a good idea. Please go with him. I was afraid you may not be able to see it because of me. Please go and enjoy yourself."

Gita bit her lips. He does not even bother with whom she went and what she did. His indifference was limitless. Was it worth loving this man? She was no longer going to wait for him who was so unworthy of her intense love. Next she rang up Biren and arranged for the pictures.

From then onwards she forcibly tried to put Shanker out of her mind and started seeing a lot of Biren. They often used to go out for late night dances, picnics and parties. Shanker came regularly in the evening to meet her but often he did not find her at home. Even when he met her he never noticed her reserved behaviour. She sometimes felt the pang of guilty conscience but when she saw that he was nonchalant and was oblivious of her change of behaviour, she used to get irritated. She thought that he deserved all these for his indifference.

Once as usual when Shanker went to meet her, Gita's mother called him to her room. After making one or two queries about his work and family, she came to the point. She expressed that Gita and Shanker should get married soon. Shanker was surprised at this suggestion since it was originally decided that they would get married after two years. Then she explained that she did not like Gita going out with Biren so much. She was apprehensive about Gita's future. Shanker did not let her proceed any further.

"But I don't mind her going out. I am so busy with my work that I hardly have any time to take her out. She is so lonely. If she goes out and enjoys herself, what's wrong with it? I know her and trust her. You needn't be afraid."

Gita's mother was not convinced since she knew women more than he did, but she thought it expedient not to continue the discussion. She only mentioned that Gita was planning to go on a long weekend to Mossoorie with a crowd which included Biren. She had not given her permission because she did not want to go like this. Shanker was astonished because he did not know anything about this trip but he did not say anything. He thought that Gita would probably talk about it when they next met.

Gita found her new life very attractive. Biren was attentive and so much more polished than Shanker. He was observant and appreciated her choice of dress, her demeanour, intelligence and wit. For the first time she realised what romance was. As a matter of fact, she thought how foolish she was that she wasted so much time on Shanker. Sometimes her conscience troubled her for her deceit and she often thought she would make a clean breast of everything to Shanker, but then possibly the lack of moral courage stopped her from doing it or the new found romance did not give her enough opportunity to recollect her thoughts. Life brought a new meaning to her and she started craving for more and more of Biren's company. She could not spend a single day without seeing him. Whenever she met Shanker she felt very uncomfortable and wanted to avoid him as far as possible.

Just before her departure to Mussoorie one day when Shanker was coming back home from a late night emergency operation, he saw Biren's car in front of his taxi. But who was that girl by Biren's side? Yes, it was Gita. Her head was on Biren's shoulder and he had one arm around her. Shanker sat up, rubbed his eyes, Yes, it was true, she was really there. Doubt never leaves a lover. He wanted to make absolutely sure. He asked the taxi driver to overtake the car. While the taxi was overtaking he distinctly saw her even though the street lights were not very bright. She was quite oblivious of the taxi overtaking the car. All of a sudden he felt giddy. He temporarily became blind. There was nothing but darkness all around him. It was only for a split second then he ordered the taxi driver to drive fast. He still could not remember how he got down from the taxi, paid the fare and staggered to his room. He was in a state of daze and as soon as he got to his room he threw himself on his bed. Gradually he came out of his shock and tears started trickling down his cheeks. The whole night he did not sleep but lay stunned.

"You see, Shanker, I waited too long for you."

Early morning he got up and after having a bath, dressed quickly. When he reached her house, Gita was still sleeping. He forbade the servants to wake her up. He preferred to wait. While he was waiting he rang up the hospital and informed them that he would not be able to come. At about nine thirty she came down to meet him. He looked at her. There was a slight look of astonishment in her eyes seeing him at this hour of the day. Otherwise she was not perturbed in the least. He did not know how to start. She also patiently waited for him to begin. In the end he rather abruptly suggested.

"I think we should get married now."

As expected Gita was taken by surprise. She could not reply immediately. After a few moments she said, "What has happened? Why this sudden change of Date?"

He nearly flared up at her about yesterday but with a great effort he controlled himself. It was not advisable to quarrel when one was losing one's ground.

"Nothing very particular. I was just thinking about you for some time. You must be feeling very lonely when I have so little time to spend with you. I have been very selfish and obstinate to make you wait just for the satisfaction of my stupid vanity. Now if we get married we could have more time together and another thing", he paused and stared at her for a few seconds, then whispered, "I can't stand the separation any more. I can't wait a single day."

"But what about your research, your appointment and your economic independence?" There was sarcasm in her voice.

"Nothing matters, when I feel you are gradually getting farther and farther away from me. Everything has its importance after I know I have you."

"How do you make out that I have gone farther away from you?"

"I am not blind. I have been coming here everyday. Previously you used to wait so eagerly for me but now tell me how often do I have the chance of even meeting you, leave aside your waiting for me".

"You see, Shanker, I waited too long for you. There was a time when I could kiss the very ground you walked on, but now I have come to the end of my patience. I am sorry I can't immediately answer. I shall have to think. I don't know what I really want."

There was hardly anything more to say. Any further persuasion would only amount to more humiliation. Shanker had to wait and leave himself to destiny. If Shanker was in a normal state of mind he certainly would have noticed the triumphant contentment in the eyes of Gita. He left her house much more depressed.

During the next three months Shanker became a changed man. Not only he came everyday but often invited her out to some entertainment or other. The sober, studious, hard working man no longer bothered about his duties in the hospital. His colleagues were surprised seeing the change. He was callous with his work and his keenness for operation had completely vanished. He started grudging and cribbing if any extra work was given to him. At home his brother and sister found him grave and peevish. They did not know the reason so they started avoiding him. But in the presence of Gita he was different. He was attentive, gay and very observant. Gita was astonished and pleased to see that she was often complimented.

In the beginning she did not accept the invitations of Shanker and more often went out with Biren. Shanker's persistent approaches and quiet patience started showing results. She started going out more with Shanker and engagements with Biren started receding. In spite of Biren's courteous and polished manners, Gita noticed that he was getting tired of her. Initial zeal was cooling down. She also heard reports that Biren was seen going out with other girls. When she asked Biren about it, he laughed and said that she should never listen to rumours. He was supposed to be devoted to her. Another thing which struck Gita as being very odd was that even though Biren expressed his love many times in many different and romantic ways, he really never proposed to her. She became suspicious of him. Moreover, she did not really get over her love for Shanker. Since Shanker had changed so much she did not have anything to complain about. She gradually went back to him.

After about six months they were married. During their honeymoon and subsequently when they started their new home Gita was very happy. Shanker proved to be an ideal husband. She did not find even a small fault with him. Life seemed to be a long period of blissful happiness.

On the other hand Shanker's professional work was completely neglected. He hardly studied. The most promising surgeon paid little heed to the patients. His private practice diminished and the head of the department of surgery recommended that Shanker should not be confirmed immediately and his case should be revised after one year. Shanker was just callous about these setbacks. When Gita came to know of all these she did not bother much. She had plenty of money and she wanted Shanker to herself. It did not matter to her if he failed to earn more. The younger brother and sister could not suffer any more their beloved brother's indifferent attitude. They tactfully requested if they could be sent to live in their college hostels. This proposal was gladly accepted and they were glad to get rid of one another.

Within the next one year after their marriage Gita found that Shanker never wanted to leave her alone. Even when he had to go out on essential work he went very reluctantly and rang her up more than once. She very rarely got any time to herself. When she wanted to go to any of her relations or to meet any of her friends he would insist on going with her. In the beginning she had liked it and thought that he was so devoted to her that he could not live even a single moment without her but gradually she became tired of this behaviour and wanted some freedom. Sometimes she showed her irritation but that was of no use. Another peculiar thing she observed was that Shanker never allowed her to meet any man. Either he would evade the meeting or when they actually met he would tactfully take her away as soon as decently possible. She was surprised at his behaviour. He was so trustful of her that he never even doubted her when she had late nights with any of her male friends, and now he did not even let her meet any one of them. Possibly men became more jealous and possessive after marriage.

"If you think I am blind and don't see your activities with your paramour or old flames you are mistaken."

One day when Gita went out for shopping alone she happened to meet Anil, her classmate in college. She met him after a long time and was very glad to meet him again. They had so much to talk about the old days. Anil suggested that they should go and have some coffee together when they would be able to talk. Without a second thought she accepted the invitation. When Shanker came home she narrated the incident. Shanker narrowed his eys and there was a distinct frown on his face. When she finished her story he said with some sarcasm, "Did you really go for shopping or was it an excuse to meet him?"

"Shanker! What are you saying?"

"I can't understand why you have to go alone. Could you not wait for me to take you out? You didn't even tell me that you were going out for shopping. It seemed you had no previous plan to go out. You just went suddenly for some reason or the other."

"But I told you in the morning that I needed some cosmetics.'

"Yes, but that doesn't mean you must go out the same day or it may be that the appointment was made previously and your requirement of cosmetics was only an excuse."

Gita was thunderstruck at his mean and baseless accusations. She was never very good in battle of words. She felt a sob rise in her throat. She ran to her room and locked herself in.

The relationship remained strained for some time. Gita eagerly expected that Shanker would certainly understand his mistake and would apologise but he did nothing of the sort. Instead. he went about with the air that he was correct and Gita should apologise.

A couple of months afterwards Biren rang up. Shanker was out in the hospital, so Gita picked up the phone. She was happy to hear Biren's voice. She had not heard from him for over a year. Biren said that his mother had some heart ailment and in his opinion Shanker was certainly the most promising heart specialist in the town. He wanted to consult him. Gita said that Shanker would be back about one o'clock, so why not come round and have lunch with them and also discuss his mother's treatment then.

Shanker was late that day. He came at about one thirty. When he entered the drawing room he saw Biren and Gita happily laughing together. His face darkened. They both became quiet and an unpleasant silence fell. Biren was the first to talk.

"Shanker, I was waiting for you. You see my mother is suffering from heart trouble and I wanted to consult you."

"Really, but why here? You could come to the hospital or to my consulting room." Rudeness was apparent in his tone. Gita quickly said, "He rang me up this morning and it is I who invited him for

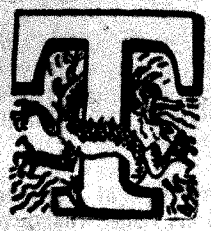
MAHESH

SARAT CHANDRA CHATTOPADHYAY



THE name of the village was Kashipur. The village was small; its Zemindar yet smaller. But so domineering was his personality that no subject of his would ever dare to raise a voice of a protest against his dispensation.

It was the birth-day celebration of the youngest son of the Zemindar. After performing the usual rites, due on such a solemn occasion, Tarkaratna (a Brahmin Pandit having the Sanskrit title of 'Tarkaratna') was returning home at noon. It was the end of 'Baisakh', but there was not a vestige of cloud in the sky. It seemed as though flames of fire were melting down the sun-burnt sky.

The field that stretched towards the horizon had become scorched and cracked like a ripe melon, and it appeared as though the blood-vessel of Mother Earth had been ceaselessly letting out heaps of smoke through the numberless crevices in her body. Would anybody direct his eyes towards the upward serpentine movements of those flames, his head would at once begin to reel, he would feel dazed.

On one side of this sun-burnt heath lay the house of Goffur the weaver. The mud-wall of the house had given way and his court-yard now became merged with the road-side, thus surrendering the privacy of the Zenana to the mercy of the passers-by. Standing under the shade of a 'Pitali' tree that grew by the road-side Tarkaratna shouted out, "Goffur! are you in?"

The ten-year-old daughter of Goffur responded to the call and said, "Why do you call Father? He has been laid up with fever and can't move out".

"Laid up with fever? Nonsense! Send that rascal! that rogue! that infidel! I shall teach him a good lesson!"

Goffur found it difficult to remain indifferent to the shouts and abuses of the Tarkaratna any longer. He slowly came out of his house, shivering with fever. A bull was standing there tethered to one of the branches of an old 'Babla' tree that raised its trunk over the dilapidated wall. Pointing to the bull Tarkaratna said, "May I know what you mean by this? Have you altogether forgotten that this is a village of the Hindoos and that its Zemindar is a Brahmin? And that nothing sacrilegious can be allowed to happen in this village?" His face grew crimson owing partly to the heat of his anger and partly to the scalding rays of the sun. And it was only natural that heated words came out of his lips at such a moment. But Goffur could not make out the cause of his temper and remained staring at his face, tongue-tied.

Tarkaratna continued, "Early in the morning when I passed by this way I found the bull tied to this tree and now at noon when I am coming back I find it exactly where it was. Do you know, fool, that the Zemindar will bury you alive if the bull dies for your negligence? Don't forget that he is not an ordinary Brahmin!"

"What shall I do sir? I have fallen in such a great trouble! I have been down with fever for the last few days, and when I try to take the bull out to feed it with a few baits of grass, my head begins to reel! Tell me, sir, what can I do now?"

"Then, why don't you untie it and let it graze freely?"

"Where shall I leave him to graze, sir? The paddy-crop has not yet been fully harvested; the straw has not yet been stacked, the edges of the corn-fields have all been singed by the heat of the sun; and there is not a handful of grass anywhere. If I now let the bull graze outside, he will either damage somebody's paddy-crop or eat from somebody's haystack — how can I untie him, Sir?"

Tarkaratna now relented a bit and said, "If you are not willing to unfasten it, then why don't you give it one or two bundles of straw that it may chew for the while? And has not your daughter cooked rice today? Then give it a tubful of gruel".

Goffur gave no reply. Helplessly staring at the face of the Tarkaratna for some time he heaved a heavy sigh of anguish.

Tarkaratna said, "Oh! you don't have that too? Why? What have you done with your share of straw? Have you despatched everything to your belly, that fathomless cavity? Shouldn't you hold back even one bundle out of your stock? You are a veritable butcher, I see!"

At this cruel charge Goffur's voice got chocked; and it became impossible for him to utter a word. After a little while he began to say in a drawling voice, "Sir, I really got some straw this year as my share, but the landlord held back the entire share in adjustment of my last year's dues to him. Falling at his feet I implored him piteously, saying, "My lord, you are both my saviour and dispenser of justice! I am entirely at your hands and is there any scope of my fleeing anywhere beyond your jurisdiction? Then kindly let me have a portion of my share of straw! You know, my only dwelling-shed that I and my little daughter share has already been denuded of thatch, and it is likely to become unfit for use any time, yet I do not mind that I shall roof it with palm leaves and somehow pass the rainy season. But if you do not let me have some straw my Mahesh will die of starvation".

Before he could finish his speech Tarkaratna interrupted and said with a derisive smile on his lips,

"The Zemindar will bury you alive . . ."

"How silly? A bull has been named Mahesh! I cannot but laugh at your foolish pranks!"

This sarcastic remark of the Tarkaratna was entirely lost on Goffur. He went on saying, "But, all my wails and solicitations went in vain; the Zemindar's heart did not soften. He gave me only the paddy that fell in my share with which I could somehow manage two months' food. The straw was stacked in entirely and poor Mahesh was given not a particle of that."

Hardly had Goffur uttered these words when his eyes became filled with tears and his voice got choked in auguish. Tarkaratna, however, was not the least moved at this. He said, "You are a nice fellow, I see. Have you no mind to pay your dues to the landlord? Do you expect that the Zemindar would feed you for nothing? And, you are so ungrateful that while living under his benign rule you dare to abuse his good name! And, what else can be expected of a low-bred fellow like you?"

Goffur said somewhat embarrassed, "Why shall I vilify him, Sir? But would you kindly say wherefrom I can pay his dues?

"I till only four bighas of land as a share cropper. Crops have failed for two successive years—they have dried up in the fields and even we two creatures, father and daughter, cannot have two square meals a day. Please also look at my room—during the rains I and my little daughter pass our nights simply squatting on a corner of its floor. Even there is no such space where we can sprawl out our legs and somehow recline ourselves. And please look at Mahesh once; he is now reduced to skin and bone. Would you be so kind as to lend me only two bundles of straw so that I can feed the bull to his heart's content only for a day or two?"

He had scarcely finished saying when he dropped at the feet of the Brahmin with a thud. Tarkaratna started up as if electrified, and hastily retracing his steps shouted out, "Fie on you, rogue! do you mean to touch my body?"

"No sir, why should I touch you? But wouldn't you lend me a bundle of straw? I have seen with my own eyes that you have as many as four big stacks — and if you part with a bundle or two out of them, your store will not be the least affected. I do not mind dying of starvation, but how could I see my Mahesh die without food before my eyes? — Mahesh, poor mute creature! he has no voice to express his feelings, he only stares at me and sheds tears".

"You are asking for a loan, but how will you repay it?" enquired Tarkaratna. Thinking that his prayer was going to be granted Goffur cried out in excitement, "Sir, I will repay your loan at all costs, I will not play false with you, Sir, I will not fail you!"

Tarkaratna made a peculiar intonation of his voice and mimicking Goffur's speech said, "I will repay your loan at all costs, Sir, I will not fail you, Sir! Oh my darling! you have come to cut jokes with me! Nonsense! Look here, fool, leave my path at once, and let me go; I have already got late and must reach home before long".

But hardly had he moved one step forward after saying this with a contemptuous smile on his lips, when he retraced his steps as if frightened and shouted out, "Go to Hell, rascal, why is this devil of a bull nodding its horns towards me, does it ..... does it mean to gore me?"

Goffur stood up and pointing to the bundle of fruits and soaked rice in the hand of the Brahmin said, "Oh, I see, Mahesh has got the scent of food, and extremely hungry that he is, he wants to eat....."

. . . his eyes became filled with tears . . .

"What! wants to eat! Nice ! As you are an idiot, so is your bull! It's a nice plan, no doubt — when it finds no grass to eat, let there be a meal of rice and banana! Look here, fool, remove it from my path! Oh, how terrible are its horns! I am sure it will not stop before it has killed some passer-by."

So saying Tarkaratna carefully crossed the place and went away with long strides.

Goffur now turned his glance from that direction and remained stupefied for sometime, and then wistfully looked at Mahesh. The two deep black eyes of Mahesh were expressing a great hunger and agony of his heart. Then coming near him Goffur said, "Mahesh, my dear, my pet, you couldn't have even a handful of grass, isn't it? They possess plenty, but they will never give anything to others! Well, what's of that? We never expect anything from them!"

It grew impossible for Goffur to continue in this strain, his throat was getting choked, and then drops of tears began to trickle down his eyes. He came to Mahesh and patted his neck and head and then began to say in a low whisper, "Mahesh, you are my son, you have served us for long eight years and now you have grown old; I cannot give you a full meal,—but you know quite well how dearly I love you!"

In response, Mahesh only stretched out his neck and remained standing somewhat cosily with his eyes closed. Goffur wiped off the tears from the back of Mahesh that fell from his eyes and then began to say in a low voice. "The Zemindar has snatched away the food from your mouth, he has also rented out the only pasture land of the village out of sheer greed for money. Mahesh, how can I save you in this year of crisis? If I let you graze outside, you will either damage somebody's haystacks or banana plantations—what shall I do with you now? Now that you have grown old and infirm you have become an unwelcome guest; everybody advises me to sell you at the cattle market." He had scarcely uttered these words within himself when his eyes became filled with tears. Wiping out the tears from his eyes Goffur cast his look around, held a handful of discoloured straw before the mouth of Mahesh and then said in a low voice, "Mahesh, take and eat this at once, otherwise—" "Father!"

"Why, my child!"

"Come to eat, Father", so saying Amina came out of the room and stood on the doorstep. Looking at her father for a while she said, "Father, you have again damaged the thatch to feed Mahesh?"

Goffur was apprehending the same thing; he felt somewhat ashamed and said, "Darling! it was all but rotten and was falling down itself; So I...."

"No, Father, I heard from inside the room that you were pulling out the thatch from the roof".

"No my child, I was not exactly doing so....".

"But, Father, what will you do when the wall gives way? — "

Goffur remained silent. Besides this one thatched shed there was no other room left in the house. And who knew better than he that this shed also would go out of use before long if he thus went on damaging its roof? And how long could one continue in such a wretched condition?

"Wash your hands and face, Father, and come to eat, I have already served the food", said the daughter.

Goffur said, "Give me the gruel and let me feed Mahesh first; he is so hungry!"

"All the gruel has dried up in the pan to-day; so how can you feed Mahesh?

"What! Not a drop remains!"

Goffur became simply speechless. Even this little girl of ten had realised that there should not be the least wastage of any article at such a critical moment. Washing her hands she went inside the room and stood by the side of her father. Then she served a little rice and some vegetable-soup on a brass plate for her father and took some rice for herself on an earthen plate. Goffur looked at her and towards the food served for him for sometime and then said in a mild voice, "Amina, my dear. I feel feverish: should I take rice now?"

"But didn't you tell me, Father, that you felt extremely hungry?" said Amina somewhat anxiously.

"Oh ! I told you so! Amina, I had no fever when I told you."

"Well, then I will keep the food for you to take at night!"

Goffur shook his head and said, "No, Amina, if I take such cold rice, won't it do more harm to my ailing body?"

"Then what will you eat, Father?" — said Amina. Goffur thought for sometime and seemed to have made a solution to the problem. He said, "Do one thing, Amina, give the rice to Mahesh. Won't you be able to cook me some food at night?"

Amina uttered not a word and kept on looking at her father's face. After a while she said gently, "Why not, Father? Of course, I will."

Goffur's face grew red and he kept silent.

It was the omniscient Lord alone who was perhaps the third person, besides these two, father and daughter, who understood the meaning of this drama, having seen everything from heaven.

About a week after this Goffur was one day sitting on the verandah with anxiety printed on his face. His Mahesh had been missing since the previous day. He became very weak after the recent illness: so Amina had been out since morning trying her best to search out the bull. When the day was waning she returned home, but without Mahesh. Approaching Goffur she said, "Do you know, Father, that Manik Ghose and others have taken Mahesh to the Police Pound?"

"That's absurd, you silly girl!" — said Goffur. "Yes, Father, it's a fact. Their servant told me,— 'Go and ask your father to make an enquiry at the pound of Dariapur'."

"What did Mahesh do?"

"He broke into their garden and spoiled the trees and plants, Father."

Goffur sat speechless. He apprehended various mishaps about Mahesh but he was not the least prepared for such a one. He was innocent as he was poor; so it was beyond his imagination that any of his neighbours could ever inflict such a heavy punishment on him. And could he ever dream that a pious man like Manik Ghose, who was well-known in this locality for his regard for cows and Brahmins could be so cruel to his dear Mahesh!

"The day is declining, Father, won't you go to bring back Mahesh?" Amina said.

Goffur simply said, "No".

"But I have been told by them that on the expiry of the third day the police will sell him at the cattle market."

"Let them do whatever they like," rejoined Goffur. Amina had no knowledge of the word "Catle market" but she had noticed on many occasions an abnormal change wrought on his father's countenance at the mere reference to the term. Without uttering a word she slowly left the place.

Under cover of night Goffur came out of his house stealthily and went to Banshi's shop. "Uncle, you have to lend me a rupee," he said to Banshi and then put his brass-plate under the bamboo stool.

Banshi knew all about its weight and other particulars as he had to pay such loans against mortgage of this utensil at least five times during the last two years. As he did before, this time too he raised no objection to Goffur's demand and handed over a silver coin to him.

The next day Mahesh was again seen in his wonted place, the self-same "Babla" tree, that cord, that post, that fodderless manger and the same wistful hungry look of those black, tearful eyes; an elderly-looking Muslim agriculturist was very minutely examining Mahesh with the keen eyes of an expert. Goffur sat silent in one corner of his yard. When he finished his examination the old man brought out a ten-rupee note out of the fold in his wrapper, and then approaching Goffur said, "Take it Goffur Mean, I give you a whole note".

Goffur stretched out his hand and received the note, but he kept silent all the while.

Now when the two men that accompanied the old man went to untie the cord of the bull, Goffur suddenly flew into a rage and said, "Take care, I tell you, don't touch the cord if you want your good!"

The men became simply amazed. The old man, who, too, was not a little surprised at Goffur's attitude said, "Why? What's the matter?" Goffur replied in the same angry tone,—"There's no why. The bull is mine and I shall not part with it. And none has any right to interfere in my sweet will." So saying he flung the note at him indignantly.

"But didn't you receive an advance from us yesterday on this account?" they said.

"Well, take it back." He at once brought out two silver coins from the fold of his cloth and threw them forcibly on the ground in utter disgust.

Finding that a heated altercation was impending, the old man gently said, bringing a smile on his lips, "Oh, I see! You mean to draw out from us another two rupees, isn't it? Well, men, hand over to the little daughter of Goffur Meah two silver coins to purchase some sweets. Well, are you now satisfied, Goffur Meah?"

"No".

"But do you know that there's none to pay you a single farthing more?"

Goffur got more excited and violently nodding his head cried out,—"No ! No ! "

The old man now got irritated at Goffur's obstinacy and said, "What do you mean, Goffur ! Do you mean to say that what I have said is wrong?

What will be a little paying is only its hide; otherwise, what matter is there in its body?"

"Fie! Fie! Hold your tongue, I tell you!" Suddenly an abusive term slipped out of his tongue. He then rushed into his room and began to threaten them saying that if they did not leave the village at once he would have them shoe-beaten by the men of the Zemindar.

Apprehending a disturbance, the men went away disappointed in their bargain. But in no time Goffur was summoned to appear before the Zemindar. He now understood that the whole matter had been reported to the Zemindar and that in a distorted manner.

When he reached the court he found that the Zemindar was surrounded by a host of gentlemen as well as some vulgar people. At the very sight of Goffur Shibu Babu shouted out with his eyes reddened with anger, "Goffur, I don't know how to punish you! Are you fully aware under whom you are living?"

Goffur said with folded hands, "I am quite aware, my lord! Only that we have often to go without food, else I would not the least mind paying any fine you would deign to impose on me."

Everybody present was surprised at Goffur's submission. So long they knew him to be an obstinate and ill-tempered man. He said almost weeping, "My lord! Hereafter I shall never commit such an offence." With these words he pulled his own ears with both hands and then rubbed his nose against the ground from one end of the courtyard to the other.

Shibu Babu said somewhat relenting, "Well Goffur, you may go now; but remember that such offence must not recur in future."

Whoever heard of this incident shuddered, and was convinced that it was only due to the benign influence and rigorous administration of Shib Chandra Babu that such a nuisance could be stopped for ever. Tarkaratna, who was present when all this happened, lost no time to make a scriptural exposition of the word "Cow" and concluded his illuminating speech with the remark that to give asylum to an impious, ill-bred man in the village was grossly sacrilegious, and thus opened the eyes of the ignorant villagers.

Goffur uttered not a word in protest, and, considering all these abuses and harassment to be his due, returned home with a rather light heart. He begged some gruel from his neighbours and fed Mahesh with it and then began to pat his head muttering in a low voice many words of endearment.

It was now the end of Jaistha. And it grew impossible for one without looking at the sky of that day even to imagine how terribly grim could become the countenance of the sun that first revealed itself with its flaming appearance in late Baisakh. It seemed as though there was not a drop of mercy anywhere. And it was hardly possible to conceive that this blazing appearance of the universe could ever undergo the least change, that this sky could ever become a little moistened with clouds. It appeared as though these flames of fire that were being showered day and night through the burning firmament would never cease, would never be extinguished before everything had been completely burnt down.

On such a day Goffur returned home at noon. He was not accustomed to the work of a day-labour.

Hold your tongue'!

He had no fever for the last four or five days, but his body was as weak as it was tired. He went out to find out some work, but no work was available anywhere. He only suffered the terrible heat of the sun, all his efforts went in vain. He was so tired and overpowered with thirst and hunger that his vision got almost blurred. Standing on the courtyard of his house, Goffur called out, "Amina, haven't you cooked rice yet?"

The girl slowly came out of the room and stood before her father holding a post with her hand but without a word on her lips.

Finding no response Goffur cried out, 'Is meal ready? What? Is it not? May I know, why it is not?'

"Rice is wanting, Father!"

"Rice is wanting? Then, why didn't you tell me in the morning.?"

"I told you Father; I told you last night".

Casting a dreadful frown at her and almost mimicking her speech Goffur burst out, — "Told you last night! Nonsense! can anybody remember anything told overnight?" His own harsh tone only added fuel to the flame of his anger. With an abnormal countenance he cried out, — "How can there remain even a little store of rice left? Without ever enquiring whether the ailing father eats or not, you the old girl go on eating four or five times a day like a glutton? Henceforth, I won't go out before I have kept my store of rice under lock and key! Well, give me a pitcherful of water,

I am going to die of thirst. Say, idiot, that is also wanting!"

Amina remained standing there in the same way with a downcast face. When after waiting for a few moments Goffur understood that there was no water even to quench his thirst, he could no longer restrain himself. Rushing to the little girl he gave her a violent slap on the face, and said, — "What do you do the whole day, wretched girl? Thousands of men die everyday, but can't you die?"

The girl uttered not a word. She took up the empty earthen pitcher and wiping her tears silently went out even in the scorching rays of the sun. But she had not gone out of sight when Goffur felt as though he had been pierced through his heart with a shaft. He only knew with what great difficulty he had brought up this motherless girl! He now realised that this loving, dutiful and sweet-tempered girl of his was not to blame. Since the small quantity of paddy grown in his field had been completely exhausted she could not have two full meals a day. Some day she had only one meal a day and some day none at all. Taking five or six meals a day was as false as it was absurd;—and the reason of the want of drinking water was not unknown to Goffur. The two or three public tanks of the village were completely dried up. The small quantity of water that was still left in the private tank of Shibcharan Babu was not available to the public. And the little water that could occasionally be dug out of those public tanks had such a heavy demand that one had to stand in a long queue before getting a pitcherful of water. And this girl being a Muslim had to stay outside the crowd. She could fetch a little water if only somebody would deign to pour it into her pitcher after she had waited for several hours. All this was known to Goffur. Maybe, there was no water or that she was not favoured with a little water by anybody in the midst of the heavy crowd. Thinking that such a thing might have happened that day he became sorry for his conduct; and instantly his eyes became filled with tears.

Amina remained standing there.

Just at this moment a peon from the Zemindar's court made his appearance before him like Death incarnate. "Goffur, are you at home?" the man shouted out.

"Yes, I am, but why?" replied Goffur somewhat indifferently.

"The Zemindar has summoned you to appear before his court. Come at once with me."

"I haven't yet washed myself and had my midday meals. I shall go some time later,"—replied Goffur.

But such audacity on the part of a poor subject was more than the Zemindar's peon could endure. He shouted out with an abusive remark. "Look here, fool, my master has asked me to drag you to the court beating you with shoes."

Goffur again lost his temper. Making a filthy remark at the man he said, "None is a slave under the Queen's regime. I live here on payment of usual taxes. Go and tell your Zemindar that I am not going to abide by his orders".

But, in this world it is a positive danger for a small man to plead in the name of a great one! The only relieving feature is that his feeble voice does not reach those big ears! Otherwise there would have been no end of his miseries; he would have been deprived of his food as well as of sleep for ever.

What happened after this is needless to mention, but when after an hour he returned from the Zemindar's court his face and eyes grew swollen. It was due to Mahesh that he had to suffer all this harassment. As soon as Goffur left home Mahesh also broke loose from the cord and went out, entered the Zemindar's compound and ate up the flower-plants and damaged the paddy that was being sunned in the courtyard, and at last when he was going to be caught he pushed down the little daughter of the Zemindar and made good his escape.

This incident was not the first of its kind. On previous occasions Goffur escaped punishment only on the ground of his extreme poverty. And this time, too, he might have been excused of his offence had he once approached the Zemindar and begged his forgiveness. But instead of beginning his pardon he only gave offence to him by saying that he had duly paid his taxes and that he was no slave to anybody.

Being a Zemindar, Shibcharan Babu found it impossible to ignore this insolent remark of a poor subject of his. Goffur also raised no protest against the abuses and beatings of the Zemindar; he brooked all these without the least demur, and after returning home he silently lay down on the floor in extreme languor and dejection. He forgot his thirst and hunger, but his heart was burning like the noon-day sky outside.

How long he passed in this way he was not conscious of, but when a groaning cry from the

MY DAD'S DENTAL ADVENTURE

By T. Lewis

MY father was thoroughly normal save in one respect. He had an irrational fear of the dentist's chair. This was all the more unusual because his closest friend was a dentist. It was on the golf-course that Dad and Dr. Duncan had become friends. Both had taken to the game late in life. So, neither was very proficient. Yet the fascination of golf so grew on them, that they never let a week-end pass without a single on the links.

Golf appealed to my father's temperament. He liked to walk and talk. What better place to do this than in the sylvan setting of the golf-course! Moreover the exercise of the game, helped him to work off that middle-age swell which comes from good eating and sedentary employment.

By modern standards my mother was old fashioned. Her sole preoccupation was her home. She had never heard of Napoleon's dictum about an army marching on its stomach. But experience had taught her that not only the good health of a family, its cheer also depended on a good kitchen. Her greatest creative effort went into her cooking. Without exaggeration, every week she had one or other palatable surprise for us.

My father believed that the good things of life were to be enjoyed. Foo ' was one such thing, and so he ate with relish. His was no hedonistic abandon. He had acquired a discriminating palate which he considered the mark of a cultured man. My mother, of course, often questioned his judgment in this matter, and it led to pleasant banter between them.

Unexpectedly this changed. It must have been round about my sixteenth year. Afterwards my mother referred to it as the one and only crisis of her marriage. My father went off his feed. Even at my mother's tastiest preparations, he merely nibbled. She could not understand this 'volte face' in disposition. He spaciously attributed it to the water which had so much mica that his stomach was affected. Using all the subtle persuasion she could muster, my mother pleaded with him to have a check-up by a doctor instead of being his own physician.

Thinking that such a course was sufficiently safe to hide his real trouble, my father, just to please my mother, agreed. Alas for him, his judgment miscarried. The doctor was a better diagnostician than he had thought.

"It's not your stomach, but your teeth which are at fault. Have them out, for they will poison not only your stomach, but your whole system." This was the secret my father had been cherishing. That explains why his medicine chest was filled with an ample supply of clove oil and creosote. He had been dabbing his gums and teeth with these oils in the hope they would relieve his pain and deaden the exposed nerves.

Now that the cause of the trouble had been traced, its remedy was simple. So, thought my mother : Dr. Duncan was not only a reputed dentist, he was her husband's good friend. Eagerly she made an appointment for my father. Expectantly she looked forward to the passing of a cloud which had, of late, hung over her home. Little did she, or, for that matter anyone else, guess the complexes deep down in my father's sub-conscious mind which would continue to resist all attempts at making him take dental treatment.

My mother made several appointments. He balked at every one of them. Sometimes at the last moment he would back out. Once while she was reviving up the motor of the car to drive him there, he called it off because of some imaginary business. The Duncans were friends of our family. We visited theirs, and they came over to our place. But since the time my mother had begun to hound him about seeing a dentist, Dad had not gone to Dr. Duncan's place. If things were allowed to remain in this groove, my mother feared we might lose the friendship of the Duncans. This my father did not want. So, on the next occasion he consented to accompany her. He suggested a Sunday because the doctor literally closed clinic on that day.

The visit was like old times. Mrs. Duncan and mother exchanged homely chit-chat. Dad and the doctor discussed the chances of the different favourites at the next golf championship the club was soon to hold. Neither entered for anything save the handicap. But they were as keen as the participants. Before leaving, the doctor remarked on my father being a shadow of his former self. Then my mother spilled the beans.

For some time her husband had been off his feed. Our family physician had examined him and suggested that he see a dentist because his trouble, so far, was merely his teeth. She had made several appointments, but he always found alibis. While Dr. Duncan looked on pathetically, my father blushed to the roots of his few hairs. To relieve his embarrassment the doctor said: "You know I don't work on Sundays. But I can have a look and tell you how things are." The check-up confirmed what the physician had advised. Twelve teeth had decayed beyond repair and my Dad's gums had suppurated. This made it advisable to extract all the teeth. For my father it was a terrifying prospect. Dr. Duncan reassured him: "I'll do it in such easy stages you'll feel nothing before, during and after the extractions." He spoke with such assurance that he generated confidence. The doctor consulted his engagement book for the coming week and gave my father the earliest appointment convenient. With a final recommendation that my mother should accompany Dad when he came for the appointment, he saw them off.

Mother did accompany Dad. For once she thought his morale was good: he raised no excuse and made no fuss. Instead he praised her for her over-solicitous attention. Her retort was that she was merely carrying out doctor's orders. Everything suddenly changed when Dad got into the dentist's chair. My mother pleaded, the doctor cajoled. Yet nothing availed. Dad would not open his mouth. So they returned in tense silence, and then my mother broke down. Up to this my father's behaviour had tortured her privately, now it added the fresh smart of disgrace in public.

She recalled another visit to Dr. Duncan's with my little sister. The child was afraid, but they had no difficulty in making her do what they had told her. There was no public exhibition of terror, after the manner they had witnessed today. And to think that the actor was no other than her husband who had been decorated for valour in war. After such a show, his name was mud with Dr. Duncan . . . .

What my father felt most of all was the hurt his conduct gave my mother. How could he explain to her that he was the victim of something which was beyond his reach, and which paralysed his will. He didn't like to admit it to himself. On the level of sensibility, this domestic drama had become for the main actors, a tragedy. Then by a merciful act of Providence, something happened which relieved its tension.

I won the junior tennis championship of the State. My photograph appeared in the newspapers. No one in the family before ever had this distinction. My parents were both pleased. My father,

Indian Dances

By HIRANMAY BANERJEE

DANCING in India is a very old institution. "Bharata Natyam", the extant book on classical dance was written sometime in the second century A.D. The Classical Dances have been developed on certain basic ideas. To properly appreciate them, therefore, it is necessary to pick up a working knowledge of these ideas. The Indian theory visualises dancing or acting as having two parts, namely the objective part and the subjective part. The objective aspect is called Bhava. The subjective aspect is Rasa. The objective part is constituted by what the dancer as an artist presents to the spectator. The subjective part is represented by appreciation of the presentation by the spectator. There are nine bhavas with nine corresponding rasas. For example we may take the case of anger. Its depiction by the dancer is its bhava aspect and its appreciation by the spectator is the rasa aspect.

Here the objective aspect is the presentation by the dancer of the picture of a mood so to say. Its appeal as an artistic creation is not to the cognitive faculty of the spectator but his emotional faculty. Although the presentations are of different types their appeal is to the aesthetic sense of the spectator. It is not a case so much where the depiction of a particular mood induces a corresponding sentiment in the mind of the spectator. It compares on his side to the appreciation of a work of art which leads to aesthetic enjoyment. For example a painter may paint the picture of a bad man or of a courageous man. When somebody studies it as work of art he does not feel disgust when he sees the first picture nor does he feel the sentiment of a man of courage when he sees the second picture. His reaction to both of them may be expressed in the same way by simply saying that they are beautiful. The Dance executed by the dancer stands in a similar relation to the spectator. The presentation side is Bhava and the appreciation side is Rasa.

Dance has been classified into three kinds, viz. Nritta, Nritya and Abhinaya.

(1) Nritta is what may be called abstract dancing. It does not express any thought but is limited to execution of certain dance patterns.

(2) Nritya is more concrete. It presents a theme or a mood. So it is accompanied by music also.

(3) Abhinaya or acting is a series of dances which tell a complete story. It can, therefore, be called dance play.

In classical dances an elaborate gesture language is employed. The component elements of this gesture language are four namely, (1) Angik that is bodily gestures, (2) Vachick that is what is conveyed through words, songs or sounds, (3) Aharya which consists of equipments, costumes and make-up and (4) Satvika—which is facial expression supplemented by movements of the body to reflect the inner mood of the mind. For example, when you want to show that you are angry your eyes wear the look of anger, your facial muscles assume the expression of an angry man etc.

In classical dancing gestures of the limbs, particularly those of the hands have assumed very great importance. They are the media through which ideas are conveyed or action is depicted. Such gestures are known as Mudras. There are two broad types of Mudras, namely,—Samyutahasta and Asamyutahasta. Samyutahasta is gesture with both hands while Asamyutahasta is gesture with a single hand. These originally formed part of dance poses. But in Kathakali dance they have been isolated and utilised with great effect in depicting both ideas and action by a combination of certain basic Mudras. For example, the flight of a bird or the hovering of a bee over a flower may be depicted beautifully through such gesture language.

A system of time measurement is another outstanding feature in Indian dance. The measurement is made with the help of different kinds of drums in different dances. For example, in Bharata Natyam, the Mridangam is used. In Manipuri the Khol is used. In Kathak dance in North India two separate drums are played by the two hands. The one played by the left hand is called Bayan and the one played by the right hand Tabla.

The home of classical dances of India is mainly in the South. There they retain the pure form. The oldest style of classical dance is called Bharata Natyam. It is also called Dasi-attam that is dance by Devadasis who are girls dedicated to the temple. This form of dance is accompanied by the drum only in its abstract Nritta form. In Nritya form it is accompanied with music also. A stanza of a poem is sung, the Mridangam is played, and the dancing is executed by gestures.

The most popular form of dance in South India is the Kathakali dance which belongs to Kerala. This is not purely ritualistic. It is popular dancing performed in the open in villages. It tells whole stories taken from the Ramayan, the Mahabharata or the Puranas. It is dance play. In this type of dancing, the most important features are the make-up and the gesture language. The make-up is very elaborate involving use of big helmets, painting of the face and flamboyant dresses. It uses an elaborate code of gesture language based on gestures of the hand.

The Manipuri Dance was evolved in Manipur in North East India. It is based on the local folk dances but was adapted subsequently to depicting stories of Lord Krishna and his milkmaid friends, under influence of Vaishnavism. Its most characteristic form is the Rasa variety of dancing. It is group dancing in which the only male member in the party is Krishna and the others are all Gopikas including both Radha and her principal associates. Krishna uses a head-dress with a peacock's feather mounted on it and has a flute in his hand. The women use a tight bodice and a gown which looks like an open umbrella. Overlapping it there is a smaller gown of white material reaching upto the knee. On the head is a cone-shaped cap surmounted by a transparent veil. The tempo of this dance is slow, but it is very graceful. It involves no movement of the head at all which is very frequent in the South Indian dances.

Kathak is the classical dance form evolved in North India proper. This is absolutely secular, its objective being pure entertainment. It has assimilated elements which are both indigenous and imported. In fact it evolved under the patronage of Muslim rulers as a form of court dancing for their entertainment. The dancer is a woman who wears a pyjama and long coat with a cap on her head. It is not accompanied by any vocal music, the only accompaniments being the percussion instruments and a string instrument which is called the Sarengi. It involves elaborate foot work and spinning of the body punctuated by sudden stops.

SANTINIKETAN

I shall now refer to the new dance form evolved by Rabindranath Tagore in Santiniketan. He was both a playwright and an actor. He had written plays in verse form. He had also experimented with musical dramas named by him Giti Natya which is comparable to operas. It appears that he wanted to go one step further and add dancing as an addi-

LOST CAUSES & GREAT FIGHTERS

By PRAMATHA CHAUDHURI

ROBERT Browning would have no truck with those who do not love to fight and to struggle against odds. Man suffers a setback only to renew the struggle with greater strength. It is within the power of man's spirit to pluck the sting out of failure and to make of it something better than success.

> "Though I do my best I shall scarce succeed.
> But what if I fail of my purpose here?
> It is but to keep the nerves at strain,
> To dry one's eyes and laugh at a fall,
> And, baffled, get up and begin again,—"

This (Life In A Love), Prospice and the Epilogue to Asolando, may be taken as, in a special degree, his testament to the world. With those who fall fighting this is an article of faith which crude sentimentalism would do well not to assail.

Let us turn to mythology and history haphazardly. Prometheus defied the gods and was chained to a rock to be tortured by a vulture. Shelley's Prometheus made light of his sufferings. He would not bend because the highest goodness lies in endless struggle.

No doubt the Satan of Milton, at least the Satan of the earlier books, is a majestic figure. There is a grandeur and spaciousness in his manner and conduct which makes him worthy of his Heavenly Opponent's steel. His fall is rapid and complete. But some remnant of his former glory clings to him. From first to last he never thinks of submission to God.

> "To bow and ask for grace
> Will never be our task."

he says and to this he sticks throughout. We rejoice he made up his mind to fight his quarrels out to the end.

We now descend to personages who relegated success to a place of secondary importance. There are Leonidas, Hannibal, Sivaji, Netaji Subhas and Rana Protap.

Xerxes would stick at nothing to do Sparta down. He collected a large army and a large fleet. He crossed the Hellespont, marched through Thrace, Macedonia and Thessaly. So far he had matters all his own way. But at Thermopylae, a narrow pass between Mount Octe and the sea he had to cross swords with one whose name is to the world the synonym of simple heroism.

OBEDIENT THEY LIE

Leonidas would not yield obedience to him. He repulsed the Persian attack with great slaughter. Had Ephialtes not shown the Persians a path across the hills by which the Spartans could be taken in the rear he would have staved off the invasion. The Persian host was so numerous that their arrows hid the sun. Leonidas fell. The defenders, 300 strong, were forced back behind the wall. As the enemy broke in from behind they drew together on to a hillock where they made their last stand to be surrounded and cut down to a man by overwhelming numbers. A column was afterwards erected at Sparta with the names of Leonidas and his 300. On it is engraved:

"Go tell to Sparta that passest by, That here obedient to her words we lie."

It was Sparta in 480 B.C. and the Sparta of Leonidas sank into history.

Though cast much in the same mould, Hannibal, son of Hamilcar Barca, is a loser of a different type. The crushing defeat of the Carthaginians off the group of island called Aegates in 242 B.C. burnt in the brain of Hannibal. He was bound from infancy by his father to eternal enmity to Rome and was casting about for an opportunity to break with the Romans. He picked a quarrel with them by attacking Saguntum, a city in alliance with Rome. His march to Rome through the Pyrenees amidst terrible natural difficulties has developed something of epic greatness. He crossed the Alps in the teeth of a murderous fire and waged war invincibly for about fifteen years until recalled to save the home-land. Scipio emerged triumphant but Zama was not the grave of his reputation. The fibre of this man bearing up against every misfortune, betrayed and undermined from home, pitted against Rome with her natural, nascent strength must have been tenser than any we have been told about. Trasemene, Cannae and Zama—these are the tableaux.

Sivaji hurled a huge challenge in the face of Aurangzeb. The thought that surged up in his breast was how to restore India to her former glory. This was not easy to do. He shed much blood and many tears for it. Perhaps the task he set himself was much too big. Perhaps he overestimated his strength. But it is a fault of which the brave are guilty. He died leaving his work incomplete. Failure is the hall-mark of greatness.

STERNER STUFF

Netaji Subhas is made of a sterner stuff. The very thought of India in chains oppressed him terribly. His one wish was to see the chains slit. He gave a new direction to men's thoughts and actions. He gave shape to the nebulous ideas of national work in the circumstances of our difficult and complex problem. Above all he gave tone to Indian politics. He was bound to be fearless of danger or death and wasted no time or thought on questions of whom he might displease or dissatisfy in pressing along the path of his duty and more than Aryuna would have on the field of "Kurukhestra" after having been convinced by Sree Krishna of the way of his "Kshatria" duty. He smuggled out of India, made soldiers out of straw, so to speak, and would have marched to Delhi had luck not let him down badly.

Memories stored in the fields and hills of Mewar are awakened on Rana Pratap's leaving us behind this shore of eternity. He lives not dimmed by mortal changes but transfigured and glorified. Akbar wanted to make quick work of him. But the craft of Pratap was more than match for him. Cheetore was despoiled of her ornaments. Cheetore widowed, burning in memory, had set him on fire and transformed him into a consummate general. He and his family lived in the hills, ate of wild fruits and bread of grass. But Akbar gave him no respite. He set against him his kindred in faith and blood and let hell loose on him. He was not fated like Napoleon to eat his heart out in exile. He bided his time and put the Moghul army to the sword. It was a stroke of luck that Prince Saleem survived the attack of the Rajpoot at the battle of Huldighat. He regained Komulmeer and Odipur. But Cheetore eluded his grasp. He lived in a hut on the bank of the Peshola and closed his eyes in sight of the river that babbled by to reveal the soul of the poet of patriotism.

Only those who take a narrow view of life put a premium on success. But the greatest of men are remembered by work unachieved.

tional element to it. In the histrionic art, the senses of hearing and sight are the medium through which the actor communicates his ideas to the audience. Obviously, his objective was to introduce a dance form in which the appeal both to the sense of hearing and the sense of sight is intensified. That is why spoken words were rendered in verse and sung. Similarly mere expression of the face and gesture of the body as involved in ordinary stage play was replaced by dancing. Evidently he was influenced both by Kathakali and Manipuri form of dancing both of which he liked and introduced in his school at Santiniketan. He called these new plays dance dramas. For this purpose he wrote out new versions of old dramas or poems written by himself. For example, we may refer to the drama Chitrangada which had been written in blank verse as early as the late nineties of the last century. He rendered it in dance drama form in the thirties of the present century.

In this form of dancing the play is sung by a group who sit at the back of the stage. The actors do not utter words but give expression to the ideas conveyed by the songs through the gesture language of dances. While Tagore adopted some of the Mudras of classical dances he depended more on natural gestures which suggest themselves for expression of ideas mainly based on miming. For example in the dance drama Shyama the hero appears in the very first scene as a foreigner in a strange land engaged in opening his bundle and examining its contents and then carrying it away. This is depicted by copying the gestures of a man engaged in such work. Similarly, in the Dance Drama Chandalika, in the first scene the untouchable girl is found engaged in drawing water from a well. The dance conforms to similar kind of miming here also.

VIVEKANANDA

And

SWADESHI MOVEMENT

By K. P. BISWAS

WILL the statement that Swami Vivekananda and the Swadeshi Movement in Bangal were complementary to each other be supported by history?

It is admitted both by those who directly guided the two phases of the Movement and those who are now out to trace its course that Swami Vivekananda's message and writings were the fountain-source of inspiration to sustain it. There is no dispute on this point and it can be established by sufficient documentary evidence from authoritative sources.

The controversy is likely to flare up when the same statement is put in a reverse order, namely, that it is the Swadeshi Movement and its aftermath, originally inspired by Swami Vivekananda, that established his rightful place in history. To put it precisely it means that if the Swadeshi Movement would not have intervened during the particular period following the passing away of the great Swami (in 1902) it is problematical if Swami Vivekananda's stand could have been so well secured, his popularity attain the pinnacle that it did and which still continue to retain its hold. For ready acceptance of the last point it can be stated here by way of digression that Swamiji's works are still the best-seller in the State.

The first point, I am afraid, will not be readily acceptable; not for any other reason but because it has not yet been looked into though it is highly interesting. As a matter of fact no serious study of Swami Vivekananda and research work of the age in which he lived have been undertaken by politically conscious literary workers even during the Centenary year of his birth when lots of books on and about him are available.

What was actually Swami Vivekananda's position in Calcutta Society in 1902? There was no dispute in any quarters, hostile or friendly, that the Swami was an outstanding personality, an irrepressible source of inspiration and a sharp and dominating intellect out to throw away many things of the prevailing Society and to replace them with healthier Indian stuff. However justifiable might be all those and many other demands regarding him the Society as a whole refused to move according to his direction and guidance. The press of the day was sharply divided in three sections, hostile, friendly and utterly indifferent to him and his activities. Public leadership showed the same attitude. Young men, particularly the college boys, were not materially different from the leaders.

Let us not suffer any confusion in outlining the picture of the particular period. It ranged between 1897-1902 and 1902-1908. One was not the same as the other. The first official correspondence over the partition of Bengal (Chittagong Division and the Districts of Dacca and Mymensingh to be added to Assam) was issued on December 11, 1902, just after five months of the demise of Swami Vivekananda, in a letter by H. H. Risley, Secretary, Government of India, Simla, to the Chief Secretary, Government of Bengal, Calcutta. And let us also not suffer any confusion over it that even when the Swadeshi Movement reached its highest point of demonstration the small College Square side-way ground or the compound of the residence of Pasupati Bose in Baghbazar could provide adequate accommodation to the enthusiastic crowd. Not to speak of the Maidan which is today's venue, even the spacious Shraddhananda Park of Non-Cooperation days was never thought of for staging demonstration then.

DIFFERENT WORLD

It was a different world altogether, a world dominated by England-returned men with a few "natives" who were honourable exceptions. Swamji's achievements and success undoubtedly cast a spell over them all abroad at the beginning of his emergence (1893-4) but that spell was broken by 1902. Various factors, mostly personal but in some cases communal too, helped in breaking that romantic spell.

The actual position was deplorable. Even a memorial meeting on behalf of Calcutta citizens to mourn the demise of Swami Vivekananda — the usual practice then was to have it convened in Calcutta Town Hall — could not for long be organised. The friendly press bitterly complained about this utter neglect. In contrast to Calcutta, Madras went mad over the sad event where people held memorial meetings not only in towns of the Presidency but even in the countryside, going ahead with the work of perpetuating Vivekananda's memory. Whatever public expression of sorrow the death of Swami Vivekananda evoked in Calcutta was due to the personal efforts of his disciple, Sister Nivedita and his friend Narendra Nath Sen. Gita Society was then a reputed body of leading literary men and Narendra Nath Sen was its president. At a meeting of the Society held after the passing away of the Swamiji, a resolution was moved by him from the Chair expressing profound sorrow over the demise of the Swami. None other than Sen spoke at the meeting which was attended among others by Bepin Chandra Pal.

The resolution with a covering letter—people of the period were very formal — was sent by Sen to Swamiji's brother-Sannyasis at Belur. Swami Brahmananda, President of the Ramkrishna Math and Mission, gave a reply to that letter of Naren Sen. In that remarkable letter Swami Brahmananda for the first time made an assessment of the role of Swami Vivekananda for others to gauge. A quotation of that letter, more than any other document, would help a student to note and appreciate the extent to which the yet-to-be-started Swadeshi Movement and its glorious aftermath could resurrect Swami Vivekananda and enthrone him on the high pedestal in the people's mind.

"Dear Sir", writes Swami Brahmananda in his letter to Naren Sen, "your kind note of sympathy enclosing the resolution of the Society (Gita Society) to express the deep sense of sorrow at the loss, has reached our hands. We hasten to send our grateful thanks for the same on behalf of all the Sannyasis of the Belur Math.

"Irreparable as the loss has been to ourselves, it gives us joy even at this time to think that the unselfish labours of the dear Swami in behalf of his motherland are being appreciated in the midst of his own people, however slightly. Time alone will show the extent of his labours and how he has raised Mother India, in the estimation of the great nations of the West. The sower has sown the seed and gone to his rest, but shall we be able to hold our own and carry on the great work which he has so nobly begun? Let us hope so; in the meantime let us all rally round the sacred memory of the great life that has been taken away from among us for united efforts for the regeneration of our own land and people".

That sowing the great Swami did between 1897-1902. And the rich harvest about which Swami Brahmananda could not be definite at that time began to be reaped between 1903-8 — and which is going on till now. It is historically provable subject.

It is greatly interesting to study the reaction of the leading public men of India of the time towards Swami Vivekananda's activities. It is remarkable to note that those among them, who were just then showing signs to go left, ardently championed Vivekananda while those, who were on the saddle and later turned out to be rightists, were cold and maintained almost a total silence over him and his activities. An analysis of their attitude towards Swami Vivekananda alone would materially help a student to sort out the controversy which later burst out over Anglicisation and Indianisation of our political and social life, over Moderatism and Extremism, over "mendicancy" and self-reliance etc. etc.

Let us refer to some names; Gokhale, Surendra Nath Banerjea, Ananda Mohon Bose, Romesh Chandra Dutt, Rash Behari Ghosh, Ambica Majumdar, Pandit Madan Mohon Malaviya were leading figures of the period. They all stood for maintaining British-Indian political ties. It was a fundamental question with them. They all, except Banerjea and that too only partially, studiously avoided Swami Vivekananda and what he stood for. It is doubtful if any of them ever spoke publicly about the Swami during his life time or even after his demise. Surendra Nath Banerjea addressed the first Town Hall meeting held to congratulate Vivekananda in 1894 but failed even to attend the memorial meeting held in 1902 although it was scheduled that he would move a resolution.

NEW FORCE

In contrast to them we note a new set of men coming up and hailing the Swami and championing his cause. They included P. Mitter, Bar-at-Law, soon to be the founder of the Anusilan Samity, the first organised secret society on this area of the country, Aurobindo Ghosh soon to be the rider of the storm sweeping Bengal, Brahmabandhav Upadhyaya, an outstanding scholar and fanatic champion for re-establishing Indianism in all fields of activities and above them all, Lokmanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak. Needless it is to emphasize that they were all exponents of the new force just released—you may call it revival of Hinduism if you are prejudiced—in direct opposition to the process of Anglicisation then prevailing. They were not silent admirers of the Swami either. They loudly proclaimed their views about him and welcomed his activities too. I will not dilate on this point in this short article, but I cannot resist the temptation of quoting a few lines written by Lokmanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak—a quotation I have not noticed anywhere referred to in the literature issued during this Centenary year of Swami's birth. It is taken from the biography of the Lokmanya by S. L. Karandikar.

"On 4th July, 1902", writes the author, "the world was shocked to hear that Swami Vivekananda had passed away. The following passage from Tilak's article in the Keshari dated 8th July is remarkable for the comparison it institutes between the Swami and the Shankaracharya:

"Shankaracharya, who lived more than a thousand years ago, understood the glory that was Hinduism. He valued it as an inestimable national asset and a source of national strength. He made it the mission of his life to propagate it all over the world. His faith in the glory of Hinduism did not merely blossom into words; it ripened into a concrete achievement. What that towering personality achieved in those old times, Vivekananda has the unique distinction of having achieved towards the end of the 19th century."

BOSE'S LETTER

In altogether a different category are to be put in the names of Jagadish Chandra Bose, Rabindra Nath Tagore and Bepin Chandra Pal. There is no controversy whatsoever over the fact that Jagadish Chandra Bose had deep regard and esteem throughout his eventful life for the Swami. Indeed it was reciprocal. Jagadish Chandra Bose was the only leading Brahmo member of the Citizens Committee set up at the Town Hall Vivekananda Memorial meeting to take steps to perpetuate his memory. Incidentally, I may mention here that I came across a letter written by the illustrious scientist to Swami Vivekananda in the archives of the President-Maharaj of the Belur Math which had not yet seen the light of the day.

Undoubtedly Rabindra Nath Tagore made only a few references about Swamiji in his writings. Possibly there was a trace of conflict of personality towards the beginning between them but later that hesitancy was well discarded by the poet. However few those references by Tagore might be they were all significant and fully complimentary too. As editor of the Sadhana Rabindra Nath was possibly one of the first of his countrymen to comment (in 1894) quite approvingly—without mentioning the name of the Swami—on the Hindu move made at Chicago to explain its message and the success achieved there for the cause. That he presided over a local memorial meeting held shortly after the death of Swamiji where he also spoke, and that later in the company of Saroda Charan Mitra, Jagadish Chandra Bose, Dr. Chuni Lal Bose, Prof. Satish Chandra Vidyabhusan, Dr. Kedar Dutt, Nagen Mitra, Kailash Kanjilal, and Narendra Nath Bose, B.L. he went to Belur Math to attend the Vivekananda birth anniversary celebrations in 1905 are well-known.

Bepin Chandra Pal, however, maintained a critical attitude to the personality and attainments of the Swami. Like the moderate leaders, Bepin Chandra had been hesitant to assess Swamiji in the way Tilak could do. That he was extraordinarily cautious in his estimate of Swami Vivekananda is evident in the first comment he made on Swamiji's demise in his weekly, New India. One will note that extra cautiousness on the part of Bepin Chandra in almost every line of that comment.

Says Pal in the 10th July, 1902 issue of New India: The news of the sudden death of Swami Vivekananda on Friday last at the early age of 39 has been read with profound regret by the Indian public and will cause considerable grief among the large circle of his acquaintances and admirers in England and America. Endowed with large powers and a supremely magnetic personality, Vivekananda exacted the wonder and admiration of large multitudes whenever he went. In his early life he came in contact with the great Brahmo leader, Keshab Chandra Sen and was one of the actors at Keshab's stage where the Minister of the Brahmo Samaj himself appeared in the cast of the religious drama, Nava Brindavan. Vivekananda, then known as Narendra Nath Dutt, belonged also, for a time, to the choir of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj. But though his early contact with the Brahmo leaders contributed considerably to his mental and ethical development and supplied, we believe, the rational note that was never wholly absent from his teachings—the inspiration of his life came from Ramkrishna Paramahansa and in his intimate association with the life and teachings of this great Hindu Saint, lay the real secret of Vivekananda's popularity with his countrymen. This popularity however, would not have been 100th part as great and wide as it was, if Vivekananda had not produced the sensation he did in America, where, however, he did also solid pioneering work, in creating interest in Indian life and thought, among large numbers of people who had been brought up to look down upon both as little removed from primitive culture. As a teacher, Vivekananda's strength lay in his personal magnetism more than in the depth of his insight, or the breath of his grasp. Indeed, as a teacher of Philosophy, Vivekananda lacked system but this in itself was perhaps what made him so popular among people always ready to be carried away by catch phrases, on both the hemispheres. Vivekananda possessed the power of transmitting enthusiasm to the multitude, and though he lacked some of the other qualifications of a true orator, in this he had, perhaps, no superior among us, after Keshab Sen, the greatest preacher, we believe, of the last century not only in India, but all the world over. But Vivekananda was no thought-builder. He had, however, the makeup of a capable man of affairs in him, and the organisation of which he was, until his death, the head and main prop bears testimony to his large capacities as a leader of men. It is yet too early to form any rational forecast of the movement with which Vivekananda was associated, but whether it endures or not, his name will not be soon forgotten by his countrymen; as of one who sought to raise them in the est - mation of civilised humanity, and thus awakened to some extent, that national self-consciousness in them, without which no people can realise its God-given destiny".

NO MISTAKE

I will not proceed further but revert to the original theme, namely, Swami Vivekananda and the Swadeshi Movement in Bengal are complementary to each other. The point was nicely touched by none else than Sister Nivedita, his disciple and who, better than anybody, could interpret her Master as she saw him. At the Town Hall memorial meeting the dear Sister in reply to comments that Swami Vivekananda was born before his time expressed her surprise and significantly referred to the classic message of the Gita that it is when objective conditions warranted that a social change was urgently required, the leadership is dispensed. One can interpret that ageless message from both spiritualistic as well as materialistic standpoints. What the Sister however, actually said on the occasion was: 'Did they not know that great men were born as there was necessity for them? Did they think it was a mistake? No."

Swami Vivekananda's Message To The World

By SWAMI SAMBUDDHANANDA

SWAMI VIVEKANANDA was a man of multiple personality—a great thinker and philosopher, a powerful writer, and an eloquent orator, an eminent historian, and a religious reformer, a world teacher and above all a man with a message to the world.

Of all the countries of the world, India had a very lofty place in the estimation of Swami Vivekananda. To him India was the epitome of the world. Every grain of earth of India was so sweet and sacred to him. He was under the impression that the regeneration of the world depends entirely upon the regeneration of India. He believed that the salvation of the whole world rested entirely upon the salvation of India. Swami Vivekananda, had, therefore, the conviction that India, not withstanding the oppression and suppression of about a thousand years was still alive, because she has yet to contribute her quota to the perfection of human civilisation in the world as a whole. The children of the soil, have, therefore, a special duty and responsibility not only to the people of India but also to the people of the world. For India is the only country that does not live for herself. She lives for all the countries and nations of both the hemispheres.

To build up a nation it is necessary that individuals should build themselves up. Swami Vivekananda believed in man-making and character building education. The education that is imparted in schools and colleges and universities today is more or less bread-winning education. Swami Vivekananda's idea was that a man of character can make money more easily and earn his livelihood better than others. "Man makes money, but money does not make man."

Vivekananda wanted man with muscles of iron and nerves of steel and above all with a will that makes him bold enough to meet even death face to face in the pursuit of his ideals. Courage, he maintained, is the lesson that one can learn from every page of the Upanishads which eloquently declares: Nayamatma Balahinena Labhyah—the Atman (Self) cannot be realised by the weak. The first and foremost of the qualities that one should acquire to become a true man is courage. A man of courage is a man of indomitable spirit that can never be daunted by any amount of dangers and difficulties. He would meet these with a smile of derision on his face. A bold man always welcomes the vicissitudes of life looking upon them as chance to wrestle with so that he can strengthen his body and mind. A man, according to him, should be fearless. "Fear not, fear not, for the greatest sin is fear." He asks everyone to shake off his timidity and be fearless and free. He could not tolerate weakness in a man. To him weakness was the cause of degradation and death.

SALVATION FOR ALL

Swami Vivekananda was not only a man of the world but also a man for the world. When in America he was asked which country he belonged to and what was his religion. He at once declared. "The Universe is my country and truth is my religion." He meant to say that he did not belong to any particular country, sect or society, he belonged to the whole humanity.

He did not believe in parochial patriotism but stood for Universalism. He warned the world in his inimitable words, "All contraction is death and all expansion is life." If any nation wanted to live in the world it must make "tolerance and acceptance" its watchwords in national life. Nations should ignore all differences. This spirit alone can save nations from mutual conflict in all walks of life and build up a much bigger unit to work out the path of salvation for all, irrespective of all distinction. This spirit alone can do away with all ideas of aggression, exploitation, intrusion and invasion. Thus alone can the powers of the world establish world peace.

He hoists, as if on the summit of the Himalayas a flag of peace which flutters on the heights as a menace to all the evils and wickedness of the world and sends out a clarion call to the people of both the hemispheres to come and rally round the banner and pave the path to peace and perfection. He was convinced of the fact that the world was badly in need of the ancient heritage of India which could break down the prison walls of narrowness and meanness and lead to universalism. He did not hesitate to reiterate the stern truth even while he was standing upon the hearts of America and Europe and announce in unequivocal terms—that the regeneration of the world depends upon the regeneration of India, the salvation of the world depends upon the salvation of India.

The Vedas declare "একং সন্তং বহুধা কল্পয়ন্তি" existence is one but is conceived of as many". In fact there is only one existence, one Creator and one God "একং সাদ্বিপ্রা বহুধা বদন্তি" The sages call it by various names. "একং জ্যোতির্বহুধা বিভাতি' The light is one but appears in different ways The world at its outlook appears to be a world of countless varieties and endless multiplicities But behind all these there is an underlying unity. The uniformity of nature speaks eloquently of this great fact.

Nature is uniform everywhere in this phenomenal world. A mango tree whether in India or courtyard suddenly reached his ears, he jumped up with a terrific speed and ran out of the room. He found that his daughter Amina was lying on the ground and that water was pouring out of the broken pitcher that lay in one corner and also that Mahesh was sucking out the water like a burning desert.

Goffur lost his senses at the very sight of what had happened. He picked up from the ground the iron blade of his plough that he unfastened from it for mending, and struck it deep into the head of the bull.

Only for once did Mahesh try to raise his face, but the next moment his weak and emaciated body rolled down on the ground. A few drops of tear trickled down the corner of his eyes and a few drops of blood rolled down his ears. His whole body shivered once or twice and then stretching out his legs he breathed his last.

"What have you done, Father!" Amina cried out in agony, "Mahesh has left us for ever, you have killed him!"

Goffur did neither move nor give any response; he sat motionless, staring with his two winkless eyes at the two still deep-blue eyes of his dear Mahesh!

Within an hour or two a band of cobblers from the outskirts of the village made their appearance. They tied the dead body of Mahesh to a bamboo pole and wended their way towards the burial ground. At the very sight of the sharp, dazzling knives in their hands Goffur closed his eyes with a shudder, but not a word came out of his lips.

The neighbours advised him, "Goffur, the Zemindar has desired you to consult the Tarkaratna to perform expiation which you are bound to do. We fear you may have to sell out your entire homestead to meet the expenses of the 'Prayaschitta'!!"

Goffur did not respond to any of their words,—he remained seated as before with a vacant look.

That day, at dead of night, Goffur roused his daughter from sleep and said, "Amina, let us go."

Amina had fallen asleep on the yard. Rubbing her eyes she sat up and said, "Where, Father?"

"To Fulbere, to serve in the jute-mill", said Goffur.

The girl stared at him, greatly astonished. Before this her father had, on many occasions, fallen in dire distress; but he could never be persuaded to serve in the mill—she heard from various sources that no man could ever keep his morals or religious faith, and no woman her chastity in such a place.

"Make haste, my child, we have to walk a long distance," said Goffur somewhat impatiently.

Amina was going to take the water-pot and her father's brass-plate with her when Goffur prevented her, "Let these remain here, Amina, with these will be performed Mahesh's 'Prayaschitta'."

In the deep darkness of midnight Goffur left home holding her daughter by the hand. He had none in this village to call his own; so he had none to bid farewell to. As soon as he crossed his courtyard and came near the Babla tree on the road-side, he suddenly stopped motionless and burst into a flood of tears like a child. Then raising his head towards the dark, star-studded sky he called aloud, "Oh Allah! punish me as severely as You will, but — how can I forget that my Mahesh died without a drop of water, and that he was not spared even a bait of grass. So, do not, Oh Allah, forgive that criminal who has deprived my Mahesh of Your gracious gift of grass and water. Pray do not, Oh Allah, forgive that sinner, do not forgive ..... do not forgive ..... do not ....."

"Oh Allah, ..."

A SOCIETY IN THE SERVICE OF INDIAN AGRICULTURE

By T. K. BOSE

HE Royal Agri-Horticultural Society, Calcutta, was founded by the great missionary scholar Dr. William Carey in the year 1820. The primitive methods of cultivation and low quality and yield of the products during his time in India inspired him to start an "Agricultural Society" to impsove the economy of tillers who were the real contributors to India's wealth. Very shortly afterwards "Horticultural" was added to it. In a letter to Dr. Ryland, Carey wrote, "I hope it will ultimately be of great benefit to the country and contribute to prepare its inhabitants for the time when they shall beat their swords into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks."

At that time East India Company only took an interest in Indigo cultivation. With the co-operation and assistance of the East India Company, civilians, zamindars and planters, the Society first took up the problems of all the aspects of agriculture including livestock and farm implements. The Society has made an important contribution to the development and progress of agriculture and horticulture in India by introducing high yielding strains of cereals, pulses, cotton, sugarcane, tobacco, potato and vegetables, fruits and other miscellaneous crops from all parts of the world and also by improving methods of cultivation to obtain maximum yield of these crops. The Society did not limit its activities only in Calcutta or Bengal, but extension of improved agriculture was also done very successfully by distributing better seeds and implements and livestock and dissemination of useful information through transaction, proceedings and formation of branch Societies and similar other organisations in various parts of India.

In a letter to Maharajah Ranjit Singh of the Punjab, Lord William Bentinck, Governor-General of India, in 1833 summarised the activities of the Society and wrote, "The Agricultural Society, of which I am myself a member, consists of a number of gentlemen who consult together to encourage agriculture by the introduction of foreign seeds and plants and the improvement of the existing modes of cultivation, and your Highness will not fail to perceive that, as the land is the original source of all wealth, this Society which has for its object to increase the quantity and improve the quality of its produce, is highly deserving of consideration and patronage."

SEEDS

In 1830 seeds of different varieties of cotton (Sea Island, New Orleans, Upland Georgia, Bourbon, Seychelles) were imported and sown at different months of the year in the Society's experimental Station at Accra and also at various places of India to study the suitability of foreign varieties under different climatic conditions of India. Seeds of the variety of cotton which showed the best performance in a particular zone were distributed among the cultivators. Cotton seeds were purchased annually from America, South America, West Coast of Africa, China and Manila and distributed among the growers to extend cultivation of the better yielding varieties. The Society's efforts to introduce high yielding varieties of cotton with better quality fibre on Indian soil and improve the method of cultivation for 30 years were considered to be of great importance in the improvement of cotton in India.

Tobacco seeds, imported from Egypt, Maryland, Virginia and Havana proved very successful in different parts of India. Quality of tobacco also greatly improved by better cultural practices and curing the leaves.

Maize seeds were brought from America and distributed among the cultivators in Bengal and U.P. In the opinion of some American cotton planters who visited Allahabad in 1831 the performance of this crop in U.P. and some parts of Bengal were as good as those commonly grown in America. Attempts were also made to follow American method of cultivation and a marked increase in yield was recorded.

Exotic varieties of sugarcane from Mauritius and Singapore were collected and grown at the experimental station of the Society and the yield was found to be 9 times more than the local cane. (Report of the Agri-Horticultural Society, 1835). In the following few years we find that 34,000 sets were distributed every year from the nursery of the Society. The Agricultural Committee of the Society recommended in 1837 that the method of cultivation practised in Mauritius and West Indies should be adopted. An important paper describing the result on mode of planting, manuring, harvesting and extraction of sugar was published in the proceedings of the Society in 1840.

Wheat seeds from Egypt and Europe were brought to India through the agency of Society and were distributed in different provinces for cultivation. Some varieties gave much increase in yield of better quality wheat than the existing varieties. In 1843, Haworth, a Wheat Specialist, examined Egyptian wheat grown at Bolendshahur and reported, "The ears I should consider very fine and well grown, the quality of grain is very superior."

COFFEE

Coffee cultivation in India was encouraged by the Agri-Horticultural Society and in the beginning it was found to thrive well about Calcutta and at Chittagong. The produce was reported by good judges as exceedingly well. Lately the soil and climate of Bengal was found not favourable although attempts were made to select suitable place for its cultivation.

The Society popularised the cultivation of foreign vegetables like cauliflower, cabbage, and peas, and regularly imported improved and new types of vegetable, e.g., Brussels sprout from Europe, Cape of Good Hope and Van Dieman's Land. A consignment of vegetable seeds from Cape of Good Hope in 1824 contained, pickly spinach, artichoke, asparagus, lettuce, sugar loaf cabbage, early cauliflower, squash, vegetable marrow, white beet and garden cress. In 1829 the Secretary of the Society read a paper, "From my experience of nine years, the duration of this Society, I have found that in order to have good and early crops of cauliflower, cabbage, peas, turnips etc., it is absolutely necessary to sow only acclimatised seeds; that is seed which was the produce of plants raised from imported European or foreign seed, sown during the previous year."

In 1832 Capt. Richmond grew potatoes from an imported variety of England distributed by the Society and a local cultivated strain. He observed that the English potato was much superior to that of the local varieties in size and weight. Nainital and Shillong potatoes owe their origin to imported English strains brought by the Society.

The yield of North Carolina rice distributed by the Society in North Bengal and Arakan was recorded twice as much as that of the local varieties and there was a continuous demand for import of rice seeds.

In England, flax and hemp had very good market which had to be imported from Belgium and Russia. Prof. Royle, Professor of Medicine, King's College, London, and also a friend of the Society sent improved seeds of flax and hemp in order to compete in the English market. Gold medals were awarded by the Society for cultivation of the best quality flax and hemp. The possibility of growing crops for substitute fibres was also considered and several other fibre yielding plants were suggested for this purpose.

Various fodder crops such as Guinea grass, Reana and Lucerne reached these shores through the agency of the Society.

Branch Societies were formed at Dinapore, Berhampore, Bhagalpore, Lucknow, Agra, Allahabad and Madras as representatives of the main Society and rendered useful services in the development of agriculture in these areas.

The Society also brought useful implements from America and China to suit the improved method of cultivation. Moulboard plough and cultivator from America was found to be of great help for cotton and sugarcane cultivation in India. Awards were given for making more efficient wind mill, cotton cleaning and better devices for irrigation.

The improvement of livestock was also taken up, cattle and woolly ram being imported from foreign countries.

Indian silk had a very good market in foreign countries. Attempts were made to improve quality and quantity of production and considerable success was achieved. A number of species of mulberry plants on which silk worms live were introduced in Bengal. Better methods of spinning and weaving of silk greatly helped the cottage industry.

Tea was another subject which called for much ground work by the Society and the valuable report of Drs. Griffith and Maclilland will be found in the Society's transactions. The Tea Committee of the Society indicated the scope of cultivation of existing species found in Assam.

In 1852 the Society also drew attention of the Governor-General to the great advantage of introducing cinchona in India and a valuable article by Dr. H. Falconer "On the quinine yielding cinchonas and their introduction into India" was published in the Society's Journal in 1854. In response to the request of the Agri-Horticultural Society, the Court of Directors sent seeds and plants to the Botanic Gardens.

Fibres, tans, dyes, oils, fats, etc., were also the items that the Society took up.

The Society has introduced tropical and subtropical varieties of fruits and selected the best types. Varieties of apple, pear, plum, peach, orange and grape were brought from Europe and grown in suitable climatic conditions in India. Many varieties were found to be exceedingly good. Grape fruit from Florida, pomelos from Java and seedless lichi from China have been lately introduced and are doing well in the Society's garden at Alipore.

During the past fifty years there has been an increasing desire for better gardens, and the Society's services towards introduction of trees, shrubs and climbers have helped to make India beautiful. It has also brought into cultivation a number of annual ornamental plants which are now commonly grown in gardens in India. The Society had devoted much time in hybridisation and the results have been highly successful. Improved types of cannas, hibiscus, ixora, lagerstroemia, plumeria and numerous other varieties of ornamental plants have been produced by hybridisation and selection. Cassia Lancasteri thus produced is one of the most beautiful tropical flowering trees.

The Garden of the Society at Alipore has always been a place of interest to the amateur gardener and botanist. It has a very rich collection of common and rare ornamental plants. The nursery of the Society supplies plants to members and customers carefully propagated in the garden.

The Society issued Transactions and Journals which embodied reports of experimental work. This was first published in 1837. Copious extracts from the Society's Journals and Proceedings will be found in the Dictionary of Economic Products of India, and other official publications of the Government prove that the efforts of the Society have made a valuable contribution to the improvement of agriculture and horticulture. The Journal has been discontinued but periodic garden news sheets are still published.

The Library contains 3000 valuable volumes on agriculture, horticulture and botany.

The Society had a museum of plants and other natural product which were received from all parts of India and England. To test the quality of the products the Society used to send samples to the specialists for analysis and steps for further improvement of quality of produce were taken up on the basis of their report.

The greatest progress of the Society occurred under the leadership of Rev. Carey, Sir Edward Ryan and Sir J. P. Grant who acted as Presidents. They were assisted by Secretaries like Mr. John Bell, Dr. Spry, and Mr. A. H. Blechynden. It was during Percy-Lancaster's Secretaryship that the Society was granted the signal honour of adding 'Royal' to its name in recognition of the Society's long and useful service to agriculture and horticulture. In recent years due to the keen interest and generous contribution of Mr. L. N. Birla, the Society's activities have greatly increased.

The first exhibition of country and foreign vegetables, fruits and farm implements was organised by the Society in 1828. Cash prizes were awarded to the cultivators. Later on cattle shows were also held and winners of best imported cattle received cash prizes of Rs. 500|- and a gold medal. Since then flower and vegetable shows are being held regularly.

In addition to the number of branches in different parts of India, the Agri-Horticultural Society always worked in collaboration with the Botanical Gardens at Shibpore. Dr. Wallich and Dr. Falconer and other Superintendents rendered services as members of the different sub-committees of the Society.

FOLK SONGS on MARRIED LIFE

By HEM BARUA

INDISPENSABLE in different rituals, marriage songs contain a wide avenue of subject matter; they are essentially women's lyrics. Besides the songs related to the ritual and ceremony of marriage, there are songs that are incidentally connected with married life, longing for love and marriage, virginal inhibitions, usual apprehensions etc., that also come within the purview of the subject-matter.

The ceremony of wedding over, begins a new life. Like all other innovations, this new life takes time to stabilise. There are songs expressing the joy of it, the inherent sensations of two young souls living together, the passion of heart and embrace. Turgeniev says that there is nothing like two souls in love sleeping together against the natural perfume of one another's body. Love is the "silken knot"; but then, this is not the end. Problems beset life, at times problems of the heart, but, more often than not, the problems of economic life. They ruffle the current of life, create jolts and sad imbalances. All these problems have found sufficient expressions in Indian folksongs, for, this is a fact that the majority of the vast reservoir of peasants' lyrics has grown out of the peasants' immediate experiences of life.

These lyrics give a glimpse into the woman's heart as nothing else. Some of these songs describe the heavy lot of woman in a strange house, and inevitably, her emotional reactions to this life. There are other songs that might truly be described as the apotheosis of agony. The core of this problem lies in the system of compulsory choice of bridegrooms for girls obtaining in our society. This is true that some husbands are dominating in attitude; naturally such an attitude creates problems of imbalance and suppression in nuptial life. Songs sing them.

Besides, there is the inevitable problem of unsympathetic fathers-in-law and mothers-in-law too. Ours is mostly a joint family structure; this is the compulsion of agrarian economy. This adds edge to the problem. There are at times taunting sisters-in-law too. A widowed sister-in-law living in the family is a constant irritation. All these facts contribute to the making of the problem of married life one of deeper magnitude.

A WORKER

To add to this, the problem of polygamous family remains. In agrarian economy and undivided patriarchal families, the daughter-in-law is a worker; she is an economic unit of production. For this, she must have health, energy and vigour, and must be capable of hard work. In a society as this, the outer beauty of a girl was no measuring standard in the choice of a daughter-in-law.

The daughter-in-law must be healthy in order to discharge her second responsibility also i.e. the production of a healthy progeny in the family so as to replace the older folks as workers in the field. More energy and vigour are to be ploughed into the field, and for this, a vigorous posterity is necessary. It was often found that one woman was not enough to discharge all these responsibilities. For this, more than one woman was necessary. This is the starting point of polygamous families in our peasant societies,—an inevitable compulsion of agricultural economy. This aspect of life is, more than adequately, celebrated in our folksongs. Generally speaking, these songs are full of the joie de vivre as they say. There are instances of the other side of the picture, the seamy side, also. These songs are sad as dirges, and moan as does a bomboo grove against high tropical winds.

Not the songs of the problems of economic life alone; there are songs that at times give wings to problems of the heart too. These are songs of longing for some "dear and near ones," possibly left behind in one's native village. The compulsory choice of a man for a woman, as it obtains in our society, cuts at the root of all fundamentals of the heart. If you take away the banks, what remains of the river? If you take away love, what remains of the shell of life? These are songs of personal emotions; they are inevitably mournful in tone and rhythm; on occasions, they express a certain level of revolt and anger also. When the revolt becomes open and explicit, it creates social problems; and songs give them wings and expression. Thus a whole gamut of experiences finds expression in the songs of married life.

Youth means an exhilarating urge for companionship of the sexes. A strange feeling of loneliness captures the heart of youth at a particular stage of life. The following Uraon song is symbolic of such a feeling of loneliness. A girl begins to feel lonely even in the midst of her home surroundings; her heart catches fire. She longs to be free; she desires the companionship of a man. The "dove" in the following song, as pointed out by W. G. Archer, parallels the "feeling of the girl."

The dove, the dove
Calls in the hills, the hills,
I have no mother, and I cannot sleep,
I have no father, and I cannot sleep.
The brown dove gathers in the hills,
Hearing the dove, mother, I cannot sleep,
Hearing the dove, father, I cannot sleep.
The brown dove coos in the different hills,
Dove, my mother is not here. I cannot sleep,
Dove, my father is not here, I cannot sleep.

To a young girl inexperienced in the ways of life, marriage is both a matter of anticipations and apprehensions. Marriage inevitably means uprooting a girl from the family in which she has been cradled into womanhood. The prospective life is not known to her. The natural longing is there, a man to possess and live with. But the "most unkindest cut" of it lies in the fact that nothing depends on her choice or wishes. Here is a Pradhan girl who wails, for the prospect is not known to her :

Father, had I been your son,
I would have stayed to thatch the roof
To take the cattle out to graze.
To drive the plough across your field,
But I was born your enemy,
A daughter who must go away;
At home I used to laugh and dance,
Today I leave you weaping.
The crane despairs beside the late,
Your enemy weeps on the threshold,
Your daughter weeps on the threshold.

This song is in a sense a trepidation of the heart. This problem is inherent in the very nature of arranged marriages. For the girl it is a leap in the dark. In fact, the climax of all marriages is separation from old ties for a girl. This is the burden of these songs. The women sing them; their plaintive tones render sorrow into sharpness. Girls are like sparrows; they fly away. The following Awadi song is an instance:

Don't cut the neem tree, father,
The neem gives rest to sparrows.
Let me clasp you, brother.
Daughter will leave for father-in-law's places,
Mother will feel lonely,
Let me clasp you, brother.

In the Kangra song given below the girl is apprehensive of her marriage. In arranged marriages partners are almost invariably uncertain. At times they are elderly persons; often they are brutish in their behaviour. Often their mouths smell of bad breath; they may have dirty teeth too. Thus a girl's maidenly dreams of life and romance get shattered. The following song speaks for Indian girls in general:

Marry me not to an old man, uncle,
Marry me not, uncle;
With fresh tresses, I shall become a widow
etc. etc.

The following Russian folksong of the pre-October Revolution period embraces the problem of arranged marriages most succinctly. It in a sense reflects Indian conditions vis-a-vis our social sanctions.

Not will she be joined in equal wedlock,
Nor will a suitable husband turn up,
He may be a thief,
And he may be a drunkard,
He may be old and wheezy;
He may be young and unfriendly,
He may be your own age and haughty,
Always supercilious and stirring up trouble,
And then, he lies crosswise on the bed,
And he speaks words that are crosswise too,
And he commands you to loosen his girdle.

(ii)

In tribal or such other social groups where the woman enjoys a certain measure of freedom, such problems seldom arise. Under normal conditions, a girl marries the man of her choice whom she meets in different avenues of life. There is no social taboo whatsoever. In Mishmi society of NEFA, for instance, pre-marital courtship is in the order of things. In such social conditions boys and girls meet in the hills, forests and other secret coverts that nature offers. They exchange assurances of life-long partnership, promises of life together. This fact is most evident in the folksongs of the Gonds, Baigas and Pradhans. The following is a Baiga karma song:

As you climb the hill,
Even your lover's voice you cannot hear,
You are panting so loudly;
Some are breaking small branches,
Some are plucking leaves,
As you climb the hill.

This is how lovers send their messages through songs. By certain emphasis and intonation, they suggest the place where to meet. The symbolic significance of the images of "panting" because of "climbing" the hill is obvious.

In most cases, courtship is a prelude to marriage; this obtains in the society of simple tribal folks. Their songs have a freshness and frankness that is obvious in such social conditions of freedom. This is not possible under social conditions of hide-bound morals. It's a Gond boy who can say thus to his girl.

You have brought pearly beads,
You tied them in your hair,
But now stop dancing in my eyes,
Or I shall tie you round my neck.

III

There are occasions in folksongs when a girl is unhappy in her new home not so much because of problems, social and economic, but because of forced separation from the man of her youth. Silently she weeps for him. In Telugu folk-poetry the mama that is the maternal uncle mostly figures as the lover. Marriages between the two are socially permissible. The Chandangiri Sari is a famous song from Andhra Pradesh. It is a silent lamentation.

Putting a ladder to the lemon tree,
My hand as I stretched to pick some fruit,
A thorn pierced my breast,
O my golden mama;
O, do send me some Chandangiri saris,
Between you and me,
O what a strange remoteness befell,
Yon blue hills impede our way.
To the hill I went, the sheep was grazing,
O handsome youth, my golden mama,
Send me some Chandangiri saris.

Odd dreams loom before the eyes. The longing for the lost lover persists even in the midst of the altered conditions of life. There are occasions when old lovers do come. But then, meeting is seldom possible; the social and family barriers are there. Folksongs sing of the difficulties. The following song is a picture in contrast. The bird enjoys freedom of movement from one branch of the mango tree to another. The girl, confined to her husband's precints, does not.

The kussera bird is swinging,
Free on the mango branch,
But you stand in the court,
How can I call you to me?

The problems of incompatible marriages are also sung in songs. Husbands are often minors because of the system of early marriages prevalent in our society. There are occasions when they are old and physically inefficient. The following songs illustrate both aspects of the problem. In the Punjabi folksong recorded below, the girl sings of her apprehensions as she spins. The song fits into the music of the spinning wheel as does rain into spring.

Ghoon, ghoon, O spinning wheel,
Should I spin the red pooni or not?
Spin, girl, spin.
Far off is my father-in-law's house,
Should I live there or not?
Live, girl, live.
Long is my woe,
Shall I tell or not?
Tell, girl, tell.
My husband is a minor,
Should I stay with him or not?
Stay, girl, stay.
etc. etc.

There is none to share her innermost thoughts with; the spinning wheel is her guardian angel. She unburdens her rebellious thoughts to it. A girl's heart is a secret mine and it is a closed sea to others. The following tribal song is a picture of it:

She goes with her pot for water,
But who can tell the sorrow of her heart?

The following dadaria throws light on the other aspect of the problem i.e. the marriage of younger girls to older people. This is an apt instance of unequal wedlock.

The young girl makes her bed,
Weeping she spreads the rags,
And waits for the old man
Who cannot content her.

Pre-marital romance dwindles into the hard facts of life; economic problems soon impinge on the placid flow of life. Life is hard; poverty mocks it at the face. Thus the struggles of economic life wear out a man and ruffle the current of family life often into disastrous tempests. But the spirit of man is indomitable. In the following song from Orissa the call of the East inspires a man. In the East there are tea gardens where he could work and make a living. He promises a good life to his wife thus.

Come, O diamond girl,
We will leave for Rangoon,
Rice and vegetable curry,
What more will I say?
Tea leaves in that country,
You can save money and keep in your hands.
Trunks and boxes in that country,
Rupees you can keep one row above the other,
Come, O diamond girl,
We will leave for Rangoon.

Here again is a song from Orissa that can be described as an agonised register of confessions. This shows how acute the economic life is and the struggle too. In fact this is true social realism.

For this stomach,
For this stomach, I left for Bengal,
For this stomach, I had all struggle,
For this stomach, I pounded rice,
For this stomach, I reaped the paddy,
For this stomach, I worked on a shop,
For this stomach, I received cane beating on my back,
For this stomach, I went on dancing,
For this stomach, I took to spinning,
For this stomach, I find abuses on my lips,
For this stomach, I met Yam Raj,
For this stomach.

This aspect of life finds an adequate expression in Tamil folksongs. Marriage is over. But the economic problem of life remains and multiplies. Poverty is there and the realities of life impinge upon and create problems. This is how a man complains.

We have rice and we have dal,
No oven, and that's the trouble,
The wind blows carrying dust,
Alas, we have no door, that's the trouble,
My wife comes and stands before me,
No sari to present her, that's the trouble,
The beggar comes and stands at the gate,
Not a dhela to give him, that's the trouble.

Here is a girl's complaint; this is also a Tamil song:

On many occasions, O mama,
The toe-ring is sold,
If you buy me a toe-ring, O mama,
I shall see how it looks on my toe.
In every village, O mama,
The wooden pestle is sold;
If you buy one pestle for me, O mama,
Pounding, pounding,
I shall get some flour, O mama.
At distant places, O mama,
The bridal veil is sold;
If you buy one veil for me, O mama,
I shall see how it adorns my shoulders.

This is poverty calling. "To be born poor is a sin," said George Bernard Shaw. In spite of poverty, there is no sense of revolt in these songs. The peasant consigns himself to his fate. He thinks this is his lot,—man-made or what?

VIVEKANANDA'S MESSAGE TO WORLD

America produces only mangoes, but never any other fruit. A cocoanut tree produces only cocoanut whether in the north or south, east or west. A man is always a man with two eyes and ears, two hands and legs whether he happens to be an American or European, African or Australian, whether he is a Christian or a Mohammedan, a Jew or Zoroastrian, a Hindu or a Jain. All these are evident proofs of one Maker, one Controller, one God and one Father. The whole human race consists of the children of one immortal bliss. We are all the sons of the same Father. We are brothers. Every man is my own flesh and blood as it were.

The Centre of a circle is the creator of the circumference. From all points of the circumference of creation any number of radii can be drawn to the centre—the Creator—the God is Infinite. Infinite are the ways to reach the Infinite. So many radii are so many paths to the same goal. Different faiths or isms are nothing but different pathways to God. "Each soul is potentially divine" re-echoes Swami Vivekananda. "The goal is to manifest this Divine within, by controlling nature, external and internal. Do this either by work, or worship or psychic control or philosophy by one, or more, or all of these and be free. This is the whole of religion. Doctrines or Dogmas, or rituals, or books or temples or forms are but secondary details. "Be and Make" should be the watchword of every human life. First be a man and make men of others; be a god and make gods of others.

So Swami Vivekananda stood for one nation. When the people will be awakened to this consciousness of universalism, world peace will itself be an accomplished fact.

whose family pride was more pronounced, could not contain himself. This fact my mother used to get me on to her side. "Your father," she remarked, "has reduced much. As a result, he is no more the joyous happy man he used to be. Up to now, I have tried single-handed to get him to a dentist. Now you must help. If our combined efforts succeeded, our home would return to its old, happy condition." Then she disclosed her strategy. Dad had told her of his intention to reward me. All I should request is that he keep his appointment with Dr. Duncan.

The plan worked admirably. That evening while we were relaxing after dinner, my father came out with his proposal. He was very pleased with my success, "So ask what you want, if I can, I shall do it for you." Well coached by my mother I said that for me only one thing mattered — he go to the dentist. Surely he could carry out such a wish. Dad was taken aback. He had often preached to me: "Be a man of your word". Now he had to practise what he preached in a manner which cost.

The job of accompanying my father now fell on me. Dr. Duncan, too, had joined our side. So it was three against one. When we arrived, he led us into his study where a bottle of Scotch was on the table. According to instructions, he poured us each a peg, and then proposed a toast to my success. He ended with a clever piece of psychological conditioning for my father. "It must be quite an honour to be the parent of a talented boy, and something of a responsibility to live up to it." Dad was visibly elated.

Without a hitch, my father got into the chair. He opened his mouth for the first inspection. Dr. Duncan will succeed this time. I began to think how I would tell mother the good news. Suddenly the old rigour returned with the time for the injection. Nothing could get him to open his mouth. Once again the attempt had to be abandoned. Before leaving Dr. Duncan took me apart and suggested gas as the way to take out my father's teeth. That I felt he would not agree to, after what he had seen and experienced of gas in World War I. Then the dentist could think of nothing else save twilight sleep, an injection that will put him into a coma.

As a result of the last failure, a terrible sense of guilt had gripped my father. He had made me a promise which, as yet, he had not implemented. He agreed at once to have his teeth extracted under the influence of twilight sleep. Dr. Duncan suggested the "Avenue Nursing Home" and Dr. Sola Pinto as the one who could administer the anaesthetic. Then he would come and at one go pull out Dad's teeth.

We found Dr. Sola Pinto a genial, efficient anaesthetist. When Dad asked him to give twilight sleep, he looked hard and said: "You are the first male I am going to give this particular injection." Then we came to learn that twilight sleep was generally administered to women in labour to deaden their pain.

The injection is given in three doses. Between the first and the second, there is a wait of twenty minutes. After only fifteen minutes, my father called out: "Doctor, this stuff has no effect on males. I feel absolutely nothing." Soon after the second prick, he dosed off, and was quite unconscious when the third was given. Then Dr. Duncan arrived and with the greatest ease extracted seventeen of my father's teeth.

When Dad came round he felt so fine that he insisted on walking down to the car. Since his gums had not been pierced by the needle, and scalded by the anaesthetic he was able that very night to eat some of his "semi-solids". Within three days he had a temporary and in three months a permanent set of teeth. Once again his appetite returned, and with it his hearty disposition. He is ever grateful to his 'dauntless' wife, his 'resourceful' doctor friend and his 'selfless' son. Whenever anyone in his presence speaks of going to the dentist, he never tires of recommending twilight sleep for a painless, no-reaction extraction.

lunch and said that he could talk it over with you after lunch."

"Oh, I see," Shanker remarked sarcastically. "But I don't want to talk shop in my house. Biren, you better make an appointment with me in my consulting room."

Biren got up and while moving towards the door said, "I shall think it over."

Gita hurriedly said, "Please don't go Biren. You must have some lunch before you go."

"Some other day, Gita. I think I should go now." Saying this Biren went out. Gita could not hold herself anymore. She turned towards Shanker and cried, "There is a limit to everything. You have no business to be so rude, mean and unmannerly."

"On the contrary I have been extremely polite under the circumstances. If you think I am blind and don't see your activities with your paramour or old flames you are mistaken. I am going to have no more of this nonsense."

"What, what did you say?"

"You have heard what I said and I meant every word of it."

Gita could not utter anything. A sob had choked her voice. She collapsed on the sofa and started weeping. Shanker did not stop there; he cruelly continued, "It is no use weeping. You should watch your step. You should know that after marriage you have to behave like a respectable lady. You can't possibly have your Bohemian life as in your pre-marriage days." He left her there and went out.

Gita did not reply. She was too shocked to be even able to discuss it. After Shanker left she somehow dragged herself to her bedroom and threw herself on the bed.

How could he even doubt her fidelity. She had always been so honest with him. She hid nothing and never even thought of betraying him. In spite of all her devotion why did he mistrust her. What had she done to give him this baseless doubt. She was not hurt so much by the insults hurled at her but the thought that he had no faith in her was making her more miserable. Once he had had blind faith in her but now when she was so honest with him he did not trust her. Why? What had she done? How could she ever live with a man who did not have faith in her? Did he love her any more? She knew that he had passion and lust for her but could there be any love without trust? Would she ever get an answer?

She could not understand that a man never trusted a woman for the second time.

THE HOLY LAKE AND A HEAVENLY GARDEN

By BIRESWAR PRASAD BANERJEE

The holy lake

IF you have ever been on the way to Badrinath you must have come across, a few miles beyond Joshimath and some two miles below Pandukeshwar, an unostentatious place called Govindaghat where you could find no chatties save one imposing Gurdwara conspicuous in its display of the flag of Sikhism on its top and a wooden placard reading, "Way to Valley of Flowers". The new iron bridge spanning the river Alakananda would have been the only indication to you as the way to the valley of flowers on the opposite bank but its name might not have been appealing to you. You have, perhaps, wondered why of all places the Sikhs constructed a Dharmashala there. But had you been interested enough you would have learnt that this tiny halting place on the pilgrim route to Badrinath leads to at least two of the most fascinating places in the whole Himalayas, one of them is the Valley of Flowers (also known as Nandan Kanan or the Garden of Paradise) and the other is Hemkund or Lokepal Lake which claims to be one of the most venerable places of pilgrimage for the Sikhs.

It was September, 1956 and we four friends were going to Badrinath in autumn in order to avoid the rush of pilgrims and also to visit the Valley of Flowers, where flowers can be seen only during the three months of July, August and September. To have a first-hand knowledge of the Valley of Flowers or the Bhyunder valley we had read the book of Mr. Frank Smythe, the famous British mountaineer. He was the first European to visit the valley in 1931 and was responsible for making the place interesting to tourists and mountaineers as a garden of nature unique in its position and beauty in the whole world. In fact, our curiosity to visit this place was roused by Mr. Smythe's colourful description and also to some extent by the film of Mr. Buddha Bose at Calcutta. It is, of course, certain that Sadhus visited this place even in the earliest times. Lakshmana is stated to have chosen this place for worship on the shores of Hemkund Lake where Guru Govind Singh is also reported to have penanced for emancipation of Sikhism.

We had already arranged for our provisions but the extra luggage had to be discarded at Govindaghat, as we wanted to travel light and in this respect we received prompt assistance from the then keeper of the Gurdwara, Sardar Madan Singh. He arranged for the safe-keeping of our luggage, our guide and lastly for our night halt in their pilgrim shed at Ghangrya on the way to Hemkund as we had no tents. He was all in for help and the Sikh residents were also jubilant finding us interested in their place of pilgrimage. So, with their good wishes, we started from Govindaghat.

This narrative will be incomplete without a reference to the bridge which then existed there. It was, as my Diary records, a frail structure suspended from thin iron strings, the narrow footway being made of rotten planks some of which were physically missing! We had to cross this name of a bridge without any sort of a handrail whatsoever, balancing ourselves with a great effort. Under our weight the structure swung to both sides, high on the foaming torrent of the river and our position was nothing but precarious. I still have a vivid remembrance of that horrible experience. This bridge has since been replaced by an iron one with the donations of the religious Sikhs.

From the very end of the bridge the track began to mount steeply. It zig-zagged along the rushing stream of Bhyunder Ganga or Lachman Ganga which has its confluence with Alakananda some quarter of a mile below Govindaghat. The path lay through a dense forest interspersed with occasional cedars and willows. We also saw some Rudraksha trees whose dried fruits are used as chanting beads by Shaivaites. Peculiar scent, familiar only to trekkers in the inner Himalayas, was emanating from nameless shrubs on the way. The air was invigorated with cool and refreshing mountain breeze. Pines and chirs appeared in higher altitudes. Inhaling the fragrant aroma of the eucalyptus we went on climbing as a cheerful party of scouts while guide Nanda Singh and the coolie-cum-cook Amar Raj brought up the rear. The river was rushing through a gorge here and we had to trek along a fantastic path which, at some places, dropped to the river at least half a mile below. Indeed, the gorge was so deep that the sound of the rushing waters was all but muffled.

After a strenuous climb of about six miles we reached the tiny hamlet of Pulna. In the absence of any young men, who were working in the fields uphill, the old village-mukhva or headman received us in his hut. His only companion was a black and hefty Tibetan mastiff. After some rest we started again passing through terraced fields of rice and madua. We noticed some peculiar velvet-coloured little trees planted round the fields as fencings. The stems of the plants had bunches of soft thorns which came out in lump with the slightest touch. We came to know that the bears, who play havoc on the ripe paddy fields after harvest time, are afraid of these prickly thorns which keep them away.

The climb of about two miles from Pulna was only the forerunner of further exhausting climbs ahead. We were now in the kingdom of conifers ruled by pines and Himalayan deodars. It was afternoon when we reached Bhyunder, the last habitation on the way to the valley. Just below the village a side-stream has met Bhyunder Ganga from the west valley of Hathi Parbat, the Karnakul valley, also known for flowers and a temple built by a Bengali Sannyasi. Our guide happened to be the nephew of the village headman, Narayan Singh. He arranged for our night halt in the compound of the village temple—also used as the village primary school—in the absence of any chatty, while Amar Raj cooked for us.

Next morning we started for Ghangrya, the scheduled camping ground. The path descended to cross our own stream Bhyunder after which, on the opposite bank, the path divided in two, one going north to the Bhyunder valley and the other to the Karnakul valley to the east. We reached Ghangraya —Ghangrya Bangla as the Sikhs call it—at about noon after a non-stop climb of six miles. Ghangrya is at a height of about 10,000 ft. above sea level and a very cold place. It is a fairly big meadow amidst a rich forest of pines and deodars, surrounded on all sides by majestic rock peaks. It is at the confluence of the Bhyunder river fed by the eternal snows of the Rataban group of mountains and the tributary stream of Hem Ganga or Lachman Ganga falling down here in great chasms from the mountain lake of Hemkund or Lokepal. To our west, down below the meadow, the combined stream is obliged to rush through a deep and narrow gorge in a turbulent and raging fury. Its roars and rumblings never forsook us for a moment.

We saw no human habitation in Ghangrya save one half-finished structure of wood and tiles of slate which told of human touch. We had been allotted one of the twin rooms and while we were trying to make ourselves as comfortable as possible in this cottage, Amar Raj soon made a fire for our tea and the evening meal of chapati and potato soup.

It was a mysterious night. In that inner precincts of the Himalayas amidst deep forests and high mountains we knew that we were miles away from civilisation but did not know if we were trespassers in that private sanctuary of the Himalayas, out of bounds for human beings. Outside, in the clear moon-lit night, the shadows of the leaves of pines formed a network of light and shade on the grassy floor of the meadow. Wears after the climb we soon fell into a deep slumber.

Next morning, we organised an early start towards the valley of flowers, our first objective, taking some prepared food for our lunch. Our belongings were left at Ghangrya Bangla. The weather was clear. After crossing the Hem Ganga or the Lachman Ganga by a log-bridge we headed towards the valley of flowers on the north along the bank of the foaming Bhyunder which also had to be crossed by another log-bridge. But then, abruptly, the route seemed to be lost on the base of the great buttress of the western mountain. The valley appeared to be closed on all sides with no opening except in the utterly unclimbable, and in some places precipitous, gorge of the Bhyunder. We had to force our way through this blockade by scrambling up a grassy cliff on the left for at least twenty feet to enable us to get a reliable foothold. Then, within a short distance, the gorge began to give way to form an open valley of incredible width and there the nature had kept her most pleasant surprise in store for us.

We were, at first sight, simply bewildered at the view which lay before us. It was the view of a vast expanse of an undulating valley floor covered with multi-coloured flower trees which grew in terraces anywhere and everywhere in the valley. The river Bhyunder meandered through this maze of a garden like a wide and shallow rivulet. The valley was looked over on all sides by towering snow peaks and the great mountain range of Rataban was commanding the northern outskirt by its dazzling silvery pryamid of pure ice.

HERE IS PARADISE

There is an inscription in the famous Dewani-Khas palace in Delhi's Red Fort stating "If there is heaven anywhere, it is here, it is here, it is here", which, I thought, should not be monopolised by any single object. As we were going deep into this rock garden of nature, it went on unfolding her beauties and we were getting lost in a plethora of flowers. They were of every shape and size depicting a veritable riot of colours. We could spot the mauve-coloured alp where Mr. Smythe had camped and the view of Gauri Parbat on its top was breath-taking. We passed through glaciers which literally overhang the valley. We could also locate the Khanta Khal Pass leading to Badrinath side. Presently, we came across a memorial tablet on which one Mrs. Ledge's name was inscribed. Nanda Singh told that Mrs. Ledge was a mountaineer who perished while scaling a minor peak in this region. As an ardent mountain-lover she had definitely had the finest possible grave for her! We started collecting flowers and even with our little knowledge of Botany, could collect some 36 different kinds of flowers of which we recognised as Daisy, Buttercup, Balsam, Potentilla, Marigold and Poppy from the coloured illustrations in Mr. Smythe's book. There were also varieties of ferns, junipers and rhododendrons. But we could not trace Saussureas or Brahma Kamal, one of the most famous of Himalayan flowers.

We advanced for about 4 miles in the valley upto the terminal moraine of the glacier of Rataban from where the River Bhyunder has emerged. It was a virtual chaos of boulders and the domain of flowers ended. We took our lunch on the bank of the stream with crystal-clear water which, incidentally, was freezing cold. It was about 2 P.M. and as the clouds began covering up the valley we started going back. Our afternoon tea was prepared in a cave on the way by Amar Raj. As the sky was cloudy we had to beat a hasty retreat from the valley and reached Ghangrya Bangla in the evening.

Our second night in Gangrya was eventful and memorable with a thrilling experience. After completing our evening meals we took to our beds early and were gossiping. I was inquisitive about the big holes I saw in the trunks of pine trees here. Amar Raj told that these were scraped out by the bears for their winter dens, having been driven out by wolves from the cosy shelter of caves. So there were bears also around us! Suddenly, just then, we heard a continuous scratching sound outside. We opened the window and there, a few yards away, a huge black bear was scraping the barks of a pine tree. We could distinghish his full profile in the clear moon light on the meadow. He might have got our scent very well, we thought. We also realised very shortly that we had no effective protection from any carnivora should they choose to come to us as the door of the room had no bolts or anything like that. Amar Raj, however, quickly rose to the occasion and bound some cloth to a large stick. He made it soaked with kerosene ready to set fire to it any time to face the bear. To our great excitement and agony we heard heavy footsteps on the verandah and the growl of a big animal and I have no hesitation to admit that I was very much frightened. We all waited with throats perched with anxiety for something to happen at any moment but, to our great relief, nothing happened for what seemed to us an unusually long time, when Amar Raj declared that the bear was gone. We had no more sleep that night.

It was very chilly next morning but we had to start very early to reach Hemkund before noon. Amar Raj prepared some food and tea for lunch and after a light breakfast we started. We had to cross Hem Ganga within half a mile of our camp by the log bridge mentioned before. The river was here falling down the slopes of the eastern mountain in a series of spectacular waterfalls on a pool after which it was rushing down the meadow in a torrent towards its confluence with the Bhyunder hundreds of feet below. The mountain itself was plastered with snow and on its top was our destination, the holy lake of Lokepal.

BRAHMA KAMAL

The path, which was nothing but an unidentified track a foot or so wide, lay through a dense forest of pine and deodar, both stately trees of thick foliage. We were climbing steadily and the view was opening on all sides. As we gained height pines and deodars were being replaced by shrubs of juniper and birch (Bhojpatra) trees whose barks were used in ancient times for manuscripts in place of paper. In addition to some varieties of flowers, which we already saw in the Bhyunder valley, we came across magnolia, Brahma Kamal (Saussurea) and Fen Kamal, the latter a spongy romantic white flower whose petals disintegrated very easily.

We were already at the 13,000 ft. level and leaving the vegetation-zone, were going to enter into the region of snow and ice. We had to cross a steep and slanting snowslope on a wide gully where Nanda Singh led the way and we traversed very carefully. It was a couloir covered with soft granular snow and the debris of avalanches from the ice-cliffs of the northern mountain, which we took to be Saptashringa. The climb had been stiff from the very start and we were panting. The path went up in loops within a short span on the mountain face. We had chewing gums to moisten our throats drying up in the thin and dry air but still we were breathless at times. On the last slopes at well over 14,000 ft. we saw some more Brahma Kamals in full bloom. Our energy was running out and we wondered whether the path would ever end for our relief when, at the extremity of a gentle slope, the lake made its most dramatic appearance.

We had been covered by a thick mist and though the guide was of the opinion that we did arrive at the correct spot leading to the lake, we could not make out anything and were advancing slowly when the mist in front of us began to clear up and we saw that we were right on the shores of a lake of placid water. The mist was lifting up like a curtain and there lay before us a large lake of incomparable beauty. We sat on a boulder to take stock of our situation. We had been gasping for breath after one of the stiffest climbs of our trekking career, for the air in this high altitude was thin and cold, but gradually we settled down to admire the superb natural beauty around us.

The lake in front of us was of oval shape, a sheet of crystal-clear sapphire blue water from which the Hem Ganga or Lachman Ganga was rippling out in a small stream through a cutting towards the west. Five towering mountains of ice and snow flanked by mauve-coloured rock cliffs encircled the lake on the other three sides. The most prominent of them was the one which we presumed was Saptashringa with its ice-capped summit adorned in silver by the morning rays of the sun. Little ice streams were pouring down the glaciers of the mountains to send small chunks of ice floating on the calm waters of this glacial lake like miniature ice-bergs. We had also a grand view of the glittering icy spire of Nilkanta, the mountain described by Mr. Smythe as the queen of Garhwal, reigning supreme on the western horizon, but the views of the valley of flowers were denied us by the mountain on the north-west side of the lake.

PENANCE OF LAKSHMAN

For an hour or so we simply kept quiet and watched the time go by, enjoying the scenery to our heart's content. Then we got up to have a round of the lake which we could not accomplish owing to boulder debris on the shores. We then climbed a gentle cliff of some 200 feet to have a bird's eye view of the area and take some photographs, with our fingers already numbed on account of intense cold wind, which naturally did not do justice to the grandeur of the locale. Coming down we sat on the shores of the lake and took our lunch and tea for refreshing ourselves.

There were two stone sheds on the bank of the lake, one dedicated to Lakshmana, who in the Treta Yuga, is said to have penanced here and the other is used as Gurdwara by the Sikhs in the sacred memory of Guru Govind Singh. It is really a place for meditation. Nanda Singh told us that at night the gods and angels came to have their pleasure baths in the lake. Enquired if we would be able to see them if we spent the night there in the shed, he vehemently objected apprehending that we might die if we dared to witness that spectacle! We, of course, appreciated that the onlooker, without adequate protection from cold blizzard at this high altitude at night, would die surely of intense cold and exposure. Already the cold was becoming unbearable and the Thermometer kept by Meteorologial Department on the shores of the lake showed a minimum temperature of 35 degrees Fahrenheit.

The Valley of Flowers

It was noon and, as is the rule with high mountains, clouds began to gather, so we had to start down with heavy hearts after having a last look on this lake of ethereal beauty. Collecting some Brahma Kamals we began to get down quickly. We were extremely joyous for our visit to this wonderful lake. Nanda Singh was relating his experiences with a climbing party on the Hathi Parbat side and the mysterious lake of Rupkand which aroused a great amount of interest to us in those days. He appeared to be quite well-informed about Garhwal. Our joyous mood doubled the pace and we completed the descent in little more than an

NEW VOICES IN BENGALI WRITING

By KRISHNA DHAR

CREATIVE writing in any literature is a continuous process. It runs parallel to the social mood of change and progress towards new frontiers of thought. This corelation of two processes has played no mean role in shaping the literary image in Bengal. Modern man is an enigma and so also is his creative activity. Creative art, as we see it to-day is but a moving symbol of the deep complexities which a social individual bears in his personality. Bengali literature is no exception to that phenomenon which haunts the sensibilities of modern man and to some extent challenges his existence.

Bengali literature flourished under the great shadow of Rabindra Nath Tagore. The last two decades, to be precise saw an artistic revolt, if we may call it, against Tagorean concept. Creative writers in recent years have been consistently trying to free themselves from the olympian shadow impact of the greatest among the greats. It does not mean that Tagore has ceased to belong to the age we live in. The revolt has been caused by the urge of the new generation of writers to impress upon the contemporary readers the necessity to emancipate the art form from cliches and give it a new tone and texture.

It must be remembered that Bengali society received a serious jolt due to partition which came in the wake of independence. It was all blood and tears the like of which the new generation never witnessed except during the terrible days of the famine. Partition opened up new opportunities to the writers, like the famine, to perceive bitter realities of existence. Humanity was uprooted and finally the border was sealed. This was perhaps the greatest tragic event which Bengali social mind had to endure in silent tears. But strangely enough, this intensely human episode found no echo in the minds of the great Bangali writers. I do not venture to suggest that political events should always lead the writers to reorientate their attitude towards society. But here was a case which an alert and sensitive mind could hold on to give a new meaning to art and break the stagnation. The writers' response to the hungry millions during the famine was much deeper and more moving. The upheaval of partition failed to move them. It was a clear indication of the rot that the social consciousness of creative writers was suffering from.

The late 'forties were incensed by this frustration of ideals. Everybody was groping in the dark to get a new meaning and give a new significance to art. The elders fumbled. The fire in them perhaps left nothing but embers. A realignment of thought was urgently called for. In the preceding years, Tarasankar Bandopadhyay's great trilogy—'Dhatri Devata', 'Gana Devata' and 'Panchagram' and his moving realistic portrayal of Bengal famine in 'Manwantar' upheld the banner of humanism. The late 'forties demanded a renewed approach and a realistic one. Manik Bandopadhaya, the greatest among the realists was perhaps the answer. He wrote in rough and tough prose. But his insight was deeper. He may be called the forerunner of realistic experiment in Bengali novel which boldly faced the other face of life.

The new experiment in literary form and content made its marks explicitly in the last fifteen years. Both in prose and poetry, the younger generation came in the field with a new voice, newer images and something fresh to ponder over. How this new voice will take shape is yet to be seen. But the main handicap with the new generation is that it suffers unconsciously from a sense of rootlessness. It has freed itself from older values. On the other hand, it has yet to find out a newer faith. This sense of wilderness is more pronounced in modern Bengali poetry.

This sense of alienation in Bengali poetry is the result of subterranean forces of anger, frustration and resentment. But then Bengali poetry is more intellectual in appeal than Bengali novel. The import of new verse form and idea content is evident among the writing of the youngers. In the mid 'forties Sukanta Bhattacharya (1926 1947) developed a vigorous way of communication. It was direct, loud and intensely social in content. Bhattacharya died young. But his image walked like a living shadow till the end of the decade. Even in the 'fifties many poets recalled Sukanta. Poetry became partisan and articulate. But the craze soon faded away. Self introspection among the poets of the fifties acted like a tranquilliser and poetry once again took to personal tone.

The greatest influence on modern poetry was left by the unassuming and soft poet Jibananda Das (1899-1954). His lonely sojourn into moonlit space punctuated by soulful shadows of mother nature still create a nostalgia for the urban Bengali poets. He is most read and most adored of the difficult but intimate poets that the preceding generation produced. His contemporary Bishnu Dey has a different appeal of intellectualism to the youngers. while Jibananda's poetry is enriched with the fragrance and landscape of rural Bengal, Bishnu Dey's poems appealed to the urban mind who had read Eliot and Paul Eluard. It was left to Sudhindranath Datta (1901-1960) to introduce masculine vigour and discipline in poetry. This trio determined to a large extent the trend of modern Bengali poetry.

Modern Bengali poetry is feebly trying to identify itself with the agony of the time. The legacy of the older poets, except a few, could not be borne by this generation. They are no doubt in earnest to communicate but the involved way of expression spoils their attempt. Poets like Subhas Mukherjee, Birendra Chattopadhyay, Manindra Ray, Ram Basu, Nirendra Chakravarti, Siddheswar Sen, Aloke Ranjan Dasgupta and some of the younger ones have certainly received an appreciable audience for their verses. But their communication of private experience remains as difficult as before to the uninitiated readers.

To the readers who have been brought up in the tradition of Tagore and his contemporaries, modern Bengali poetry would seem to be a hothouse of experiments. The undertone of lyricism is there but the structure is involved strewn with very difficult personal images. Unlike their counterparts of the preceding decade modern poets abhor pronouncements. They prefer to be quiet in tonality but complex in ideas. But the main complaint against this generation of poets is that they are more collective than individual, and that they demonstrate in their verses the patheic picture of horizontal living of the age. Their concern about agony and the brutal demolition of dream, however, leave the readers in cold detachment.

The poets are in search of a new method of communication. Verse dramas are being attempted. Experimental drama groups have even staged some of the modern verse dramas written in abstract language. The audience is eager but the right type of modern verse drama is not yet forthcoming. I think modern poetry will have to use this medium to get an escape route from the impossible position it is now put to. Whatever the medium may be experience has proved this beyond doubt that modern Bengali poetry needs new language and new image to resuscitate it from the sense of alienation. But alas, few of the moderns has the power to do it.

FICTION

Modern Bengali fiction has, of course, a wide but not altogether discerning readership. The maturer writers have built up a tradition of good story telling. And in fact, modern Bengali prose has fine specimens of short stories. But apart from the traditionally acclaimed novels. viz Tarasankar's 'Kavi', Bibhuti Bhusan Bandopadhyay's 'Pather Panchali', Manik Bandopadhyaya's 'Putul Nacher Itikatha', Annada Sankar Ray's epic 'Satyasatya', Narayan Gangopadhyaya's 'Upanibesh'. Amarendra Ghosh's 'Char Kasem'. Satinath Bhaduri's 'Jagari', the promise of the arrival of the real novel in the present decades has not been fulfilled. Prose writers are writing with a vengeance to reach maximum readership. But we are still waiting for the novel 'with its creation and inquiry, music and knowledge, myth and science, its human scope, its objectivity and irony', to use the words of the great novelist of the century Thomas Mann, which will make it the most representative and dominant form of writing. Narendranath Mitra, Jyotirindra Nandy, Bimal Kar, Ramapada Chaudhuri, Samaresh Bose are some of the writers of the decade under review who have established their reputation. Narendranath excels in short story writing. His theme centres round urban middle class, their hopes and frustrations of love and life. Jyotirindra Nandy is also a storyteller. His view of life is however, obsessed, by his preoccupation with sex abnormality. He is unconventional but is least involved with the inquiry of the age we live in.

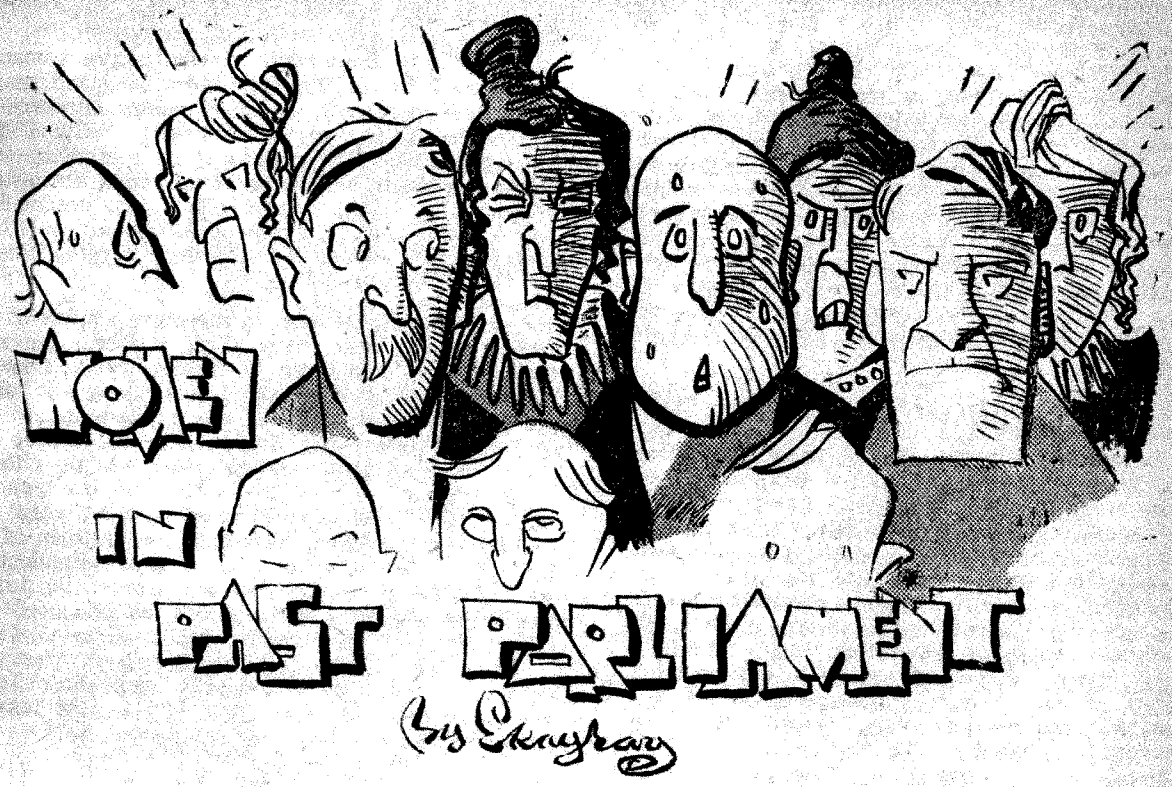
Ramapada Chaudhuri, is essentially a romantic. A nostalgia haunts him for quaint land and people. Sometimes he finds his escape in historical anecdotes which he retells with ingenuity. Bimal Kar is supposed to be the guiding spirit behind the anti-story movement which the more young enthusiasts are following. Kar is not a realist. He has made a world of his own, a world of probabilities where man and woman are tangled up in surging tide of passion and complexities.

The most remarkable of the prose writers of the decade is Samaresh Bose. This youthful but serious writer's triumphant entry into Bengali literature was through some bold and poignant short stories reminiscent of the early Tarasankar and Manik Bandopadhyay. His observation is deep and experience is varied. Though his style is clumsy, he places life in the raw. None of the younger writers have gone so deep into life. His 'Ganga' is a bold attempt to depict the life of the boatmen of the great river which reminds us of Manik Bandopadhyay who wrote that memorable saga of the turbulent river 'Padma'. He has also another predecessor in this river epic, Advait Malla Barman whose 'Titas Ekti Nadir Nam' is definitely a nearest approach to reality in this respect. But Bose's promise is failing He has succumbed to the temptation of superimposed romantic cliches which mar the sensibilities of many a young writer of the day.

We find promise in Amiya Bhusan Majumder, ('Gar Srikhanda') Prafulla Roy, (Purba Parbati) Kamal Majumder, (Antarjali Yatra) Gunamoy Manna (Junapur Steel) and Ashim Ray, (Rakter Haoa). All of them have attempted to break away from the common run of story telling. They have a new awareness, a critical and analytical mind. The hospitalised society, the etherised living of man, his fruitlesness and the outsider attitude tend to impress upon the very young generation of writers. The ideas are surely imported and therefore not easily assimilated in the thought process of the writers who are in a hurry.

The greatest living novelist Tarasankar Bandopadhyay has reverted back to what he calls 'our tradition'. His pursuit, however noble is not conditioned by historical or logical inquiry. It is an emotional feed back. Hence his message is foundering on the rocks of agonised soul of the modern man. On the other hand, less capable writers with limited sense of perspective are getting lost in the dark alleys of anger and disbelief. The journalese they produce in the name of literature is no answer to the great question which stalls our future.

The new voices are too feeble. We have, to be frank, no Sartre, no Camus nor have we that sublime voice of Gora, the great Tagorean character. We imitate, we falter and bleed on the thorns of life. The hero is demolished from the pedestal but the pharisees have not installed the anti-hero either. This ambivalent nature of modern Bengali literature truly reflects the attitude of the time we live in.



DELVING the old records contained in the history of the British Parliament written by authoritative compilers it appears that women formed an essential part of early deliberative assemblies even in the thirteenth century. Abbesses of Shaftesbury, Berking, St. Mary of Winchester, and of Wilton were summoned to Westminster during the reign of Edward I. A number of ladies of high birth, including Mary, Countess of Norfolk; Alienor, Countess of Ormond; Anne Despencer, Countess of Pembroke and Matilda, Countess of Oxford, were required by writ in the days of Edward III to give their attendance in the National Council Chamber,—though presumably these summonings in most cases were mere matter of form. A custom also existed of allowing peeresses to be represented by proxy and this continued till the time of Henry VIII, but when Elizabeth became the queen it disappeared altogether.

"I SAW PETTICOATS"

The presence of women as spectators in the Parliament became a subject of public comment. When on June 1, 1675, a debate was proceeding the Speaker (Edward Seymour) exclaimed—"I am sure I saw petticoats." The amused House, as eager then as it is today for anything in the nature of a "scene," cast away its business to look at the women who had crowded the back benches of the Strangers' Gallery and peered over the shoulders of the gentlemen in their front. "What borough do these ladies sit for?"—the Speaker enquired in mock severity. "They serve for the Speaker's Chamber," jerked out a Parliamentary wit. "The Speaker might take them for gentlemen with fine sleeves dressed like ladies," quipped another jester. And, laughing at its own humour, the House resumed the business of the day.

This incident gives us an interesting insight into the attitude of the House towards the women visitors in the legislative precincts about three centuries ago. Progressive as the Parliament has been in most things, in its attitude towards ladies it has in many respects retrograded. But in February, 1762, a well-known lady wrote to her friend,—"In the House of Commons everybody who can articulate is a speaker. . . . They sit late every night, as every young gentleman who has a handsome person, a fine coat, a well-shaped leg or a clear voice, is anxious to exhibit these advantages. To this kind of beau-oratory and tea-table talk the ladies, as is reasonable, resort very constantly. At first they attended in such numbers as to fill the body of the House on great political occasions; but a ghost (the Cock Lane) started up in a dirty obscure alley of the City and diverted the attention of female politicians." Many references are found in the gossipy records of the eighteenth century to the part played by the "ladies of quality" in the doings at St. Stephen's.

From these it is apparent that not only the women had admission to the public galleries, but that they actually occupied seats by the side of the Members. But this uncontrolled liberty was withdrawn for an incident displaying feminine fractiousness. On February 2, 1778, a debate on the state of the nation had drawn to St. Stephen's a large number of ladies who not only crowded the galleries but also trespassed upon some seats from which they were customarily excluded, and a blustering naval captain, who was a member of the House, was incensed at the monopoly of the strangers' benches by the fair sex and the consequent exclusion of several of his male friends and drew attention of the House which issued orders for the clearing of the galleries. But it was easier to give this order than to execute it. The ladies, having come to the House for an evening's amusement, were not to be easily removed, and they turned a deaf ear to the commands of the House, their defiance not being of a merely passive character. They laughed and stamped and jeered. The authorities could not use force although it was impossible to permit the mandate of the House to be flouted. The only course open to the authorities was to oppose obstinacy to obstinacy and in the long run carried their point. It was full two hours before the skirts of the last of the ladies disappeared. Later, so rigorous was the ban against women that Mrs. Sheridan had to don male attire for listening to her husband's eloquence. The beautiful Duchess of Gordon was also seen in the Strangers' Gallery dressed as a man, as Wraxall mentions in his "Memoirs."

AMAZONIAN ATTACK

The outburst which occurred about the year 1738 was amazonian indeed, as has been described by Lady Mary Wortley Montagu in her letters. "At the last warm debate in the House of Lords it was unanimously resolved that there should be no crowd of unnecessary auditors," as Lady Montagu writes. Women were excluded, but they resolved to show on this occasion that neither men nor law could resist them. "They presented themselves," Lady Montagu continues, "at the door at 9 o'clock in the morning when Sir William Saunderson respectfully informed them that the Chancellor had made an order against their admittance. The Duchess of Queensbury, as head of the squadron, pished at the ill breeding of a mere lawyer and desired him to let them up the stairs privately." This denied and reported, the Peers resolved to starve them out. "The amazons now showed themselves qualified even for the duty of foot-soldiers. They stood there till five in the afternoon without sustenance . . . . every now and then playing volleys of thumps, kicks and raps against the door with so much violence that the speakers in the House were scarce heard. When the Lords were not to be conquered by this, the two Duchesses of Queensbury and Ancaster (very well apprised of the use of stratagems in war) commanded a dead silence for half an hour and the Chancellor who thought this a certain proof of their absence (the Commons also being very impatient to enter) gave order for the opening of the door, upon which they all rushed in, pushed aside their competitors and placed themselves in the front row of the gallery. They stayed there until after eleven when the House rose and during the debate gave applause and showed marks of dislike, not only by smiles or winks (which have always been allowed in these cases) but by noisy laugh and apparent contempts (which is supposed the true reason why poor Lord Hervey spoke so miserably)."

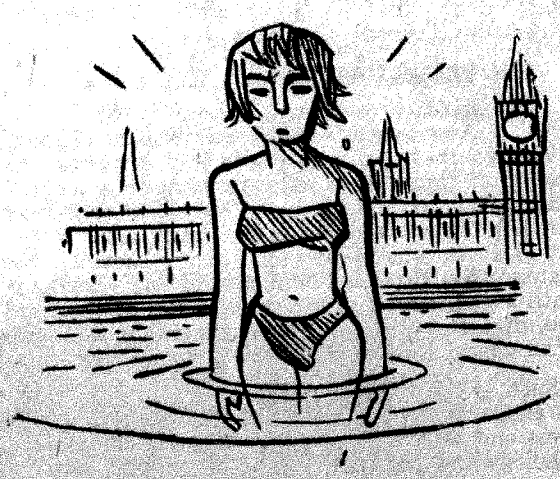
DOG-HOLE OF 1822

To these incidents, and perhaps others of a similar character which have not been handed down to us, is probably to be attributed the strong prejudice which grew up against the admission of ladies to the House of Commons. For a time they were kept absolutely at arm's length, but later, as a great concession, they were admitted to the lantern above the big chandelier which lit the old House. Not more than fourteen could be accommodated there at one time and the smoke and the heat made the atmosphere unbearable. Miss Edgeworth in her memoirs gives a description of a visit to this dog-hole in 1822. "We want," she says, "one night to the House of Commons. Mr. Whitbread took us there. A garret—the whole size of the room—the former chapel, now the House of Commons; below kit-cats of Gothic chapel windows stopped up appear on each side; above the floor and above roof-beams. One lantern with one farthing candle, all the light. In the middle of the garret is what seemed like a sentry-box of deal boards and old chairs placed round it; on these we got and stood and peeped over the top of the boards. Saw large chandelier with lights blazing immediately below; a grating of iron across veiled the light so that we could look down and beyond it."

Such was the state of affairs from the end of the eighteenth century until the fire of 1834, which changed many things, brought to the front the desirability of making adequate provision for women in the temporary House of Commons constructed in the late House of Lords (or Old Court of Requests) and a portion of the Strangers' Gallery not exceeding a quarter of the whole and capable of holding twenty-four ladies was set apart for their accommodation,—no member of the House being allowed to introduce more than two ladies in the course of one week. These measures were not carried out without strenuous opposition. Lord Brougham barked out—"If such a proposition is to be made, I enter my protest against it. . . . I think the ladies would be better employed in almost any other way than in attending Parliamentary debates. I like to see them in their proper places. The Marquis of Lansdowne was equally emphatic. "Ladies are not mentioned in the report," he said, "and, so far as I can prevent it, they shall never be."

The presence of women had a disconcerting effect on some noble orators. "The number of ladies who attended the debate (on Lord Ellenborough's want of confidence motion on May 12, 1885) created great displeasure among the peers. Lord Ellenborough said that it made him nervous; and Lord Lyndhurst positively refused to speak saying that the House looked like a casino, and not a place where business is transacted. Lord Redesdale was also very angry as the ladies overflowed from the gallery into the House. This invasion will, I fear, lead to more stringent and less agreeable arrangements in future." (Lord Malbesbury's memoirs.)

Notwithstanding these ungallant sentiments, speeches and events the ladies had their gallery in the new House and asserted themselves in other directions as well,—in the Lobby and dining rooms, on the promenade and the Terrace. The later history is extant on better records and evidence. Today Profumo cannot perfume the breach of the Parliament, a feminine stench is in the air.



A FEW GEMS FROM TAGORE'S SHORT STORIES

By KESHAB LAL DAY

RABINDRANATH'S "Post Master" is a story of hope that sustains life, despite the fact that there is almost invariably always an element of uncertainty about its fulfilment. When Ratan finds a refuge in the post master, life begins to have a meaning for her. But it is soon to fall to pieces when time comes for the post master to leave that far away village for good. Her heart breaks but she is consoled. There will still be another post master to take his place, both in the post office and in the girl's life.

Was it his foolishness that made Ramkanai to tell the truth about his elder brother's will? In the story (Ramkanaiyer Nirbuddhita) he is painted as a half-wit simpleton, a good-for-nothing and hanger on who depends on the charity of his worldly wise elder brother. The will deprived him and his son of a share in his elder brother's property. It meant poverty and starvation for them. If the will could be proved to be a forged one before the court of law, he might have been sure of a livelihood for himself and his wife and son. When a suit was filed alleging forgery he was briefed by his wife, and brother-in-law to give evidence in their favour. But during the hearing, he sprang a surprise. He told the truth, and only the truth and fell unconscious. According to worldly standards, he was proved a fool.

What does it matter if he is proved a fool? The truth has been told. Righteousness has triumphed. There is no hope for humanity so long as goodness will be treated as a synonym of foolishness. It gives only a fragment of Rabindranath's mind which was committed to truth and beauty. Only the simple at heart has a right to truth, though wiseacres will ever pity him for being a fool.

"Was this the face that launched a thousand ships
And burnt the topless towers of Illium?"

Though in an entirely different context, the spirit of the girl whose skeleton hung in the study of the student of medicines inspires such a musing as in the above-quoted outburst of Dr. Faustus at the sight of Helen in Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus". The skeleton ("Kankal") had flesh, and life. The flesh had beautiful shape, and inside there was a heart that loved, dreamt, wept, felt disappointed, and finally lost all charm for life.

Such is the transitoriness of the world, of life, with all its vanity and pride, its joys and sorrows, its success and failure. It is a symphony of philosophy, psychology and phantasy, composed with an artistry which only a few like Rabindranath are heir to. Here is the tragedy and irony of the human drama—that behind this fiery facade of life is the skeleton.

How many pairs of feet had left their prints on the stony steps of the ghat on the bank of Ganga? Countless no doubt, but that is not all. They are the footprints of cavalcades of generations which the Ghat as a macrobiotic being had been witness to since its birth ("Ghater Katha"). The footprints, the stories of the bearers of the feet, were engraved in the stones of the Ghat. And perhaps only the Ghat knew them.

Such a story was Kusum's which the Ghat alone knew. Her husband who had left her unnoticed some time after marriage and remained untraced for long years, appeared as a Sanyasi on the scene of the Mandir attached to the Ghat, and met Kusum there. Kusum was staying in her father's house near the Ghat after she left her husband's home. She wanted to live a life of seclusion and austerity after he gave her the slip. When they met at the Ghat, they recognized each other. Kusum nurtured a fond hope that they could unite again as husband and wife. But the husband, now a Sanyasi, gave her advice as a preceptor to lead the life of a nun, and vanished one day, this time never to return. The only way left to Kusum was to seek a watery grave in the Ganga, and she found it.

Home, after all, is the place for woman, and it is the haven where she is bound to return however much she might love the stormy, unchartered sea and perilous voyage. This miracle, however, is made possible only by love. So the wayward Mrinmoyee at last accepts the unromatic household of her husband, and makes peace with it (Samapti). Mrinmoyee is more like a boy than a girl, turbulent; pranksome and something of a delinquent. But young Apurba would take no other girl to wife but Mrinmoyee who fascinated him. After he marries her comes the trouble. There is little of feminine sweetness in her to make her an ideal bride and daughter-in-law to shine in the circumscribed world of home-life. In course of time she too learns to find her place in this world and is reconciled to it.

It is perhaps his short stories which prove more than anything else he wrote, that Rabindranath was not a poet of the ivory tower. His acquaintance with life in all its reality was deep, and his sympathy with the common man, and understanding of his little problems and joys and sorrows was sincere. In no other literary medium the question of craftsmanship is of so supreme an importance as in short story. And Rabindranath's stories were models of craftsmanship, to say the least.

POETRY AND THE REALM OF VALUES

tery evokes the subjective quality of wonder in its primal freshness when the morning stars sang together at the beginning of terrestrial time. And it is the quality of wonder and its perpetual rebirth, like that of the fabled Phoenix, that poetry celebrates and preserves from decay. In it are embalmed the moments of profound wonder that the human spirit has experienced in the course of its encounter with Reality—embalmed not in death but in life. Poetry integrates the broken fragments of life on the physical plane by fusing them in terms of value.

What Time divides Poetry unites. Poetry takes our fleeting moments and gives them the texture of eternity and thus enslaves Time itself.

In the world of time and sense, in the midst of life we are in death; in the realm of poetry in the midst of death we are heirs to a richer life which is free from the shackles which we habitually wear in body and mind, because it evokes a state of awareness which is whole in itself and not a means to some remoter good.

In the realm of poetry we are perfectly free because we are perfectly unexpectant in terms of personal advantage. The gem like perfection of poetry is not something we seek to possess but a benediction which is bestowed on us and by which we are profoundly moved. If a rainbow moves and stirs us to the very depths of being through a profundity of confused feelings which have no name we do not wish to frame the rainbow to place in a festal hall.

In fact in the highest poetic sympathy and realization even the mind is laid to rest. We shed the sheaths of mind and body and are reduced to the essential elements of soul and spirit, thus becoming pure, palpitating entities wholly identified with the specific stuff of poetry. It is a state which is common to poetry and religion. It is the common experience of the mystic; it should be the equally common experience of the devotee of poetry. It is a state of beatitude. It cannot be explained for it is a state of awareness which has to be realized to be understood. But this is not to say that it lacks reality; in fact it appears to be the one avenue leading to the highest reality; transcending the intimations of reality received through normal channels under normal physical and mental conditions. Poetry requires a persuasive discipline of a high order both for the poet and for the devotee of poetry. Milton realized this when he endeavoured to make his life a true poem. The true poet has a sense of vocation and dedication to which he is willing to sacrifice all other things. The poet should be like the trader in pearls who having found a pearl of surpassing value bought it in exchange for all the lesser pearls he had gathered in a life time. One of the great disadvantages of modern life is the difficulty of living adequately in terms of the demands of true poetry. The fragmentary and distracting quality of modern living makes it extremely difficult to attain that unclouded upgathering of the spirit which is so essential for the sustained quality and integrity of poetic inspiration.

Another danger which also stems from modern conditions is that of abusing inspiration by misusing it to subserve political or economic groups or blocs.

TRUE POETRY

True poetry is bound to languish behind the bars of such confinement. True poetry cannot flourish unless our living is geared to it; it follows that neither can the values which poetry seeks to convey—values which can only be revealed by the sweep, and strength, and energy of unalloyed poetic impulse.

One can only hope that humanity will ascend from the valley of modernism, at best of chequered light and shadow, to the broad sunny uplands where the impulse of poetry can be free of extraneous limitation, free to roam as its spirit listeth, knowing no vicissitude and acknowledging no alien jurisdiction.

In the realm of values poetry would appear to have a pervasive and prerogative place for the insight which is peculiar to it has a vaster ambit than that in the case of the other arts. Music approaches it most closely but cannot rival it.

Poetry by virtue of its comprehensive range of media can draw on all the other arts for it is freer of the bonds of the perceptual. It can convey the spirit of sound and motion, of form and colour without the aid of the sensory basis which the other arts draw upon in the communication of specific effects.

As an expression of life, heightened and intensified, its range is as unbounded as that of life itself, in fact it is more than that, if such an expression be allowed, for it lifts life out of its own rut and reveals it in its potential nobility as transcending the limits of it both in the spirit of heroic resistance and heroic endeavour. It is at this point that man can apprehend the summation of values—the value of values in their ultimate synthesis. It is the Pisgah-sight of the Celestial City of which he is a denizen and from which he is exiled—but not for ever. This vision of the Holy of Holies—the rightful dwelling place of the spirit of man, is revealed in the highest poetic flights.

Like the quality of mercy, the spirit of poetry is twice blessed, blessing both the receiver and the giver.

From the heights of poetic insight the different values, aesthetic and ethical seem like a pattern of shot silk in which the threads of one colour blend perfectly with those of another, creating a fabric of shimmering beauty, wondrously harmonious and fairylike.

The various elements of the realm of values blend and merge, and the divisiveness of finite consciousness falls away like the chrysalis of a butterfly.

Poetry at its best and highest and widest can lift the spirit to this rarefied height where it can breathe a new air and see a new universe of transcendent values which exist by their own inner strength.

The high calling to which poetry beckons demands inner discipline and the ruthless discarding of all that stands in its way. This is a hard and steep path which leads upward to reality—a reality which ultimately resolves itself into a reality of values, just as the reality of matter has resolved itself into a reality of impulse in the form of electric charges.

The basis of epistemology is shifting from intellection to intuitive perception. All history shows us the defeat and disaster of logic, for even with the past to learn from mankind has made a mess of the business of living and bids fair to make of the earth, his dwelling place, a veritable holocaust.

Poetry and the spirit it engenders and fosters are needed even in the lower sphere of social values as never before. Moral values have been rudely shaken and shattered and the eyes of a sick and harassed world scan the horizon for a new sign. The way of poetry, the true poetic outlook, can take the place of the light which has failed. It can brace the Spirit to fan the embers of despondence till they glow with the fire of worthy and heroic endeavour.

THE OLD HOUSING PROBLEM

By A. N. KERR

HOUSING problems in the underdeveloped areas of the World make one of the most important items engaging the attention of the United Nations. These problems can be solved only by the expansion of housing and urban development, the adaptation of measures for mobilizing National resources for the expansion of low cost housing, encouraging research, evaluation and information, and drawing on International resources.

About 70% of the World's population reside in the underdeveloped continents of Africa, Asia and South America and the rate of increase in population is the highest in these continents. The population is estimated to have increased at the rate of about 18% per annum. The corresponding rate of increase in these continents was over 2%, as compared to about 1.8% in the U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. and less than 1% in Europe. There were about 1,400 cities in the World with a population of 100,000 and over, the number of such cities in the three continents was only about 630 or 45% of the total number, even though these continents accounted for 70% of the World population. They are already densely populated with low agricultural productivity in relation to the high rate of population growth.

According to a United Nations report by 1965 the developing countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America will require 24 million structures annually to house the increase in population to meet the existing shortage over a period of thirty years. This means ten dwellings annually per 1,000 inhabitants.

The magnitude of these requirements can be gauged from the fact that even the highly developed Nations of the West, with their rapid expansion programmes, to-day build no more than 6 to 7 dwellings annually per 1,000 inhabitants.

In Asia the per capita income of most of the countries is less than Rs. 500 per annum. It has been estimated that an industrial working family in our country cannot afford to pay more than 10% of its earnings in rent, this would meet however, only 25% of the annual cost of a dwelling built according to accepted technical and health standards. In our country only 5% of the population in rural areas, and 12% in urban areas can afford the economic rent of a low cost dwelling whereas 15% of all households in Ceylon and Philippines could similarly afford an economic rent. According to the statistical year book published by UNO, Canada has 6.7%, U.S.A. 10.4%, U.K. 7.3% of the houses with 1-2 rooms, whereas India has 69%, Ceylon 75.6%, Japan 34.1% and Chile 67.6% of houses with 1-2 rooms. Industrially as well and economically advanced countries have houses with three to four and five to six rooms covering more than 70% of the total number of houses of different categories. In most of the advanced countries, more than 40% of the urban houses have tap water, better facilities of garbage disposal, better road and transport facilities, sanitary latrines and electric connections etc.

The eleventh round national sample survey on housing conditions in India conducted in 1957 revealed that in our country about 39% of the houses had only one room, 30% of the houses are two-roomed, 13% of the houses are three roomed and 18% of the houses are four-roomed. About 49% of the dwellings had floor space of less than 200 sq. ft. per person and 47% of the households has floor space of less than 50 sq. ft. per person. About 42% of the houses had no latrines, about 20% has separate latrines and 38% had common latrines. Shortage of housing today is a universal problem; and in India it is a major problem.

Although we have made some progress in other directions, we have a leeway to make in rural, urban and industrial housing. The standard of housing will have a bearing upon the standard of living of the people and depend on the climatic condition of the place. The majority of our people today live in sub-standard housing conditions. Due to pressure on urban land and concentration of population in townships, urban housing is changing its character. The vertical expansion in the shape of multistoried buildings has become a necessity resulting in community living and a greater civic sense.

Today our problem is not how to add to the existing land areas but how to make better use of them. The days of land expansion are gone and the hopes derived from it are no longer capable of sustaining our fresh efforts. The balancing of local resources is a complementary process to the establishment of a balanced world economy and the two go hand in hand. Control of urban land values through fiscal and legislative measures, so essential to urban planning, can also be achieved by the excercise of a little foresight and design. With urban planning thus completed and land rates frozen the little resources that are available in the developing country may just be adequate to provide the infra-structures and frame work of urban development. It should then be possible to provide within this frame, housing and other civic and essential amenities as the national income increases in the years to come.

URBAN AND RURAL

As compared to urban housing, rural housing has not changed its character very much. There is still not much demand for home-stead land in rural areas, except for the due allowance for growth of populations which is met by extending existing accommodation.

According to the 1951 census, there were as many as 6.44 crores occupied houses out of which 5.41 crores were in villages to accommodate a population of 29.5 crore, and 1.03 crore in towns to house 6.19 crore of urban population. This comes to 6 persons per house in towns and 5.5 persons per house in villages. A test survey was carried out, and it was found that there were 112 households for 100 rural houses and 124 households for 100 urban houses. It was also found that there were 441 persons for every 100 rural houses and 471 persons for every 100 urban houses. Accepting the desirability of one house for each household, we find that in 1951 shortage of houses per 100 households, i.e. 471 persons in urban area was 24 and that for the rural area was only 12 for 441 persons. Thus for an urban population of 6.19 crore, the housing shortage is 31.5 lakhs, and for a rural population of 29.5 crore the housing shortage is 1.22 crore.

The urban housing situation in every developing country is a story of acute shortage and distress, and will continue to be so, so long as incomes are low and urbanisation grows at its present tempo and pace. Although increasing efforts have been made in India, the backlog of housing is tremendous and it is difficult to keep pace even with current requirements. In the third five-year plan for India, efforts are being made towards setting the problem in its proper perspective in order to arrive at a satisfactory solution. But the urban housing development is closely related with the prevailing house rents in the locality. With the rise in standard of living, more amenities are required to be provided. One has to plan ahead by anticipating future demands in respect of amenities. The obsolescence is becoming quite an important consideration in urban housing and large houses are being pulled down, to be replaced by houses with better amenities.

At the end of the second five-year plan and after the 1961 census, the statistical figure for urban population was 7.78 crores according to the Registrar General of Census operation. The household pattern is also changed to some extent due to socio-economic changes. But if we assure that the household pattern remained unchanged during the last ten years, we shall find that there will be shortage of about 34 lakh houses. On this basis if we add the present shortage of 34 lakh houses to this accumulated shortage upto 1951 i.e. 31.5 lakh, the total shortage of houses will be 65.5 lakh for urban population. But the actual shortage will be more if we add certain percentage due to demolition, slum dwellers' house unfit for human habitation and replacement of old houses etc. This will give us an actual shortage of housing of about 85 lakh for urban population.

During the period of 1951-61 it was expected that approximately 4 lakh dwelling units might have been constructed by the various authorities. Thus still there will be a shortage of about 81 lakh houses in the urban areas in our country. Although the development of housing is being controlled by civic authorities and certain minimum requirements are to be fulfilled by owners, care should also be taken so as not to increaase the density of population in residential areas by vertical development in the shape of multi-storied tenements.

The policy of urban housing should be considered on the basis of the following:—

(a) A National population policy, with an eye to stabilisation instead of permitting the threatened decrease;

(b) A policy of urban land nationalisation which will liquidate the present structure of urban values and permit large scale reconstruction to be economically carried on, in a fashion favourable to balanced family life, and balanced communal life relationships;

(c) A national policy of industrial de-centralisation;

(d) A policy which will progressively disperse more population out of the city proper and other large centres;

(e) Regional administration units that will undertake the task of resettlement and building outside the existing municipality and will co-ordinate the work of the municipal authorities;

(f) Control of indiscriminate expansion of urban area;

(g) Rigid application of building rules and bye-laws and their effective implementation so that slum like structures cannot crop up (this can be done by heavy taxation to the slum owners);

(h) Ceiling on land value specially in urban areas and banning land speculation;

(i) Ceiling on rates for essential building materials viz. steel, cement, bricks, woods, paints, etc. should be fixed.

The lack of planned development in rural areas will one day present us with a serious problem, which may result in the abandonment of a whole village, after it has turned out to be a plague-spot. The problem cannot be solved only by constructing more and more house and letting them out on reasonable rents. The planned development of rural housing also envisages development of communications and transport, drainage and water supply, educational institutions in order to effect all round development in community living. In rural areas one does not visualise the growth of permanent structure on a large scale. Rural housing will develop out of necessity, size of family and surplus savings. Unless the present rural agronomy developes substantially, the character of rural housing cannot be expected to change very much. As there is no ready land, no ready materials at site, nor the technical expert and skilled and unskilled labourers to implement this heavy gigantic task, it cannot be tackled specifically. It has to be dealt at the National and International level by controlling the abnormal growth of population, by restricting the unplanned urban expansion, and by dispersing undesirable elements having very little urban function to perform within the city.

UNUSED FUND

In our country efforts of the Government for partial solution of the housing problem were with emphasis on (1) low income group housing, (2) middle income group housing, (3) plantation labour housing, (4) rental housing scheme for Central and State Government's employees, (5) rural housing, (6) slum clearance and (7) subsidised industrial housing schemes. In addition to the above schemes, substantial housing programmes have been undertaken by the Ministries of Rehabilitation, Defence, Railways, Steel and Heavy Industries, Communication, Works and Housing Ministry, etc. The funds were earmarked for the above purpose in successive plan periods but unfortunately they were not fully utilised either by the Government or by the Co-operative Societies and Industrialists due to rigid rules and regulation framed by our Government. Therefore our Government should immediately relax their rules and regulations, so that the Co-operative Societies and Industrialists of our country might avail of this opportunity. I believe these societies can solve at least 30% of the present shortage of housing in the urban and rural areas.

Eighty-two per cent of India's population live in rural areas. They make the backbone of the country and any effort made to improve the living conditions of rural dwellers either by the Government or by societies will naturally be a practical contribution to the National and International advancement.

A quarter of the world's population is housed in poor, unhealthy dwellings. While food, health, labour, agriculture and industrial development have received the attention they deserve, housing on a world-wide scale has so far been neglected. I hope that it should be implemented by all the developing nations of the world and particularly by a developing country like India. The United Nations should play their part on National and International levels to reach this goal.

EFFICACY OF BIOLOGICAL MOVEMENT

By Dr. SIVATOSH MOOKERJEE

IN a way movement is synonymous with life. Every kind of living being is symbolised by some kind of movement. The credo is in essence that there cannot be any life which is not at work. Though we often inaptly say that the plants are incapable of any movement, whereas it is the privilege of the animals. This is a very superficial way of looking at the plants, because the plants in course of their existence, do show their own kind of movement, which may not be like the animals'. Movement is not necessarily concerned with the gross body movement. It could be very subtle, even invisible, concerning itself with the molecular rearrangements. Movement is a vital sign of existence. Some of the engineering principles of movements in the living system will be discussed in the following paragraphs.

Muscles of our body are primarily responsible for movements like walking, jumping, swimming etc. but there could be movements without muscles. Perhaps the most symbolic travel was that of Tenzing and Hillary when they went all the way to make a conquest of the highest point of the earth. Symbolic in the sense that in such a quest not only the sturdy muscles of the heroes worked indefatigably but such travel represented the noblest of our aspirations. Besides this kind of bodily displacement from one place to another, one can exhibit movement by sitting or even in sleeping. Muscles of the heart tirelessly contract till death, they have no apparent respite. Cardiac muscles constantly make the heart work.

Another kind of muscle is found in our viscera, like the stomach or intestine. The contraction of these muscles allows the movement of food in the gut. Chronic spasm of the vascular muscles results in blood pressure. Asthma is the cause of muscle contraction of the respiratory passage by which the calibre of the respiratory tract causes inconvenience. Colic is caused by an abnormal contraction of muscle fibres. These are some of the well-known examples of movements caused by muscle contraction. Insects also have flight muscles which cause movement due to tetanic contraction. The octopus has big muscles to effect sharp movement. Locomotion of the earthworm wonderfully demonstrates the contraction and expansion of circular and longitudinal muscles.

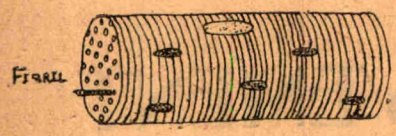
Besides the muscular movements, there are ciliary and amoeboid movement which are seen in a good number of organisms. Cilia are minute hair-like structures which move in one direction like stiff rods and make the organism move. There are many unicellular organisms which have ciliary mode of locomotion. Some, instead of having many cilia, may have one or two flagella which are used for about 20 beats per minute. Sponges and mussels utilise their cilia (they have ciliated cells) for causing water current inside their body. Ciliated cells are found in all animals except in nematods and arthropods. Our own trachea and bronchi have on their surface many cilia. They beat constantly in direction away from the lung to keep the surface clean from dust particles.

SPECIALISED CELLS

The spermatozoa are very specialised cells, they store all energy to swim across the genital tract. The movement is effected by a lashing of their tails across the seminal medium. When a cell divides, the chromosomes separate into chomatids which travel to two poles to bring about the completion of cell division. The movement of amoeba is in a way extra-ordinary. Amoeba utilises the various points of the surface of the body to bring about locomotion. Minute projections from the body make the rolling in of the cytoplasmic mass. These temporary projections are known as pseudopodia. Lastly almost all types of cells show the movement of their fluid content inside the r cell. This kind of churning movement is seen in amoeba. The plant Nitella beautifully exhibits the inside movement of the endoplasm.

The muscle tissue is quite complex. There are about 639 different muscles in our body. In males, muscles constitute about 40 p.c. of the body weight and 30 p.c. in females. There are specialised cells in muscles. Muscles are composed of many lengthwise fibres. Each fibre is again formed by many delicate fibrils. They are either striated or smooth. The striated muscles are voluntary while non-striated muscles are involuntary. Muscle cell has sheath,—the sarcolema—inside which numerous fibrils are present. Between the sheath and the fibres is found the sarcoplasm—the liquid part of the protoplasm. Often muscles are attached to the skeleton which serves as a frame. Muscle fibres are also attached to a nerve and the nerve to the brain. It is believed that no organised movement is possible without the skeleton. However there can be movement without the frame. It has been suggested that a mediumsized muscle contains about ten million muscle cells and six thousand million fibres. With great difficulty one may however imagine that possibly billion muscles are mobilised for a piece of movement. The cardiac muscles are different, they form a net work. They are involuntary.

WHOLE MUSCLE



MUSCLE FIBER

Fibrils are known for their excitability, extensibility and elasticity. They become shorter and thicker. Biological science owes a great deal to A. V. Hill and his students of the Cambridge University for the knowledge about muscle contraction. Through their researches, the idea was developed that the muscles may have two phases of existence. When contraction takes place, muscles are in 'active state' and when relaxed they are in 'plastic state'. Fibrils in the muscles represent the contracting elements. It has also been worked out that a chemical substance known as actinomysin, a kind of a protein present in the muscles fibres is primarily responsible for muscle movement. Mysin is present in the thick filaments of the fibrils and actin is located in the thin filaments. Muscle contraction is essentially a phenomenon of molecular contraction.

DEAD MUSCLES MOVE

One of the best understood phenomena of movement is undoubtedly the muscle cells. A large amount of fruitful data has recently been gathered to know more about the biological process of contraction. It has been shown that during the working of muscles lactic acid accumulates and until the lactic acid is removed muscle fibres cannot function. Our body has a special system of removing the poison as we work. A great result was produced by a great scientist—Albert Szent Gyorgyi. The result was so extra-ordinary that on the face of it, it appeared a part of fiction. But the observation is repeatable and after the design of the original experiment by Szent Gyorgyi, a host of similar experiments on different materials were found to be confirmative.

Let's see what Szent Gyorgyi did with the contraction of muscle cells. His experiment began with the contraction of muscle cells and storing them in cold solution of glycerine. Glycerine is employed as a kind of preservative and naturally when living muscle cells after dissociation were put into glycerine, it took away the life. Even after taking away its life, the general texture of the muscle fibres was there. With an ingenuity, Szent Gyorgyi added a very special chemical, commonly known as ATP, an abbreviation of Adenosine triphosphate, was added to the dead muscle fibres preserved in glycerine solution. And to the surprise of all, these dead muscle fibres showed signs of contraction at the instance of ATP. Inference was that ATP gives energy to muscles.

A series of interesting result came following the discovery that dead muscles fibres contract by adding ATP to them. Different categories of moving cells were glycerenated to be activated. When similar experiments were done with sperms, the tails of dead sperms showed signs of movement with adding up of ATP. Young connective cells known as fibroblast also contracted similarly.

One is led automatically to assume that unless there is some kind of common molecular bas's, such widely diverse category of cells cannot show similar phenomenon of contraction. The different structures which manifest movement were critically analysed and found to be made of a highly contractile protein-actinomysin. It led to the study of the biochemical nature of actinomysin. Again we owe our thanks to Szent Gyorgyi for providing a new understanding of the contractile protein—actinomysin. He showed that the two important counterparts of myosine and actin of the muscle fibre can be synthesised, in the test tube and some kind of artificial muscle (synthetic) fibres formed which again contract when ATP is added.

A contractile protein like actinomysin (spermosin) has been isolated from sperms. Broken flagella contains enzyme capable of releasing ATP. Another organism, namely slime mould, which shows vigorous movements in some phase of life, seems to contain a protein akin to actinomysin. This is a contractile protein. Recently in our laboratory in the Presidency College, we have shown that in hydra in addition to muscle cells, presence of contractile fibres is traced. The elegant movement of the hydra is very likely due to this protein fibres.

Other locomotory organs like cilia and flagella show interesting ultra-structures which are supposed to be involved in effecting movement. The internal structure of cilia and flagella as revealed under the electron microscope are strikingly similar. The flagella are many times larger cilia. Internally each of them is made up of fine filaments. There are two central filaments surrounded by a ring of nine circular filaments. Nine outer filaments are paired structures. It is assumed that by the effective contraction of these filaments, the movement of the entire flagella and cilia is brought about.

Ultra-thin filaments within cilia

STREAMING IN AMOEBA

Wonderful streaming movement is seen in amoeba but no filamentous structures have been found in amoeba. Electron-microscope has not revealed any visible structures in streaming movement.

Amoeba move by throwing a tiny portion of the body, known as pseudopodium, into which the protoplasmic content of the cell streams in. Constantly new pseudopodium is formed and the protoplasm rolls into it. The surface of amoeba is quite thick. It is visible under the ordinary microscope.

Scientists differ in regard to the actual progress involved in movement in amoeba. Allen and his co-workers in Princeton University, believe that the locomotion in amoeba is brought about by the shearing of its cytoplasm. They assume that whenever there is a movement in amoeba, a 'fountain zone' is formed in the anterior region from where the movement will take place. A kind of tunnel is formed within the cell, through which the cytoplasmic material from the rear end passes forward from the gel to sol condition. With the streaming of the cytoplasmic material and eventually the passing of the fountain zone, it assumes again gel condition and becomes stiffer. Continuously the fountain zone advances which also literally makes amoeba move forward. The other view-point of movement in amoeba has been advanced by Goldacre. His theory is that rear-gel material contracts which generates the motive force of advancement. The most important thing in both theories is that movement is possible by molecular rearrangement.

The miracle of a fertilized egg is to convert it into the adult. During the formative stages when the different structures of the body are being formed, embryonic cells move in a perfect order, sense and time. Cells move from one place to another and in the course of the movement they carry the message of differentiation from one place to another.

In the frog's embryo it has been seen that for prospective epidermis cells are apt to move outside the embryo and for mesoderm and neural plate cells move away from one another.

The migratory activity and adhesiveness of embryonic cells raise a peculiar problem. Surface-contact during normal morphogenetic movements is as yet almost unknown in embryos, though Holtfreter claims that the various cells acquire their histogenetic shape mainly through amoeboid activity.

We have investigated the properties of normal interfacial connections in developing tissue like notochord and have found evidence of an ensuing closeness of cell-to-cell contacts during morphogenesis. It is interesting that contact between notochord cells is effected by increase in their polyhedral surface areas—a good example of increase of surface area to volume. However, it is not certain whether for all differentiating tissue cells increase of the surface contacts is the case; blood remains a unique tissue where necessity of cellular contact is unimportant. White blood cells are peculiar. They move around independently and can leave the circulation and go into any tissue. They behave like an amoeba.

Cell-specific organisations of tissues are often traceable in individual cells in culture. Notochord cells are capable of becoming polygonal and epidermis cells tend to flatten in isolation. The cell membrane seems to be associated with the assumption of histogenetic shape by changing its round configuration. Waddington has expressed the view that ". . . . . arising from the adhesiveness of the cell membrane plays a part not only in the in-turning of the invagination stream but also in producing it." In an analysis of the nature of membrane process, it is often advanced that contact between two different cells is a reaction very much similar to antigens and their homologous antibodies—a concept due to Tyler and Weiss, Biological constant to all surface.

The intracellular matrix of the developing cells can be easily disrupted and soon the mass of cells disintegrates. The cells fall apart singly or in groups and isolated cells show the peculiar morphodynamic characteristics and amoeboid activities. The surface layer of these cells are mobilized in the form of pseudopodial bulge which often rotates round the cell. For this reason, the shape of the cells is variable. In some cells, needle-like projections are often thrown off. The amoeboid movements are thought to be the result of localized and reversible state of solution of the oriented lipid molecules of the cells surface. The process of dissociation of embryonic cells has been found to be reversible in nature. The disruptive force which breaks the surface liaison and converts the embryo into a heap of dissociated cells, can be spared if the treated embryo is immediately passed through successive changes of normal culture solution before the complete liquifaction of their ground substances. On removal to culture solution, the surface attachment between cells is once again restored and stabilized, and differentiation may proceed normally.

Fertilization is essentially a phenomenon of cortical reactions in the egg. From the beginning of the entry of the sperm till the first zygotic division, the surface layer of the egg shows variable permeability. In immature eggs, the surface layer remains impenetrable to sperms. However, the property of this layer undergoes precise changes with the initiation of the fertilization reactions and continues till they are completed.

The part played by the surface layer in living cells is now beyond doubt, and thus its dynamic structure merits a close examination as a gateway of many potent physiological reactions. The concept of inside-outside gradients, controlled by enzymatic factors, is also becoming recognisable. The surface layer of cells is no longer considered as protective covering of no physiological import.

BIOLOGICAL CONSTANT

A new interest has recently been aroused in regard to the understanding of cell surface not only for showing movement but also for other vital phenomena. All cells seem to be covered by a membrane.

The resolving power of ordinary microscope is about a thousandth of a millimeter which is really unable to reveal the structure of a few molecule—thick membrane. There is a striking similarity between cell and membrane of cells belonging to a bacterium, a plant and an animal. There is some kind of biological constant to all surface in their structural make-up. The electron microscope reveals that the membrane is 75 angstrom unit.

The situation is becoming such that many will not regard that the outside of the cell is really not outside, it is a part of the inside, because the membrane is a continuous system. There is membrane inside the cell in the form of canal or sinus. It is clear that membranes make new membranes. One can distinguish at least three stages in the formation of membrane from the initial cytoplasmic stage to languages and their literatures, there was no special animus against English. There was, however, in certain quarters, the sentimental objection that English was a foreign language—at its worst, the language of the exploiting and repressive foreigner from whose colonial and imperial control as well as what was described as "spiritual domination" India was striving to be free.

But after nearly 200 years of close contact with English, the language still reigns supreme in India, primarily because it filled the lacuna which existed in India for a Common Modern Language of all-India administration, of higher education in science and culture, and of international contacts. Not only does English continue to flourish, but non-officially (and below the surface with its anti-English furbishings) English is becoming still better entrenched — particularly among commercial and industrial groups who formerly had not much to do with English. English has become established as the indispensable language of modern civilisation and communication, and the enthusiasm with which it began to be cultivated in India from the beginning of the 19th century right down to now (the very recent growth of international contacts in business and politics and science has given it a great fillip during the past few years) made it for all practical purposes an important language of Modern India. Outside the Home, it was English everywhere. Although, as it is alleged, less than 1 per cent of the Indian population may know English, its importance far transcends any numerical figure. It is the "microscopic minority" of an intellectual elite knowing English that acts as the leaven and supplies the shaping and directive mind in the affairs of present-day India. There was at any rate, for the elite, no difficulty for adjusting, and adjusting with profit, the claims of the Home and the Outside with English. It may be said that in some parts of the country attempts have been made to restrict severely (if not to suppress entirely) the English language from the school, but that attempt has proved futile and harmful. The attraction of English is once again on the ascendant, though outside the school, and ere long, there will be registered a higher percentage of Indian persons knowing English. And, in spite of what some people may have said to the contrary, all our Modern Indian Languages also substantially benefited by their contact with English, being disciplined and enlarged in the modern way of thinking and expressing. In this way, both English and the Modern Indian Languages under the guidance of the English succeeded in enabling the Indian peoples to modernise their minds and to extend the scope and the horizon of their literatures.

No one has ever suggested the suppression of the mother-tongues—the Modern Indian Languages—by English. As a matter of fact, it has been found practical, as the only suitable thing at the present moment, to have a stage of Bilingualism in all the departments of our corporate life, including Education in all its various stages. The Mother-tongue (or the State Language) and English—this is the only solution we are gradually coming to. And that will put an end to the further development of the ugly spectre of Linguism which is now looming large in the Indian scene, and creating one of the most potent factors of Disintegration, which we must suppress, and suppress with knowledge and with a spirit of sweet reasonableness going hand in hand with firmness.

disease! Behind the confusion there is order, behind division unity, in the heart of despair a burning hope, whose flame human agony, cruel and spiteful, cannot extinguish: out of chaos, division, suffering come peace and joy bringing hope and security to mankind. Left to himself, man is the author of anarchy, prey to fear; sustained and strengthened by Faith there is no danger he cannot face, no sufferings he cannot endure. This truth he reveals most eloquently in the most painful drama of KING LEAR; MACBETH, OTHELLO, HAMLET, CORIOLANUS, JULIUS CAESAR, TIMON OF ATHENS reinforce this truth which seems to be hidden in the mist that covers it.

Shakespeare had done all that a man could do to read the signs of the times, to analyse the situation, to tear the veil off the face of things; when he had written the last play, was it THE TEMPEST? he could breathe to himself: consummatum est! His work was indeed finished, he had fulfilled his mission beyond the expectation of man. He had given the world a complete Vision with the consummate thoroughness of a creative artist. Then he felt the urge to retire from the field of his labours, from the scene of his fall and rise, to the comparative seclusion and safety of his beloved Stratford-upon-Avon; he retired into relative oblivion crowned with a glory which Age could not wither nor Time decay.

Shakespeare, now a soul at peace, cared little for the enmity of the world. He had tamed his flesh and cured his soul and drunk the blessings of Heaven by the grace of God; his heart could resign itself only too gladly to the inward peace, joy, and desire which he enjoyed after many years of expiation for the sins of his romantic manhood. Because of his redemption, urged by a yearning for domestic happiness, with his great Achievement he left the stormy world of London for the quiet life of his birthplace, "where every third thought would be his grave". A pious wish, a happy fulfilment.

BIOLOGICAL MOVEMENT

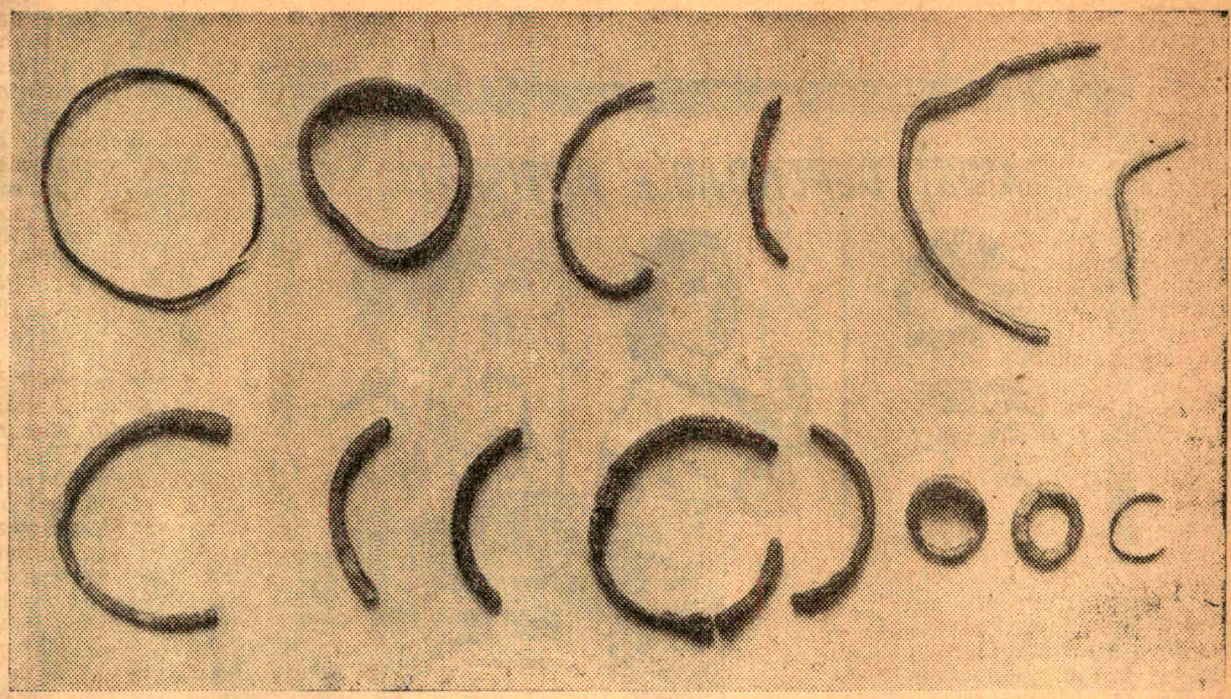
endoplasmic reticulum and eventually as membranes separating portion of cytoplasm. Membranes are supposed to be pushed into cavities. It is natural to infer that complex cells emerge out by drawing in the surface. Human R.B.C. is the simple example where no organelle is found within.

We are increasingly led to believe that the surface membrane separates colloid system from another or from a different kind of medium. A variety of evidences indicates that plasma membranes are basically a lipoid layer with protein layers absorbed on either side. It is a sort of sandwich-structure having a thickness of about 200 A°. Lipid molecules are considered by many as one of the key molecules in the origin of life. These molecules in water have a capacity of coming together. It is not unlikely that lipid gave some kind of container when other molecules would conveniently be housed. The phenomenon of movement is an example of dynamic flux where lipids and proteins are playing important part. In the animated system of life ATP seems to be the fuel and the protein is the machinery. ATP comes from food and sun as heat energy or entrophy as the second law of thermodynamics. Movement thus in terms of fine structures is essentially a phenomenon of molecular rearrangement caused by the dissipation of some energy.



RELICS OF A COPPER AGE IN BENGAL

By PARESH CHANDRA DASGUPTA

Director of Archaeology, West Bengal Government

THE ancient mounds of Pandu Rajar Dhibi stretch from east to west on the southern side of the river Ajay in Burdwan district of West Bengal the main routes of communication being from the railway station of Bhedia before Bolpur from Calcutta and from Panagarh across Radhamohanpur and Ramnagar.

The finds of Pandu Rajar Dhibi have amply revealed that the civilisation of Copper Age which once illuminated other parts of India besides Mesopotamia, Egypt and various other regions of the ancient world had also bloomed in the lateritic terrains of West Bengal centuries before the preamble of written history. The reddish soil-formation with laterite outcrops and occasional knolls and hills that extend from Midnapur to Birbhum, among others, appears to be very ancient. A few fossil woods from Birbhum which have been studied by the Geological Survey of India probably appertain to an age millions of years ago. In such a geological and palaeontological context a number of unifacial pebble tools of quartzite comparable with similar ones from the Himalayan Ice Ages including those from the well-known Sohan valley have been discovered in the basin of the Suvarnarekha and the Pitanau in Midnapur district. Palaeolithic Abbevelio-Achevlian hand-axes were found in the valleys of the Kansavati and the Mayuraksi, apart from the numerous microlithic tools, flakes and cores lying scattered in a wide zone, and polished neolithic celts amidst old alluvium and hills of West Bengal. The proto-historic remains of Pandu Rajar Dhibi belong to such a chain of evolution of human culture and they throw a new light on the chalcolithic civilisation of Bengal which seems to have developed in the basin of the Ajay somewhere in the latter half of the 2nd millennium B.C. As a matter of fact systematic explorations and excavations at the site as undertaken by the Directorate of Archaeology of West Bengal have placed the valleys of the Ajay, Kunoor and the Kopai in Bengal in the archaeological map of the diffusion of Copper and Bronze Age civilisations of Asia.

Though well-known for several historic ruins in the surrounding area the proto-historic importance of the mounds of Pandu Rajar Dhibi remained long unknown in the absence of any sustained exploration. Apart from local legends of a certain king named Pandu whose palace is said to have been buried in the core of the main mound, the chalcolithic treasures of the area were never recognised until the year 1961 when the mounds were explored by the Directorate of Archaeology, West Bengal. The excavation yielded examples of black-and-red ware, a few microliths and a single fragment of a bowl of lustrous red ware bearing a painted design which obviously seemed to belong to a hitherto unknown proto-historic civilisation.

PROTO-HISTORIC

The explorations were continued after a study of the materials and field works resulted in discovery of fragments of beautiful channel-spouted bowls of black-and-red ware of undoubted proto-historic origin as also significant examples of painted black-and-red and lustrous red wares, perforated pottery, microliths, neolithic celts, beads of semi-precious stones and a few bits of copper. These antiquities proved that the site was first inhabited long ago in proto-historic times and a strange affinity between some of these findings and those from Central India and Rajasthan indicated the possible chronology of the civilisation somewhere in the 2nd millennium B.C. As a sequence of such discovery attention of experts were drawn to the unique importance of the mounds which were kindly visited by the eminent pre-historian Dr. H. D. Sankalia, Director of Deccan College Post Graduate and Research Institute, Poona in the month of January, 1961. While Pandu Rajar Dhibi was immediately recognised to be a proto-historic site of outstanding importance mainly due to its distance of about a thousand miles from the analogous chalcolithic sites of Central India and Rajasthan, the State Directorate of Archaeology made preparations for an excavation being encouraged by the Government.

The trial digging as carried out in the Spring of 1962 revealed many an interesting aspect and it was noticed that the earliest inhabitants of the area lived on an earth surface of mottled sandy silt more than 12' (feet) below the surface of the back of the mound. While the first inhabitants appeared to be a simple agricultural people who lived in mud houses and had an industry of hand-made grayish or pale red pottery of thick fabric bearing impressions of paddy-husks, the phases immediately after showed traits of an urban civilisation whose general equipments included painted black-and-red and lustrous red wares, channel-spouted bowls of graceful form and bright red outer surface like glowing ember, perforated pottery and various objects. The impressions of paddy-husks bear witness of rice cultivation in this part of Bengal presumably in the latter half of 2nd millennium B.C. and the contemporary and later wheel-turned and artistic ceramics seem to disclose an era of immigration of a people who lived in a chalcolithic civilisation besides the evidence of painted or simple channel-spouted bowls which recall similar specialised wares from the proto-historic Narmada valley and Rajasthan in India and the more distant countries of Iran and the eastern Mediterranean world wherefrom comparable excavated pottery or lime-stone tray belong to ancient epochs several thousands of years ago.

The black-and-red wares as appertaining to the proto-historic phases of Pandu Rajar Dhibi are occasionally painted with oblique strokes, dots, hyphens, chevrons etc. in translucent white pigment on the inner side though there is a small carinated vase with flaring rim as typical of the age which is found to be painted with a row of curved strokes in creamish paste on the shoulder. The lustrous red wares on the other hand have a very smooth surface and a fabric distinct of Ajay culture. The paintings as occuring on them on one side or occasionally as it were on both sides are generally touched in black or in creamish white pigment the designs being mostly geometric or conventional patterns like solid triangles, simple bands, stepped chevrons, lattices, dots, ladders and wavy lines. While the black-and-red ware was mainly represented by knife-edged or lipped bowls and small carinated vases with bevelled rims the examples of painted red ware included shallow bowls and basins with extended rims besides vessels of other kinds. In all five Periods were noticed in the excavation of 1962 and the proto-historic pottery and other antiquities came from the first three Periods ending and sealed up in the main mounds by accumulation of ashes of a conflagration of unknown origin. Although a few implements of iron meant for combat were unearthed from the level of Period III, the metal was totally absent in Periods I & II when copper was known. If Period III goes around first millennium B.C. this emergence of iron will not be surprising as the metal was once used by the Hittites and the Philistines of western Asia in the 2nd millennium B.C. while objects of iron were even found in the grave of Pharao Tutankhamen of Egypt apart from its occurrence in proto-historic Troy in Asia Minor, Sialk in Iran and Alamgirpur in India. Being situated in the vicinity of the iron-producing area the mounds of Pandu Rajar Dhibi offers a new problem in Indian archaeology though the cause of such occurrence of carbonised iron may be attributed to an age of transition if not to the coming of invaders who might be responsible for the last conflagration.

VEDIC STEEL

In this connection it may be pointed out that recently Leonard Woolley has expressed his conviction that Rigvedic Aryans knew the preparation of steel (avas) though there is another opinion that primitive Asurs of Chotanagpur plateau once instituted the metallurgy of iron and from them the knowledge was transmuted to the Vedic Aryans. Whatever might be the precise position of iron in the chronology of Pandu Rajar Dhibi the excavation in the year 1962 revealed in proto-historic levels the smooth lime-plastered floor of a fairly spacious room or a hall as also a curved pavement of beaten terra-cotta nodules with post-holes and diagrammatic rows of lime-plastered ovens resembling those from Navda Toli in Central India. As a trench dug at a considerable distance revealed the same sequence along with a small scraper of stone and a micro-lithic flake of green jasper it could be presumed that the proto-historic habitation once spread up over a considerable area: By a further careful study it may be said that the upper levels above a thick layer of ashes overlying Period III belong to an early age though later pits were recognised here and there. The foundations of brick-structures and thick storage vases evidently bear evidence of an altogether different culture beginning from early historic times.

In order to have a clearer view of the proto-historic culture of Pandu Rajar Dhibi a more elaborate excavation was taken up at the site in the beginning of 1963 by the Directorate of Archaeology West Bengal, on the 3rd February of this year. The excavation brought to view various evidences of the past beginning from the chalcolithic times down to the historic age after the afore-mentioned conflagration of unknown origin.

The excavation in the year 1963 revealed four periods the last one having two phases. So the sequence of the last year was slightly revised in the light of further stratigraphy on a much larger scale.

Period I commenced from a very early period when the inhabitants of the area lived on the surface of mottled or spangled sandy silt and practised human burial with east-west orientation i.e., the head was turned to the east. While the burial might be of fractional type (the upper part of the skeleton found was missing), the very nature of inhumation within the mottled sandy silt seemed to be very striking as it indicated in appreciable ancient culture. Among the fine pottery wares as recovered from this period mention may be made of small fragments of black-and-red ware, a class of pale red vases with beaded and bevelled rim and globular body. While these were unearthed along with plain sherds of thin section and sandy fabric and parts of thick hand-made pottery like those excavated ones of the previous year, a uniform deposit of yellowish and whitish sandy silt overlying this occupational stratum, a reminiscence of a flood from the Ajay also noticed in the last year, has made the sequence slightly problematic. Among the scanty remains of this layer dots of charcoal, a few microliths and a kind of chocolate ware with whitish painting are of special interest as those mainly occurring in dark patches seemingly belong to an age of transition from Period I to Period II which must have witnessed the river flood.

TYPICALLY CHALCHOLITHIC

The Period II of Pandu Rajar Dhibi seem to have witnessed a very flourishing stage of civilisation as now we meet with systematically aligned floors of houses occasionally superimposed made of reddish peletty laterite bearing signs of post-holes as also traces of a paved passage which appears to be a lane flanking two houses, an elaborate human cemetery, numerous examples of painted pottery, channel-spouted bowls, microliths including one with crested medial ridge and copper ornaments. The culture of Period II is thereby typically chalcolithic recalling various sequences of this culture in other parts of India from the Indus Valley to the Deccan across Rajasthan, Malwa and Saurastra. The relics of the Ajay Valley throws a new light on the epic of this development and diffusion of proto-historic culture with regional variations revealing a hitherto unknown horizon of possibilities. In another Trench where an extension of the cemetery already mentioned was found two human skeletons of both extended and secondary burials were uncovered along with a convex-sided bowl of lustrous red ware painted in black, a bowl of the same ware with a cluster of perforations at the base, a pair of copper bangles including a significant spiral one and a microlithic scraper flaked on a piece of fossil wood all coming from the level of the grave pit. This assemblage clearly reveals as in other trenches that the men of Period II of Pandu Rajar Dhibi practised burials with east-west orientation and at the same time they were the users of microliths, copper ornaments including spiral bangles of seemingly West Asiatic affinity besides painted and perforated wares.

The human cemetery of the second Trench succeeded the earlier cemetery of Period I and here six skeletal remains were discovered, four lying extended from east to west and two in urns of plain fabric covered by lids of black-and-red ware one of which was found almost intact. A study of these skeletons bring to us several very important points which can be considered in the light of discovery of similar skeletons at other archaeological sites of India and outside. One of these has a slightly flexed condition with arms and legs joined together. The legs of this skeleton are further severed from ankles as it happened at the chalcolithic sites of Chandoli and Nevasa in Maharastra besides the alignment of skeletons remotely recalling the tradition of very early secondary burials like that of the upper Palaeolithic triple burial at Barma Grande in Europe. While it appears from the drawing of Verneau that two of the skeletons at Barma Grande in France are without their ankles, Jacquetta Hawkes has commented 'that the practice of interment after the flesh had decayed, another custom frequent among primitives and usually linked with the idea of a final setting free of the spirit to join its fellows, seems not to have been observed before Mesolithic times'. (Prehistory and the Beginning of Civilisation, Vol. I, UNESCO publication 1963, page 209).

An almost intact skeleton of a supposedly long-headed primitive male or a female was also seen as lying in the same east-west orientation i.e., the head pointing to the east though turned to the south along with two afore-mentioned urn-burials, one very close to the feet and the other a few feet away from the head in an undeniable alignment. The extended burial of the skeleton of an adult was noticed with a tubular copper bead and barrel-shaped bead of agate as still sticking to the jaw. Such meagre trinkets as to be seen a few thousand years after burial recall various proto-historic human burials with beaded ornaments like those of chalcolithic Nevasa and Natufian Palestine among various other instances of the ancient world.

BENGAL & EGYPT

Apart from these first evidences of proto-historic inhumation in eastern India, the painted red ware and black-and-red wares of Period II are of outstanding archaeological importance. The lustrous red ware is generally represented by bowls with or without straight extended rims and other vessels and the paintings on them are mostly done in black or whitish pigment of subdued tone. Besides the fine fabric of occasionally well-levigated clay which is typical of the Ajay Valley the painted patterns included among others solid triangles, wavy lines, simple bands sometimes joined by uprights, lattices, hatched lozenges and leaf or wavy lines flanked by sigmas as if the formalised motif of a stream with a hovering flock of birds. Apart from the white painted chocolate ware bowls coming from layer (6) composed of compact whitish or yellowish sandy silt with scanty remains of material culture, a class of dishes with concave inner surface of black-burnished ware belonging to Period II are embellished with rows of strokes of translucent white as it is so typical with painted black-and-red ware as unearthed from early levels. Among other pottery types mention may be made of a class of inverted helmet-shaped globular vases of black-and-red ware with abruptly extended rims after a fold at the neck which somehow resemble the essential forms of a class of pottery from Tell Halaf in Western Asia and a kind of silver vessels from Troy as belonging to 'The Treasures of Priam' though the analogy may only be superficial. Besides, there is another class of elegant conical basins of the same ware resembling flower-pots with a cluster of perforations at the bottom and signs of later drilling at the neck evidently meant for suspension for ritualistic or any other purposes. Occasionally, paintings in translucent white occur on the inner glossy black surface of black-and-red wares as those found on similar excavated pottery of the trial digging of 1962 and these uniformly comprise chevrons, dots, sigmas, hyphens, oblique strokes and other symbols recalling similar paintings on excavated black-and-red wares from Gilund and Ahar in Rajasthan. The channel-spouted bowls of black-and-red ware generally found in broken condition and bearing painted strokes in white have also profusely occurred in this level and they are comparable with the terracotta channel-spouted bowls of Navda-Toli and Maheswar in the basin of the Narmada as also a unique find of copper from Khurdi in Rajasthan besides those from Tepe Giyan in Iran, a lime-stone tray from Catal Huyuk in Asia Minor and the Early Minoan pottery with beak, teapot-spouts or bridge-spouts from Vasiliki in the island of Crete in the eastern Mediterranean world. While the channel-spouted tray from Catal Huyuk stratigraphically belongs to 7th-6th millennium B.C., the characteristic Minoan wares from Vasiliki are supposed to have been 'evidently modelled on similar copper and stone vases of the Egyptian Old kingdom Period' by Donald A. Mackenzie (Myths of Crete & Pre-Hellenic Europe, The Gresham Publishing Company, London, page-209). The origin of the Cretan schnabelkannen

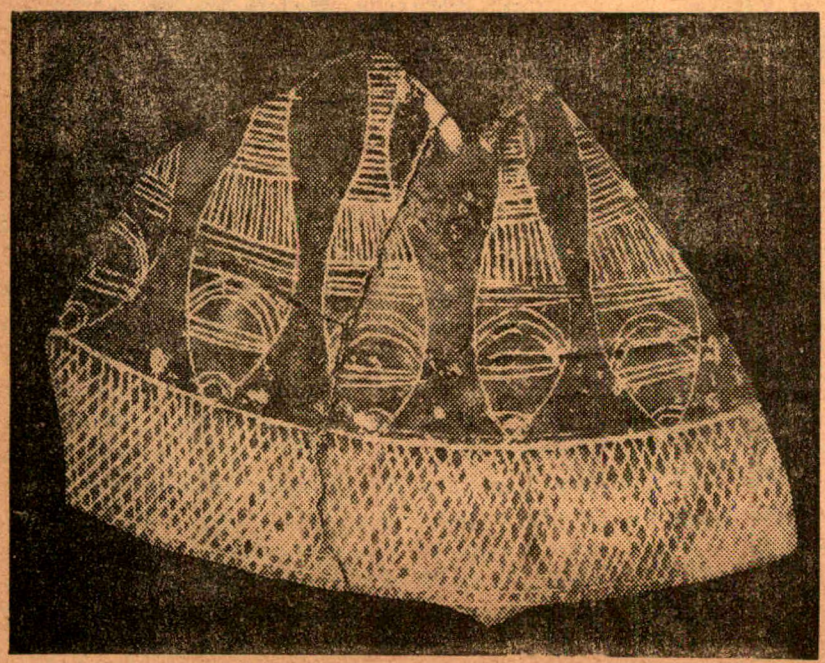
(vase form) has been attributed to "trading relations between the Cretans and the Nilotic peoples" (Ibid). As the splayed end of the teapot-spouts or channel-spouts appear to be similar (as studied from photograph) with those from Vasiliki, are we to suppose a similar relation between Bengal and Egypt in a period when this part of India was not dominated by Vedic Aryans a few thousand years ago? This may be answered by further diggings and explorations in the lateritic and hilly terrains of West Bengal and the neighbouring Chotanagpur plateau. It is true that the channel-spouts of Pandu Rajar Dhibi are more allied with Early Minoan types than with the Iranian or Central Indian forms which are straight instead of being splayed at the end.

ELEVENTH CENTURY B. C.

Apart from the various other excavated antiquities like beads of semi-precious stones including a leech-shaped one etched in white, bone arrow-heads and mutilated examples of what appear to be bowls-on-stand, the Period II has become more remarkable for a number of floors of houses made of beaten peletty laterite or moorum bearing signs of post-holes. These floors of reddish complexion reveal a systematic layout and occasionally they are superimposed upon each other. At one place at the highest crest of the mound a beautiful yellowish lane or a pavement was seen as separating such two houses at a depth of 13' 9" from surface. So the inhabitants of Period II lived in houses with walls of mud-plastered reeds as it is amply evidenced by lumps of clay bearing reed impressions. Such a lump of mud-plastering bearing reed-impressions was also unearthed from Period I. In one Trench on the northern slope of the mound a heap of burnt clay tiles or plastering, which appeared to be the debris of a fallen roof, was noticed in the level of Period II as lying on a floor of burnt earth immediately upon the uneven surface of whitish sandy silt of layer (6) probably deposited by flood waters in some unknown proto-historic phase. In Period II ascribed to 11th century B.C. by Radio-carbon examination the occupation at Pandu Rajar Dhibi might be thick and the supply of water was obviously good which might have left its mark on the greenish tint of some thin sandy layers of this level. Among the skeletal remains of animals which are now being examined by the Anthropological Survey of India mention may be made of partly fossilised small bone of supposedly a Nilgai unearthed from cemetery level besides antlers recalling that of a Sambar deer as excavated in the year 1962.

The material culture of Pandu Rajar Dhibi remained almost the same in Period III though the emergence of polished neolithic celts with pointed butts as also the occurrence of a few war-implements of iron like points and blades had been noticed. Apart from the recovery of various examples of beautiful painted pottery and vase-stand as those of the preceding age, the microliths included fluted cores occasionally associated with chalcolithic civilisation besides recalling similar ones from Sukkur and Rohri in Sind. This cultural phase which may be called as chalcolithic-neolithic in the language of V. D. Krishnaswamy (Ancient India, No. 16, 1960) is well-represented by microliths, copper objects comprising bangles, rings, eye-pencils and a fish-hook as also neolithic celts, painted black-and-red ware and red ware. Apart from floors of houses made of peletty laterite or moorum like those of preceding period there are traces of a deeply penetrating sullage pit and an extensive layer of ashes bearing witness of a serious conflagration that might have destroyed the glamour of proto-historic civilisation of Pandu Rajar Dhibi.

In one of the trenches at the peak of the artificial knoll such a floor with a post-hole and a debris of what appeared to be the roof of the house was found within this layer of ashes while the most spectacular was the finding of a white painted channel-spouted bowl of black-and-red ware which was seen as lying invertedly on this floor. This complete channel-spouted bowl with sagger base, graceful convex sides, slightly incurved rim with a groove and splayed edge of the spout is a magnificent example and offers a significant land-mark in the growth and development of proto-historic civilisation of the Ajay Valley in Bengal. While the interior of this channel-spouted bowl is symbolically embellished with seven vertical rows of whitish strokes recalling the early concept of the vasudhara, it may be noticed that the channel-spouts of Period II are more slender than those of Period III when these appear to be broader and have more noticeable splayed edge like fish-tail.



Fragment of a black-burnished ware incised with a row of fish.

That the area of the so-called citadel within the main mound was devastated by an extensive conflagration cannot be doubted and it is also to be considered whether the few iron tools of Period III bear evidence of influx of a new people. Is it possible that the conflagration of Period III was the result of an invasion preceded by trade of implements of iron ? Above the layer

SCULPTURES of KORANGANATHA

By S. R. BALASUBRAHMANYAM

SRINIVASANALLUR is a village on the northern bank of the Kaveri, situated about thirty miles west of Tiruchirapalli and six miles from Musiri in the Madras State.

In this village, there are five temples which seem to have been in existence from the early Chola period; the most important of them all is the Koranganatha temple.

Alexander Rea visited this temple as early as 1908 and remarked that it is "an interesting temple of very early date and of unusual design in many of its principal features"; and he also carried out some extensive and urgently-needed repairs. At the same time, he lent weight to a wild popular belief that "worship was never performed in the temple owing to its having been defiled by a monkey (kurangu, in Tamil) after its consecration," and added that the temple had derived its name from this fact. This is a historical myth, and the credulous world of scholars and laymen have given currency to it. We have unimpeachable epigraphical evidence that this temple enjoyed the benefit of worship from various grants and endowments from the period of its foundation some time before A.D. 895 (24th year of Aditya I) to at least the 21st year of Kulottunga I (A.D. 1091), i.e., for a period of about two centuries. And the name 'Koranganatha' should be explained by a popular belief that the temple might have been consecrated or worshipped by one of the monkey-heroes of the Ramayana, Vali and Sugriva. We find in the Tamil land other temples which are so associated with these epic characters. Two of them are Valikandapuram in Tiruchirapalli District and the temple of Tiruk-kurangaduturai at Aduturai in Tanjore District, Madras State.

According to the oldest local inscription, the deity of this temple is called Tiruk-kurakkattut-turai Perumanadigal; and its location is described as the Brahmadeya village (village gifted to Vedic scholars) of Mahendramangalam which seems to be the ancient name of the modern village of Srinivasanallur. Mahendramangalam should have derived its name from that of the Pallava king Mahendravarman I of the early 7th century A.D., during whose reign Pallava rule had been established over the Kaveri basin. An inscription describing the achievements of the father of Mahendravarman I mentions that "he conquered the land of the Cholas, which has as its garland the daughter of Kavera (i.e., the river Kaveri) and as its waist-band (mekhala) the rice-fields, the rich fields of sugarcane, the groves of palm-trees and plantains." The Velurpalayam copper-plate grant of Pallava Nandivarman III corroborates this very conquest of the Chola country by Simhavishnu, son of Simhavarman. The description of the Chola country in this grant follows the same lines as in the earlier grant, using almost the same terms. Even today, there is a hamlet of Srinivasanallur, called Mahendramangalam, which perpetuates its ancient name.

The main temple of old consisted of the garbhagriha (sanctum), the antarala (vestibule) and the ardha-mandapa (porch in front). All these three parts are really original and form an integral unit from the time of its foundation. It has two storeys (talas) surmounted by the griva (neck) and the stupi (the crowning element, square and curvilinear). This superstructure is a later construction during the time of its repairs and conservation. So these parts of the superstructure cannot be considered reliable for a study of the genuine architectural and decorative features characteristic of the Early Chola age, however, much they might have been modelled on the ancient originals. Surrounding the temple, there should have been, as in the case of other early Chola temples, eight subshrines for the Parivara-devatas. Neither the subshrines nor any sculptures thereof are extant.

EMPTY NICHES

The garbhagriha has projections and recesses. The three main devakoshtas (niches for the guardian-deities), which are found in the projections, are well-developed niches flanked by pilasters and surmounted by makara-toranas. The front two niches where dvarapalas (temple guardian-deities) are generally installed, and the two side-niches on the outer walls of the Ardhamandapa are now empty.

The western devakoshta on the back-wall of the sanctum is also empty. But the makaratorana over this niche encloses in the centre a sculpture of Narasimha. The northern devakoshta has a sculpture of Brahma, and the southern one of Dakshinamurti. The spreading tree, the jata-bhara, the graceful countenance, the silent teaching of the Lord more eloquent than words, the fine ornamentation, the delicately-finished Nandi, and the wriggling of the monster of Evil (Muyalakan) crushed under the foot of Siva, the decorative motifs, the embellishment of the pilasters, the rishis and the animals sculptured on the sides—all these make the figure of Dakshinamurti one of the finest creations of the Early Chola sculptors.

In between these main devakoshtas, there are other improvised niches, which are flanked by round pilasters and are adorned with sculptures whose natural charm in every limb and fine workmanship enrapture the visitor. Their naturalism, artistic perfection, and dignity are too deep for words. Similar sculptures adorn the outer walls of the sanctum of the Nagesvara temple at Kumbhakonam. Owing to the lack of data, it is a mere speculation if these male and female figures are portrait-sculptures of royal patrons, or of Apsaras, or other divine or semi-divine dignitaries. One of them is sometimes identified as Chandesvara, the Head Siva's followers.

Dakshinamurti.

About the date of this temple there is a long-persistent historical error. Jouveau-Dubreuil wrote about it half a century ago as follows: "We know the style of the Chola art at the commencement of the 10th century from a study of the temple of Koranganatha at Srinivasanallur. It is extremely remarkable not only from its style, but also by the numerous inscriptions on its walls and the perfection of the sculptures with which it is ornamented. This represents the Dravidian style of the age of Parantaka (A.D. 907-949)." This view is based on an earlier wrong lead given by the Government Epigraphist that the earliest inscription on the walls of the temple was one of the 20th year of Parantaka I wherein his 19th year was quoted. And this initial error has vitiated the opinions of all later students of Chola Art, who also subscribe to this view that the temple is of the age of Parantaka I.

But the earliest inscription on the walls of this temple is one of the 24th year of a certain Rajakesarivarman. This is inscribed on the basement on the south side of the ardha-mandapa, which, as has been stated already, is an integral part of the original temple. Below this, there is an inscription of Parantaka I. From the archaic features of the script and its high regnal year (the 24th year), we can safely assign it to Aditya I (A.D. 871-907). Therefore, the temple must be considered as one built some time on or before the 24th year of Rajakesarivarman Aditya I (A.D. 895). The plates of Sundara Chola credit Aditya I with having built on both banks of the Kaveri tall stone-temples, from the Sahyadri mountains (the Western Ghats) to the sea, as monuments of his success. And the Koranganatha temple at Srinivasanallur is one of those temples built in his days. We are not sure if he was its builder.

This earliest inscription of the days of Aditya I records a gift of land for burning a perpetual lamp. The donor is said to have invited the Sabhai-variar (village-administrative committee) and the arika-bhattarar, and proclaimed his intention to make the gift to the temple, and he further agreed to pay the land-revenue due on the gifted land.

There is one other notable feature about this temple which deserves mention. As already stated, the earliest inscription of the temple mentions a body called Arika-bhattarar (Ariya-bhattarar) and a later one designates it Chaturvedi-bhattap-peramakhal. This body of Vedic scholars was in charge of the administration of the gifts and endowments made to the temple.

Such was the popular respect for learning, ability and character, during the heyday of Chola rule. And we have enough evidence to infer that this body of learned men fully justified the confidence and trust reposed in them; and we have on record that they, on the whole, rendered a good account of themselves and discharged their duties ably and well. We find similar local committees functioning in the Early Chola period in other centres like Allur Sembiyan Mahadevi and other villages.

The Koranganatha temple at Srinavasanallur is one of the finest of the Early Chola temples built during the reign of Aditya I, and the sculptures on its walls are of the most beautiful workmanship and among the best of those of the latter half of the 9th century A.D.

FANTASY IN ENGLISH FICTION

Barlow takes the orthodox Christian view, that man cannot save himself—only God's love can save him —the love that hangs on the gibbet with the bleeding Christ.

The third and final writer of my trio presents a fundamentally comic rather than a tragic vision; but it is comedy with a dangerous cutting edge. Anthony Burgess worked in Malaya and Brunei and his early books have a Far Eastern background. But a major breakthrough was his savage farce A Clockwork Orange published last year. Set like Barlows One Half of the World in the "near future", this tour-de-force pictures a Socialist Britain infested with teenage thugs (Burgess develops leading tendencies of the Teddy Boy—Stilyagi cultus) conducting nightly orgies of rape, robbery and razor-slashing (making the gang-leader hero of Brighton Rock look like a sissy!) The book follows the adventures of one leader of a group of thugs who goes about his bouts of violence with the music of Beethoven on his lips and Russified English slang on his lips. The book gains a whole new comic dimension by Burgess's teenage argot compounded of Russian, Romany and Jazz. The serious point of the book is the attempted "conversion" of the juvenile thug hero by Pavlovian conditioned response technique. That freedom is necessary to the creation of a moral order and that evil must be a possibility contingent upon this freedom is of course the classic Christian argument. Burgess in his own comic way is as horrific a writer as Golding; but his vision of the modern European scene is like Barlow's—based on selective observation. He has caught and perhaps only slightly exaggerated the atmosphere of senseless violence and teenage tyranny which surrounds the urban jungles of Europe and the U.S.A. Burgess differs from both Golding and Barlow in his deliberate and zestful manipulation of language and his Joycean multilingualism.

All three writers are pre-occupied by the catastrophes that modern society faces. They evoke —but only to dismiss—the ghost of George Orwell and 1984. They seem to me to be rooted in the Christian beliefs which Orwell abandoned. The co-existence of the novels of Golding, Barlow and Burgess with modern Science Fiction of a philosophical and even theological bent (Bradbury, Blish, etc.) is intriguing, but I have no time to explore it here. Equally significant is the gulf that stretches between their books and the work of the leftish "Angry Young Men.'

(NOTE: James Barlow's The Patriots and Term of Trial are published in Penguin Books; and all Golding's novels are available in cheap editions. As far as I know there are no cheap editions of Burgess as yet).

of ashes iron occurs frequently along with completely news types of pottery belonging to early historic and later times when houses of kiln-burnt bricks were made flanking rubble pavements. On the basis of such revolutionary change between the material cultures of Period III and Period IV with its sub-phases it is obvious to conclude that there was a break of culture (suggested by Sri B. B. Lal, Director, Delhi School of Archaeology) and desertion of site after conflagration. The earlier antiquities which are sometimes found in post-conflagration level may be attributed of pits and it is difficult to ascertain whether they sometimes represent a kind of survival. In one of such pits of Period IV was found a round stone seal bearing in relief a mysterious design of hatched triangles, a wavy line and a curious centepede-like figure. Among other excavated antiquities from this level various examples of stamped and incised pottery as also several terracotta animal figures seemingly belonging to early historic period and a few sprinklers may reveal that the site was largely re-occupied in post-Mauryyan times. Whereas a class of terracotta beak-headed mother-goddesses with pin-hole decorations and one having accentuated breasts from this level seem to have an early tradition, the lower part of a terracotta fertility goddess with splayed hips encircled by a symbolic girdle represented by pin-holes as found in the layer of ashes upon a floor of Period III may recall the artistic trends of pre-Mauryyan times. A careful study of all these relics originally revealed that the chalcolithic habitation at Pandu Rajar Dhibi which might have begun in the latter half of the 2nd millennium B.C. continued to flourish in spite of recognisable change down to the beginning of 1st millennium B.C. Recently, a Radio-Carbon analysis of excavated charcoal sample from the cemetery level of Period II of Pandu Rajar Dhibi as conducted by Dr. Shyamadas Chatterjee, Head of the Department of Physics, Jadavpur University, Calcutta has fully confirmed the expectation by dating the chalcolithic phase to B.C. 1012 $\pm$ 120. It is obvious that Period I belonged to earlier times. Here Period IV may again be divided into two phases. Phase 'A' represents a layer of early historic times after bearing prominent signs of intrusion of much later periods as revealed by a scattered distribution of a class of red ware, plain vases and conical cups among others which may be conveniently put under Phase 'B'. Among the important findings of Phase 'A' of Period IV may be mentioned a fragment of a vase of black ware incised with a row of fish on frieze above a hatched band vaguely comparable with motifs of Post-Harappan incised pottery of Bara and Salaura in East Punjab and a retouched neolithic celt evidently showing signs of long use.

The excavations at Pandu Rajar Dhibi have revealed the existence of a Copper Age civilisation in eastern India which had once a close relation with the chalcolithic civilisation of Central India and Rajasthan as illuminated by a comparison of cultural assemblages of these regions. While the eminent experts of the Tata Institute of Fundamental Research in Bombay have opined that the culture of Pandu Rajar Dhibi developed as a diffusion from Central India wherefrom the culture also diffused to western India there are various points yet unsolved. This eastern Indian chalcolithic civilisation which was mainly confined to the basin of the Ajay in West Bengal so far revealed by systematic explorations as undertaken by the Directorate of Archaeology of the State may suggest a proto-historic route connecting the ancient Chotanagpur plateau and the flood-plains of the Bhagirathi near Katwa where the Ajay mingles up with the river. These chalcolithic sites in the valleys of the Ajay, Kunoor and the Kopai belong to Burdwan and Birbhum districts. The eight sites discovered are Jashpur, Mandira and Surath Rajar Dhibi in Birbhum district, and Basantapur, Rajar Danga, Goswami Khanda and Ganga Danga in Burdwan district besides Pandu Rajar Dhibi. This discovery of chalcolithic mounds and the sequence of Pandu Rajar Dhibi have fascinatingly brought Bengal in the map of Copper and Bronze Age civilisations of Asia by suggesting occasional relation with lands beyond inaccessible terrains and the Sea both towards the west and the east in the forgotten epochs of proto-historic times.

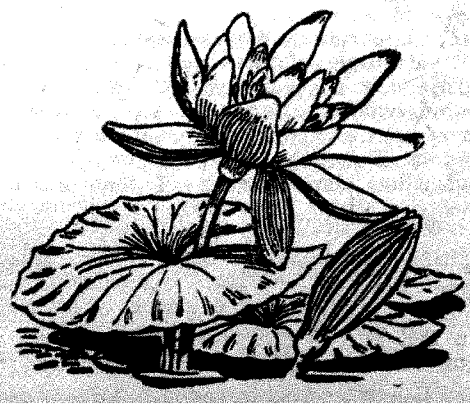
hour while it took more than 3 hours to ascend.

It was 2 P.M. when we reached Ghangrya. Nanda Singh said that we could, if we liked, go down to Govindghat that very day as there was ample time. We, therefore, collected our gear and drinking some tea, started for Bhyunder. It was raining in Hemkund area and we thought us to be lucky enough to get a fair weather so necessary in the high mountains. We went on descending till we reached Bhyunder in the afternoon. There we had to part company with Nanda Singh only to remember him for the rest of our lives. We were entertained by his uncle Narayan Singh, the village-chief, in his house and after taking leave from him we started again on the steeply descending path of the gorge.

We crossed Pulna in the evening. With the night darkness was closing in to cover us up in the gorge and as we were afraid of being benighted in this No-Man's land, we were trying as if to rush down to safety and comfort in Govindaghat. But night overtook us before we were face to face to tackle our last problem, the bridge of Govindaghat! People had already collected on the far side of the bridge to extend their moral support. We crossed the bridge in complete darkness, we did not know how. Probably the gods of Lokepal were kind to us!

The next day we were on our way to Badrinath with sweet memories of Hemkund and the Valley of Flowers and last, but not the least, the blessings and good-wishes of the Gurdwara. Thus ended our colourful journey to a holy lake and a heavenly garden.



POWER OF 20 MILLION HORSES IN HARNESS

By TARUN CHATTERJEE

PICTURE an endless array of horses standing close to each other covering the whole length of the Equator one and a half times. How many horses are required for this? The answer is 20 million. The rockets which place some of the recent spaceships in the orbit command the power of 20 million horses each, which is equivalent to 15000 million Kilogram-metres of Kinetic energy capable of melting and evaporating steel ingot as heavy as a spaceship.

The wheel is said to be one of man's greatest inventions. That is quite true. The wheel was no doubt a product of brilliant imagination. One can imagine how much more daring and conjecture were necessary to overcome the force of gravitation which was the key to Gagarin's earning the title "Columbus of space" and which will some day take the "Gagarin of the Universe" beyond the bounds of the solar system.

Who could have thought, say 100 years ago, that man will ever be able to overcome the force of gravity? Addressing the British Association in 1838 the eminent scientist Dr. Lardner said, "Men might as well project a voyage to the Moon as attempt to employ steam navigation across the stormy North Atlantic." But why go so far back? Let us look back as late as 1934 in Britain, one of the most scientifically advanced countries. At that time when the father of Soviet rocketry Konstantine Tsiolkovsky was engaged in astronautical research in Moscow even the idea of jet propulsion was regarded as eccentric by the British official circles. So when an Interplanetary Society was founded in England by P. E. Cleator, the gentleman received a letter from the Under Secretary of State which said:—

"We follow with interest any work done in other countries on jet propulsion but . . . the possibilities have given no indication that this method can be a serious competitor to the air-screw engine combination. We do not consider that we should be justified in spending any time or money on it."

Such short-sighted views received a rude blow from Hitler's V missiles and the Russian flame thrower "Katyushas". Not that the conservatives have overnight become far-sighted but they are compelled to change their views because technological advance has started to turn fictions into facts.

FROM FICTION TO REALITY

The first moon voyage "story" was written in the second century A.D. by the Greek satirist Lucian. But the first serious scheme was put forward in 1865 by Jules Verne in the form of a space gun for shooting man into space at a speed of 7 miles per second which is actually the earth's escape velocity.

In Czarist Russia in the year 1881 a young revolutionary named Kibalchich, when he was awaiting the Czar's gallows in prison, drew some diagrams of a space rocket which were later found from the police archives in 1917, long after his judicial murder. It ultimately fell on Tsiolkovsky to give concrete shape to the idea of space rocket. Side by side with him Robert Goddard, an U.S. scientist, Herman Oberth, a Rumanian professor, Johannes Winkler and Werner Von Braun the two German scientists were working on the same problem. The last mentioned scientist was the creater of V2 rockets which were some sort of space vehicles measuring 40 feet and weighing 40 tons.

The first space rocket which opened the first page of the history of man's conquest of space, shot sputnik No. 1 into an orbit around the earth. Success followed success, record followed record. A space ship invaded the realm of the Moon, another became the 10th planet of the sun, yet another photographed the reverse side of the moon, one left for destination Venus, another for Mars. Meanwhile man himself has made rendezvous in space repeatedly and he is now on the threshold of a journey to the Moon. In all these breathtaking achievements, the booster rockets have been playing a signal role. It will be frightfully interesting to peep inside them in order to have some idea of their power and propelling system.

Our familiar flying machines as well as jet propelled planes are useless in airless space because while the former has to grip the atmosphere with air screw and use its wings for the lift, the latter has to draw oxygen from outside. So in airless space a flying machine must be fundamentally different from piston or jet planes. Such machines are rockets whose acting principles were discovered as early as the 13th century.

SELECTION OF FUEL

Rockets are reaction-propelled means of locomotion in which in the words of Tsiolkovsky "one matter is ejected rightwards, while the projectile moves leftwards by virtue of recoil. Explosives or fuels, by combining with the reserve oxygen compound produce jet velocity. When the explosion occurs part of its energy is imparted to the apparatus while the other part is expended in the gas jet."

The reaction principle was scientifically formulated by Newton in the 17th century. At the end of the 19th century the Russian scientist Nikolai Zhukovsky scientifically formulated the Force of Reaction of an outflowing and inflowing liquid which is used today, all over the world.

Tsiolkovsky's rocket astronautics was born in 1903 in the form of an article titled, "Exploration of space with Reaction instruments." His subsequent article, "The Rocket in cosmic space" envisaged a motor which can combine all contradictory requirements of a liquid fuel space rocket.

The liquid fuel of a rocket usually consists of two different fluids one of which is known as the 'combustible' while the other is the 'oxidiser'. Tsiolkovsky called the former "a 'hydrocarbon' which could be gasolene, kerosene, alcohol or aniline. Strong nitric acid, hydrogen peroxide etc. can serve as oxidiser." Such rockets can develop half a million horse power.

But there is a serious drawback of the liquid fuel rockets. Their engines are too greedy for oil. That is why such rockets are bound to be too heavy with fuel load. Say, in order to attain a height of 40 kilometres such a rocket will require 9 tons of fuel.

Again it was Tsiolkovsky who pointed to the way out of this difficulty. He suggested a 'rocket train' with several autonomous compartments each of which will impart a thrust by turn from behind the train. Each will automatically detatch itself from the train after its fuel is consumed. In our days this 'rocket train' is known as multi-stage rocket.

Inasmuch as the usual chemical fuels do not contain sufficient energy to ensure the velocity necessary for cosmic flights, selection of the proper fuel is of signal importance for success of space flights.

For a space rocket to be placed in a 300 kilometres high orbit, each kilogram of its weight must receive an energy of over 3 million kilogram-metres. In taking off from the launching pad the thrust of the manned rocket engine must exceed the weight of the ship i.e., it would have an environment free from gravitation. An increase in the acceleration of the rocket makes it possible to reduce the amount of fuel spent to break away from the earth's gravitational field. This is very important because the scarcity of space in a rocket makes it imperative to reduce the amount of the propellant. For an exhaust speed of the gases of 4000 metres per second and an acceleration 10% above that of a freely falling body the fuel to rocket ratio will be 378 : 1. So acceleration load of a manned space ship must be very high and the cosmonaut must be sturdy enough to stand the strain and stress.

FUTURE PROSPECTS

The performance of a rocket engine as a heat engine depends on the ratio of the chemical energy of the burnt fuel to the kinetic energy of the exhaust gases. When the rocket flies at a speed equal to that of the exhaust gases, all the kinetic energy produced goes to propel the rocket. But if there is a difference between the two speeds some kinetic energy will be wasted. In fact the total efficiency of a rocket engine at the beginning of the flight is rather low which is only one-tenth to one-fifteenth of the efficiency of the steam engine. At that time shooting up at a speed of 20 metres per second it develops only 50 horse power per kilogram of fuel. But when it flies up at 10 kilometres per second it will develop 30,000 h.p. per kilogram of fuel per second, thus increasing the efficiency by 350%.

F. Tsander, the first Soviet engineer and follower of Tsiolkovsky's ideas whose designs of an interplanetary space ship was submitted to Lenin as early as 1920, advanced the idea of using certain metals including some metal parts of the ship itself, as combustibles. This idea has now been thoroughly studied.

Other prospective fuels too are being investigated. Particular mention should be made of electrically neutral molecular particles of hydrogen, hydroxylic and methyl groups which are known as "free radicals". When excited, they develop a store of energy considerably exceeding that which is characteristic for the state of equilibrium of the given molecule. One kilogram of a free radical can produce upto 55,000 calories of energy. In place of 230 — 270 kg. per sec/kg thrust of the present rockets the free radicals can produce a thrust amounting to 600 kg. per sec/kg and more.

Free radicals can be obtained by imparting to the molecules such great energy as would make them decompose in the form of heat energy, electric discharge, ultra violet and cosmic rays etc. It is necessary then to stabilise the radicals thus obtained by cooling the radicals down to a very low temperature.

It is interesting to note that in the upper layers of the atmosphere, at an altitude of 100 kilometres, the molecules can turn into free radicals under the effect of sun rays. They can be harnessed for propelling rockets then and there by making them stream into the engine. When this technique will be possible, space rockets will not require much special fuel. Reaching a distance of 100 kilometres above the earth they will use the limitless energy from the surrounding space.

The most bright prospect for future cosmic rockets is offered by atomic energy which is millions of times more powerful than chemical energy. it requires only 20 kilograms of uranium or plutonium for a space vehicle weighing 1000 tons to go to the Moon and come back. But before creating an atom-propelled rocket there are many serious technical difficulties to be overcome.

The whole world acclaims the series of victories of Soviet rockets and space ships in the battle to conquer space. The cosmic journeys of cosmonauts from Gagarin to Tereshkova have become a symbol of the Soviet State whose remarkable history has travelled at a breathtaking speed from the wooden plough to the apogee of space orbits within a span of four decades only. We in India have not heard the roar of the fabulous 20 million h.p. rocket motors but my mind can hear it in unison with the gunfire salvo of the battle cruiser 'Aurora' heralding the October Revolution, in unison with the din and bustle of the 5-year plans, the reverberations of the anti-Fascist 'Katyusha' guards mortars and the rhythmic pulsations of the 20-year plan efforts of the Soviet people. I am absolutely sure that it will be the Soviet space vehicles driven by the power of the atom and photon and travelling with the speed of light, which will test Einstein's Theory of Relativity which says that Time will decelerate itself on such a rocket. And the cosmic explorers on such rockets will thus gain a longer lease of life.

process of lowering the standards is to insist upon removal of anomalies of the types noted above. The U.G.C. is the only Central agency which has the moral authority to initiate reforms in this direction. Left to themselves, the Universities are not likely to move towards the right track; pulls and pressures are persistent and strong.

UNIVERSITY ORGANIZATION

The most striking feature of University organization in this country is the predominance of non-teachers. We have forgotten the simple fact that a University is a society of teachers and students assembled together for a common purpose, viz. pursuit of knowledge. We have converted Universities into convenient pastures for non-academic men seeking power and employment.

In practically every University the highest officer is the Governor of the State whom the University Act calls the Chancellor. A Governor may be the Chancellor of half a dozen Universities. In this respect we are loyally following the British precedent. Chancellorship is a compulsory duty imposed on every Governor without reference to his capacity, interest and inclination. But the Chancellor is by no means a figurehead for ceremonial purposes. He has many and varied powers, e.g., nomination of persons to different University bodies, approval of University statutes, etc. These powers are exercised by him on the advice of the State Government. The name of the Chancellor is used as a convenient camouflage by the State Government for interference in University affairs.

The most important power vested in the Chancellor is the appointment of Vice-Chancellor. In most cases his choice, i.e., the choice of the State Government on whose advice he is bound to act, is confined to a panel of three persons nominated by a University body like the Senate or the Syndicate. But this nomination is usually nothing but a curious legal fiction. The initiative is usurped by the State Government; it selects a person and gets his name included in the panel through the votes or the influence of those members of the nominating body who accept its whip. The other two names in the panel are 'dummies', for the Chancellor cannot consider their claims because the State Government has already made its choice.

It is not surprising that this system should bring in Vice-Chancellors who are not educationists in any sense of the term. Judges, bureaucrats, politicians hold the de facto headships of most of Indian Universities. Some of them are able and successful men, respected in their own spheres of life; but they are obvious misfits in the field of education where they are inexperienced intruders and nothing more.

The U.G.C. pleaded more than once for appointment of teachers as Vice-Chancellors. Neither the Central Government nor the State Governments took that plea seriously. The committee appointed by the Union Ministry of Education for framing a model constitution for the Universities is reported to be strongly in favour of excluding non-academic persons from controlling positions. But no recommendation to that effect is likely to be acceptable in political circles. Vice-Chancellorship is a prize post, both in salary and in status, and we can hardly expect that teachers will be given a monopoly in preference to non-teachers with closer contact with V.I.P.s.

The greatest Vice-Chancellor in the history of Indian Universities, Sri Asutosh Mookerjee, was not a teacher. But men of genius and towering personality are above all rules. Moreover, he became Vice-Chancellor after long and intimate association with University affairs. To-day we find Vice-Chancellors coming directly from High Courts, Secretariats and Public Service Commissions without any previous contact with Universities or educational matters. Such transfers require no preparation or training.

Look at the effect of this system on the psychology of the teaching profession. A young man entering a particular profession knows that he can rise to the top in that profession by dint of merit; he has to compete with members of the same profession and not with outsiders. But a teacher knows that the highest prize in the educational field is practically beyond his reach. Men from other fields will rush in as competitors, and they will have a decided preference. Teachers who have devoted their lives to teaching and research and studied educational problems through daily contact with them must comply with policies framed, and decisions made by Vice-Chancellors who are new-comers and do not know the job. Can they be blamed if they lose interest in their work and succumb to the routine of obedience?

This is one of the reasons which keep away promising youngmen from employment in the educational field. A bright M.A. or M.Sc. can join the I.A.S. with the hope that in 15 years' time he will control education as Education Secretary, and he can reasonably expect a Vice-Chancellorship on retirements. If he joins a University as a Lecturer he can normally hope to retire as a Reader; a Professorship he can hardly venture to hope for, and a Vice-Chancellorship is totally beyond his reach. Why should any really capable and ambitious young man prefer the long and dreary course which the teaching profession stands for?

Apart from their practical monopoly of the post of Vice-Chancellor, non-academic men usually occupy a prominent—and sometimes dominant—place in the executive bodies of our Universities. In an old University, for instance, the Act lays down that 8 members of the highest executive body consisting of 23 members (including the Vice-Chancellor), i.e. more than 33 p.c. of the total number, must be non-teachers. Apart from this statutory minimum, non-teachers come through different channels, and they may secure even 50 p.c. or more of the total membership. With a non-teacher Vice-Chancellor at the top and with 50 p.c. of the total membership secured by non-teachers the executive body becomes a predominantly non-academic body.

This non-academic body does not deal with administrative matters only; its jurisdiction embraces a large academic field. It prescribes the qualifications of University and College teachers. It appoints University teachers of all ranks. It frames rules relating to studies in Colleges, University examinations, etc. It finalises the results of University examinations. It decides whether Doctorate degrees are to be conferred in particular cases. In most cases it acts on the basis of expert advice, but it has the final authority to accept or to reject advice.

It is not easy for non-academic men to make right decisions in purely academic matters. The difficulty becomes greater when they are new-comers. The introduction of large scale elections as a popular method of constituting University bodies has made it possible for men without any contact with University affairs to enter straighway into the highest University bodies. No period of apprenticeship is drawing on the bank of the accumulated life-sense of a race which now presents almost a blank bank balance.

INTERNATIONALISM

Internationalism is also one of the forces which have helped in the liquidation of a compact and organised life of the community. It is still an idea rather in the air, an uncertain but potent inspiration waiting for its embodiment in a definite form. Internationalism has found its most concrete expression in the Communist programme of a rule of the proletariat, a world brotherhood of workers banded to capture political power by eliminating capitalism. As a counterblast to this challenge of the have-nots, the great nations of the world have brought into being the U.N.O. and its ancillary bodies. But its main effort hitherto has been towards the prevention of outbreaks rather than the construction of a new sense of world-solidarity. No doubt there is much more contact to-day among nationals of different countries and considerable advance in the way of mutual understanding. An Englishman may now feel at home in Vienna, or an Indian in Paris without bothering about any other kind of society than that in which they are directly interested. Intellectuals and artists of all countries seem to have developed a cosmopolitan outlook without penetrating into the secrets of the national temperament and the significant, shaping influence of social manner. Each one is after garnering experience on his own without storing it up in a common granary. In the literature of the more advanced countries of the world, local colouring seems to have faded almost to the point of obliteration. The more backward, obscure areas of American life provide a touch of local colouring, an intimacy of local customs in some recent American fiction. The China painted in the novels of Pearl Buck is already a thing of the past and the naked truth about its present self only provokes violent revulsions of feeling.

GOOD TO DREAM

The extended horizons of international life make it unnecessary to relate it to a definite social background. It is still a matter of speculation and experiment, not one of intimate grasp and realisation. It is an abstraction which can hardly be steeped in the strong colours of personal feeling. A society which is co-extensive with the whole earth is but a nether version of the blue immensity of the sky overhead. It is good to dream about, not so good to live in. Man without society is without a steadying and stabilising influence, a conditioning reality, and his flesh and blood seems somehow lacking in the requisite stuff. He may indeed outgrow society as he may one day outsoar the force of gravitation. But the question is: will he be the same man as we know him to-day?

The society of the future is yet to be built-up. It must grow round other centres and be planned after more generous proportions. The international vision, with its far-flung thoughts and feelings, its more spacious needs of body and soul, must revolve round a much wider axis and take a fixed shape and motion much transcending the narrow limits of our present gyrations. It must receive some kind of social embodiment which may be securely grasped and confidently handled with a knowledge of the laws of its working. We must build a temple high enough to contain the deity we propose to put into it. The new god of internationalism should not be left without its appropriate habitation and shrine.

necessary; a non-teacher can directly become a member of the University High Command if he can manage an election. He adds little weight to the deliberations of University bodies, but his ignorance or prejudice may vitally affect their decisions.

UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES

Efficient post-graduate teaching requires efficient teaching at the undergraduate stage. In order to ensure that the undergraduate Colleges function properly and produce graduates with proper equipment for post-graduate studies it is necessary that the University should exercise continuous control over them. No college should be granted affiliation unless it can prove to the satisfaction of the University that it has adequate financial resources to maintain itself on an efficient level. And after affiliation is granted the University should keep a strict watch on the College so that nothing likely to impair its efficiency can take place.

Some Indian Universities have laid down fairly strict conditions of affiliation. Colleges within their jurisdiction have a fair start in respect of financial resources, buildings, libraries and laboratories, teaching personnel, etc. Other Universities are more tolerant; they are satisfied with a bare minimum. But their readiness to affiliate inadequately equipped Colleges is doing a serious damage to the cause of education. It is one of the factors directly responsible for the deterioration of educational standards.

The problem of post-affiliation control has two aspects. First, some Universities have extremely limited statutory power in this regard. A College may ignore or even defy the orders of the University seeking to correct abuses or to improve efficiency. The University can, of course, disaffiliate such a College, but in practice disaffiliation raises complicated issues. Secondly, the University may be prevented by its own inner tension from taking a strong line towards a below-standard College. Sometimes some of the non-teachers in the Universities have political or personal interests in defending such a College. Sometimes a lenient view is taken under a false impulse of generosity. Sometimes, again, there is the usual reluctance to face a troublesome situation, and the magic word "tact" comes into play. To save friends or to save one's own sleep becomes more important than saving education.

CHINESE AGGRESSION AND A PAIR OF BANGLES

By TARASANKAR BANDOPADHYAY

THERE would have been no necessity to set down this story if like the ladies present at the meeting on that day, Jagatdhatri did seek to donate her bangles or some of her other gold trinkets.

In a big village in the district of Birbhum, a meeting was held to protest against the Chinese aggression of India. It was a mammoth gathering and the largeness of its size exceeded all idea of plentiful amplitude. Everybody would have averred that there was nothing to be wondered at that spectacular sight. The country as a whole extending from the shores of the ocean up to the foothills of the Himalayas was awakened by that onslaught in cruel anger and frustration. Frustration was the major feeling in that the cause of the attack was beyond human comprehension. Just ponder, even the other day, the shouts and slogans of "Hindi-Chini Bhai Bhai" swept the country like a storm and agitated the air to the sky. The rainy season was marked by scanty rainfall, the winter lost its rigour and the summer its heat but no ebb-tide set in the flow and flux of those shoutings. Every city resounded with the cries of that slogan. Their echoes reverberated far beyond the villages to the hats and marketplaces, to the fields and the plains. It was all along trumpeted that our relations with China were friendly and brotherly—were thousands-of-years old. In the new epoch that friendship was reputed to have attained such a stability that any deterioration or loss thereof was an impossibility. On top of it, a Communist doctor was returned to the Assembly in the last two successive elections from that local constituency. Once in every month, the doctor would lead a "red" procession with red flags and would hold a meeting. The audience would be wrathful when the story of the sufferings of the people was delineated and in the same measure they would grow hilarious when the story about China was unfolded before them. China was lauded up as a paradise. There were no good souls anywhere like the Chinese. Their leaders were visible gods. They bore inexhaustible love for Bharat and for the people of Bharat. Many great men had lectured about China after their return therefrom. The people had read those lectures in the newspapers and they had heard them. Many writers had written big books.

That China of people's imagination had launched an attack on India. Are the Chinese traitors? The mortification following the betrayal of confidence is more deadly than anger.

That village, already a big one, had now developed almost to the dimension of a town. The Communist Party had even a "cell" there. Some of their experienced field-workers had come there from outside. Ten local youngsters from the group of the unemployed along with six others from the group of the half-employed had joined them—this complement of 16 people being like the sixteen phases of the full-moon—to keep up the full moon of their propaganda all through the twelve months of the year. One of them was locally known as Lal Chand, the "Red Moon"—a non-descript technician having the surname of Chakravorty. At the start of the Chinese skirmish, he attempted to convince the people that it was all bosh. China had not made an attack on India. China, the leader of the peace movement could not do it. China can never do it. Incited by America, India had grabbed a large chunk of Chinese territory and India was repeatedly requested to vacate it. As she failed to give it up, the Chinese had driven out the Indians. This was all that had happened. They must do it as the tract was a part of their territory.

But that presentation failed and was totally disbelieved. China must quit, China must go away. Look here, we have got another neighbour. Thrice in a month they would make inroads into India, carry away the cattle, cut away the paddy, kidnap the people. Sometimes the depredations are accompanied with looting and forcible occupation of land. Are we to believe that the country which in the face of these acts of violence does not show any bellicose tendency but sends protests only has usurped the Chinese territory? You are only circulating a canard. The other day in such a small gathering in the neighbouring village, a youngster appeared before him from nowhere with rolled sleeves and hard look. "Red Moon" was asked to stop. He made a turn to move out. But the people would not let him off. He had to eat the humble pie and was at last set free. But this incident was merely superficial like the foam of the tide. The intrinsic thing to be looked at was the cruel censure in the mind and the heart of the people against the treacherous act and the hard anger out of the sense of extreme mortification caused by the inflicted wound. My wonder knew no bounds at this spectacular sight. I knew my people. This was my village—my birth-place. I worked with all these villagers from 1921 to 1930. All my writings were centred on the new shape they had taken in that community of people who were once so quiet, docile and indifferent.

I wistfully looked forward to witnessing this kind of transfiguration. This was the reason that drove me to my village. I had been to Delhi, I had been to Calcutta. I had read reports from all places in India. As soon as I came back to Calcutta from Delhi, I hurried to my village solely to see it. I wanted to see what was going on in our village. As I reached it I was told that a meeting was going to be held on that very day where the District Magistrate, many officials and political leaders would come to join. It would be a protest meeting. At the end, donations would be accepted for the Defence Fund. I rushed to the meeting uninvited. I was bewildered at what I saw. What a vast concourse of people! Their facial expressions overwhelmed me. Men and women, boys and the aged, the rich and the poor, the Hindus and Muslims, had thronged there in waves.

I was cordially received by the official body and was asked to deliver a speech. I agreed. It was my village. It served as my training ground from 1921 to 1930. I had gone there to see my village, my mother, in her new lineaments. Why should I not make a speech?

I was the last speaker. I dilated upon my pet thought. I told the audience that I was in their midst on that day to see my birth-place, my village Nabagram, in her new shape of a marvellous transfiguration. Every country in the process of the suns undergoes transfiguration in every age. This is specially true of India. In the depth of her earthy body is seated in contemplation the conscious self of Mother India. The conscious self is the glorious fountainhead of all powers. She comes out of her muddy vesture and stands before us and awakens us. She commands us "Awake, arise. Drive out the evil. Give up your life for justice. Be immortal. Lay down your life before my feet, give up everything and receive the sacrament of nectar out of the pitcher of nectar in my hand. Once at such a posture of national crisis, the Mother said in Chitore—'I am hungry'. In the crisis of the Chinese aggression today, Mother has arisen in the same way and is proclaiming—'I am awakened. Bring forth your worship'. Those who have eyes to see have seen her glorious revelation. Those who have ears to hear have heard her call. The other day our Prime Minister made a speech in the Lok Sabha and said, "Before my eyes, a strange scene is unfolding. The veil that covered our mother's face is being lifted away. The Mother is awaking from the very depth in her Divine Form. I have seen her image. There is fire in her forehead, there is fire in her eyes. In her hands, she holds blessings and boons, arms and weapons. She is repeating, "Bring forth your articles of worship, bring forth your wealth, your honour, your life. Worship me." The grand worship has commenced throughout India. I have seen it in Delhi! What a grand worship! The rich are pouring forth their wealth, the beggars are giving away their mite, the jawans are sacrificing their lives, people are donating their blood, the women are offering their service, donating their ornaments. This is not the end of the story. I have seen a strange worship by a glorious lady. She is the Sarwati Debi of the Punjab. She has come to the pandal of worship with her son aged 16 years who held a telegraphic message in his hand. Her husband was an army man. The War Department has informed her that her husband was missing. It bore a cruel report. She did not break down under the impact of the sad news. Neither did she weep. She led her son to the pandal and said 'Mother, accept the offering, this young son of mine will fill up the vacancy caused by his father and will worship you.' One old Rajput came with three grandsons to offer them for the worship. One blind Sannyasin walked all the way from Benares to Delhi with a blanket which was his sole possession. 'Accept this, Mother, as my humble offering.' Mother India has stood today in the midst of our village mother Nabagram. Once she came in 1921 and then in 1930 when I called you all here. You gave away your offerings. Unfortunately I was not here in 1942. She again stood here in 1947. Today she has come again and is standing in our midst saying 'Bring forth your worship. Bow down your head. Bande Mataram'. Closely following that shout, 'Bande Mataram,' it seemed as if a sea roared back 'Bande Mataram'.

There was no need to remind the audience of the articles of worship. There was fire in the sacrificial ground, there was fuel too. At a moment's notice it blazed forth at the breath of my emotion. But I did not employ my words in a tricky way. It was my village, my birthplace. I do not belong to that group of thinkers who would hold that the feeling of love and devotion for the soil of one's birth-place is a spacious sentiment and that there is no glory in that kind of feeling. Be that as it may, the people were pressing towards the dais. I noticed as I was speaking that some were eager to raise their hands, the men were putting their hands in their pocket, some held money in firm grip. The youngsters were busy with their rings. One was sitting so long with the fountain pen lifted from the pocket. The ladies were sitting on the left side. The western side was in front of them. The afternoon glow of the winter sun was falling on their faces. They were weeping since the time I told them about Sarwati Debi. They were handling their bangles, ear-drops, necklaces and rings. In the front row a lady was sitting motionless, a stranger to me. She had a steadfast look and was quite unmindful, not even wiping out the tears rolling down her eyes on the skirt on her lap.

'Red Moon' was asked to stop

As I finished my speech, I sat down. The donated articles were being placed on the table in my front in quick succession. The organisers pleaded that the articles be placed one by one, so that they might write out the names of the donors. But who would listen? A regular scramble ensued for placing the articles. I thought on the women donors. They would give away in plenty by taking off their ornaments. Their donations would be more valuable. But they could not make way as the crowds were pressing. I came forward with one assistant to write the names. I spread out the corner of my wrapper—"Please Donate."

At the start, the wife of our Nitya Babu took off her pair of bangles and donated them. I murmured, "Good". The second lady was just taking off her ear-drops. She was a nubile girl. The third one was a daughter of a poor man in our village. She was ready with her ring. Next to her was that stranger lady. She was still sitting motionless absorbed in herself. Her tears were still sparkling in her eyes and they were not wiped out. Perhaps she was a newcomer, not known to me. Perhaps the wife of some officer or a school mistress or the daughter-in-law of a well-to-do family, not at all a maid of the village. Her eyes and face bore marks of city-culture. Her hands were full of golden bangles. There were many blemishes in her face but still there was a pervasive beauty in the countenance. She was not quite young. As I was thinking about I almost came before her and she seemed now to be self-conscious. She wiped out her tears and said with a smile "Your speech was very good. I could not check my tears."

I said — "Your donation please".

— "Ornaments?" Her look underwent a change.

— "Yes. Whatever you please. It is offering to the Mother."

She cast a strange look at me and said, "I have given my donation. It has been previously given."

— "Once again, please."

— "I will, when time will be ripe. But it is dusk, I can't take off my ornaments now to the prejudice of my husband's well-being,—moreover, there is no cash money with me to make any gift."

My mind was rudely shocked. Her protest made my mind away. I replied, "This would bring blessings to your husband." The young lady sharply looked at me. At the next moment she restrained herself and said, "Please excuse me. I have taken up a vow. I am unable to take off my ornaments." Then she smiled and said, "There are others. They are ready with their offerings." So saying she stood up and gloriously glided away in quick steps. Once again I cast my look at her and then diverted it to another direction. "A strange lady! a proud and doted on wife." A crooked smile beamed in my face. Next I approached another girl. When she donated her ear-drops, she said, "Don't you know her?"

I replied in the negative and felt no urgency for further information. There was no need for unsolicited calumny. I stepped forward and went around. When I slid back to my seat after the collection, the corner of my wrapper was filled up and heavy with the collected articles. I touched my forehead to the ground of my native village and came back home. It was past evening.

I sat in the verandah in a get-together mood. As I looked at a natural scene, a sense of wonderment crept in my soul. The moon had arisen in the heavens as I sat self-absorbed. It was the bright fortnight and the moon was in her fourteenth phase. The earth was flooded with her spotless white radiance. For a long time I had not seen such a regaling moonlight—so peerless in beauty. It was early December. Coldness was conspicuous by absence. Still in that moonshine the dangling thin film of mist appeared like a milk-white outer scarf. It struck me that my mother the native village was standing, self-absorbed in contemplation, covering herself with an immaculate white garment. I got down from the verandah and stood in the courtyard garden. I cast my eyes upwards. They were glued there. Waves of moonlight were playing free and unrestricted over the village scene—the tops of the palmyra trees, the attic room of a building, the corrugated roof of a two storied mud structure, the longish leaves of the cocoanut trees standing in the yard of Satya Babu,—the whole series shone, glittered and dazzled in that flood of moonlight. The firmament was transparent blue and a cluster of bright stars was hung aloft.

Suddenly I heard a grating sound and my mind was diverted from the upward sky. Somebody was opening the wood-and-iron framed gateway at the approach of the road. The rusty gate bolt would spark a sound if someone operated upon it. Who was there? A womanly figure was visible, attired in washed clothes. She was brownish in colour, had no veil over her head and she possessed a head of dishevelled hair—a figure just in keeping with the mood of imagination at the moment. I doubted if she was my daughter-in-law, the wife of my nephew who looked after me and arranged things accordingly just like my daughter. She was a good girl but unfortunate—a widow. But who was she? —A married lady with dazzling bangles in her hands!

She entered the compound and bowed down her head in reverence. I looked at her face as she raised it. I at once came to recognise her. She was that proud lady whom I met in the meeting. Perhaps she was a stranger and came to me in a repentant mood.

She smiled as she spoke, "Perhaps you don't recognise me?"

I felt a bit surprised, for the pattern of her smile was familiar to me but I could not recall her face, who was she?

"Fie! Fie! Why should I cry? It is the insignia of the rich people."

I replied,, "Mother, don't mind. It is exactly so."

"How you speak? Why do you call me mother?"

— "Then a daughter."

— "No, why should I stand in that relation?"

— "Then sister."

— "Not so."

I had to laugh and said, "Then the next relationship is not possible with a man of my age."

— "Quite possible—the relationship of a sister-in-law. Old people can have a young sister-in-law."

This time I was lost in surprise, "Then you are . . . . .

— "Yes —Srimati Jagatdhatri — D.D.P. — Destroyer of Demon's Pride."

— "Oh! Oh'. I clasped her head against my chest."

Exactly it was so. She was Jagatdhatri herself —the youngest daughter of my uncle-in-law, perhaps of the same age, it might be less as my third daughter Ganga. I was not at fault. I did not see her for an age, it might be 22 years or more. I took up my lodging in Calcutta in 1339 B.S. after I left my village. I did not keep up any contact with my village up to 1359 B.S. except some rare breaks. Once in the year 1342 B.S. I stayed in the village for two months at a stretch on the occasion of Ganga's marriage. My mind became filled with agony. It was just two months that Ganga had become a widow. Oh, the pity of it.' I heaved a deep sigh.

"How you speak?"

I said, "Night has descended on the life of your 'in-law. Everything has been covered up."

She understood me and replied in a grief-stricken voice, "I know everything."

— "Oh, come inside."

— "Let us go within. I have not seen you for an age. I read about you in the papers in distant land, saw your printed photos and told the people that you are my '-in-law. Will you believe me that they didn't believe my words?"

Self-control comes spontaneously. There is no need for any exertion. What is needed is diversion to a subject-matter of sweeter content. There is no other sweeter diversion than eulogy. This is what I understand as I write down my recollection of that day. I replied to Jagatdhatri, "Why didn't you tell them about your D.D.P. title, about the giver of it. It was he who alone could confer it on you?"

We got on the verandah and seated her in a chair in front of me. As she sat on the cha r she said laughingly, "I have told them so, and also many other things."

— "What was their reply?"

I thought at once that she should be treated to some refreshment and ordered Dhiren to prepare tea.

— "I won't take it. I have got an ulcerous stomach."

— "Then?"

— "Please don't mind. Besides I am fasting today. I have taken a vow. Don't you notice that my hair is loose? I have taken a bath after I came from the meeting."

— "What kind of vow? And at this time?"

— "It is my new-fangled vow. I fast on the 14th day in the phases of the bright moon and also on the new moon day. During day time I listen to the recitals of the Chandi by the Brahmin. And I count Mother's Name one hundred thousand times during the night."

I was taken aback and felt a pang of sorrow. Religiosity had taken hold of her quite early. What would happen to her next? She would develop into a morbid maniac! What a lively girl she was—always romping and ragging, very much outspoken and bright. Quite a redoubtable girl. Some would describe her as a tree-climber girl, some as blunt-tongued. I stuck to my D.D.P. title. I remembered to have told her once that she would understand herself if she was married to a husband of my type.

Her retort was sharp—"My God! How do you rate yourself. I would be married to a better qualified husband than what you are. You are vainglorious about your jail life and your writings!"

Her audacity stunned me. I responded — "Halt. I would have to marry you. I would ask my uncle-in-law to stop further searches for any groom for you and would ask him to marry you to me. Do you know the grandfather of your father married sixty wives? The existence of a co-wife is a matter of no moment in a Kulin's family. Besides, you will have your cousin as your rival. You will find no difficulty."

She retorted — "Then there would be no end to your miseries. We two sisters would pull you through endless sufferings by running a cord through your nose. I don't accept the theory of sin."

I wondered how Jagatdhatri had been transformed into such a creature! I saw tears in her eyes in the meeting. From her brief utterances, some similarity was detectable. It flashed on my mind that I should ask her why she behaved in that fashion in that gathering. But I hesitated. After all, she had come to me after a long spell of time. I stopped.

Jagatdhatri cut in — "Just tell me what you are thinking? Why this sudden silence?"

I did not suppress myself and told her how she had put on years. how she had changed and had

ORCHID

By SUBODH GHOSH

THE tourer has a noiseless engine. The latest model. It makes no more than a hiss when imperceptibly it comes to a smooth halt near the gate of the house. Not so mute, however, is its siren type horn. It doesn't blow — it expodes, it clangs in a sudden flourish of wild exultation. Karuna understands — it is Gunakar. He has come!

There — it is Ramtahal the servant pulling the grills open. But what is that strange noise? Something clanks and rattles. Does the servant's hand slip off the grill? Does he stumble and break his head on the iron to make that jazzy sound? Or is it Gunakar's arrogant, brand new tourer dealing the closed gate a jolt in a bid to break through all barriers with a crash?

And, what if it is just as much? Should he find the gate shut against him when she knows he is due, and at that very hour? What makes her so bold? It is more than boldness—it is rank impertinence. It's discourteous and foolhardy. The servant should have had clear instructions, that he should keep the gate open for Mr. Sen, and wait. And, of course, he must not forget to salaam thrice as soon as the Sahib arrived.

She had thought out all this in advance, but forgot about it at the required moment. The servant had been dozing in some safe corner. Startled by the hooter he had hurried to the gate to open to Gunakar. And perhaps the annoyed and impatient tourer had hit the gate with a disdaining push before the servant could reach it.

But no, he did not break open the gate. Peeping through the window, Karuna finds Gunakar's car crawling along the gravel towards the porch. Ramtahal closes the gate.

This house today will be blessed to dedicate itself as a token of gratitude to Gunakar's generous will. So much depended on his coming, including, perhaps, her very existence in the same house since this day, and also of Pranab her husband. The mounting debts were soon to swallow the house. Besides, it would no more be that same house with the spacious, neatly laid out garden, the herbarium and laboratory, the greenhouse and the dainty lily pond — things so dear to his heart and destined to fade out as dreams. And Pranab Basu the botanist would no longer be the remain the detached researcher lost in the mystery of plant life.

Life was wonderful for P. Basu the botanist. He would let hours slip by, just observing a favourite orchid in his greenhouse, and not know. The lunch drowsed on the table, and Karuna on a chair nearby, still and speechless, while P. Basu watched a bunch of rare mosses heaped on a dish, as if nothing else existed.

Karuna calls, "Do you hear me?"

"Yes?"

"The rice is getting cold."

"I remember," says P. Basu.

Perhaps he does, because a minute later, he starts, and like one waking from slumber reaches for the food.

"Wash your hands," says Karuna.

"O, I remember," says P. Basu.

It is five years since P. Basu came to live in this house. He sold all that accrued to him as patrimony — an ancient house in Guptipara, a solid structure, square and courtyarded, bordered on three sides by tanks, and on one side by a garden. The massive architecture had stood the ravages of time although its elephant portal was crumbling. It fetched a god good price. P. Basu gave shape to many of his dreams with the money. He made three exploratory trips to Sikkim, two to Kashmir, and one to Naga hills. No honeymoon trips or health excursions—they were perilous treks and mountaineering demanding grit and daring. Tents, ponies, porters and guides punched enormous holes in his purse. He combed the forests for botanical curiosities, and rare and interesting orchids.

At the end of each exacting expedition, P. Basu returned home utterly spent — physically as well as financially — but he never perhaps bothered if it was worthwhile. He never made an accounting of what he gained or if he didn't. Meanwhile basketfuls of orchids rotted, and bunches of rare wild flora wilted under his very gaze.

Fortunately, P. Basu had spent a part of the money from the sale of his ancestral estate to buy this house at Madhupur. Otherwise, he would not have a roof over his head. Perhaps he would have ended himself just sleeping in the deep shady recesses of some jungle. Karuna knows it too. That is what her brothers say in utter disgust.

And in moments of passion, her father too said it till he died. Loose and insensate banters. But he could not help it. An acute sense of frustration had made him irresponsible.

Pratul Das the attorney, whose high hopes solidified to a feeling of security when he married his only daughter to a man of such rare talent, finally came to this sad conclusion that by a cruel joke of Destiny he had given his daughter to a half mad fool. Pranab gave no grounds for suspicion. A thoroughbred in all respects, and handsome in the bargain — that was he, to say the least. Both at home and abroad his records were sparkling. He studied four years in California, U.S.A., and passed with medals. A fat salaried post in the Government's Agriculture department was the least one could expect for him.

Pratul Das, the attorney, could not dream that her daughter's lot was so soon to be reduced to this mockery. Neither did any of her relations. Karuna also had not even an inkling of such a dreadful prospect. — That she would have to rot in a far off place like Madhupur in this wild haunted house. Who was she to dress for ? Who was she to sing for ? What if she slept all day till it was dark — there was nobody to seek her out and, caressing her hair, to say, "It's no time to sleep, dear."

There was only one man — the solitary soul who reigned in the house — who could say that. But he would not. So what could she do ? Herself her sole company, Karuna was alone — alone.

Was she the same girl who once said to her friends, "Hills for me, for me the hills in summer. Never the plains, nothing doing."

"And Calcutta in winter, am I right ?"

"Can't say exactly."

"Why ?"

"Winter is the season to pack up for outings. I will ask that gentleman to take a month's leave. Besides, wherever we go, we are not travelling by rail. It will be a drive — there's no travelling except in one's own car."

Her own car ! The recollection whipped her to a consciousness of the present. A squirrel also leaps on the ivy overhanging the window. Following the squirrel, her eyes catch the morning beams reflected by the shiny body of Gunakar's latest model tourer. That way lies a picture of promise, beyond any shade of doubt. Karuna can set out on a journey by car today itself, or any day from now. She has only to wish it. She has Gunakar's standing offer: "Don't be shy. Tell me straightway whenever you feel like, wherever you want to go. The car is yours."

Karuna only listened to his advances in silence. She did not reply. But today she must, perhaps. There is no point in keeping mum in hesitancy. She has prepared herself today to accept a benevolence from Gunakar's hand — a cheque or cash.

His shoes creak up and down the verandah. There are three seats but Gunakar has not taken any. Today he is in no mood to be any more satisfied with a seat in the verandah, as he was yesterday, or one of those hundred days during the past one year. Were it any of those days, Karuna would have by now herself come out of her room and offer him a seat with a smile of reception. But today, the mirror which reflects her smile distresses her. Is she afraid then ? Come on, there is nothing to fear. It is smallness to be afraid of a man like Gunakar. This one year's acquaintance has been her treasure — a wonder that charms.

To Karuna Gunakar was not at all a stranger from another world. Maybe, his emergence was sudden and a trifle stunning to the house, although Gunakar the man is not one who could dazzle — least of all, dazzle anybody of this house.

He is distantly related to Pranab. Besides he is a successful man well known to her father. It is that same Gunakar who was a clerk in a Builders' firm only seven years ago. He was once to the States also to buy machinery for his firm. There he met Pranab several times. Pratul Das the attorney did not know when he came back or opened his own builders' and contractors' firm. The day he knew it he sank in his seat in glum silence and remained like that for a long time. Mrs. Das, his wife, and Karuna's mother had asked, "What's the matter ?"

"No dear, it is nothing serious."

"What is it anyway ?"

"I mean, that Gunakar has shined."

"Which Gunakar ?"

"You remember Bidhu-da of Kalna ? It is his son."

"Yes I remember."

"So I was thinking....."

"Yes ?"

"If I could give her to this boy, Gunakar."

"Destiny. It is inexorable they say."

"Absolutely." You cannot explain it otherwise—a man with so much learning and foreign training turns nutty!"

It is a year ago that Gunakar first came to this house. Karuna's father was present during that visit. He had come here to see her daughter's strange lot with his own eyes. A bridge-building contract had brought Gunakar near Madhupur. He ran into Pratul Das one day on his way to the market-place. Pratul Das was pleased to meet him. He invited him to his daughter's house and introduced him to his son-in-law.

Gunakar was intrigued by Pranab's ice-breaker. It was just an unceremonious "Let's go."

"Where ?" said Gunakar a little bewildered.

"To my greenhouse. You will see a discovery of mine."

"What's it ?"

"Calanthes Karunaina."

"What does that mean ?"

A new orchid."

Gunakar laughed. "Well, I am a mazdoor, who understands only concrete and hardware. I have no time to stare at orchids."

"Any interest ?"

"Not even that."

Karuna brought tea. At the first sight and hearing she was sweeter and more fragrant to Gunakar than the tea she brought. Pratul Das told stories of big earnings in his attorney's career, and Gunakar of his struggles as a builder and contractor.

Karuna said, "I have a complaint."

"What is it about ?"

You have not brought Mrs. Sen."

Gunakar laughed out loud. "You are mistaken. It is an unfounded complaint."

"You have not brought Mrs. Sen"

Pratul Das explained, "Gunakar is not married."

Gunakar : "I am off today."

Karauna : "I hope you will come again."

Gunakar smiled : "Only if you are not annoyed."

Karuna : "We won't be — not at all."

Her lovely face lit up with a mellowed suggestion of welcome as she said goodbye.

It is the same lovely face after a year. Today it has got to be lovelier with a blush. A minute from now, her hands would be outstretched in acceptance of a stark truth — that from today Gunakar is a friend of the family.

She did not forget her father's sigh when Gunakar left after the first visit, and his words uttered despair: "Worthless wretch!"

The glore of his eyes hit the greenhouse with a ballistic of contempt. It shook her to the marrow as she stood behind his father unnoticed. Even her shadow betrayed her agony. Surprised Pratul Das turned round. Her placid face was aglow, two soft petals of orchid for her lips quivering. It looked like a smile, but ——

Gunakar came next day before dusk. She received him with a smile, the same sweet smile and cup of tea.

"What a surprise," he said, "I have met Mr. Basu several times before."

"You may have," said Karuna.

"Perhaps in America."

"Maybe."

"But he doesn't seem to recognize me."

Pratul Babu butted in, "Not he. He has hardly a mind to rember with.

"But he is great botanist."

"Heaven knows. But he has not earned a dime up till now."

Gunakar looked grave. "But how long — I mean, they can't go on like this. ——"

"Not at all," said Pratul Babu, "The next scene will be on the streets. So I say it again, he should get himself a job as soon as he can. I have come here to persuade him to his senses. The Government's Agriculture department wants a superintendent. Our Naresh writes from Delhi he can negotiate it for him."

The suggestion lashed Gunakar on his face. It made him smart, quite unaccountably "What a job," he whispered.

Karuna started. The smile on her soft lips flickered. A wind from somewhere swept past, and the orchids trembled.

"That is a mali's job, I say," said Gunakar clarifying. "Growing pumpkin and potatoes. He can be without it."

"All right", muttered Pratul Babu, "then leave them to fate."

That Pratul Das is no more. He did not live to see with his own eyes the shape of that fate. In a year many, many orchids bloomed in P. Basu's greenhouse. The lily pond was near choked with rampant growth. Two German tourists were impressed with the herbarium and left with a large number of seedlings and young plants. They offered a price, but P. Basu said, "I have no need of money, I don't need it at all."

It gave Karuna a burn that charred her angelic smile. A wonderful man from dreamland! In this land clouds of white orchid laugh, pollens fly with the breeze, petals quiver and sprouts thirst for morning dew. And P. Basu is happy. He does not know what happened to Karuna's ornament box. Does he notice the vanishing gold lines on Karuna's body? He doesn't. He has no eyes to see it. Soon the wedding ring, the last to go, will go, inevitably, and he will not know. And then one day a hungry P. Basu pining for something to eat will walk to the dinner table laid with empty crockery.

Yet, and yet he is happy. He has not known any cares this one year. One who is committed to the welfare of trees and herbs, one who carries a mission to develop species like non-poisonous "dhutura", coloured "punarnaba", fragrant "palas" and sweet "neem", is beyond the reach of worldly cares.

Once, down came two cousins of hers from Kulti. Pranab told them of his worries about the colour of "palas" and taste of "neem." They were horrified.

"Karuna may come to stay with us now and then, say three months in a year". Suggested the dazed cousins. "Here she too will go mad."

Dhirenda laughed. "What is the name you call your new orchid by, Mr. Basu?"

Gaganda laughed too. "It is Calanthes Karunaina."

"What on earth is that?"

"You don't understand? It is named after

"I mean, did I eat yesterday ? Do you remember ?"

Karuna. Mr. Basu says it is a discovery from the jungles of Sikkim."

"After all, it immortalizes our Karuna", said Dhirenda, laughing still.

"Mr. Shahjehan the Second", added Gaganda. "A rare lover."

Then they frowned at Karuna. "And the fool, she still smiles. Looks as if she loves to put up with this monstrous nonsense."

She is not going to endure it any more. She has the realisation at last. For five years she had cherished the smile, and now it is about to be shed from her lips with streams of blood. She does not mean anything to Pranab. She does not form a part of the house. She does not forget the tears in his eyes when once a dragon fly chewed up a whole orchid. How he suffered! She would be happy if he expressed half that concern when nightly she coughed herself out. But he was deaf, and worst of all, he did not hesitate to ask her to send him a cup of tea to the garden when she was in the grip of a violent paroxysm of cough. But she did not resent. She made the tea coughing all the time, and carried it to him in the garden.

It is not a wife living with her husband—it is something of a nurse charged with the care of a dumb, capricious baby, cruel and wayward. The man who stripped her bare of all her hopes, dreams and yearnings to make a rubbish heap of it all is her husband—the mad botanist who has no sleep thinking of the problems of plants and trees.

This one year has been different in a way. It has brought a touch of novelty in her denuded existence. After all she has someone to talk to. Gunakar came and went. He did not brag about himself, neither was he curious about her life. He felt gratified just to come. Rather, he liked to hear about Pranab whom he held in reverence. He did not hesitate to say, "They are the most wronged of all men—they are not understood. I tell you here is hope for all humanity in this petty accounting world—that at least one of us is a dreamer who is undaunted in his isolation."

"But I have to account, to keep going."

"There's no reason why you shouldn't."

"But how long can it go like this ?"

"Don't worry, it is dynamic world."

There was great consolation in it—something for which one should be respected. Gunakar who was nobody in relation to this house appeared to be a sincere friend of its tormented soul.

He seemed to think something. Then he burst out with a strong note of protest. "No Mr. Basu should not be dragged into the drudgery of a world which works for an income. Let him do unperturbed what he is doing. I also request you to carry on." The reply swelled in her in a mad urge to be told, and it nearly burst her ribs. But she could not tell—she cannot. Yet she has to. "What am I to do, what have I ? The whims of an insane misfortune has squeezed me empty."

Yet she must tell. Even to Gunakar. There was no point in shying. Why shouldn't she tell the man who turned a respectful eye even on a nonentity like her, who did not despise a crazy fellow like her husband, who would be only happy to see peace established in the house.

She had a feeling that a sympathetic heart like Gunakar would himself suggest it without waiting for her to tell it. But he did not give so much as a hint. And slowly the shadow was spreading to swallow the house—the shadow of starvation and death. Her jewel box was empty.

Didn't he understand even the day when she failed to serve him a cup of tea? Obviously he didn't. His loud and hearty laugh proved it.

Tea leaves, sugar and milk were things of another world. The rents in the door curtain yawned, the ragged end flapped with a whiff of breeze, baring a part of her room. His eyes did not seem to rest. Repeatedly they darted keen searching looks through the gaps as though to discover some new wealth in the meagre furniture of her room, in the coloured saris hung on brackets, in the face towel dangling from a hook on the mirror.

He did not turn up for ten days since that. He should have come. She was restless, and kept looking through the gate on to the road at some distance. Would she write, "Come once, immediate. It's urgent."

Meanwhile botanist P. Basu staged a quaint comedy one day. He rose from sleep before dawn, and straightway walked to Karuna's bed.

"Listen, do you hear me", he shouted, waking her up.

Startled she screamed, "Who's there?"

"It's me", P. Basu said.

"Who is me?" She asked, confounded, in a voice trempling with fear.

"Me, P. Basu, your husband", he said smiling.

"What's the matter?"

"I mean, did I eat yesterday, do you remember?"

In the dark, she could not discern any line of pain or puzzlement in that boyish, innocent face. But she buried her face in the pillow, sobbing.

P. Basu repeated, as if in a hurry, "Come, say it quick. I have work to do."

"You did, yes", She shouted.

"So!" P. Basu hastened out of the room.

Strange she could tell this great and ruthless lie out loud. The man who had neither lunch nor dinner yesterday, went away happy and reassured because she said he had it.

After this, an evening of clouds. There was lightning but no thunder. Gunakar came. Unabashed, without a falter, she said, the first thing, "I need some money."

"How much."

"You may guess."

"Five thousand, will that do?"

"It will."

"When do you want it"

"Today itself."

"Cant you wait till tomorrow?"

"I can."

"All right, let me go now."

"When are you coming tomorrow?"

"When do you want me to come?"

"In the morning."

Very well."

And he did not fail. The morning warmed up with the fresh smiling sunbeams. Gunakar has come to end all the worries that ailed the house.

So it is, that the shoes creak so emphatically. So now a little smile to brighten up the weary face. A touch of the comb to rule the storm tossed hair, a twist to tip up the coiffure in place. And then,, stand on the threshold to look out where Gunakar paces up and down the verandah and call,

"Come in."

But what's the matter with her? Why does her smile take the hue of a flaming fire? Standing in front of the mirror she stares at her smile with two blazing insane eyes. The ears redden smitten by the insolence of a creaking pair of shoes, pacing haughtily up and down.

Not that way. She rushed to the corridor inside opposite. Not here either. Here the creaking from the verandah chased her ears. A shadow of fear haunted her, fiercer than a tiger, peeping greedily to and fro from that end, mad for a pull at her sari's skirt. Her helpless soul groped for a safe refuge of protection.

She ran and ran to stop at the door of that dear greenhouse of her husband's.

P. Basu shouted bewitched and stupefied.

"You here?"

"Where else have I to go?" she gasps.

"Look, there—" says P. Basu.

"I can see."

"Calanthes Karunaina !"

"The orchid you love."

"Yes".

"Lovely!"

P. Basu again started, almost scandalized. He become sweet-tongued. "I think your D.D.P. title should now be replaced by another title, S.T.—sweet-tongued and if you add another letter "S" to it, you would also be sweet-smiling."

Gagatdhatri started laughing.

—"It might not so happen in the presence of a big boss like you."

—"Stop, stop. Today I confer on you my new title. I have forgotten to ask anything about you.

"He returned"

I was not present at the time of your marriage. What is your husband doing?"

—"He is in the army."

My old memories came back.

—"Yes! yes! Did he not go to the front during the last war just after his marriage?

—"What you mean by "just after"? He took me home after the bridal night. The second night was Kal Ratri—inauspicious night. The third night was the night for "flower-bed" ceremony, our honeymoon night. He received a telegraphic message in the morning and left home at noon. So there was no 'honeymoon' or 'flower-bed' ritual. He returned from the front after three years serving in Africa and in Burma Take it from me if some one posed before me that he was the man to whom I was married, it was not possible for me to distinguish. I did not even remember his face."

She began to laugh.

—"Where is he at present?"

—I don't know exactly But he is in the front fighting against the Chinese.

Surprise overtook me. "Fighting with the Chinese"?

She confirmed. "The vow has been taken for his sake." I felt a reeling sensation in my head Oh! how composedly she was referring to the matter.

After restraining myself with great difficulty I asked — "How long is he in the front?"

—"These eight days."

I heaved a sigh of relief. Bomdila fell more than eight days ago.

She continued in a calm tone — "A month ago his old contract came to an end. We were at Shillong We were shifting ourselves to reach home after the retirement. Suddenly the hostilities started. We received the news of the fall of Twang. My husband argued, 'In former times we fought for the British. Thereafter we served so long in safety and in comfort in our independent country joining cantonment after cantonment and drew our salary. Now our freedom is threatened. The war has commenced and the enemies have entered into our territory. Shall I take the opportunity of retirement and save my soul?' I asked him in reply what he intended to do. He told me that he liked to apply for a new service-contract. I gave him my full support and assurance and told him how my famous—'in-law suffered imprisonment for the sake of the country. What an aroma of glory surrounded the name of my '-in-law! I insisted that he must go, and go without any sense of fear. I assured him that he would certainly return and our country would be victorious. I would take up vow for his sake.

"My husband was exceedingly pleased. He at once made the petition and we waited there for the reply. Ten days back he signed the new contract. On the eighth day he went to the office and soon came back home attired with the bullet-belt, the cross-piece, across his chest and with the revolver and the bayonet fastened in the web belt. He told me that he would start immediately and that within a day or two we would be sent back home by the Department. 'Go home with the kiddies. You understand?'

"I made the affirmative reply and bowed down my head in obeisance.

"While starting to move out he capped in — 'If I don't return —,

"I stopped him and assured, 'You will certainly return. If the worst comes to the worst, the entire responsibility will be mine.'

"I added, 'If it does come to pass I would take my eldest son along with me on the very day I would receive the news and would admit him in the army'.

"My husband was astonished and queried, 'What next?'

"I made the reply. 'Then I would myself join the army. I have learnt the art of rifle-shooting in the club. I will go to the front."

I was silenced. I could not realise that tears were rolling down my eyes.

Silently Jagatdhatri rose from the chair, made her bow and getting down from the verandah quietly she melted herself in the full tide of the matchless beauty of the moonshine of the night I knew that her present mood lacked the quality of permanence and it would again undergo a change. Still a snatch of Tagore's melody evoked a murmur in my mind:

"When today, out of Bengal's heart,
oh! Mother dear
Hast thou risen up in splendour, free and clear."

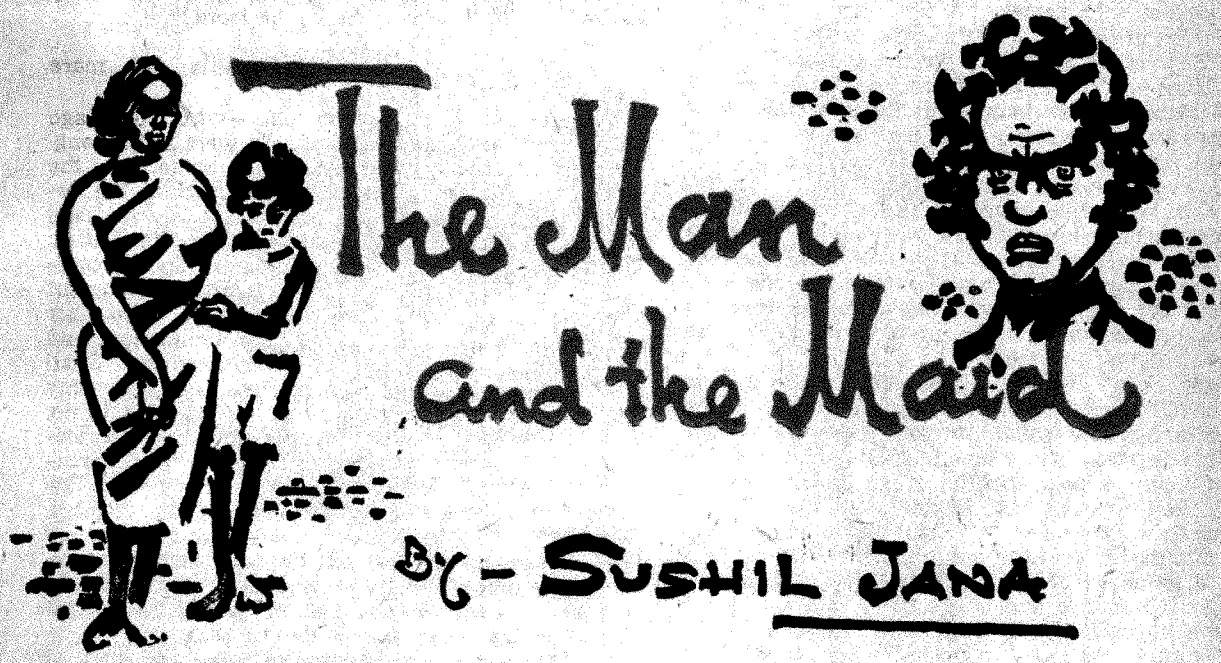
(Translated by Satyendra Mohan Mookerjee)



THERE are about twelve of them —men, women and children. They eat their cold rice in the shade of a roadside tree, pick up their bundles and baskets, pots and pans and resume their journey eastwards.

"Where do you go ?" asks Hotlagar, as he drives his bullock-cart alongside.

"To Kharagpur," comes the reply.

"Kharagpur, that hell of a place !" Hotlagar flies into a passion, furiously lashing the bullocks. The very name of Kharagpur drives him mad these days. Whole bands of these Santals pour into that cursed marketplace, where they lose their caste, and sell their honour. "Let them go to the dogs ! Surely the Devil's after them !", Mutters Hotlagar to himself, but then asks again : "And where do you come from ?"

"From Pathardanga". There's a ring of weary sadness in the voice.

Pathardanga! Pathardanga ! ah ! that countryside where the earth is red !—farther to the west.

Wherever it be, it is the homeland of Santals and Hotlagar has a strange affection for his homeland. And now out of that homeland—the ancient abode of their fathers, away from the fields they once made out of rugged earth, away from their own clan, they are heading towards a land of strangers. Hotlagar seethes with anger at the thought. He prods the sides of his bullocks with his feet. "So you have left your old home, but why ?" he asks.

"Why ? You ask, why ?" The man looks surprised. He is a strongly built, broad-shouldered person, past middle age, and has nothing but a narrow strip of cloth hanging down from the waist just enough to hide his nakedness. Indignant, he looks Hotlagar in the face, and says,

"Where on earth do you come from, eh?" He rages like an angry tom-cat, "Do you know that our womenfolk have been outraged, our huts have been burnt down and three of our young-men shot dead ? The man stares at him for a moment and says again, "But it is we who cleared the forests, broke the stones, made the fields and tilled them and now at last this Singhji—the brute of the landlord—appears and declares 'the fields do not belong to you, be off !' He would not have us enter the jungles or even gather the fallen leaves!"

"So that's that ! that's that !" mutters Hotlagar.

Smarting under the lash the bullocks break into a run. Hotlagar makes a curious guttural sound. His cart leaves the band of Santals far behind.

"So that's that !" Hotlagar's temper is badly ruffled.

Batch after batch the Santals have been thus leaving their homeland ! Hotlagar has watched them going and chafed as he watched. They all go to Kharagpur to the Railway workshops, the colony. They go even farther to the mines. The women have their babies tied to their broad backs. The men have on their shoulders a plain bamboo pole from either end of which hang all their worldly possessions : tattered quilts, mats made of palm leaves, and even the earthen cooking pots ; the women have some clothes insufficient though they be ; the men go stark naked except for the strips of dirty cloth, six or seven inches in breadth, barely enough to hide their nakedness. Batches of them move eastward along this red, gravel road, that meanders out of the hill-forests of Chhotanagpur, incidentally touching the Railway lines here and there and some even crossing the Railway stations. The Santals do not entertain at these stations; they walk all the way to Kharagpur. If entrain they must, they do so at Kharagpur. From there they are hurled who knows where ; a few find their way into the local 'Coolie lines' ; there they rot,—and die. As Hotlagar puts it, they lose their caste.

Hotlagar cannot bear the sight. He watches them going and gets angry. As for himself he cannot leave his place. Months have rolled into years. He only chafes at intervals.

He drives his cart to the right—to the Railway Station. One can see from far the huddled railway sheds roofed red with tiles and a few tea-stalls roofed yellow with thatch. A few men going about doing their duties raise a little noise in that desolate place. Beyond, it is empty space—a vast barren tract. Here and there, granite rocks stick out of the copper-coloured earth looking like waves. Hotlagar stops his cart in the shade of a tree across the culvert, not far from the station. Under the culvert, there flows a brook in a broad sand-bed ; it pushes its way through the gavel of the parched plains. Hotlager unyokes his bullocks and tethers them to the matted twigs of the banyan tree. He goes to the stream, takes his bath and returns to his cart. He brings out a water-bowl, a plate and an iron pot for cooking rice and a little quantity of pulse. He has now to cook his meal.

Lying about him are ready ovens made by the hands of old wayfarers nobody can say when. Some of them are whole, others broken. Gaping—under the roadside trees, these burnt, sooty holes tell the tales of many a past cooking. The Santals forced out of their hearths and homes must have made them when they passed this way. Hotlagar selects one and puts his cooking pot upon it. But he fails to get a flame, strive as he may. He gathers dry leaves and branches and stuffs them into the hole ; he blows himself dry in the throat. Only curls of smoke rising from the oven hurt his eyes which redden and water. Columns of smoke fill the air around ; yet there is no sign of fire.

Just then a girl appears on the scene and takes her stand behind Hotlagar. She has a boy, about thirteen years old, with her He has a hungry look. They were resting under some other tree. The smoke of the oven has drawn them here. They seat themselves in the shade. They are silent. Hotlagar goes on blowing on the fire.

Hotlagar turns his face

The woman breaks the silence at last and says, "No, that isn't the way."

Hotlagar turns his face and sees her. His eyes are arrested in a gaze at the girl to whose square-cut face a pair of sunken cheeks have lent a beauty at once rugged and melancholy. She is hardly above twenty. Her face is weary and hairs lack lustre. She is one of his own people, a Santal like himself. However, she is more generously clad than a woman of her tribe, not just up to the knee. Her hair too is carelessly tied up in a loose knot, not carefully done into a neat knot in the Santali mode. There is something about her which is not like a Santal. Her face betraying a weary resignation. But Hotlagar sizes her up rightly as one of his tribe. He can pick out one from a crowd. Hotlagar points to the oven and says, "Can't make a fire! How very annoying!"

"Won't you let me have a try ?"

Hotlagar is pleased. He stands aside.

She draws all the leaves and branches out of the oven and rearranges them with a deft hand and says to Hotlagar, "Fetch me a few dry leaves please."

Hotlagar fetches all the dry leaves that he can gather under the tree. She takes only a few, puts them into the oven and blows into it. In a moment, the leaves burst into a flame.

Hotlagar is positively delighted ; he laughs with glee, "After all, it's a woman's job. Isn't it ?"

The woman returns to the boy and sits beside him.

Hotlagar asks her, 'Where are you going ?'

'To the west—a very far-away place'.

She isn't going eastward ! Ah—not to that cursed Kharagpur ! Hotlagar is glad to know.

"And where do you come from ?"

"From Kharagpur."

It's good that a woman of his tribe has left that hell of a place, indeed, it's very good. Hotlagar is immensely pleased, but he asks all the same, "But why have you left the place ?"

"They drove us out of the workshop. The military was called in. They killed my father and closed down the workshop. It's a long story."

Hotlagar is pleased to know it. Isn't it Kharagpur—the market-place where they lose their caste ? Such things are bound to happen there.

"What's your name ?"

"Kamala".

Hotlagar likes her. A sympathetic soul she is. He now raises his eyes towards the boy and asks, "Who is that boy ?"

"My brother".

The water in the pot is boiling. Kamala has her eyes set on it. She says, "We have come all the way from Kharagpur on foot. My brother has had nothing to eat for two whole days. Would you boil some more rice for the boy ? No, not for myself."

So ! Hotlagar now knows why she came forward to help him. Why, isn't she from the workshop—town ? Very clever ! Hotlagar looks at her with suspicion. "Got rice with you ?" he asks.

She nods No, she has no rice with her.

"Then ? Have you money ?"

Not even that : Kamala nods again.

"Then ?"

Kamala looks helplessly at him and says apologetically, "It's only for my brother."

"I've got just this much rice extra." Hotlagar shows her the extra quantity of rice. He grumbles /

"Have you got a wife" ?

but pours out the rice into the pot. "You have been starving for two days. You will eat a lot. This isn't enough for you, eh ?"

He lights a home-made cigaretts and sits tight. "Have you got any other relatives ?"—he asks.

"None."

"How is it, then, that you are returning to the old place ? Where would you put up ?"

"There are the people of my tribe there."

"The fire has gone out again !" Hotlagar rises.

"Don't worry please. Let me see to it, "Kamala hastens to the oven.

Kamala rekindles the fire. She settles herself by the oven.

Hotlagar has come to like her, but not wholly. Hasn't she been to places and seen things ? Isn't she cute ? How tactfully she has just now managed to get a share of his food. She is quite nice, of course, as a woman of his tribe should be. Yet, he has a haunch about her. After all, she is from the market-town, where they lose their caste.

They talk. As they talk, they begin to feel at home with each other. Hotlagar leans against the trunk of the tree and smokes his home-made cigarette. Kamala stretches out her legs and attends to the cooking. She begins to take an interest in the man.

"The cart and the bullocks—are they yours ?"

"Whose else do you think ?" Hotlagar scrutinises her face. Does she doubt it ?

"A nice pair of bullocks ! Do they draw the plough too ?"

"They do," Hotlagar feels important and adds, "Two acres of land too."

"So you are a chief !" There is a note of admiration in the woman's voice.

"Oh no," says Hotlagar. He is glad to have made an impression on her. He smiles to himself, Hasn't he struck her dumb !

"Have you got a wife ?"

"No, I shall take one after the harvest."

"I see !"

They are silent for a while. Hotlagar smokes on ; Kamala feeds the fire. The rice is boiling. Kamala's brother has his hungry eyes set on it and is watering in the mouth.

"You are a happy man—a settled man!" says Kamala abruptly with sigh.

Hotlagar makes no reply. Kamala falls silent again. After a while, she begins to tell her own story. The words come rather fitfully. She speaks of a lock-out, of his father being killed by a bullet. She speaks of unemployment, of dishonour. Her unkempt hair, the gravity of her sad and tired face, the broken sentences—all these lend to her face a rugged beauty. There is a far-away look in her eyes. She mutters, "If only my brother were grown-up !"

"So, what ?"

"We might have found some job. We might have worked. We might have hoped." Kamala continues after a pause, "Couldn't exchange honour for a job. So I had to return to my own people."

Hotlagar is feeling soft. Poor lonely girl! "Where do your people live ?"

"Pathardanga."

"Pathardanga, did you say ?"

Ah, it's the very place, from where groups of Santals, men and women, are trekking eastwards. It is the very place where women have been outraged, houses looted and burnt and people killed. And this Kamala is going there! Hotlagar feels puzzled but says nothing. He doesn't know what to say. But he must speak out ! At last he bursts, "Don't go there !"

"Why ?"

Hotlagar tells her the story of Pathardanga.

"What's to be done then ?" Kamala stares at him with a querying look.

Hotlagar is silent.

The rice is cooked. The sun has inclined to the west. Hotlagar spreads Sal-leaves on the bare earth.

"Just a handful for my brother, please." says Kamala.

"Why don't you dish out the rice ? Let all three of us share."

Not so very long ago, it was the same man who grumbled that as the two had eaten nothing for two days, they would eat a lot. So, if the food must be shared, let Hotlagar himself serve it. Kamala is not going to do it. She stands aloof, a bit hesitant and abashed.

Finally Hotlagar gets up and shares out the rice. They talk like old friends, as they eat. Hotlagar feels happy.

Kamala asks him, "Who cooks for you ?"

"I myself do the cooking."

"No mother ?—No sister ?—Have you none to do it for you ?"

"None".

"That's rather annoying. You have your land, your house, the cart and the bullocks—but no woman ? Find some hardy girl to marry, Chief."

"Hum !"

They fall silent for a while. They are absorbed in thought again.

"But what am I to do ?" asks Kamala. She looks up earnestly at Hotlagar for a solution. But Hotlagar is silent; he has no solution to offer.

The meal over, Hotlagar lies drowsy under the tree. He wakes up suddenly. It is a long time since Kamala went to wash the pots at the stream. There is no trace of the boy either. May be, they have slunk away with the utensils. He springs up, moves a few steps towards the culvert, looks down and stops short. Kamala is washing herself at the stream. Leaving her cloth ashore she has gone down nude to the stream. Like a bird she is sprinkling water over her naked body. The muscles of her youthful body are dancing to every movement of her hands. Hotlagar returns to his place and lays himself down. No, the girl has not run away. He closes his eyes, relieved, thinking of the girl full of the flowering youth.

Kamala comes back with the cooking pot and the bowl, and places them neatly on the cart.

Hotlagar does not open his eyes. The sun rays shooting through the leaves are on his face. Kamala looks at him. Ah! The man is sleeping! Hotlagar's dhotie (wearing cloth) is spread out to dry in the sun, with its ends fastened to the matted twigs of the tree. Kamala begins to unfasten them. Hotlagar feels uneasy and looks stealthily at her. Is she going to wear the cloth? Or, perhaps, to run away with it? No. Kamala spreads it out again at a different angle so as to screen his face from the sun.

Kamala takes her seat under the tree. She sits still with her eyes set on the distant horizon. No port for her in the boundless emptiness!

With his eyes shut, Hotlagar expects the girl to ask him again, "Where are we to go? What are we to do?"

No, she does not do so. Hotlagar gets up and collects and counts his things. No, nothing is missing.

Like a wild buffalo, he rages... "You lied to me!"

But Kamala brings him his cloth, folds it neatly and says, "You forgot your cloth!"

"Ah! I did!"

So, the girl is really good, not of the designing sort, though from that cursed town.

The sun is now leaning on the horizon. It's time the train should come. Hotlagar yokes the bullocks in a leisurely manner, casts a last glance around to see if anything has been left through mistake. He feels so uneasy in his mind, when the girl suddenly speaks out, "Back we go to Kharagpur, or to some colliery, come what may."

The brother nestless close to the sister again.

Hotlagar fixes his gaze on them for a minute and says, "God give you a good job." Then he falls silent. What more has he to give her but good wishes? Hotlagar makes a curious sound with his tongue and the bullocks begin to move. Hotlagar turns his face to bid them goodbye.

"Now, I must be gone. It's time for the train."

Hotlagar drives his cart towards the station. After a while, he looks back again. There goes Kamala with her brother—back to the east, back to that cursed Kharagpur again. They move slowly, wearily.

Hotlagar absently holds the lash ready in his hand but has not the mind to use it. He is in a pensive mood. The bullocks are drawing the cart at a slow pace. Hotlagar looks hard up the Railway lines. Smoke is visible far, far away.

Lalaji is expected to come by this train,—his master.

He went to the town to make purchases and is sure to come back tipsy. He is a big dealer in clothes and yarns. The business has given him a big landed property and has settled him in usury. From the town he comes dead drunk and gives himself upto revelry in the cart. From amongst the gipsy women inhabiting the broken hutments near the station he picks up one of the daring sort and comes all the way in his cart carousing. He does not forget occasionally to pour out a little wine into the cupped palms of Hotlagar, saying, "Come, sonnie, you too have a share!"

On all such occasions, he waxes generous every time and makes a valuable renewal of a gift to him of the same two acres of land for tilling and building a hut on, the same cart and the pair of bullocks. He gives his solemn word to procure Hotlagar a wife too. And what if at times the childless Lalaji makes the solemn promise of adopting Hotlagar as his son, adding: "Well, when the heart opens out, what worth are silver and gold, sonnie?"

It is this same man for whom Hotlagar seems to lie in wait today. At last the train comes. The evening sky has by then grown dark. Lalaji tipsy as usual staggers on to the cart with Punni, a gipsy girl, with him. He says to Hotlagar in a drunken voice, "Go ahead, sonnie!"

"I ain't going with you. Take back your cart. I go my own way!" blurts out Hotlagar.

At long last Hotlagar has revolted.

"Come sonnie! Are you angry? What's up?" Lalaji seeks to mollify him.

"You are a liar! What about your promise of land, bullocks and a wife?"

"Ah-ha! Calm yourself. Everything shall be given you as promised. When the heart opens out" —Lalaji thrusts a whole bottle of wine into his hand, saying, "Now, have a drink, sonnie!"

Hotlagar goes frenzied and throws away the bottle. He says, "You lie! You lied to my father

The Angel-Child

By CHRISTEL DAS

LITTLE Suzan was what is generally termed a "darling child." She looked exactly like the Little Lord Fountleroy, complete with long golden curls and big blue eyes. When she cried—and she usually managed to do so when she thought it necessary—they would turn the colour of "violets covered with morning-dew", to quote Mrs. Smith, her mother. One look from those eyes, full of tears and innocence, with an extra tear hanging in long fluttering lashes, was enough to melt an iceberg, especially when accompanied by a slight quivering of her tiny pink mouth. Suzan never howled like other children, she just stood there like a persecuted saint, tears streaming down her face, sweet and beautiful and angelic. And she looked even more adorable when she smiled, with two dainty dimples appearing in each rosy cheek!

Suzan's natural charms were greatly enhanced by her mother's choice of frocks. She wore nothing but frills and laces, velvet and silk, always in white, pink or light blue. And she lived up to it! There was never a better mannered child than Suzy. She was a perfect little lady of ten! She would curtsey to old ladies and gentlemen and say her "thank you"s and "please"s so sweetly, that she captured everybody's heart—that is the hearts of nice old ladies and gentlemen. Other children were not so easily won over. The former called her pet names like "Goldilocks" or "Angel-Face" and gave her candies and hair-ribbons, the latter were less flattering. They had other names for her: "Cat!!", "Tattle Tell!", "Spoil Sport!"—to name but a few.

The class-teacher had been taken in at first by the big violet eyes and the quivering lips and many times she had punished the wrong child for talking in class, spilling ink on someone's books or throwing little paperballs about. But now she simply muttered "Spoiled Brat!" under her breath, whilst throwing one of Mrs Smith's frequent complaint-letters into the waste-paper-basket. For Suzan's mother was firmly convinced that her child was an Angel-Child and that all others were just jealous of her sweetness and beauty. "They are not fit to teach such a sweet and sensitive child! How her tender mind must suffer, having to mix with those rude and unfeeling brutes!" she would storm, showering the Angel with kisses and taking her out for a treat "to make up for it."

The least enthusiastic about Suzy was her cousin Peter, aged eleven. At that age boys have not much use for little girls anyway, especially when they are forever well-behaved! But Peter's case was exceptionally severe—"Angel Child? My foot! A pain in the neck, that's what she is! To have her for a blood-relation is a disgrace!" He would have been more outspoken, had his mother not given him one of her famous stern looks. Though secretely she had to agree with her son, ever since Suzan's visit one year ago.

Mr. Smith suffered from chronic "nervous disorder of the stomach" and that was not very surprising either, for to be a salesman in a big warehouse with mainly female customers and to be married to Mr Smith would have proved too much for the strongest man! Mr Smith was a mild little man and his wife was one of those buxom, horse-faced women hailing from a family of domineering females, so she thought it best to deliver her husband personally at the sea-side health resort, where he was supposed to take a long rest from business and married life. Suzan was to stay with Aunt Polly, Peter's mother. Actually all three of them stayed for seven days. It took Mrs. Smith that long to find out if her darling would be happy there!

Aunt Polly was absolutely charmed by little Suzan. And when Peter started complaining that she spoiled his books and disturbed his studies and that it had really been her fault when he had spilled his milk over Mrs. Smith's silk frock because she had kicked him under the table—well, his mother just did not believe him. "Such a darling little angel? You should be ashamed of yourself, blaming a helpless little girl for your own misdeeds! I shall not give you any more pocket-money until you have apologized to your cousin!" This of course Peter would not do and Mrs. Smith called him "that wicked little boy", when referring to him. Strangely though Suzan's father gave him half a crown one evening, laughing a little nervously and asking him not to tell his aunt!

The angel stealthily crept behind him and gave him a good push . . .

Next day they left for the health resort. Mrs. Smith tearfully took leave from her Angel-Child and told her several times to beware of "that wicked little boy"—loud enough for Peter and his mother to hear. She finally tore herself away and then things happened fast!

Peter was busy filling his pen when the Angel stealthily crept behind him and gave him a good push! The inkpot fell down of course, spilling the ink on the newly upholstered armchair and ending up in a nice little black pool on the carpet, Mrs. Miller's pride—. Now Peter's mother was very house-proud and he did like her things neat and tidy. Seven days of Mrs. Smith's company had left her slightly irritable. Besides that, the final remarks about "that wicked little boy" were still ringing in her ears when she entered the living-room. She took the situation in with one glance and advanced towards the poor boy like Nemesis, the Greek goddess of retributive justice. In vain did he proclaim his innocence—one look at the Angel Child, so helpless and sweet with big violet eyes full of tears, long fluttering lashes and quivering cherry lips—he had no chance! He just managed to dodge behind the table when his mother tried to grab him. Down crashed the cut-glass bowl, a treasured family possession! Seeing the remains shattered all over the floor, together with the inkpot, did nothing to improve Mrs. Miller's temper and had Peter not done some fast leg-work he would have got the whacking of his life! Unfortunately he slipped on the highly polished floor, taking with him grandmother's photograph when he tried to steady himself on the little side-table by the door. The glass broke, the fancy lace coverlet tore and Peter cut his knee badly.

It must be admitted that Suzan greatly aided Peter's fall by putting her dainty little foot in his way when he was trying to make a dash for the door. Had Mrs. Miller looked at little Suzy now—she would have been very surprised indeed! There was nothing angelic about the child anymore, the "dew-covered violets" had a certain gleam and the pathetic quiver of the sweet rosy lips had definitely given way to a satisfied smirk. Salome could not have looked much different when the head of John the Baptist was presented to her on a platter! But alas!—Mrs. Miller was busy picking up the various fragments and she looked so angry that Peter thought it better not to ask for sympathy but to disappear as fast as his aching knee permitted.

That day Peter did not turn up for lunch. Mrs. Miller found a note in his room, pinned on his pillow. It read: "I am leaving for good! Don't try to make me come back as I shan't! Anyway not as long as that female is in the house. I am going away where there is justice and fair play!!!" His mother felt slightly uneasy. Could it be that he had been right after all in blaming Suzan? But one look at the little girl, sitting at the table and smiling sweetly up to her re-assured her. Soon Grandmother rang up to inform them that Peter had arrived safely, so Mrs. Miller decided to put the whole incident out of her mind for the time being.

In the afternoon little Fred who lived next door came over for tea. Strange, thought Mrs. Miller, he did not seem to like Suzy very much. However, he was polite enough so she did not worry about it unduly. She was just busy handing the cake around when she suddenly received a violent kick against the shin! She cried out with pain and very nearly upset the tea-pot. She shot an angry glance at Fred, but the boy was in the act of raising the tea-cup to his lips and since he had not spilled any it could have been Suzan only! The Angel sat there, too stunned to move, flaming red and guilt written all over her face. Suddenly Mrs. Miller understood everything! The incident with the spilled milk over the silk frock came back to her mind. Obviously this had been supposed to be a repetition of it and the kick had been aimed at Fred to make him the victim. Slowly Aunt Polly got up and very slowly she went round the table towards Suzy. She grabbed her arm firmly and piloted her out of the room. There the Angel Child got

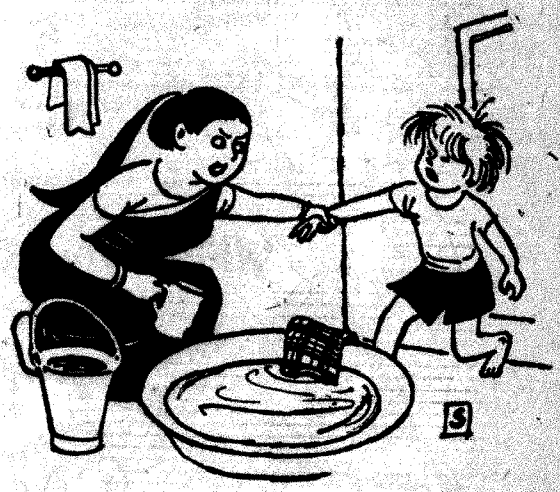
Young Mothers' QUESTIONS



By PEG

1. Why do some children dislike taking the daily bath?

THERE may be several reasons. Some children dislike it either because the mother or ayah — especially the latter who may be careless — pours water that is too hot. Their skin is more sensitive than that of adults, so they may find a certain temperature unbearable, whereas an adult may not find it to be so.

Or in the children's little brains a strange idea may have entered—that very hot water poured on them would kill them, as boiling water kills pests like bed-bugs. This idea appears silly to grown-ups, but social workers in Children's Clinics have found out how the working of children's minds in such a direction is responsible for their antipathy to bathing in hot water. Gently talking to them about this matter can bring good results. No scolding, please!

Other causes which have been found responsible for this attitude are: the bathroom may be badly ventilated, and it may become too stuffy as the process of bathing continues. Or on the other hand, it may have a window or ventilator through which a draught comes to make the children shiver uncomfortably on cold days.

Some children may dread the soap going into their eyes. Or they may resent over-vigorous scrubbing. These objections can be annihilated by allowing them to bathe and dry themselves under adult supervision. Children like to do things rather than to sit steadily on a stool when their mother or ayah bathes them.

There may be other psychological reasons. They may dislike bathing as it interferes with their play or their inclination to eat or sleep at that time.

2. Why does one's daughter dream repeatedly of snakes?

Fright may weigh on a girl's mind as she may have come recently to live in a quiet, woody place—supposed to be infested by snakes—as a boarder in a school or due to the sudden transfer of her father. This dream is more likely to repeat itself if during waking hours she is not permitted to express her fears.

The best way to make her get rid of the fear is to explain to her what precautions have been taken to prevent reptiles from entering the building. Secondly, it should be explained to her that snakes are not always dangerous or poisonous. Most of them never attack unless they are provoked, and only a small percentage of them are poisonous! Once the wrong notion of all snakes being deadly is driven from her conscious mind, the subconscious will stop picturing them before her mind's eye when she is asleep.

Or the snake in the dream may symbolise a sly, apparently quiet person who is at the same time as deadly as the cobra. A dreaded tongue may also take the form of a serpent in her dreams. A honey-tongued woman who loves to carry tales and misrepresent people may take that form, especially if the girl is not allowed to expose her (woman) during waking hours. As soon as an understanding, loving adult explains the symbolisation to the girl, the dream will not repeat itself.

3. Does your neighbour annoy you by haggling with the hawkers when your baby is asleep?

Yes, she may be the haggling type! But there is no need to quarrel with her in an attempt to improve her. Nor should you be such a martyr as to leave her at liberty to disturb your baby.

The best way to set her right is to refuse to appreciate her skill in bargaining with the poor men. I say "poor" because in most cases such women dare not pit their wits against a strong party. They have an inverted inferiority complex that tempts them to show off their capacity only when they are sure of a triumph against a weak party.

Suggest to her, jokingly, that she might reap a greater advantage by trying her bargaining skill on her husband's boss or her tip-top mercers or jewellers. A subtle remark, preferably made in the presence of somebody whom she wants to impress with her amiable qualities, will bring her to her senses.

4. Is your son in the habit of asking too many questions?

If the questions he asks are likely to increase his knowledge and understanding, he should be encouraged with the correct answers. He may not understand intricate details, but he is sure to understand at least a part of the information you give him. Never ridicule him by saying that he has not the brains to understand such matters. Give him the elementary information, and then tell him gently that you will explain the matter in greater details in the future.

If you are not sure of the answer to his question, you may tell him plainly that you will consult either a book or somebody who is likely to know the answer. It is better to make him wait for the correct answer rather than to give him a wrong answer and bluff him. If he is bluffed and finds out the truth later, he may lose his confidence in you.

On the other hand, if you encourage him to refer to a dictionary or encyclopaedia or a librarian, he is likely to learn to educate himself. This is better than spoon-feeding him.

The more intelligent he is, the more eager will he be for information. So encourage him to ask questions. Of course, this does not mean that he should be encouraged to ask inquisitive or rude questions, when he goes to his friends, neighbours or relatives. With a little bit of effort he can be made to differentiate between sheer inquisitiveness and genuine search for information.

5. What will help your daughter to have a clear complexion?

My grandmother used to say that a clear complexion can be preserved by a cream made of bullock's bile and ostrich egg beaten up with fresh milk! But since this preparation is as much beyond the reach of most city-dwellers, as are costly cosmetics, the following is recommended to be used even when there are pimples on the cheeks:—

Let her splash the face with luke warm water. Then apply the paste of gram flour mixed with fresh unboiled milk. The milk may be substituted by water if the skin be very oily.

Finally, she should splash cold water on the face. That will stimulate the skin and indirectly help her to keep the skin free of pimples.

Healthy exercise in the open air, as well as, proper rest are also essential for a clear complexion. Avoiding over-spiced diet, and adding juicy fruits and leafy uncooked vegetables like lettuce, radish leaves, celery and parsley, can produce marked results. Boiled vegetables are recommended, but fried greasy stuff is to be avoided. Milk, butter, eggs, carrots, cabbage, drumsticks, green peas, spinach, tomatoes and ripe fruits like mangoes and papaya which contain Vitamin A are valuable. But if fruits and vegetables are too costly, sprouted pulses can be substituted.

Constipation is to be avoided. Pimples are generally due to impaired digestion. So anything that helps digestion clears the skin. Drinking six to eight glasses of plain water daily helps one in this respect and indirectly improves the skin.

the first and best spanking she ever had! She then made her stand in a corner and Fred enjoyed his tea enormously, eating Suzy's share as well. Ten minutes later the shock wore off and the reaction set in. Suzan howled and screamed, not so much out of shame as anger.

After tea Mrs. Miller sent Fred home and Suzan to her room while she herself set out to Grandma's house. There Peter and his mother had a long talk together which cannot be repeated here because Peter was actually sitting on Mummy's lap, being smothered with kisses and lapping up sweet pet-names — a fact which no self-respecting boy of ten likes to be made public!

In the evening Mrs. Smith arrived. She had not been able to stay separated from her darling! What passed between those two ladies better remains unknown as well, but at half past ten Mrs. Smith collected her Angel Child and proceeded towards home, not without consoling "the poor mal-treated baby" first and darting venomous looks at Peter and his mother.

Well, that was the end of the Angel Child! Her father dared to put his foot down when he returned from his cure and Mrs. Smith very nearly had a nervous breakdown after Suzy had left for a good boarding school. The headmistress there stood no nonsense and it may be hoped that The Angel Child will turn out to be quite nice and normal after all, being out of her mother's reach!

ORCHID

gave her a long unwinking look. A stream of moist wonder glittered in his eyes.

"You didn't tell me so long."

"I thought it useless."

"I would have gained if you did."

"Gained, do you mean?"

"Yes, I would then know that you don't think me crazy."

"I do not, believe me."

A slice of green turf was all that separated P. Basu and Karuna. A shadow fell on the patch.

"You are here, what is the matter?" asked Gunakar.

The language of the query made her laugh. The soft petals of orchid trembled again as she smiled.

"What brings you here?" she asked.

"Have you forgotten?"

"I don't need it."

"You dont need the money?" A rude surprise hung tremulously between the stiffened brows.

"No", said Karuna.

Gunakar's head languished to a bend. But his sympathetic heart made an effort to perk up. He muttered,

"How do you mean to carry on?"

"We will make it go somehow. Perhaps that job of growing pumpkin and potatoes."

And, amazing all, P. Basu snapped in,

"O yes, some job must be found."

"Then I am going", said Gunakar.

"Thank you."

"You are really a magnificent orchid. What's its name, Calanthes Karunaina, isn't it?"

Yes please". Karuna laughed

REMINISCENCES OF THE CHITTAGONG REVOLT

By SACHIN DUTT

T was the fateful day of 30th August, 1931, a little before sundown. The veil of darkness was spreading over the Railway grounds. The football final was just over in the maidan, popularly known as "Nizam Paltan." The President of the Winning Town Club Khan Bahadur Asanulla, a redoubtable Inspector of Police, was visibly jubilant. The trophies were distributed. Prominent District officials and non-officials including a few Europeans were present near the President's dais. There was an armed police cordon since the political situation was grave, and there was suspicion and terror in view of the Chittagong Armoury Raid and consequent troubles. Those present, however, focussed their attention on the trophy and the winners. The Khan Bahadur was receiving lusty felicitations. Just about the moment, from the thick of the crowd a pistol shot rang out. It was deadly and fatal! The Inspector dropped dead, hit by the bullet. The moment of joy turned into a scene of tragedy. Its suddenness was benumbing. All ran in confusion. The police at once closed upon the assailant, — the boy who was fast running across the field and was all along firing behind the remaining bullets. Those were extremely terrific moments !

A boy of 14, Haripada Bhattacharyya was caught red-handed, it was stated, with two revolvers. He was put to inhuman torture, right from the moment of capture through dragging upto the lock-up. Maximum pressure was put upon him to extort any information, but to no effect. In his teens, he was a death-defying boy of unmatched determination. The police could realise, however, that Haripada was none other than one of the many young rebel recruits of the then absconding leaders of the Armoury Raid—Surya Sen and Nirmal Sen. The first raid case was then under hearing before a Special Tribunal. It was learnt that the under-trial prisoners inside Chittagong jail had been overjoyed at the incident ending with the life of a 'most unwanted person' in their eyes and condemned for severe tortures upon the revolutionaries. The Inspector was then the Special Officer in the District Intelligence Branch.

DRAMATIC DEVELOPMENTS

Dramatic developments followed. The Police Inspector's murder almost immediately gave a signal, or easy handle to the police to launch an attack on the townspeople, particularly on the Hindu residents. The authorities of those days somehow formed an impression that the "terrorist movement" was mainly Hindu sponsored. Stray assaults commenced on the pedestrians in the nightfall, looting of a few shops and burning of some residential quarters (of Hindus) during the night in the outskirts of the town took place.

Overnight, the Police and other top officials, aided by the non-official Europeans hit upon an organised plan of what appeared to be an 'open reprisal' on Chittagong's Hindu population. Firstly, there was a complete roundup of the political suspects in the town. They were all detained in the town police station (Kotwali) lock-up and put to severe beatings with the evident purpose of eliciting any information regarding the raid case, absconding leaders etc.

Citizens passed a sleepless night. Next morning, the whole town awoke to a scene of muzzled awe and rumours of all kinds. All city shops and business premises remained closed. In the trail of the dead police officer's body being taken to the burial ground in a large procession commenced indiscriminate looting and burning of Hindu shops and houses. In the very heart of the town, at Anderkilla, shops were set fire to, while the police sergeants supplied petrol to the miscreants. The whole town was in the grip of unbriddled loot and arson. It was a reign of terror and oppression upon a section of the population. Sufferers and eye-witnesses who survive till today may recall the incidents with shocking sighs.

ATTACK ON EDITOR

Evidently to muzzle the press, a party of police and non-official Europeans had, in the previous midnight (night of Inspector's murder) swooped on Chittagong's Bengali daily "Panchajannya" office, attacked the Assistant Editor Hiren Chowdhury (in absence of the Editor Ambika Ch. Das) causing bleeding injuries on his head, and broke down the flat machine, with sledge hammers and other weapons, leading to the closure of the paper.

It may be mentioned here that a couple of days earlier, an Anglo-Indian Calcutta paper wrote a short leader charging this Chittagong daily with active sympathy for the "terrorists" and subversive movement. Revolutionary outrages were taking place elsewhere too in Bengal. The local Europeans had been, as it were, waiting for an opportunity to satisfy their grudge against this paper. And the opportunity came at last for them to teach at least one paper near at hand and its editor, a lesson.

While the town was going through such grim ordeal, it was by sheer luck, as it appeared at that time, that the Divisional Commissioner W. H. Nelson returned from Rangamati the same evening from his tour in the Chittagong Hill Tracts. Promptly, he had a stock of the situation and took action. At his instance, the Section 144 Cr P.C. and curfew order from dusk to dawn were promulgated and thus the open loot, assault, and arson were to some extent brought under control.

The scene of organised horror was then shifted to the country-side. Armed Police and Gurkha troops headed by the Additional Superintendent of Police carried Haripada, the murderer of the Inspector, hand-cuffed and bound by a rope and under merciless torture, all the way to the villages where for three days a reign of terror prevailed. They moved in a mad orgy of indescribable violence raiding all the houses of the under-trial young men of the Armoury Raid Case, as also of the 'wanted' persons and the suspects. All the inmates of these premises and families were put to brutal pillage; cash, jewellery and every costly movable thing they could lay their hands on, was looted; whatever else fell in their front was broken, smashed and ransacked, and lastly, some of the residential houses were not only burned down but even the earthen plinths were dug out and desecrated with the dirtiest performances.

The homesteads of Haripada Bhattacharjee at Howla village and of those others, two at Saroatali (including that of the late Prasanna Kumar Sen, well-known leader of Congress and also a pleader, a son of whose was a prominent political suspect) were literally razed to the ground. Even today, after a lapse of some thirty-two years, I shudder to recall the terrific shock at what we saw.

Not only these. The police and military forces were let loose upon the open high schools in the area and the boys, even teachers, were bitterly attacked and assaulted. Barbarity could hardly have a parallel! One would rarely come across such indiscriminate raping of the entire countryside.

COLLECTIVE FINE

Meanwhile, a few prominent citizens met in their anxiety discussing what could be the ways of protection of the poor and innocent people against this organised and officially sponsored atrocity. Life and property was not at all safe. Collective fines to the tune of fifteen lakh rupees had meanwhile been imposed in different areas on grounds of their alleged harbouring of the raid case absconders. Loss of property in the riots and loots amounted to several lakhs. It was decided, at last, to inform Deshapriya J. M. Sen Gupta, the then Mayor of Calcutta and B.P.C.C. chief, requesting his immediate arrival at Chittagong.

Accordingly, Mr. Mahim Chandra Das, Chittagong Congress leader and Kaviraj Jatin Rakshit left for Calcutta carrying a first hand report of the happenings. They met Sen Gupta and Subhas Babu and told them all. At Sen Gupta's instance, a public meeting of the citizens of Calcutta was held strongly condemning the Chittagong outrage, as also the authorities for failure to control the situation. A Chittagong Enquiry Committee was formed with Sen Gupta as its Chairman.

Jatindra Mohan expressed his readiness to come immediately to Chittagong. The news almost unnerved Chittagong's officialdom. Next day, the Commissioner informed. Tripura Charan Chaudhury, the local leader, that immediate withdrawal of the police and military from the villages had been ordered and restoration of peace was assured. The officials proposed postponement of Sen Gupta's visit. But it was too late. Jatindra Mohan was on his way along with colleagues. They included Deshapran B. N. Sasmal, Prof. Nripendra Chandra Bandyopadhyaya, Dr. J. M. Das Gupta, Maulana Akram Khan (now in Pakistan) with whom a non-official Chittagong Disturbances Enquiry Committee had been formed in Calcutta.

Sen Gupta and party were to arrive at Chittagong in a day or two. The first notable episode was interesting. As the mail train from Calcutta with Jatindra Mohan and party arrived at Pahartali, Chittagong, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate met Sen Gupta in his compartment and communicated to him a request to detrain there and meet the District Magistrate who was waiting near the station. Sen Gupta was coming with a painful heart. He was not prepared for such a situation. Out came forthwith the Bengal leader's sharp reply, "Well, how do you expect me to meet the Magistrate here unprepared and before meeting my own people. You may, however, ask the Magistrate to prepare and give evidence at my enquiry committee. Thank you." Evidently, the redoubtable S.D.O. went back to his master. The District Magistrate must have been disillusioned that Sen Gupta was a difficult man, the leader who in the very soil of Chittagong about a decade back had provided many a sleepless night and nerve-break to European and British officials during the B.O.C. and A. B. Railway strikes heroically conducted by him.

Within a short time, the train steamed in at Chittagong station with Deshapriya Jatindra Mohan and party heralding a moment of relief for the sufferers and foreboding almost a 'Judgment Day' for the powers that ruled.

Soon after his arrival, Sen Gupta glanced through the detailed stories of the Chittagong incidents and Police atrocities in Chittagong town and in the villages since 30th August, the day of Asanullah murder. He heard the accounts also from the prominent citizens who met him. He formed his own first hand conclusion. He gave me a press interview in which he declared his considered view to the effect that: "THE CHITTAGONG INCIDENTS WERE NOT COMMUNAL RIOTS, AS GIVEN OUT IN THE OFFICIAL ACCOUNTS AND TO THE GOVERNMENT, BUT PURE AND SIMPLE OUTRAGES PERPETRATED BY OFFICIALS AND ON THEIR INCITEMENT AND INDIFFERENCE, AND ACTIVELY AIDED BY NON-OFFICIAL EUROPEANS." This was the purport. He added that he was going to expose the worst ever terrorism committed on the innocent people which he and his colleagues from Calcutta would presently enquire into.

NIGHTMARE HAUNTING

The Collector was then staying in a part of the Commissioner's bungalow, for security reasons. In those days, officials, particularly Europeans were going extremely panicky being in fear of any attack. "Revolution" was in the air and 'terrorists' at large. These were haunting them like nightmares. Every European official or non-official of high rank (like officers in European mercantile firms of which there were many in Chittagong) used to carry loaded pistols on his person and often kept the weapon right on the office table near at hand for use at any emergency. They would see or grant interviews to strictly selected persons, very familiar, mostly on previous appointment.

Commissioner Nelson, wiser and more sober by nature, to our knowing, held a different view of the Chittagong happenings which cast a shadow not only all over the district, but over the country and considerably brought down British prestige.

The town enquiry over, Sen Gupta and Prof. Nripen Banerji (so far as I remember now) proceeded to the affected villages, 10 to 15 miles in the interior. It was the rainy season. The village paths were all mud and slush; some places were even under knee-deep water. The dearly beloved "idol of the people" went on walking with his colleagues defying all the difficulties, even at places wading through mud and water. He refused use of the palanquin that was kept ready for him and Nripen Babu. Motor vehicles were not in use in those days on rural roads, particularly in that weather. He moved from door to door visiting every suffering family, spoke to as many of the men and women as possible, and every victim of police-cum-military vandalism.

Nripen Babu, sentimental by nature was rising very often to the height of his excitement. In one of such moments, Prof. Banerji declared: There is a Nemesis in history for every sin!

Quietly and determinedly, Sen Gupta was looking through the atrocities and sufferings writ large on the face of the vast multitude. He was all along unusually grave and grim. The common people saw Jatindra Mohan so near them and were overwhelmed with his sympathy for them. He consoled them and assured that redress would not be late in coming. The very foundation of the British Raj would be shaken very soon.

Sen Gupta and party passed a couple of days in the villages. He was very much touched and stirred in the depths of his soul. He was telling those near him that this outrage was probably God-ordained. It proved to the hilt how the British Authorities themselves were creating and fanning the communal virus between the Hindus and the Muslims. But the part played by the European citizens was most despicable in Chittagong. Sen Gupta recalled Late Lala Lajpat Rai's historic utterance, "These outrages would prove to be the last nails to the coffin of the British Raj." Lalaji said so when he received injuries by Police lathi-charge while leading an anti-Simon procession at Lahore a few years back.

Prior to his departure for Calcutta, Sen Gupta met the Commissioner and told him about his thorough enquiry into the incidents. He requested Nelson to do justice as a right thinking Britisher. Sen Gupta's words had perhaps carried weight with the Commissioner as was seen subsequently.

CHALLENGE TO GOVERNMENT

Immediately on return to Calcutta, Deshapriya at a large public meeting in the Town Hall, Calcutta, threw a most emphatic "challenge" to the Government of Bengal, to disprove the conclusion of his enquiry committee that held the District Magistrate and police mainly responsible for the reign of terror in Chittagong. With his thundering voice, at the highest pitch, Sen Gupta declared, he would not rest till the Chittagong wrongs were redeemed. He demanded redress and compensation to all the sufferers. After all, the British regime must be ended, he demanded.

In a few weeks' time, the non-official Chittagong Enquiry Committee's report was published ("Advance" press). The Indian press and public opinion were very much agitated over the details and findings that shocked the world! But the Government kept mum over Sen Gupta's challenge as also on the report of the enquiry committee led by him.

Meanwhile, an Official Enquiry was held into the Chittagong incidents by Divisional Commissioner Nelson and the I. G. of Police, Bengal. They recorded statements of officials and non-officials, the latter including eye-witnesses and sufferers most of whom had given evidence before the non-official enquiry. The trend of both the enquiries appeared to have been almost identical.

The whole country was keenly awaiting to know the reaction of the Government after the official enquiry was over as also the results thereof. The Government continued to maintain absolute silence. The official enquiry report had never seen the light of the day. Anyway, it was anticipated that the Government was moving in its own way. Some drastic steps seemed to be in the offing. They gave obvious indication of the Government policy.

S. P. SHOOTS HIMSELF

Some months passed. One morning the city of Calcutta, and for that matter, the whole country, read the news that Chittagong's Additional S.P., B. J. Shooter, I.P., was no more! He killed himself. The body was reported to have been found in a pool of blood in the United Service Club, Calcutta (presently converted into the Geological Survey of India Office). His revolver was found lying beside the body, it was also stated. It might be recalled that Shooter had led the reign of terror in Chittagong town and villages, referred to above, and was the 'strong man' of Chittagong Police.

In a few days' time, it was seen further that the Collector of Chittagong, A. H. Kemm, I.C.S., was leaving the district with bag and baggage. He left for his native land via Akyab and Rangoon; and why he did not pass through Calcutta as usual, was best known to himself. It was rumoured that Kemm was asked to retire from service. All the rest of it followed!

Kemm's exit from Chittagong and the tragic end of the young Police Chief, Shooter cast a spell over the sober section of the European community as could be sensed generally.

It was further found that some police officers of different ranks in Chittagong were either suspended or transferred from Chittagong. The overall morale of the services seemed to a large extent to have been restored.

So many things were happening. Nothing was officially known. It was later learnt that Government took a balanced view of the findings of both the official and non-official enquiries, and out of inescapable conclusions, took some actions by way of passing censure on those mainly responsible for the Chittagong outrages; some were asked to retire or resign; and departmental actions were taken in certain cases.

Meanwhile, Chittagong events were having country-wide repercussions openly and beneath the surface. Jatindra Nath Rakshit (Kaviraj), one of the most active youth figures of the time, was said to be having contacts with the Chittagong Armoury Raid's supreme commander Surya Sen, then absconding. Rakshit met the Congress leaders and Working Committee leaders and apprised them of the situation.

J. M. Sen Gupta was also preparing for his London visit. He had not been keeping good health. In addition to the rigours of jail life he had to undertake the onerous responsibilities of the triple leadership of the Bengal Congress, and the Legislature Swarajya Party as also the Corporation of Calcutta after Deshabandhu Chittaranjan's passing away. The Chittagong worries added a further strain. Because of so many difficulties, Sen Gupta declined the offer of the Presidentship of the Indian National Congress which, according to his wish,

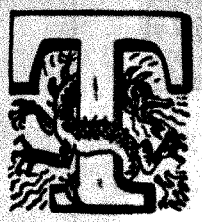
WHEN THE GODS COME

By PADMALAYA DAS



THE drums called from a distance . . . . restless, insistent, they drew me, eager to watch the evening worship of the Mother Goddess. The sound brought us in a wide arc from the brightly-illuminated station area through tree-darkened depths across a winding road to the pavilion. Colourfully dressed women and children sat on steel chairs, the menfolk stood. We stopped at the edge, I stood on tip-toe, and peered over shoulders.

There she was—the Mother—in all her glorious splendour:

"Luminous like the moon is her face,
And a sight of it charms away many a woe.
Her hair hangs like Sivji's serpents,
Her eyes are the envy of the lotus and gazelle," sang Guru Govind Singh.

The huge drum which had boomed its message across the distance was deafening at such proximity. Two smaller ones punctuated the pauses, and two trousered boys in vests (it was hot in that tarpaulin-covered enclosure) beat frenziedly, yet rhythmically, on big brass gongs. Another young man in vest and dhoti danced to the maddening rhythm, waving a large clay incense-burner in each hand. The fragrant smoke whirled, circled, plunged, rose in swift spirals, tracing the movements of the seemingly possessed dancer.

The flurrying, eddying smoke wove a flimsy veil of fragrance before the "Giver of All Bliss." Faster and faster he went. Fortissimo. The music rose to dizzy heights . . . . . and stopped. "Mother!" a cry rang out in the sudden stillness, and he flung himself at her feet.

It was tremendous, that adoration of the Mother. It shook one to the depths. Sir William Jones was so impressed by her beauty and mystical significance that he composed a fervent hymn to the goddess:

"O Durga, thou hast deign'd to shield Man's feeble virtue with celestial might,
Gliding from yon jasper field.
And, on a lion borne, hast brav'd the sight;
For when the demon Vice thy realms defied,
And arm'd with death each arched horn,
Thy golden lance, O goddess mountain-born,
Touched but the pest — he roared and died."

On the fringe, where light dissolved into darkness, a blind beggar sat, his bowl before him, his little helper curled asleep by his side. A smile played on his parted lips, and he looked rapt, as he gazed with unseeing eyes towards the source of light and joy. And peace stole in, parting the curtain of clamour.

From time immemorial the Mother Goddess has been worshipped in Orissa, but not in the form of clay images during Dusserah. On Vijaya Dasami day, people of different castes venerate their professional implements and weapons, and householders and students, their books and writing materials, invoking Durga's blessings for success and prosperity.

The introduction of clay images of the goddess in Cuttack probably goes back to 200 years. It could not have been very much earlier, as the oldest reference to the modern Bengali form of Durga Mahishamardini (attended by Lakshmi, Saraswati, Karttikeya and Ganesha) is found in the Chandimangala of the 16th century.

Initiated by a few Bengali zamindars of the area, over the years it has become very much a part of the city's autumn festival. But with a striking departure—only about half the images are of Durga. In 1960, for instance, 51 were of the goddess and 43 of Siva while 11 tableaux depicted different myths and legends.

* * * *

Take a ragged row of endless rickshaws and raucously impatient automobiles, mix in a mass of milling pedestrians, beat in the boom of drums, the clash of gongs, the wail of pipes, sprinkle with sparkling illuminations, pour in the cacophony of magnified music, season with a gay holiday spirit—and you have Cuttack in carnival at Dusserah time.

The entire populace seems out in festive attire, on foot or wheels to see the sights. Vintage models have been dusted, coaxed and pushed into the medley. (Often to stop exasperatingly right before a pandal, earning sizzling epithets from drivers held up in the rear). It requires Himalayan patience and jawan-like fortitude for the man at the wheel to do the rounds by car, and innumerable policemen to keep traffic on the move, however sluggishly, in the one-way traffic areas. You would have scarcely taken in the entrancing spectacle at some pandal before the law poked in its head and yelled above the ceaseless roar to "MOVE ON PLEASE!" And then again you miss the best ones which seem inevitably to be found in the narrowest gullies, like Budhi Thakurani, where, if a car managed to squeeze in, pedestrians will be well-nigh plastered against the walls.

So a cycle-rickshaw is the answer. The driver knows it too and rates go rocketing. But Dusserah is for everyone, you'll agree (at least after the count-down commences and is clinched at half). Nothing like night-time, you will be told. And after you've returned unscathed, "How many did you see?" they will ask you, and, "The best?" Notes will be compared with gusto, and arguments for and against will cleave the air. But statistics apart, I've seen many a magnificent specimen of plastic art. And one cannot help thinking of the chiselled creations of the master craftsmen of Konarak whose descendants have now come down to moulding malleable clay—and yet with what artistry!

Unhampered by tradition, imagination takes wings and the tableaux vary in theme and treatment. For instance, in one of the many of Siva or Mahadeva, the consort of Durga is depicted riding his bull in terror-striking stance in the act of destroying a wicked-looking demon, who is incongruously astride a zebra of all things! Naturally, the poor animal from Africa plunged with tail erect, in frozen panic. A delightful departure, palpably motivated by a certain recalcitrant participant of the saw-dust ring parade (the city had sustained the show for a month).

There was an adaptation of the Konarak wheel with Siva and Parvati as the central motif; the famous panel of elephants figured in another; and baby Krishna killed Kaliya, the terrible serpent, in a natural setting over a tank with lotuses (authentic) and neon-lights. There were other mythological groups, all in clay, and glittering with paint, tinsel, satin and nylon too.

At one place, almost invariably, models of top-notch political leaders from the state-level to the 2Ks are displayed (shades of Madame Tussaud's!), besides representations of some of the burning topics of the day. Elsewhere social evils like the dowry system were skilfully dealt with.

There were puppet shows as well, showing women performing ordinary domestic chores, and grandma dandling the baby. I saw a small girl in a passing car solemnly saluting one of these—obviously she had been told they were going out to see the gods.

During the day. Happy crowds of city and village folk. Vendors had their way. A little balloon-seller took time off to lick his ice-cream cone. Paper toys. Clay toys. Pea-nuts. Baar majaa. A man with a harmonium and plastic voice, selling songs—5 nP. or 10 nP. per booklet—politics or romance—take your choice. Cars demanded right of way, carrying loads their designers had never dreamed of. Pedi-cab drivers panted with sometimes a family of six or seven crammed in one vehicle—mamma and papa on the seat with the younger two squirming on their laps and the older ones at their feet gazing wide-eyed at everything. Cool drinks. Flutes. Excitement. Joy.

Not satisfied with fleeting glimpses. I sat down one morning to gaze my fill at the Chaudhury Bazaar pandal. It has a unique feature. Since some years now, instead of the usual medha (mandorla) of tinsel, paper and sola, it has one made entirely of Cuttack's famous silver filigree with an intricate design of flowers, leaves, peacocks and butterflies. Against that elegant background was a superb life-size image of the goddess, flanked by small exquisite images of Lakshmi and Saraswati on one side and a chubby Ganesha and handsome Karttikeya on the other in resplendent raiment. All the ornaments and some of the accoutrements (including the demon's) were made of silver filigree. The Mother's benign look and serene smile radiated an aura of boundless affection and compassion.

Far away against autumn's limpid blue an eagle wheeled. On the river bank dragon-flies flitted.

The corpulent carpenter said, "Why didn't you come to see our debi?" (Carpenter Street has one every year.) I mumbled something and watched. He carefully folded the pink Benarasi silk saree and placed it in the basket piled with the velvet and tinsel jewellery. In the distance drums spoke. More images were being brought for immersion. He put the nylon hair on top.

A little boy laughed and capered, holding aloft the dripping head of Karttikeya. Someone chased him half-heartedly. He fled grinning with his booty. A small girl lingered for a last look, holding her father's hand. Gently he said, "Come child, Dusserah is over."

MAN AND THE MAID

and you have been lying to me these thirty-two years."

Punni giggles over his words, presses close to Lalaji, and says "Ah-ha! Lalaji how you amuse!"

At a wink from Lalaji, Punni staggers towards Hotlagar with open arms. She is drunk. She is about to throw her arms around Hotlagar, when Hotlagar knocks her down to the lap of Lalaji. She screams in the darkness.

Lalaji too is frightened and looks up at Hotlagar. The fellow seems to have gone mad! Like a wild buffalo, he rages—this docile youngman of two and thirty years, who has waited and waited patiently all his life. "You lied to me, you lied," repeats Hotlagar.

Lalaji takes fright and hides himself behind Punni. The wild buffalo is advancing towards him.

But suddenly Hotlagar turns round and moves away, raging. He has changed his mind. Now, he will go his own way—straight eastward!

Sure! she has not gone far—the girl who needs a support, a companion, a man to fill up the void of her lonely life.

REMINISCENCES OF CHITTAGONG REVOLT

was given to his most esteemed friend Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel (1931).

Sen Gupta embarked on a visit to the U.K. mainly for the purpose of recouping health. But, the smouldering fire of the Chittagong happenings was yet burning within him. While in London, he availed himself of the opportunity of addressing the Members of the British Parliament on the Indian situation, and in that context, on the very soil of India's Imperial Masters, Sengupta strongly exposed the Britishers' game in Chittagong outrages and reiterated the same challenge to the British Government.

But, the imperialist's power grip was ever ready to silence the leaders of the freedom movement. On return to India Jatindramohan was placed under arrest and removed to Ranchi where, under long detention, he passed away (July, 1933). He was only 53. The great leader lost vitality hour by hour, yet dreamt of his motherland's liberation and died with his mission unfulfilled. When Deshapriya's sacred ashes were carried to Chittagong for interment in the ground of Jatramohan Sen Hall—in the sacred soil of his birthplace—thousands stood by in silent tears and paid homage to their dearest leader (July 30, 1933).

It is worth recalling how the then Collector A. S. Hands, I.C.S. granted special permission for the procession in memory of Sen Gupta's ashes in the prevailing restrictions under Sec. 144 at Chittagong, on the present writer's personal request over the telephone. It is also no less noteworthy that both Hands and the Police Superintendent Cleary, I.P., waited at the foot of the Court Hill as the procession was passing and took off their hats. This was like a true Englishman who knows to honour a hero ("A. B. Patrika" report, August 2, 1933).

NINE MONTHS in a South Indian Prison

By BIRENDRA CHANDRA SEN

IT happened in the year 1914 when we least expected it, just about a month before the first great war broke out. The politicals in Port Blair were causing headache to the then Government of India. One prisoner had died in the hospital and another committed suicide. There were constant strikes and hunger strike. In spite of all the precautions the local authorities could take, news leaked out constantly. The Indian press took up the matter in right earnest, there was great excitement in the central legislature. A general concern for the welfare of the politicals was manifest all over the land, and even the British Parliament moved. The Central Government had to depute two of its topmost officials—Sir Pardey Sukis, the Director-General of the Indian Medical Services, and Sir Reginald Craddock, the then Home Secretary of Government of India—for on-the-spot enquiry. To smooth matters most of the prisoners were sent out, but in a few months' time the entire group of young men struck work on the ground that forced labour was degrading to manhood and were sentenced to short terms of confinement in the Cellular jail. One of these boys elected to remain in jail on the expiry of his term. The others, too, were not to remain outside long—within a few months they were all thrust back to prison on the allegation that they were planning to escape. It was at this stage that the Central Government decided to send them back and to disperse them all over India.

The first one to be sent back to India was Ullaskar Dutt, the architect of the first high explosive bomb. He had lost his head and was, evidently, sent back for better accommodation and treatment. The next batch consisting of seven or eight prisoners including the writer was called upon to pack one fine morning without any previous notice whatsoever just as the Maharaja, the only steamship plying between India and Port Blair, was on the point of weighing another. From our study of the movements of the ship we could only say that we were heading for the port of Madras and no more.

In this ship all the eight of us were put in one of the holds meant for prisoners. The hold was just above the water level. A drain ran all through along the entire length of the inner wall carrying filth from every corner. It was always full of water which was removed twice daily when a sweeper came to clean the hold. We were taken up twice-a-day for airing and for attending calls of nature. At other times we had to manage as best as we could in this very drain. Whenever the ship listed heavily this foul water splashed on the floor and even sometimes drenched us. It was, again, with this filthy water that the floor was 'cleaned'!

For our diet during the voyage we got "chira" or flattened rice, sugar, tamarind, and fried grams. This princely fare reminded us of the Rajput warriors' motto in the most glorious period of their history—"kabhi ghee ghana, kabhi muthibhar chana! Kabhi woh bhi mana". That is "A hearty meal sometimes with plenty of ghee, sometimes a handful of grams only, and sometimes even that is denied." Doubtless it was this readiness to face any eventuality that made them the dauntless warriors that knew no defeat. And if we can call up again this unflinching determination we need have nothing to fear from the combined machination of Pakistan and China.

But to return to our narrative, this modest and humble fare was all right in ordinary circumstances, but when one fell ill, and that with acute diarrhoea, it was difficult. The writer had the ill-luck to fall a victim to its attack. In this dire need one of his fellow politicals came to his rescue. "Don't mind", he assured, "take chira-washing and that will stop this in no time". He put my ration in plenty of water, washed it thoroughly, and let me drink the washings with plenty of sugar. This checked the diarrhoea by the time we reached in the Madras harbour although it left me a bit shaken and feverish.

PRISONERS' BATH

It was the month of June. It seemed terribly hot. We were taken to the shore in a boat and thence in a Police Van to the Madras Penitentiary. It was near about three o'clock by the time we reached there. Those who wanted it were given the prisoner's bath. It was already meal time, and we enjoyed our humble fare after the few days of privations during the voyage although we were not accustomed to it. The meal over we were taken to our cells.

It was yet more than an hour to sunset. The setting sun shone straight on the cells. The heat was oppressive to the extreme. Presently relief came I was asked to pack and was taken out. Though I did not know whither I was going, the relief from the oppressive heat was something much desired. At the gate I was handed over to an armed escort consisting of a European sergeant and a few armed Indian police.

From the jail gate we went straight to the railway station. Subject to the restrictions necessarily applying to a prisoner this sergeant gave me all the facilities he could. He shared with me all the way the books and magazines he carried. He certainly spent substantially more for my fare than sanctioned by the jail code and some of it must have come from his personal supplies. At night he spread out his blanket on the bunk for rest. We had, by this time, reached the bare hilly tracts of the Deccan plateau where the nights are as chilly as the days are hot, and while I rested comfortably wrapped in the blanket, its owner made the best of the chilly night dozing at the window.

Our destination turned out to be Bellary which place we reached on the morning of the third day. I was taken straight to the jail and was placed in one of the segregation cells outside the compound where I had to stay for a few days to make sure that I carried no infection.

Presently the head warder appeared with a blanket, earthen pots and clothing. The earthen pots I refused to accept on the ground that once used they became "jutha" and could not be used by another man. Apart from this, earthen pots constantly used by one man should not be given to another on ground of health. The same is the case with blankets and clothing and these should not be re-issued without washing and disinfection. The jailor was informed, I explained him my difficulty. Then came the super. I must explain here that this refusal was a very serious offence under the Indian Jail Code and might lead even to flogging. But the super was very considerate and I got everything new. He also allowed me a rice diet which I could not claim as a matter of right.

Bellary is one of the four districts ceded by the Nizam and is situated in the Deccan plateau which is one of the driest regions of India consisting of bleak bare hills with intensely hot days and comparatively cool nights. Supplies of water, both for irrigation and consumption, were obtained mainly from two sources: (1) huge reservoirs storing rain water, and (2) deep wells. The town, a fairly big one, seemed to be built round a very big reservoir not less than half-a-mile across each way. There was no sign of any natural vegetation anywhere. On the further side of the jail there stood on a hill-top a fortress built of stone. This was built, as I learnt later, by the famous south-Indian chief, Tipoo Sultan, who defied the British and was at one time a terror and a problem to them and a power to reckon with. The jail gardens were irrigated from a deep well, water from which was drawn by what appeared to be a huge bucket made of leather suspended by a stout rope passing over a pulley. This was worked by manual labour and the water was carried to the gardens by surface drains. The water for the consumption of prisoners was obtained from another well inside the jail, and the consumption was strictly controlled.

The Bellary jail was a Central jail, not as big as the central jails of Bengal, but a medium-sized one with accommodation for about 700 prisoners. The structures were of stone blocks all through and, if I remember aright, there was only one two-storied building, the office building with the jailor's quarters. The staff was exceptionally good. The Super, an Anglo-Indian, never tired of dilating upon the excellence of London, and was named 'St. Samul' by his loving relations; the jailor, also an Anglo-Indian who had taken an Indian wife, was a good soul; the head warder, a native of the soil who spoke English fluently, was very considerate and respectable; and as for the rest of the staff, I have nothing but praise for them.

The main industries of this jail were wool-spinning, blanket weaving and production of vegetables for internal consumption. It was, I believe, this jail that supplied the bulk of the blanket requirements of the South-Indian jails. For the benefit of the present generation it may be stated that the Presidency of Madras, as then constituted, extended along the entire east coast from Ganjam in the north to Cape Comorin in the south and thence northward along the western coast to the borders of south Canara minus the major states of Mysore, Cochin, and Travancore, the French and the Portugese possessions in the coastal areas and the Chief Commissionership of Coorg, plus the entire central area south of the errstwhile Nizam State. The biggest province of British India, it contained all the four main elements of the Dravidian race—the Tamil, Telegu, Malayalam, and Canarese. The Bellary jail was an epitome of the entire province, the Malayalese and the Telegus predominating. But in those days half-a-century ago, there was nothing of the jealousy that developed in the wake of the progressive transfer of power.

DISINFECTED FINGERS

At the end of the period of segregation I was admitted into the jail after passing through the routine formalities. In place of the steel wire ring carrying a wooden tablet bearing my number and class that I wore in the neck in the Bengal and the Port Blair jails I got a metallic piece carrying these particulars hung from my neck by a cotton string. As I entered the jail the first thing that attracted my attention was the scrupulous care with which cleanliness and tidiness was maintained everywhere. The cookshed, particularly, was the model of cleanliness. Every opening was covered by thinmeshed wire-netting allowing free passage to air while it kept out insects. A few convicts sat outside the swing-door carrying small sticks with leather flaps at one end and killed any stray fly that ventured near. The block I was taken to was a big one consisting of long rows of single cells on either side with a nice building at the further end that housed T. B. patients. Along the road leading to the T.B. Ward was a pucca drain that carried water for our use. A new innovation was the provision of two big earthen pots carrying a strong solution of permanganate of potash in which everyone had to dip his hands as he proceeded to take his place in the file for his meals. This was, perhaps, to guard against any possible infection through infected fingers. Meals were served thrice daily. For breakfast we had one measure of 'conjee' every morning and for our mid-day and evening meals, a brick of boiled rice or 'jowari' and dal with vegetables added to it.

During my stay at Bellary plague broke out in the city. Special measures were taken to guard the prison from infection. On a recent occasion some 10 years back an out-break of bubonic plague was brought quickly under control in Calcutta by inoculation and other measures. I do not remember to have been inoculated at Bellary though inoculation against plague was discovered more than a decade earlier. But I understood, every article was sterilised before it entered the jail.

The cell I was put in was about 12' x 8'. My material possessions, in addition to my jail kits, were two humble earthen pots for food and drink and an additional one with a bamboo handle attached for attending calls of nature after the locking up. This last one every prisoner had to place outside his cell every morning. These were, then collected by the jail sweepers, cleansed and dried, and left in front of the cells. As the prisoners returned to their cells in the evening they had to carry these pots in. This, again, I was exempted from doing, a consideration not shown in every jail.

My first task was wool-spinning in a typical old-pattern charka. The task, eight ounces a day was done by meal-time. On coming to know that I had done some book binding in Port Blair the Super put me to that work. The implements were few and simple—needles, thread, a hammer, a knife, a pair of scissors, wooden knife and folders.

The Super allowed me books from his personal stock. Some of the books received for binding or repairs also provided good reading. "The Orbs of Heaven", Grahams's "Book of Knowledge" (1912), and a volume on Metaphysics were some of the Books I had here, but the two books that I prized most were Hunter's "Imperial Gazetter," Madras (1908), and Watt's "Economic Products of India" (1908)—two master-pieces that ought to be re-edited and brought up-to-date.

MEN I REMEMBER

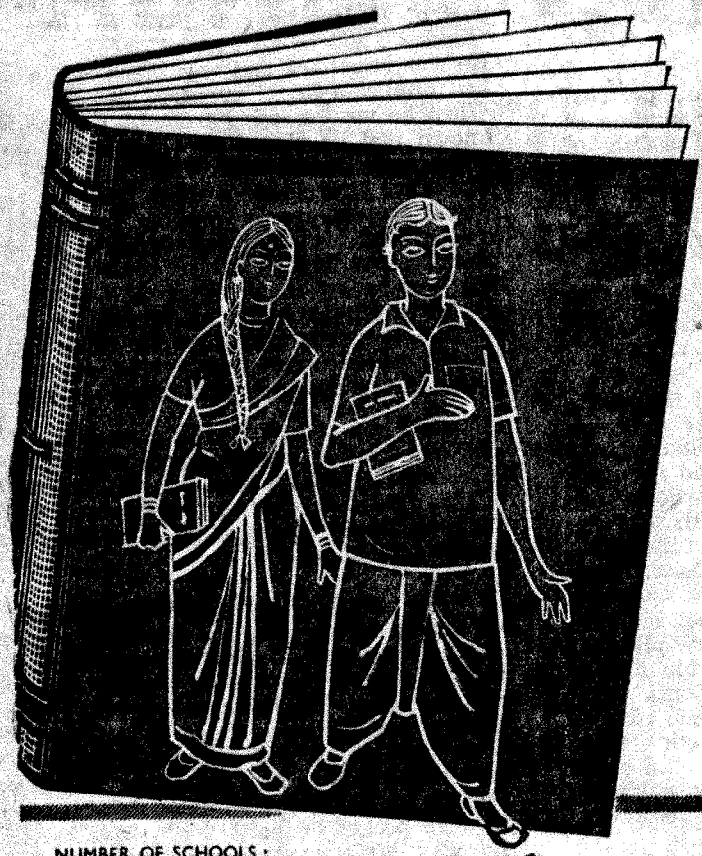
Bengal seems to have an affinity with the south, down to Ceylon. The people were friendly, genial and accommodating. Many of them could speak Hindi and some English. Those who could not also communicated their thoughts by gesticulations and gestures. A T.B. patient was bold enough to visit me. On one occasion he invited me to coffee and offered me biscuits and other rare delicacies. One G. Venkama from Vizag visited me occasionally. He owned a printing press with a book-binding establishment attached at Vizag, and was allowed to work with me. On my release I wrote him a letter. As the simple address of "G. Venkama" reached him he must have been a man of some consequence. He replied by return of post saying that his business was lost and enquiring if I could give him any financial assistance little knowing, evidently, that I belonged to a class whose earthly resources and belongings were meagre and uncertain.

The most interesting person I met here and whose acquaintance I valued above all, was Sri Nilkanta Aiyar from Tanjore. Of about my own age he was a patriot of the first order and belonged to a group of young journalists who preached the Gospel of Freedom. They ran three weeklies that vehemently attacked each other and anyone who read one of them had to read the other for this mere fun of it. The Government of the day found them out soon and the machinery of the Law and Order started moving. One of the group, the Tamil poet Subrahmanya Bharati in whose honour a commemoration stamp was issued on 11.1.62, escaped to Pondicherry and was a close associate of Sri Aurobindo. He had studied the Vedas with Sri Aurobindo and it was his recital of the Riks that interested Kapaly Shastri who, later, compiled a Bhashya of the first Ashtaks of the Rigvedas in the light of Sri Aurobindo's interpretation and named it "Siddhanjana Bhashya" of the Rigveda. Nilkantham was apprehended and got one year's simple under section 124A. Another of his associates was Surendra Nath Arya. Hailing also from the south he had met Swami Vivekananda during his south-Indian tour and discussed with him his doubts and difficulties. The words of the Swamiji—"Surrender not" had so greatly influenced him that he adopted the name of 'Surendranath' in consonance with these words. The surname—Arya—was added later when he joined the Arya Samaj of Swami Dayananda.

Nilkantham was devoted to Sri Aurobindo and wrote under the pen-name of "Kamala-nayakee" to indicate this devotion. I got from him a general view of the political developments in the south. He managed to get papers from outside and it is from him that I got the news of the outbreak of the first World War and its progress, of the shelling of the port of Madras by the fugitive German cruiser "Emden", and of all current events of importance. He was impatient and was planning his escape and had duplicate keys prepared at the jail smithy. When he was missing from his cells it became known that he visited me frequently and I was questioned. Denying the visits was out of question. The other information I could give was that he discussed current events with me, that lately he spoke much about his home and appeared to be home-sick. He got newspapers of course but I could not say how he got them nor could I satisfy the Super on many other matters he wanted to know. And while I was thus under fire the jailor and the chief warder stood speechless, grimly apprehensive lest I should say anything that involved them.

As I was left at that it is possible the police did not think it worthwhile to trouble me further. His arrest within 24 hours on his way to the south might also have given a semblance of truth to my statements and lessoned the gravity of his action in the eyes of Law.

The period of my stay in the Bellary jail was coming to an end. For the day of my release was drawing near and I might have to be sent back for the purpose to the Alipore Central Jail whence I was convicted. The day came at last. I was asked to pack up and the day seemed to be brighter than any other day. At the jail gate I was made over to the escort who was to take me over to Bengal. The Super gave the escort an extra five-rupee note from his own pocket so that I might have better treat on the way. We started on our journey at last and my nine-months' stay in the jail came to an end, but the joy of going back to join my surviving parents and relations was marred in no small measure by the thought of the friend I was leaving behind and whom I have not been able to trace so far.



EXPANDING EDUCATION IS THE SECRET OF NATIONAL STRENGTH

Consistent with the major objectives of West Bengal's planned efforts, progress in education has been accepted as a major social responsibility in all the three Plans. The results have been reflected in the rapid strides which the State has taken in the fields of basic, secondary, collegiate, medical and technical education.

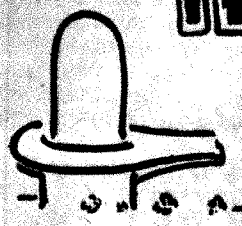
GOVERNMENT OF WEST BENGAL



THE SHIVA-LINGA
a new interpretation

By BHABANI PRASAD NIYOGI

ASK a scholar of west, and he will tell you glibly that the Siva-Linga as worshipped in India is the phallic symbol deified by many ancient races and religions. Strangely, the phallic interpretation is accepted by a majority in India including even the most devout worshipper of Siva. The Sanskrit word "linga" which is popularly used as a synonym of phallus or its feminine counterpart, also promotes this interpretation.

According to a story in Padmapurana, the god Siva and his spouse Durga once offended Bhrigu the sage and some others by refusing to see them when the couple were enjoying each other's company. Enraged, the sage cursed them, and Siva and Durga were converted to the phallus and its feminine counterpart respectively. From then on offerings to Siva were considered as unholy, and Brahmins who stuck to the worship of Siva were looked upon as fallen. Worshippers of Siva rubbed their bodies with ashes and were declared outcastes. That is why Dilip the king described the Siva-Linga as the horrible and shameful shape to which Hara Gouri were transformed—the shape that was despised by all. The Siva-Linga as worshipped today is supposed to be the phallus and female genital part referred to in this story.

Now let us listen to another Purana. The Linga-purana says that the Gouri-Patta of the Siva-Linga emblem which is interpreted as the genital part of Gouri, is Gouri herself, and the egg-shaped stone piece, the phallic symbol of popular belief, is Hara himself. All the gods and Asuras worshipped the Hara-Gouri emblem with reverence. In the 37th chapter of the Lingapurana it is said that Brahma and other gods, mighty monarchs, men of all sorts and sages, worshipped the Siva-Linga. Rama, who was Vishnu incarnate, worshipped the Siva-Linga after killing Ravana. By worshipping the Linga one is absolved of the sin of killing a hundred Brahmins.

That Purana says that the worship of Siva-Linga alone can give one Dharma, Artha, Kama and Moksha and the Siddhis. It is said that Narayana himself had declared that by worshipping the Siva-Linga the devotee worships every conceivable entity fit to be worshipped.

The shape of the Bana-Linga, the standard Linga worshipped in every household is that of a duck's egg, which does not suggest the phallus, or does so vaguely at best. In some passages, the egg-shaped emblem is represented as Siva himself and in other passages it is said to represent Brahma at the bottom, Hari in the middle, and Hara at the top. This is quite in keeping with the theory that Brahma, Hari and Hara are identical. Also, according to orthodox view, Gouripatta or the Bedika is Gouri herself.

Now here is another Purana. The Skanda-purana says: He who spends his time from day to day without worshipping the Siva-Linga becomes a fallen man. The worship of Siva-Linga on one side balances all sorts of gifts, bratas, visits to holy places, austerities, and sacrifices on the other. The devotees should give up all sorts of ineffective religious practices and stick to the worship of Siva-Linga alone.

This estimate of the worship of the Siva-Linga is the orthodox estimate still prevalent in Bengal. A pious Hindu, whether a Brahmin or a non-Brahmin, man or woman, considers his daily religious practices finished, and well finished, if he daily performs the worship of Siva-Linga in the Hara-Gouri emblem. It falsifies the claim of the Padmapurana that Brahmins ceased to worship Siva and Durga after they were converted to the phallic shapes by the curse of Bhrigu.

I have brought in the evidences of the Skanda-purana and the Lingapurana just to neutralise that of the Padmapurana in support of the phallus theory. The question still remains: What does the Linga stand for?

ETYMOLOGY

The meaning of phallus which attaches to the Sanskrit word Linga is traceable to usage. Etymologically the word Linga originally meant, and still means, sign.' It is derived from the root Linga which is 'to paint' or 'to write a mark', from which comes the sense 'sign' or 'emblem'. Subsequently it was also used to mean a sign of a male or a female. An analogy might help—in English, the word 'piano' means the musical instrument of the name. But 'piano', originally an Italian word, means 'soft', as in 'soft notes, soft sound' etc. The instrument which could be played both soft and loud, was called 'pianoforte,,' and it is shortened to 'piano.' So if we forget that 'piano' means 'soft' and assert that it only means a particular type of musical instrument, we only betray half-learning. I hope it is now clear that Siva-Linga may also mean "the emblem of Siva," which is not necessarily his phallus.

---

This article has been posthumously taken from an enormous heap of unpublished manuscripts left by the author who worked himself to death researching on the antiquity of Bengal. BHABANI PRASAD NIYOGI (1871-1949) who made a brilliant start with a Calcutta University triple honours, appearing from the Presidency College, had to cut short his scholarly career by accepting a Deputy Magistrate's post under the British Government of India. But he did not cease from his pursuit of letters, and the assiduity and spirit of probe which he brought to bear upon his midnight studies, was truly representative of the "old school". He hailed from a well-known family of scholars of Mymensingh district, now in East Pakistan and was respected by many in his time.

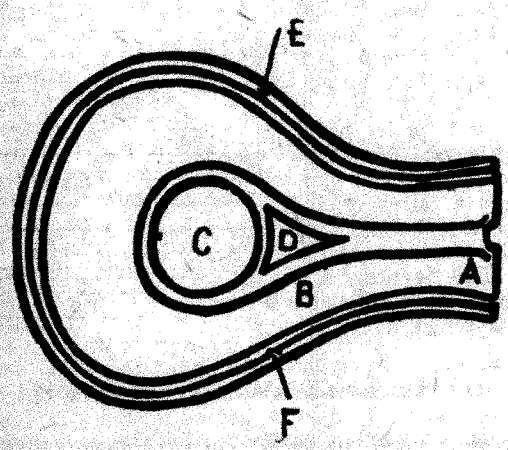
Let us consider the structure of the Bana-Linga in greater detail, as specified in the relevant texts. The emblem has three parts: the upper, called the Linga, the middle which surrounds the Linga called the bedika, or Gouripatta, and the lower, the Pitha or pedestal. The part of the Bedika that is elongated is called the Pinaka, the pointed end of the Pinaka is called the Nala or Somasutra.

The Linga part of the emblem is carved out of a stone piece more or less the shape of an egg, which is placed in a hemispherical cavity scooped in another piece. (The egg-shaped piece is detachable, but in the emblem used for household worship the Linga and Bedika are in one piece, either stone or clay.) The egg-shaped stone is the Linga and the one with the cavity is the Bedika or the Gouripatta (Gouripatta—that which is surrounded by Gouri). "পক্কজম্বুফলাকারং কুক্কুটাণ্ড সমাকৃতি".....the shape of a ripe 'jaam' fruit or an egg—is what the Linga should be. Bedika or Gouripatta is a flat piece of metal or stone with a hemispherical cavity near about the centre, a drain going almost right round it, and another drain entering the cavity from the tapering end, making a triangular formation just before it enters the cavity (see diagram.)



We have seen that the main grounds on which the theory of Linga being the phallus is made to stand can be neutralised with counter-grounds. Similarly the Gouripatta should not necessarily be supposed to represent the genital part of Gouri. It may be a symbol of the many-branched Gouri river entering into Hara Sagar forming a delta, a geographical phenomenon symbolised in the curious legend of the birth of Kartikeya or Skanda, in Skanda-purana.

The legend has it that somehow the river Kutila (alias Saraswati), the daughter of the mountains, became the mother and Agni became the father of Skanda or Kartikeya, who is generally known as Parbatinandana, i.e. son of Parbati, the daughter of the Himalaya mountains. Kutila abandoned the child in a reed forest and six Krittikas wanted to suckle him simultaneously. This is why the boy developed six mouths to please them all. (Sharanana is another name of Kartikeya). Subsequently Hara admitted that Skanda was his son by Gouri, as well as the son of Agni and Kutila. The reed forest which sheltered the boy was his foster father and the Krittikas the foster mother.

Reading through the symbolism of this legend it is possible to recognise the topography of a certain part of the country mentioned in the Puranas. It may be put thus: Hara the deity symbolises Hara Sagara, the sea that was at the foot of the Himalayas and extended from the Indus to the Lohit river (Brahmaputra). Or to put it the other way round Hara Sagara was supposed to represent the deity Hara.

Similarly, Gouri or Durga, the spouse of Hara is the symbol of the many branched Gouri River (Dashabhuja, the Many Armed Mother, is another name of goddess Durga).

Agni Sagar was a part of Hara Sagar and the branches of the Gouri river called Kutila Saraswati or Krittika fell into Agni Sagar and might have jointly formed a delta with six heads, which is supposed to be represented by Kartikeya the Six Mouthed.

The suggestion that the above topography is symbolised in the curious legend of the same child having two actual mothers and two actual fathers, and of a child developing six mouths may not be a mere wild guess.

In the figure, the channel A with the bifurcation B may be identified with Gouri river and its branch Kutila Saraswati respectively, and the central cavity C with Hara Sagar and Agni Sagar combined. The triangular formation about D may be identified with the delta symbolised by Kartikeya, although the six heads due to the six Krittikas branching from Kutila Saraswati have not been represented in the Bedika.

Relics of the geographical phenomenon of Gouri entering Hara Sagar and forming a delta are also discernible in the map of modern Bengal. Some rivers retain in their names a corruption of the word Gouri, and their courses which must have changed a good deal in course of the centuries still suggest the layout of the drains cut along the outline of Gouripatta (E and F) as well as the central channel (A).

It is significant that the river Atreyi in Rajsahi district is also called the Gur which may be a corruption of Gouri. It may be identified with the central channel of the Gouri River. The Krittika branch is suggested by the Kartikpur Dara river in Malda district. The lower course of the Tista in Mymensingh district is called Gure Ali, and a town on its bank is called Gouripur. From this the Tista channels may be imagined to be the branch of Gouri that deviated to the south-east direction. The syllable 'Gur' is retained also in the name of Siliguri (along with other place names in North Bengal), and the Nagor branch of Mahananda river which washes the feet of the town Siliguri, and flows south-west suggests the origin Nava Gouri.

The vast sheet of water called the Chalan Bil in Rajsahi district is well known to Bengalis. A river having its source in the Chalan Bil is called the Harasagar Nadi. Does it point to the probability of Chalan Bil being a remnant of Hara Sagar? Similarly a 'bil' near it is called Agundaha and suggests Agnisagar. The positions of these waters in the map of Bengal in relation to the rivers mentioned tally with that of the cavity in the Gouripatta

Unforgettable Women

MADE TO MEASURE

By TAPAN SEN

WHAT do you remember a woman for? Beauty, charm, grace, intelligence, responsiveness or just a pattern of life that is fascinating and so is not to be lost? More than that almost every woman features on one or two occasions which are particularly memorable, and having been instrumental to these moments such a woman may well take on a shade of immortality. These occasions pop up and remain lodged in memory although the rest of the life which lived through these moments of glory has nothing in it to hold attention. May be it was an evening stroll out in the garden when whips of rain made a showdown and flicked spoil at her bright dress, but unrestrained she insisted on horseplay and wheeling round and round you, shielding under cupped hands —a shield that really was no good. Or is it that one day when you were deep set to study, she came in breezily, swept your attention the moment she arrived, and after bantering this way or that she entreated you into a programme of her own. Now rain comes when she is no more and in a flash, a mist of rain brings her back to your mind as ever before. Similarly, when she is past and alone you sit in the study, there can be times when you are looking straight to her vision. This sort of occasions are quite commonplace and if being a participant in such occasions is a criterion of an unforgettable woman, well too many women appear as being unforgettable .

GRACE AND BEAUTY

We are, therefore, to look in for more definitive stamps, the marks of which can at once render a woman imperishable. One such mark is the mark of beauty. Beauty is good to the looking and this is as long as one looks at it. What is more it catches immediate attention and if only you got your sights, you perceive what a delight a beautiful face brings in. But beauty lends itself to pass through phases of change. So that a face which in young age had been very handsome and demanding, as it grows into middle years takes a tone of sweetness and at last, lined by wisdom and experience, makes a face of appealing serenity. History presents a mass of evidence to prove that towards being an extraordinary woman it pays to possess a good face. It enhances effect as soon as possible and puts a gloss over other points of superiority that are also there but could have died unseen had the face been just ordinary. A good face is like a well-composed advertisement, ready and aching for attention and most of the time getting it. The result is other things being equal, the choice is invariably in favour of the more attractive. Now here, now there all over the world, they seem to say sardonically, 'I told you she is not just another woman. She has a beautiful face', as if that in itself asserts her having true virtues. But if prettiness is what makes a woman high or cuts her for better things, history has also on record a bunch of women having been consumed and wasted in flames of passion which their beauty created.

So it is not just prettiness or charm that may also be rusticly referred to as sex-appeal. Had it been so harem girls or dancing maidens would have reached heights of glory and been a part of living memory. But squarely, they never could stay and as they rode crests of fluctuating fashion they were abandoned as soon as they could be replaced or new criterions of fashion arose. Whatever it may be, it is seen that women who got presentable faces in addition to their virtues were and still are regarded with attention worth more than the hump of virtues they were or are loaded with.

The appeal of a lovely face or for that matter figure is not only for the sentimental but also for the rational-minded. While the sentimental are overwhelmed by grace and admit it to be so, the rational minded keep their reasons ready to justify their preference. For instance, they may say that a good face is a mirror reflecting inner things that are as good. Nevertheless such a reason may not on occasions be any good at all. So why a false reason or a vain way to give the world to understand things? Let us face it. Without any other consideration in view, a beautiful face or figure is joy enshrined, a joy for everybody to see.

INTELLIGENCE AND DEVELOPMENT

Is it intelligence then? In a good way it is. It is probably established by now that prettiness of mind is another name for intelligence. Promptness and trim of mind shoot anybody to the centre of appreciation. However, we appreciate intelligence or rather a hint of intelligence so naturally that it is too obvious and seems to slip out of conventional consideration. This is the reason why the part of intelligence has come to be recognised and examined on its own merit from not so long ago. Even in our country which unfortunately is one where emancipation of women by western standards, at any rate, is yet to be complete, women are expected more and more to grow faculties of education and career-making, if possible. So much so that even women who are being diverted in marriages to housekeep and rear families only are preferred when basically cultivated and awakened. If the twentieth century is fantastic for scientific advance, it is not less so in the field of culture, etiquette and literature. Today a woman or a man, a girl or a boy, she or he may not enter the world without a sort of aesthetic flourish and here there is a rigid minimum beyond which no one can go. Perhaps the centuries ahead will require us to be of a more and more, subtle order if there are more of us to live in this world and when you are jampacked with people on all sides, you got to drown your grumbles and put on a polish against their invading your privacy, the polish of sympathy and accommodation, the polish of culture.

When intelligence is meant, it is not intelligence pure and simple but intelligence dotted with a discretion of vocabulary and laced with a sense of responsiveness. Mind must be more than discerning things correctly, it must also absorb and encourage others' ideas. A lady to whom many voices wish to go out and nod hello is a girl who understands and what is more can take away the monotony of speaking replacing it by a verve of communication. So that a person in her contact can do or say many things he ever wished to do or say but never could bring himself to.

TONING AND CONTROL

All the same, womanly woman who is recollected and admired as such is a creature of deep reserve. She is not a screen version of life pushing her femininity at the slightest opportunity but is preserving it being jealous of it. A man in love with a woman wants this femininity securely tucked away from him for his not being pampered by it but all the same, the very warmth of it becomes his source of inspiration.

He that loves a rosy cheek
Or a coral lip admires,
Or from star-like eyes doth seek
Fuel to maintain his fires;
As old time makes these decay,
So his flames must waste away.
But a smooth and steadfast mind,
Gentle thoughts, and calm desires,
Hearts with equal love combined,
Kindle never — dying fires:—
Where these are not, I despise
Lovely cheeks or lips or eyes.
—T. Carew

RESPONSIVENESS

What happens in this work-a-day world? Everybody is set on his own track which is a part of a rat race that gives no respite or pause for sympathy and fresh encouragement. When a man and a woman are in love, they are sidestepping the race and doing something else. Here a woman is one thing if she is casual and wise of the time and energy she gives to this engagement. But if she throbs the boy with dreams of a common future and recites how green will be their valley she puts irresistible charm to these minutes of togetherness. At one stroke she becomes unforgettable.

Music, when soft voices die,
Vibrates in the memory—
Odours, when sweet violets sicken,
Live within the sense they quicken
. . . . . And so thy thoughts, when thou art gone,
Love itself shall slumber on —P. B. Shelley

An unforgettable woman has other dimensions too. She is essentially one that loves to be in the middle of one's events and circumstances, sharing one's joy and pang with others as well as others' with one's. She is not exclusive and as far as it goes, she gives the appearance of feeling interested in every affair around her. Unlike most of men she knows how life is got to be utilised and naturally she is not an on looker on life but rushes in on life caring and taking note of everything immediate or mediate; things happen to her, she happens to them. In this world if the striking force is Man's then the power to consolidate, mitigate and humanise the force may be Woman's. In short, a woman hoping to get fastened on memory must be active on life.

GOODNESS

Not that Man and Woman must take total jobs, worries and rigours in halves but that operation should be mainly on Man's shoulder as peace and stability a Woman's purpose to live. Although a large portion of women is extraordinary for quarrel and intrigue, there are also those who are easily the most tranquil and levelheaded. It is not moments of rupture but periods of adjustment. So one reason why one or other woman is or is supposed to be hemming domestic affairs is not so much that she is able to do little else but that she must be available to quell disturbances and work a system of order at home. Hence it is seen that a legendary woman must be good too. She is to be remembered above all for her being a woman and as such having all those traits that make grandma a portrait of ceaseless affection, ma a gift of love and sweetheart a hint of romance. Is not the Elizabethan age with its values a nice thing then?

Yet the poet who flung those lines 'I did but see her passing by, And yet I have her till I die,' might have been accentuated by none more or none else than a mood of moment. It is not so much to possess germs of beauty but the power to develop beauty in the middle of all events. You see it well and even virtue is a beauty.

in relation to the channels A, B, E and F (Channel A for Atreyi, channels E and F for Tista and Mahananda respectively.)

So if we imagine that Hara Sagar and the Gouri river with its branches as mentioned in the legends are represented in the Banalinga emblem on the basis of the comparison of the diagrams and resemblance of names, we may take the emblem of Siva-Linga to be the symbol of the motherland of the people who worshipped it, and discard the phallus theory.

It is significant that the rule with the Gouripatta is that the tapering end with the three drains convergent should always point towards north when worshipped. The Banalinga of household worship, or the clay linga, always has the tapering end of the Gouripatta towards north. In household worship also the worshipper has to sit facing north. The Gouri river enters Bengal from the north, and its branches also flow more or less from north to south.

It is more logical to believe that these men loved their motherland, saw the divine mother in the motherland and the motherland in the divine mother, and deified a delta because it was the offspring of the divine river which was one with the Divine Mother. Any obscene representation of their Divine Parents was far from their conscious thought.

THE WARRIOR DANCE of SIKKIM

By SATYAVIR

EVERY year in August or September, depending upon when the auspicious date recurs in the Tibetan Almanac—the 15th day of the 7th Tibetan month—is sent forth from the palace in Gangtok, an invitation to attend 'The celebration of the worship of the Snowy Range of the Kinchinjunga' or the 'Warrior Dance'. The day is declared a holiday and you soon find yourself joining the stream of jeeps and pedestrians wending their way to the palace gate, where for once the red-coated sentry lets everyone in. So fantastic is the scene that greets your eyes inside, that if it were not for obvious differences, you could easily believe yourself back in the Middle Ages.

The lawns between the palace monastery, a colourful and beautiful building and the prayer-pavilion is cordoned off, to serve as a stage, with the sky as a roof. In the pavilion are seated the red mitred Lama musicians with trumpets, cymbals and weird drums, ready for action. To their left under a Tibetan canopy sits the gold-clad Maharaja, surrounded by his family, invitees, and officials of the court. Opposite him is the friendly crowd composed of men, women and children, Sikkimese, Tibetans, Indians and Nepalese, jogging each other merrily, multifaced and multicoloured against a backdrop of the eternal mountains hidden partially by thick, black clouds with the palace in the foreground.

From behind the curtained entrance of the Gompa, comes out the Master of Ceremonies clad in the Royal colours carrying a staff adorned with scarves and proceeds to the centre of the stage, where he takes his stand under a flagstaff bearing the Royal Standard and the Prayer Flag in the five auspicious colours.

From the sides are led in ponies, black and white, the mounts of the Kinchinjunga, Mahakala and Thengla, caparisoned and bedecked to the hilt. Incidentally, these ponies are never ridden or saddled, and live in the palace stables. They are brought in during the dance. Whenever their masters appear on the scene, if they tremble or show signs of friskiness, it is an augury of good and makes everyone happy. The musicians busy themselves and there is a crescendo of sound ;*trumpets blare, cymbals clash, and drums drone, the curtains part once more and out emerge the warrior-dancers, colourfully booted, clad in rich tunics, with heavy head-gears and wielding swords and shields (which they manipulate with great dexterity throughout the dance) and forming a circle around the Master of Ceremonies begin their dance. A few solemn paces, swords and shields held aloft, a breath-taking jump and whirl, and a stance—these are the basic steps of the dance with a number of other variations. They go in , and out comes a black masked soloist—Mahakala—who after dancing round and round takes his seat in the pavilion. Another masked figure who participates is the Kinchinjunga. Two masked clowns also come on the arena and amuse the crowd by imitating the dancers.

THUNDERBOLT STEP

The warrior dance is peculiar to Sikkim and is not to be found in other Northern Buddhist countries. It was composed by the third consecrated ruler of Sikkim, Chagdor Namgyal (1686-1717). This festival dance is performed in celebration of the worship of the spirit of the 'Kang-chen-mdzod-Lnga' or 'Kinchinjunga', meaning 'the five treasure Houses of Snow'. This deity, regarded as the war deity of Sikkim, represented as riding a white mount, with a red body and carrying a red spear, belongs to the

INDIA'S HERITAGE & THE CINEMA

By RITWIK GHATAK

RECENTLY a friend of mine has come from Athens.

He saw there the film 'Electra', the latest film by Michael Cacoyannis based upon the Aeschylus tragedy. He was full of remembrances. He could not forget the film. I learned from his enthusiastic report the surprisingly virile details of Heroic Greece.

Our conversation strayed to other films like Jules Dassin's "Phaedra" and Cocteau's treatment of Orpheus legend and similar films.

Then he suddenly stooped forward and in an eager voice asked why we, the new film-makers, do not take up such legends and myths from ancient Indian classics and folk-lores as our subject matters in films.

I weakly tried to point out that some eminent film makers of new trend in our country have announced some such projects sometime or other. There was some talk of foreign collaboration in some projects, in fact. I had to admit in a shame-faced manner that of course those projects never saw the light of day. My friend from Greece was really cross with me because he saw only the horrid hashes that go in the name of mythological film in our country.

I raked up in defence that much-flogged horse, the budget of a Bengali film. My friend brushed me aside, mentioning the production costs of my and some of my colleague's films.

After he departed I really started brooding. I have seen some of our mythological films which are steady money-earners in our countryside. I could not reject my departed friend's contentions nor cooperation from the artistes and intense competitive challenge from other quarters are extremely intricate. They need all the ingenuity, intelligence and patience of the director to properly understand them in all their implications, and stand up to them adequately.

DIRECTOR'S GOAL

It is a pity that the director generally finds it difficult to make the producer evaluate his labour in the context of the anticipated cost of his production. Whereas the proneness to pay a fabulous sum to a star seems to make the producer shine in his cheeks in conscious self-importance the director's place in the scheme of things tends to be relegated to the background. His labour and remuneration therefore, are taken for accepted facts. The star and the correlated factors seem to overshadow everything — even the director who will work as the pivot of the game of star worship.

NOT ALL BLACK

I shall not, however, try to paint it all black. There are a good many producers who understand the importance of the director and gives him the freest possible hand in the making of a picture. The story, the artistes, the technical crew, the music director and even the publicity campaign are necessarily approved by the director Such freedom and importance are rare but they are known of. In a case of such freedom the success of the picture concerned should be assured. It sometimes is. Sometimes it is not. But that is another matter. No human director can guarantee the box-office success of a picture.

I am sometimes asked what I can or cannot do to halt the onrush of difficulties consequent upon the star-system. In other words, I am asked to devise ways of cutting down the staggering cost of production of today. This is almost asking me to do the impossible for as a director I am a mere cog in the production machine. The star-system is rooted far deeper than is commonly imagined. Specially, its involvement with public liking makes it all the more difficult to be dispensed with. The star-system is not peculiar to West Bengal. It is the eternal craze everywhere. So the system has got to be left to itself. I tend to think that the remedy against rising cost does not lie only in finding out new talents. The new talent of today is sure to flower into the star of tomorrow with his or her demand for inflated remuneration. Apart from this, there is another deep-lying cause which has got to be reckoned with. The film industry is an industry of opulence. It has of needs got to wear the look of richness and glamour. You cannot stint and go into a programme of austerity in films. The richer and the more magnificent they look the bigger and more irresistible is the appeal. There is no getting away from this truth. You can try to avoid misspending but you cannot make your picture, apart from ornamenting it with popular players, put on a widowed appearance.

I would like to conclude by wishing that the films of tomorrow be worthier and more expressive of the lives and thoughts of our people. If a coordinated production industry can make this task easy, we all will have done our bits worthily. And director or carpenter, to be worthy is the goal he must strive for.

INDIA'S HERITAGE AND THE CINEMA

could I defend myself from his accusations. Those films are really abominable—not only as films but also as tributes to our glorious gods and heroes.

When one comes to think of it, it is really a paradox that the nation which has the most varied, the most profound, the most significant heritage of Puranas and Mahakabyas, has never seriously cared in matters of film, to take help of this glorious material.

Of course there is an economic aspect to it. But when one comes down to it is it really insurmountable? A "mythological" film presumably costs more. But at the same time, it is the staple product of our industry and, as such, provides a maximum amount of guarantee of a steady return. One or two films of this kind, I remember,—though in no way superior to others excepting the use of famous actors who are normally not employed in such film and better production mounting—have fared very well even in the big cities.

I think we have never really bothered to care for such subjects. Because if one goes deep into it, the prospect becomes breath-taking.

If we take up any well known exploit of a "Bhima" or "Arjuna",—the nuances that can be brought into play may impregnate the old theme with absolutely new significances. As the stories and fates of such heroes are known to the public to the last detail, — interest always centres round in such films to the interpretation and the execution part of it.

What a freedom is given to the artist! He has not to carry the load of story point, suspense intrigue and such matters in the normal senses of the terms. He can re-interpret freely (as Madhusudan did in 'Meghnad Badh Kabya') these age old legends and put in messages for today through these archetypal figures. He can comment on present day life by allegory and by juxta position of thoughts, customs and usages. He can even provide us with answers to the ills that haunt us today. He can sublimate our very recent sufferings.

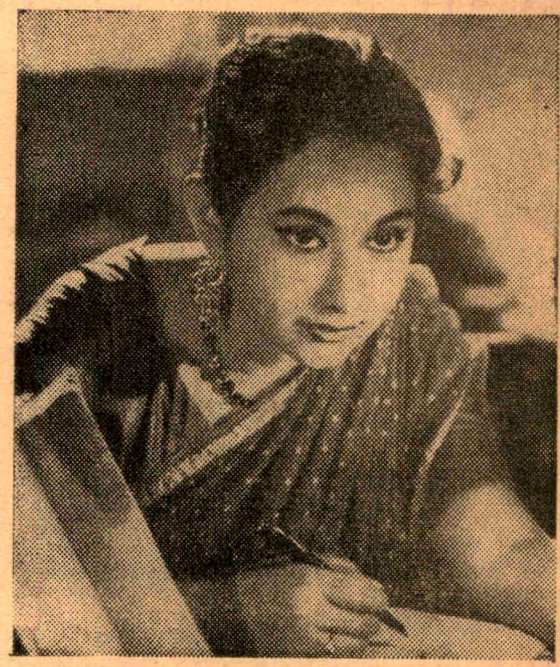
On the level of production point there may be no many challenges. One can delve deep into the history of the Heroic Age of India. The invading Aryans, their expansion eastwards, their slow but inevitable change from Nomadic to settled, farmer's mode of life, their handicrafts, chariotry, weaponry, mode of warfare, marriage customs, — in fact the entire culture complex that is Heroic India, — can throw up exciting indications of plastic materials.

The philosophy of India, which was at a state of constant flux at the time, evolving towards the rigid code of much later age, — is also an extremely exciting material for finding that mystique which is of paramount importance today.

I do not know whether anybody will undertake such a project in near future in our country. But if somebody did, it would have been an undertaking worth applauding.

For ADULTS-REALLY

By KABITA SARKAR



Sandhya Roy, a Bengali screen favourite.

IT was an inevitable corollary of censorship that children and adolescents — in short, minds susceptible to dubious influences— should be excluded for their own good from certain types of films. Obviously the degree of sensitivity of each child is not the same and the restriction to those over eighteen, while appearing a trifle arbitrary, has this in its favour, that it makes a generally acceptable barrier. The themes reserved for adults generally involve those of sex and horror (inclusive of extreme cruelty), and there is perhaps some justification for this for so long as the claim of unbridled sex and hair-raising horror in film is genuine.

Regrettably more and more films having an "A" tagged on to them are, in actual fact, reasonably innocuous and can often be seem by children without adverse results. The general audience has come to consider an "A" certificate as symbolic of the sensational — and often without even bothering to investigate further, the parenthetical "A" after the title is an added allurement to see the film. The fact that experience has proved that this is just as often a snare and a delusion hardly counts. The Censor in a way gives the distributors and the exhibitors free publicity — often of an undesirable and generally of a misleading nature. If one were to examine the film content of the Indian cinema, apart from the general trend towards vulgarity and dubious taste in the general conception, there is seldom anything more devastating to the general morale. Conversely, there is rarely anything in it to appeal to a specific "adult" audience in the sense that it is essentially too mature in conception to be understood by a juvenile audience. Occasionally there might be a film calculated to provoke the audience to concerted action against a social or economic ill — but this is rare enough. Generally it is expressed in a romantic guise, so that the adolescent members of the audience accept the film on the level of general entertainment and happily overlook the implicit moral, which in any case consists of lengthy tirades. These films are in any case created for adult impact and universally shown.

The system in other countries is worth consideration. In most places there is an understandable avoidance of any reference, however oblique which might offend religious susceptibilities. In some places there is also a taboo against minorities being shown in a bad light. (This however, is not so consistently maintained and fluctuates with current political prejudice). In France, as compared with the Anglo-Saxon approach, sex, as a subject in the film, is relatively uninhibited, but censorship in matters political is very strong, nor is the problem film, which essentially is compelled to show the less savoury side of the French economic and social scene, much favoured. Carne's Les Tricheurs with its exposition of heady recklessness and abandon among youth was a relative rarity — heavily criticised at the time. Hollywood on the other hand, whatever its artistic shortcomings, has never been given adequate credit for its hard-hitting social themes which intrinsically display the negative facet of the much-vaunted super-hero. And in the showing of these aspects of national life — unless the element of violence is too great, as happened with THE WILD ONES there are seldom any exceptions made to the members of the audience.

"INTELLECTUALISM"

These are really adult films for they demand intelligent appraisal and consideration and cannot be dismissed with the casualness of the escapist film. In the Indian cinema however there are very few films made specifically to produce this intelligent reaction or a thought-provoking aftermath. The accent is consistently on the entertainment element, and relatively rarely on any higher level of appeal. The constant confusion of "intelligent" with "intellectual" is a deliberately perpetrated myth and any director who aims at a higher level of intelligence, is automatically suspect of "intellectualism" — and his films are tacitly avoided by those very adults who would benefit immeasurably, and in turn be able to benefit these films.

One of the very few Indian directors whose films are consciously not calculated to pander to the lowest common denominator of the human intelligence, without however being unduly high-brow, is Satyajit Ray. Thematically anyone, even a child, might derive some pleasure from seeing "Pather Panchali." There is finesse and no concession to the cruder instincts of the audience — and if, at times, a passage seems too restrained for them, it is not obscure to those whose way of life it seeks to define, nor for the more sensitive members of the foreign audience. And for those who miss the emphasis of the obvious, it is because they seek to judge these films in terms of the conventional Indian cinema—which this is not. In the West again, Ray's films are the rare Indian ones received with enthusiasm. Not a little of this is due to the fact that he is one of the few film makers who treats the audience as if it is mentally of age.

It has been cynically suggested that the obvious if small widening of the scope of the cinema, mentioned earlier, and the maturity of conception in a relatively few films of the cinema as a whole, is an inevitable attendant factor of the general evolution of the cinema. Perhaps this is partly so — but that hardly justifies a tacit acceptance of it. The original bias of the cinema has, in most countries, remained intrinsically unchanged, but again, in many specific spheres, there is a perceptible revaluation in the light of current needs, and a greater mental sophistication not to mention changed circumstances. Some directors have made a constant and consistent effort in film after film to achieve a degree of maturity, to break away from the eternal boy-meets-girl merry-go-round. Often they have been unsuccessful at the box-office and after an initial venture have been forced back into the rut. Many of the serious-minded directors have reluctantly, but practically, come to the conclusion that for every unusual film they "wish" to make, they "must" also make a pot-boiler to balance their accounts.

TYCOONS WONDERED

Yet all of the finest films, artistically speaking, have not necessarily been museum relics and box-office ciphers outside the specialised cinemas, and some, like Marty have even been unexpected box-office successes. Relatively recently there has been the freak case of a film like "La Grande Illusion", which was made in 1937, and was by-passed then. When the film was re-issued again in 1958, it ran to packed houses and was the year's resounding box-office success! This strange phenomenon has set the tycoon wondering. Even if films are made with a long-term recouping of resources in view, it is hardly likely that many individuals can afford to take risk. They might not be alive to reap their belated profits. But that fortunately has not deterred inspired film makers or those with a conscience from making a small section of films, which, by their very nature should deservedly be labelled "For Adults Only" — instead of those efforts in dubious taste which merely induce the wrong people to see the wrong film!

It would be an interesting experiment to encourage a trend of films which are more genuinely worthy of serious consideration. In a cinema the size of ours, surely there is ample room for all kinds of films which would not considerably affect any of the more popular types of cinema. Even if the standard boy-meets-girl routine goes on, it could hardly affect the cinema at all adversely if some films were made with a deliberate appeal to the conscious thinking of the intelligent audience. If a few films which were calculated to appeal to adults mainly were occasionally produced, perhaps that might justify the "adults only" stricture for a larger number of films. For, as long as vulgarity is the sole criterion of adult requisites — the stricture is hardly justified. Then again, this very definition of vulgarity is insidious. For a film like "Hiroshima", "Mon Amour" surely transcends the barriers of conventional and hardly justifies the ban even for film-society showing?

Nor will this constant preoccupation with misplaced "A" certificates create a desire in adolescents for a better type of film. If only they can be exposed at some time to a "really" adult film as also a film that is reserved for adults solely on its merits of dubious taste, will they have a yardstick, will they be able to distinguish between the two, instead of confusing the vulgar with the "adult", and thus create a potential audience for a better type of film in the future.

The "adult" film is to-day still too strongly identified with the vulgar or sensational element, rather than intrinsic maturity — and this attitude bodes no good for its future development. In the meantime a relatively mature public has no other recourse but to rely on a small minority of films which are intended for their delectation and are perhaps the only guarantee the cinema has of eventually graduating to an acceptably mature art form.

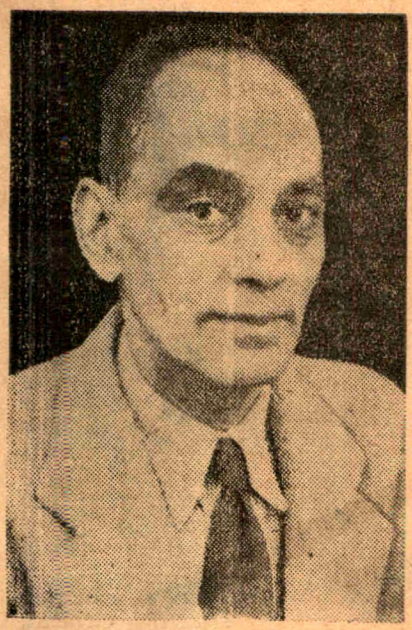
present bottleneck. An important step in respect of expanding the market for Bengali films is the current setting up of a film Society in Britain which hopes to show quality Bengali films in Britain where Bengali-speaking people from India and Pakistan are numerous. Some such arrangement which seems to be the twin concern of the industry and the State Government, is necessary in Burma also where the Bengali-speaking population is yet considerable.

But before everything else, Bengali films must rehabilitate themselves on a rational basis, leaving aside gambling or merely speculative propensities. Only then can things improve.

FELLOW-FEELING

The film industry is a great art-industry employing thousands of men and women and entertaining the leisure period of lakhs of people. The future of the Bengali film industry which was two decades back a very thriving one can still be saved from ruination if the different sectors of the industry have more of fellow-feeling and if they can readjust their intra-relations in the light of the prevailing sad plight. As yet no mood of readjusting misunderstandings has emerged. The industry today needs a lot of self-help and mutual advice on the part of the different sectors to retrieve its lost good name and recover its economic health. External help, if not compulsion, is also necessary. The Sen Committee's recommendations may be expected to serve as this external instrument of guidance and help. A statutory Film Council to control the industry in all its aspects is another agency which may be thought of in this connection.



The SCIENTIFIC ART OF SELF-DEFENCE

By P. L. ROY,

THIS grand sport (Boxing) is controlled throughout the world of amateur boxing by "The Association Internationale de Boxe Amateur" and by their wonderfully complied and comprehensive set of rules. The "Paramount Regulation" of this august body reads as follows:

The plea of "Force Majeur" may never be invoked.

Could there be a thing grander?

The period 1962-63 once again gave birth to one of those periodic outbursts against boxing, led in the main by persons who have not boxed as amateurs.

Such anti-boxing "spasms" have occurred thrice in my life of three score and ten years but boxing still continues. In Bengal more strongly than ever I hold no "candle" or for that matter any other professional sport.

I consider that sport is massacred when it is "served up" to whet the appetite of a public all out "on betting" and the evil and illegal consequences following in its trail and to get their money's worth and at whatever the cost.

Amateur boxing is a grand clean manly sport and its followers and participants are a clean living, manly set of young men more courageous than those who practise other games and who must be fitter bodily and quicker mentally and more self-reliant than participants in any other sport.

Answer this question: Which requires more courage and skill? (a) to run 100 metres against others; (b) to play football as one of eleven men against eleven others where you can dodge the issue by passing to someone else; or (c) to box three rounds against a single individual.

Yet boys and young men go into the amateur boxing ring day after day and finish the best of friends at the end of three fiercely and fairly fought rounds.

How often is a boxer turned out of the ring for foul boxing? Perhaps once in 2,000 contests. Is this the same in footfall? A boxer always keeps within the rules or out he goes disgraced and a loser.

In Bengal dubbed one of the "non-martial" races of India there are hundreds of schoolboys, keen on and constantly practising this grand sport. The number is only limited because there is not enough money to provide boxing gloves and food for boys who participate in this grand sport.

Boxing teachers and its participants know how to bear pain and not to fear,—yes, even death. Could there be a finer grounding for soldiers? There is, however, a "must" and that is the necessity of correct coaching from the start. In order to prepare a young boy or a man to box it is essential that he starts learning under an experienced coach as otherwise, as in all games, no high standard can be reached.

The following qualifications are essential in a good coach:

(1) He must have considerable personal experience in actual class contests. (He need not necessarily be a champion).

(2) He must have received correct coaching himself or else he cannot coach his trainees properly, because boxing is a scientific game and not an animal sport involving wild whirling of arms and fists.

Cool, calm, calculated delivery of correct blows, accompanied by correct and correlated footwork, is the basis of good boxing.

(3) He must instil into his pupils
- (a) ring manners,
- (b) control of temper,
- (c) courtesy to an opponent before, during and after a contest.

(4) He must be a "psychologist". He must study his pupil thoroughly, scan the latter's ability,

B. D. CHATTERJEE

TELLS THE STORY OF FOOTBALL

By SPORTSCRIBE

THIS article is not a history of football. It is at best rambling thoughts put together to let boys and youngsters catch a glimpse of some great footballers I have met, as well as to refresh my memory. I called on Mr. B. D. Chatterjee who is an expert and a mentor and whose name, to quote Rupert Brooke, a great War Poet, sports lovers "will write golden for ever." It was autumn, "season of mists and mellow fruitfulness," and the glow of the setting sun perhaps reminded him of the far fields of battle where he and his comrades took on crack footballers drawn from the British Army as well as Europeans. The "episodes" took place decades ago. Yet the passing time has not blunted Mr. Chatterjee's memory. The past came crowding into his head and he answered me, "with malice towards none and charity for all."

Q. Mr. Chatterjee, could you tell me something about the origin of football?

Ans. You have got to hark your mind back to the time when Normans and Saxons used the head of a soldier killed in battle as a football and played after the battle was over. England is the cradle of football. The Chinese also claim that China gave birth to it.

Q. Do you subscribe to the view that we, Indians, were strangers to football?

Ans. Short of turning the Mahabharat upside down one cannot say this. While playing football Durjodhan's ball fell into a well and his preceptor Dronacharya took it out with the help of a lance. All this happened in the dim past. As a matter of fact football found its feet in the 19th century England when Englishmen made rules and regulations to put the game on a proper footing. At first a club fielded a team consisting of six players and the club against which it played, played for full two days. After 2 days the spectators took part in it and they played together. But the rules were amended and each side consisted of 11 players. Two-backs a side came into vogue in 1888. One Mr. Wilson introduced the Shin-guard and the goal-net. The referee controlled the game with a flag. But it was far from satisfactory. It was in 1892 that whistle took the place of flag.

Q. It is very interesting. In fact it has all the interest of a drama. Now, Mr. Chatterjee, tell me how the Bengalees took to football. Will you?

Ans. On their way to the river Hooghly a Bengalee woman and her son were passing by the C.F.C. ground. It was a stroke of luck that a football rolled up to the feet of the boy who kicked it back to the ground. The story spread like wildfire. The Bengalee boys and young men were keen on playing football. But they had to exercise their patience till a professor of the Presidency College, Calcutta, made determined efforts to teach the Bengalees how to play football. Much spade work was done by a military team. British of course. Football clubs were formed in North Calcutta. Sovabazar and Town Clubs are the pioneers. Soon other clubs were formed. Kumartuli, Sporting Union and Mohan Bagan deserve special mention.

Q. Could you point to a period of time which is the turning point in the history of Indian Football?

Ans. 1911 of course. Mohan Bagan fought as few have fought and won the I.F.A. Shield. The victory put a halo round their head The passage of time has not dimmed the vividness of the memory. One sees the "glory-garland" round their head in one's mind's eye.

Q. Has any noteworthy change come over football?

Ans. We live in a fast changing world. New systems have taken the place of old ones and Brazil has wrought a profound change which I had not dreamt of. The pattern of the game as well the size of football has changed. Our old star players used to play for 50 minutes and played with a 13 oz football and played with bare feet. They played exceptionally well and played very fast on a dry ground. The sky overcast with cloud damped the fire and they cut a sorry figure on a wet ground. To them and to us also football turned out to be a fight for international honour. To them and to us nothing was warmer in life than to fight without rancour and to lose without bitterness. We were on fire to enhance our country's good name abroad. We did remarkably well in Java in 1924.

Q. Do tell me something of some of the "giants" you came into close contact with. Will you?

Ans. P. K. Biswas of National Club, and Sudhir Chatterjee of Mohan Bagan. They were cool and calculating. They made up their minds pretty quickly. They had tremendous guts. Sudhir Chatterjee was the only Bengalee who played with his boots on. He was a very good tackler. Gosto Pal of Mohan Bagan is a hero of more battles than one can count. He was seldom put out or flurried. His "strength is the strength of ten because 'his' heart is pure." It was a pleasure to play under him. He was my captain. His judgment was seldom at fault. He pulled me up when I played rough. He could head the ball very well. He leant on the ground to ward off an attack. He was the veritable Chinese wall and crack forwards felt as though they were knocking their heads against a stone wall. "Positional play", almost lost sight of today, was his. Yes, he forms an unforgettable chapter in my life. I remember Knight of the C.F.C. He came nowhere near to him and would often centre from the extreme left, almost the last flag-staff, almost at the last minute which did beat the best goal-keeper hollow. Samad of Tajhat was a wizard who could toy with the ball. It stuck to his feet just as iron sticks to magnet. He could make a fool of his opponents if he wanted to, and walk straight into the goal-net to show the stuff he was made of. Samad, is a name to conjure with in the football world. U. Kumar of Mohan Bagan occupied the centre of the stage. It was very difficult to keep track of his movement. He used to send the ball in, through one's legs, through a very, very narrow passage to the nearest forward to kick or to flick the ball into the net. He so trimmed his through-passes as to beat Bennett or Colvine, Duncan or Magnoni completely. He seldom or never headed a ball. He was so self-less. He was cool and never cut up rough with any one. He played the game. He and Robi Ganguli formed a formidable pair, much like Dhyanchand and Rupsingh.

Robi Ganguli is a refreshing, a first class footballer with tremendous speed, wonderful ball-control, balance and brains. He is a shortish Bengalee with splendid legs and broad feet and cheerful demeanour. He would have done credit to any country in the world. I kept on feeding him. So did Kumar. Kumar timed and measured his inimitable through passes to him. He ran fast, perhaps faster than other forwards in the world, and pulled up at the penalty area. By the time those who were trying to catch up with him overtook him he turned round and kicked the ball over his shoulders which gave the goal-keeper a lot of trouble. He would often kick the ball straight into the goal and the ball flashed past the goalkeeper. He ran with his body at an acute angle, that is almost at 50 degree from the ground. He dodged and dribbled and did weave his trunk and made Bennett and Magnoni lose their temper and balance and seized the opportunity to score a goal. He was a good header and scored more goals than Kumar.

Q. Is it a fact that Chuni Goswami of Mohan Bagan, idol of our youngsters, caught your eye quite early?

Ans. As far back as 1947 I watched him playing for a local side in a comparatively obscure place,—Deshapriya Park, Ballygunge. There I discovered the talent lying latent in him.

Q. So many boys and youngmen play football. Why can't we field a purely Bengalee side?

Ans. Geniuses like pearls lie scattered, they lie about unattended to. A footballer is born and not made. So we should go to schools, watch boys play football in parks and on playing field. This we should do to spot talent. We should catch them young and train them. I think talent abounds in our country.

Q. Earlier on you referred to changes. What are the changes?

Ans. In our time we played 2-back and 3-half-back games. The two wings were guarded by the two half-backs. The centre-half had to guard the two-insides and the centreforward. So one man had to keep an eye on three. But these days in 3-back games, the two wings are guarded by the backs. Insides are guarded by the half-backs and the centreforward is guarded by the stopper-back. Here no player has a passage free. Take the system adopted by Brazil in 1954. Work it out this way, 4, 2, 4: Four backs, two half-backs and four forwards. Offside rules have been amended from time to time. The weight of the ball is 17 Oz now.

Q. Just a word about sporting spirit and I shall have done with you. What is the chief point of merit in Mohan Bagan?

Ans. Mohan Bagan took and take defeat with a good grace. We never lodged a protest after defeat.

Q. Mr. Chatterjee, so far you have not spoken about your struggles and triumphs. May I refresh my memory by recounting one or two incidents of your life on the playing field?

Ans. I am afraid that would be something of a task. You could tell your friends that I am a great lover of football.

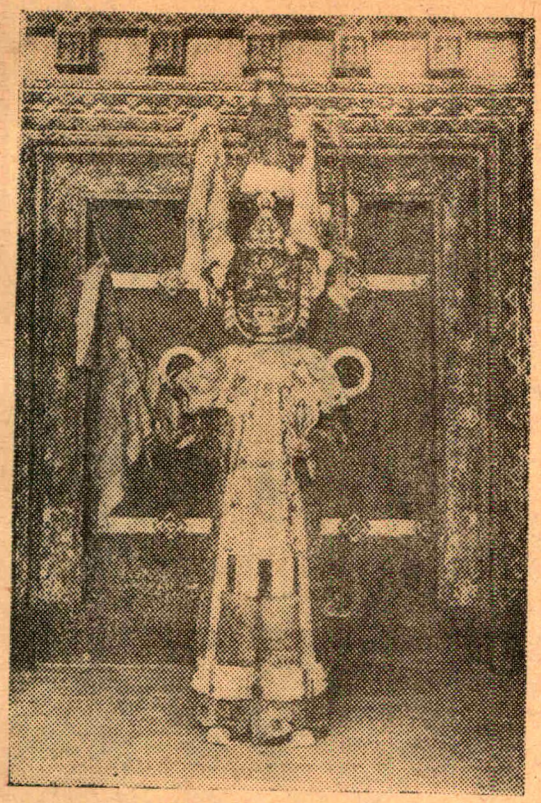
I close this article with the hope that I will pass on this art to as many boxing teachers as I can while I am still able to train coaches and carry on the good work and not waste the vast and world-wide experience I have had in coaching young boxers.



Kinchinjunga.

class of deities known as Yakshas. It is to propitiate this deity and invoke his patronage in fostering the martial spirit of Sikkim that there is all this display of war-like pomp, and panoply. In order to prevent the festival from degenerating into mere demon worship, the Lamas cleverly brought in the idea of invoking Maha-kala—the King of all the Devas, Rakshas, Daityas, Danavas and the Gandharvas, etc., 'to command the spirit of the Kinchinjunga, to guard the Faith and the State and to bring peace, prosperity and security to the people'. Spirit worship of trees, mountains, rivers etc., is a natural development in the Himalayan region where life is hard and lonely, for while nature is at her most magnificent here, she is also 'red in tooth and claw'. It was the great Indian sage Padma Sambhava (8th century A.D.) who hit upon the happy idea of inculcating into the Buddhist framework, the local forms of Shamanism or Spirit of Worship, thus firmly consolidating the spread of his faith in these remote, mountain kingdoms. As a matter of fact, a particular 'step' in the warrior dance is called the Vajra Pada or Thunderbolt Step in honour of the Guru.

The preparations for the dance are elaborate. On the fourth day of the sixth month of the Tibetan Almanac, 'PHELTSAN', multicoloured wool, is woven by expert carpet makers in a day, at the palace monastery, and made up into sealed parcels, together with cash, prayer flags etc., and despatched by the 10th of the seventh month through special messengers to the following destinations: four to the four sacred caves of the East (Byphuk—Hidden caves), the West (Dichen Phuk—cave of Great Happiness), the North (Lharinyang Phuk—cave of the essence of Heavenliness), and the South (Khado Sang Phuk—hidden cave of the Dakkinis). Another parcel used to be sent to Chumbi—which was at one time the enclave of Sikkim—in Yatung (Tibet) where His Highness had a summer palace but this year it was sent somewhere else in Sikkim. Another parcel is sent to Chekray Khasmahal Busti in West Sikkim, and another to Kalijhora in West Bengal where land has been alloted to the Ruler of Sikkim for the worship of Mahakala since the inception in Kalijhora of this dance-festival. The worship of Mahakala is performed by a Pujari who is given the Lepcha uniform and an allowance, and who wears a peacock feather on his hat.

HIGH SKILL

The parcels to the four sacred caves are delivered at the Pemiongtse monastery in West Sikkim, whence the Lamas are sent to the caves to perform the necessary rites. It is believed that the weather in Sikkim which is incessantly wet, clears for the better as soon as the "Pheltsan" is despatched !

In the Palace Gompa, before the dancers emerge, an elaborate worship is gone through, with offerings of fruit and butter placed in front of the effigies of Mahakala and Kinchinjunga installed on either side of the altar. The image of Mahakal is decorated with flowers and a garland of the inflated intestines of a goat, the carcass of which complete with head and four legs is put in front of it.

The dance, looked upon as a sort of combat training for young Sikkimese aristocrats, demands high skill in the use of the sword, stamina, co-ordination, physical fitness and concentration, and above all a spirit of religious fervour. The dancers had to observe abstinence and still do, during the period of rehearsal. Another feature of the dance is the appearance of heralds who chant proclamations. For example the herald of the war deity comes out and proclaims as follows—'Oh Thou Fulfiller of Guru Padma Sambhava's command.....The Supreme Guardian of this noble Rice country (Sikkim is known as the Hidden Valley of Rice).... O Lord of all spiritual beings known by the name of the peak of m-dzod-Lnmga or Kinchinjunga ! Thou art the war deity, etc.' The Herald of Mahakala proclaims 'Victorious over all, arrows are turned towards the enemy (meaning the forces of evil)—consume the dead.... I will cut the red string of life and offer it in wor-

Suchitra Sen plays a dual role in 'Uttarfalguni'

By N. K. G.

CONDITIONS in the film industry of Bengal during the last few years have reached such ruinous proportions that the Government of West Bengal had to assure itself that now it was time to intervene. This intervention is yet on paper because it has not yet started. The first step that the West Bengal Government took was to set up a Committee of Inquiry under the chairmanship of Shri K. C. Sen, a retired High Court Judge. The Committee was given quite wide terms of reference. Broadly speaking, they were asked to inquire into the fallen fortunes of the local film industry and recommended steps whereby the industry may recover from its present malady and function for the good of all concerned. The Committee went through an elaborate and long programme of hearing evidence from persons actively connected with the film industry of West Bengal and also from members of the public, if they desired to give evidence. The film press was invited to depose and a number of film journalists also expressed themselves through a questionnaire which the Committee of Inquiry had provided. The questionnaire was composed of many items to answer which would mean writing a complete essay on the subject. It was a well prepared questionnaire.

DR. ROY'S FORMULA

It is now known to all that the Committee after having formulated its own recommendations have submitted them to the Government. The State Cabinet are now reportedly busy considering these recommendations and will soon have to take its own decisions which will be announced to the public in due course, unless of course the announcements have been made by the time this writing appears. While it is unwise to attempt to forecast at this stage what the Cabinet is going to do in the matter of resuscitation of the West Bengal film industry it can be safely remarked that some of the decisions are going to be felt in film circles. It is public knowledge that the State Government has been long exercised by the deplorable financial situation prevailing in the industry, unrest among its lower cadre employees and sundry issues. Producers had had meetings with the late Dr. B. C. Roy to whom they opened out their tale of woes. Dr. Roy was widely known for his sympathies with the manufacturing sector of the film industry and advised them to make films on the co-operative basis. Only on that basis, Dr. Roy told them, Government would consider financial help for them on terms of easy repayment.

Now that the film people are awaiting the Government's decisions on the Report of the K. C. Sen Committee and the implementations of the same, it is time that the industry once more pondered over the ailment which has been troubling it for years. Or will they choose to await the governmental decisions and stop thinking in the intermission? Only the film industry can tell. The journalist, unfortunately, has to do some thinking in the meanwhile.

'ELSEWHERE'

From all he has seen and heard the journalist has not failed to conclude that the problem of the film industry of Bengal is essentially a problem of rationalizing the function of the producers in relation to the two other sectors with which they have to deal viz., distributors and exhibitors. And herein lies the rub, for it is the producers' maladjustment of relations with these two sectors that is the ultimate cause of the deflated look of the film industry today. Capital has shied of late but not patrons who are more eager than ever to get entertained by native films. . . . . The difficulty is elsewhere and it is this "elsewhere" that one has to find out to examine what can be done to cure the ailing film industry.

Broadly considered, the manufacturer of the film in Bengal today suffers from the following drawbacks:—(1) Soaring cost of production which shows no sign of stabilizing even at its highest-ever pitch; (2) Inequitable distribution of the money earned by a picture among the recipients, mainly due to the systems of "hold-over" and "protection" which preclude just income all over the exhibition area; (3) lack of facility for quick release and (4) shrunken market for their products. There may be other factors but most of them stem from the broad ones listed above. And it is precisely these factors—and others—which producers submitted to the Government for redresses without delay, failing which, they have impressed upon the authorities, most of them have to go out of business in no time. As such these factors have to be examined not only in the light of genuineness but also taking into consideration the points which others have put forward as a counter.

PLAYING WITH FIRE

Soaring cost of production with no prospect of coming down in sight has been, impartially speaking, at the root of the disease which producers are afraid will overwhelm them soon. But, again, impartially speaking, it is producers and nobody else who have merrily been playing with the fire of "more money to the star" which is now scalding their onee eager palms. Instead of halting the surreptitious growth of the more-money-to-the-star racket one openly vied with another to sign up the pretty star or the buxom hero at a cost higher than the one quoted by his brother producer and smiled triumphantly at what he then considered his superior bargaining power. Film artistes were quick to read the sign of the time and went all agog into wresting more and more money from the producer till it has reached a state when at least ten artistes on the higher plank are today prohibitively costly for the producer with the modest budget.

THE MOCKERY

The far-seeing Dr. Roy had seen through the mockery of the whole situation and had accordingly advised producers to make films on co-operative basis, sharing risks and gains equally. But it seems that producers prefer to be effaced individually to working jointly and thereby survive. It is astounding that no serious attempt has yet been made to go into co-operative film production. Perhaps financial assistance of a miraculous nature is being awaited. Let us hope there will yet be awakening on their part and efforts pooled to make survival easier. Of course this co-operative business is also a kind of partnership in which fellow-feeling, patience and trust are essential. Producers will need to have them aplenty if the co-operative system is to be given a trial

SORE POINT

Regarding the second point of complaint, namely, unfair distribution of the money earned by a film, the sore point is the systems of hold-over and protection enforced by the exhibitors. It is said that a film of average merit and of average box-office potentiality cannot earn more than 35 to 40 p.c. of the total earning in the producer's share as a consequence of protection although the contract generally makes it 50-50 between the producer and the exhibitor. This is indeed a problem bristling with many difficulties.

It is a point of law whether on the parallel of the Rent Control Act, the Government can make it obligatory for the exhibitors to charge equitable rent (for the producer's share is in the ultimate analysis rent charged on a weekly basis). But that means debate and contest between two claims. The exhibitor is quick to retort that he cannot do without protection in view of the mounting expenses he has to find. It seems that some sort of compromise between the two claims will not be hard to be effected provided there is genuine desire for a give-and-take solution of both sides. Producers are also unhappy over the payment of rental for Films Division or State Government 'shorts'. But that is a small point, easily adjustable after the bigger quarrel is solved.

As regards the attenuated market which was caused, first, by partition taking away 62 p.c. of the area of undivided Bengal into East Pakistan and secondly, by the ban on Indian films in Pakistan, it is a matter of very serious concern for all persons in the film industry except perhaps the exhibitors who are not directly affected by the loss of market. While nothing can be done to either persuade or compel a foreign country to show our films one can suggest to the Central Government that in any future scheme of Indo-Pakistan trade, arrived at by joint conference between the two countries, Indian films should be rated as top export priority by this side and the other government be asked to accept it. If the Government of India becomes assertive in this respect, Pakistan cannot go on having it all her own way.

INTERNAL MARKET

The internal market can also be expanded. There are at least 30 centres within West Bengal where Bengali language films are not shown. They are mainly industrial areas where thousands of labourers from other States live. But that is no reason why those theatres will not set apart 25 p.c. of their screening time to show indigenous productions. In Calcutta not more than 20 p.c. of the cinema houses screen Bengali films. Considered in its implications such a system is undesirable to the extreme. The result is that at least ten to fifteen Bengali pictures a year do not find a house to be released in. For aught one knows the State Government is highly perturbed over this state of affairs. In that perspective the talk of a compulsory reservation of total screening hours for local products cannot wholly be wishful thinking.

The virtual loss of Assam as an exhibition area after the language riots of 1960 is another grievous factor. As things show themselves. the recovery of this important area is not likely in the near future.

There is thus every likelihood of constructing new show houses all over the State to remove the

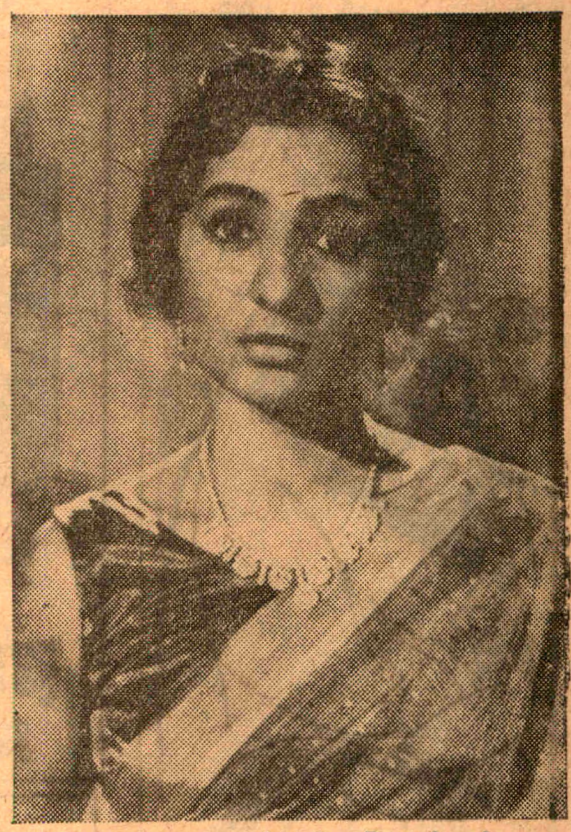
The DIRECTOR'S GOAL

By BIBHUTI LAHA (Agradoot)

THIS is an age of film consciousness. People and even the government of the day seem to have suddenly realized the truth in the saying that films constitute a powerful medium both of instruction and of entertainment. The propagandistic utility of the film has also been well understood which is evident from the systematic shorts the Union and certain State Governments have been making, as well as from the deluge of advertisment shorts shown in every cinema house show these days.

This film consciousness has, uncomfortably for the makers of feature films, led to a much greater volume of criticism indulged in by filmgoers. Naturally, the film producer, the director and the artistes cannot go as easy with their films as they could afford to go a few years ago. They have to constantly remind themselves of the need for satisfying a a very alert and very understanding audience. But out of this greater film consciousness of the people a new fact has come out. It is the comparatively great importance the film director exercises at this moment. Not that he was an insignificant factor in the days that are past. It is only that it is being finally realized all around that next to the theme it is the director who makes or mars a picture.

The last three decades in Bengal's film world saw the simultaneous preponderance of both the institution and the director. In those days the very name of New Theatres or M.P. Productions carried a lot of significance for the filmgoing public. People could be almost sure that they were going to have a generally good show for the money they would spend. But at the same time the name of a Barua or a Devaki Bose or a Nitin Bose would also carry a lot of value. If a picture had a Barua or Bose for a director, there would be avid rush for the tickets. I do not suggest that the director's name is not much of persuasion for the cinema-goer today. The older days were less competitive. Directorial hero-worship was, therefore, more natural in those days. The circumspect moviegoer of today is apt to be more critical than admiring but he does not certainly stint where praise is due. What I was trying to say is that in the past decades the institution and the director meant a lot for each other.



Tanuja's next is her first Bengali role.

They strengthened and enriched mutually. Alas, today there is no New Theatres or any other established and regular production institution. So the director has to go it alone — all on his capacity.

As I was saying, the emphasized film awareness among people and the Government has made the successful director's position quite dignified. The stigma which attached to the director's, or for that matter the film artiste's calling has not entirely evaporated. It stays but is profitably counterbalanced by the greater attention and sometimes by greater financial income due to the awakened consciousness referred to above. The director of today can plan and make a picture with an eye to the President's Gold Medal and State Awards, not to speak of overseas prizes and recognition. In that sense the director of today is far better placed than his compeer of a decade back who practically went without a bouquet except, perhaps, his producer's patronizing pat on the back if his picture proved a gold-digger. But looking at the other side of the coin it must be admitted that his task of pleasing the audiences has become infinitely more difficult because of the overcritical attitude of the audience today who simply seem to refuse to be pleased. The vastly complex and divided audience mind is a very hard nut indeed to crack as the director who makes a picture today is wont to discover at every step of his career.

And does he find only this "divided and complex audience mind" his only adversary? Certainly not. The problems posed by ever-mounting cost, less

HOLIDAY in SPREEWALD

By RANAJIT RANJAN CHAUDHURY

ONE summer afternoon last year. I alighted at the Luben main station from the Berlin-Gorlitz express. I was bound for Spreewald for holidaying. My German friends recommended Spreewald to me for recreation. "You would not find anywhere the like of it in the whole of Germany. You would love it", said one of them emphatically. As I came out of the platform handing my ticket over to the ticket collector, I was greeted by my colleague Herr Balow who had come to receive me. A room was reserved for me at a hotel a few minutes walk from the station. It was a sunny warm day. I preferred to walk the distance purposely, because it gave me a chance to see the part of the town of Luben through which we were walking, and also I could, thereby, enjoy a conversation with my companion. The hotel is located in a large park. I liked its quietness.

After placing my travelling kit in my room, I followed Herr Balow. We walked through the park and then crossing a culvert on the rivulet Hain, to which owes the hotel its name, we turned our steps into the town. We were joined by a young man, an acquaintance of Herr Balow, who wanted to have a talk with the "Inder" (Indian). He remained with us about an hour or so. Luben is a small town. I could see that it could not also escape the air-raids in the last world war. However, much of the ruins has been replaced by new flat houses, and other buildings. Like many other towns and cities of Germany, Luben is also church-centric in its growth. It was Sunday. The roads were crowded. I was told that many of them were outsiders, on visit to Spreewald. As the night came down, we stepped into a beautiful restaurant, "Strand cafe", semi-circled by waterways. In the hall, the band played dance music. The dancing floor was crowded by young people mostly. We sat at a corner table and enjoyed the time while taking our supper.

Spreewald is situated in the middle of the eastern part of the German Democratic Republic. The word Spreewald literally means Spree-forest in English. It owes its name to the small river Spree that originates in the mountainous Czech-G.D.R. frontier and meandering through the region of Spreewald, meets the river Havel near Berlin. This area was, in the last century, a vast stretch of swamps overgrown with forests which provided den to bears, pigs, and wolves. Much of the forests has now been hewn down. Gone are the days of wild animals. A network of canals have been dug in different times to drain out the swamps. A number of pumps operate to maintain the desirable level of water. Flood is almost of annual occurrence here. A number of dams have been planned, which when completed will alienate the fear of flood for good from Spreewald. The chief engineer under whose guidance the first dam of this series was fast approaching towards completion near Cottbus city explained the details of the scheme to me.

Spreewald is noted for its polychromatic attractions. In summer the area buzzes with life and activity when a large number of tourists visit this area, particularly at the week-ends. A boating through the reticulum of canals spreading through green forests, grass and crop fields and quiet villages makes the day unforgettable. Boats are available for hire. Young enthusiasts paddle about in boats almost all day long. Large motor-fitted gondolas ply about with loads of tourists. A number of restaurants here and there cater for the holiday-makers.

In Spreewald live the Sorbs, a national minority of Slavish origin. The Government is trying to safeguard the culture and language of these people. I could not, however, distinguish a Sorb from a German from appearance.

THE COMPANIONS

Herr Balow made his motor boat available to me one day for a whole day's outing in Spreewald. We boarded the boat near the village Alt Zauche, where the institute I work in has a research sub-station. Herr Balow heads the staff there. Our party consisted of four—Frau Lehmann, Goldshanke, Herr Balow and myself. Herr Balow is a rather tall, medium-built youngman on the wrong side of thirty, a bachelor still because he has not yet found his right match in Germany, as he humorously puts it! He is a silent type of man. His expressionless face seldom betrays his feelings. I do not know if it is due to practice during the days of his active service in the air force during the last war. His hobby appeared to me to be smoking quality cigars and that in chains. In the seven days of my stay at Spreewald, I developed a liking for this silent German in whom I discovered a good heart.

Frau Lehmann was a laboratory assistant at Herr Balow's at that time. She is a frail young lady, whose age I shall not attempt to infer as a lady's age is not to be inferred! Her hair was styled short as that of a boy. This appeared to be in vogue now-a-days. The short-haired young ladies claim that it is practical and advantageous. The German young men also do not seem to like the girls less for short hair! So who am I to differ? Frau Lehmann wore spectacles with extraordinary thick lenses, which made her eyes rather obscure. She spoke with an intonation of Thuringia.

Goldshanke belonged to Alt Zauche. He was employed at the research sub-station. He was in his early twenties, a shy type of young man. He took the rudder of our boat. He did this work skilfully.

It was ten in the morning when we started. A mild breeze was blowing giving rise to myriads of silvery ripples on the surface of the water. The sun was pleasant and warm. The meadows on either side of the water course looked extraordinarily fresh and green. Our boat swam through the forests and fields. It was wonderful through the forests. The trees wore lushy green foliage. The sun rays infiltrated through the breaks in the foliage canopy, creating a magic effect of light and shade. The speed of the boat, breeze flowing past, and chirping of the birds occasionally reaching the ears filled the mind with gladsome feelings.

On canal flanks, there grew beans, cucumbers, tomatoes, horse-radish, pumpkins and, of course, potatoes. My companions said to me that the vegetables of Spreewald have reputation for taste and as such are in great demand in big cities. Farms in Spreewald are small with very little advance in mechanisation unlike other parts of the country where the farms are often as large as thousand acres or more and very highly mechanised.

PATIENT ANGLER

We were stopped at times by the self-service sluice gates which Herr Balow operated to open our way. A boat or two passed by us now and then manned by youths, a young man with a beautiful young thing perhaps. At one corner in silent patience sat an angler. We wished him 'Petriheil' in German i.e. may St. Peter (the patron saint of the anglers in Germany) grant him good luck, as we passed by. We made our way through the villages Eiche, Polenzschanke, Burg, Leipe, Lehde and others. The cottages stood on the sides of the canals. Front of the houses were generally colourfully painted. There were flower gardens in front of many houses. A couple of children were building houses with moist sand. An elderly lady was busy at her domestic routine. A group of ducks just out of water were vigorously flapping their wings to shake off water. A cock crew somewhere. A dog barked at us. The canal gave off a peculiar odour. The engine groaned on. At noon, we tied our boat in front of a village inn "Waldschloszchen" (forest fortress) under a willow which bent its twigs with the grace of a "prima ballerina." On the lawn of the building were also sitting arrangements but we chose to sit inside. There were not many guests there that day. For lunch, we got boiled potatoes, cabbage head with mashed meat inside cooked in gravy, and a fruit dish. We took lemonade to drink. A German does not drink water with meal. Otherwise also, he shudders at the thought of drinking water! He prefers a drink beer instead.

After lunch, we visited a vegetable farm run on collective basis. The chief brought me a large globe and asked me to show the part of India I came from. His son took us around the farm. He was in Sweden for his floricultural studies, where, he said, he had seen some Indians. He put a number of questions on Indian agriculture, economy and politics. I tried to satisfy him as best as I could.

Again we were on our way through the beautiful land. The sun gradually inclined to the west. On the way, we saw the villagers returning home after their day's work, in boats. An old lady plied a boat. She wore a much plaited black gown reaching to her feet. On her head was tied a kerchief. An almost overloaded boat with coals, vegetables, bread, beer and other provisions slowly glided by. It may be mentioned here that Spreewald has only a few roads. These canals provide the chief means of transport.

As evening came, we stopped for a while at canalside restaurant for coffee. The rooms were full. The cigarette smoke had dimmed the electric bulbs. My companions took milkless, sugarless coffee in the German fashion. As I was not till that time accustomed to black coffee, I took coffee with milk and sugar.

The evening sky and the landscape bathed in the pink of the setting sun. The sky, fields and forests all were silent and still as if in a painting by a master. A feeling of profound delight had descended upon me. I had no sordid thoughts. Such moments are rare in life. My eyes, by chance, fell on the bank. There stood below a little birch tree a tiny deer gazing at us with its beautiful broad eyes. I saw this picture for a moment. Next moment, it darted into the darkness of the forest. I did not like to look at my watch. I did not like any touch of reality. I wished to go on like this eternally if I could. I was as if in dream, while wide awake. I do not know how long I had so sat. I was awakened as the boat suddenly came to stop with a jerk and heard Herr Balow's voice, "Bitte, aussteigen Sie" (Please, get down). It was our starting point—Alt Zauche. Frau Lehmann whispered it was a wonderful day. Herr Balow too later admitted that it was really a nice excursion. Goldschanke was glad that I was delighted.

ship. Those who meet death at my hands will not suffer damnation. I am the blood drinking and destroying being, Glory be to Mahakala, the indomitable Hero'.....etc. ..... etc, And last comes the herald of the sword.

The dance festival has a social aspect as well because it is an occasion for communal merry-making and helps both rich and poor to get away from the monotony of daily existence. Sweetmeat stalls are set up in the grounds, all turn up in their holiday best and everyone has a good time. Pomp and pageantry combine with informal gaiety to form a pleasing experience. It is to be hoped that the festival will be kept up by the younger generation, who in keeping with the advent of democracy are being trained in these dances at the Tashi Namgyal Academy for boys, irrespective of whether they are aristocrats or commoners.

The dance is really symbolic of the Triumph of Good over Evil. To the uninitiated it may appear monotonous as it is inclined to be repetitive and stylised. But viewed as a reflection of Sikkimese life —for isn't all art an expression of life?—it leaves a vivid impression on the mind, of a proud, courageous and colourful people, with a strong individualistic faith of their own.

SHERLOCK HOLMES—THE CHARACTER AND THE MODELS

By GOURI SHANKAR BANERJEE

MANY are the poets, but there is one Rabindranath Tagore. It has a parallel in the field of prime fiction also. Many are the writers of good detective fiction who are as lovable names to countless readers of the world as their detective heroes. But there is, and can be only one Conan Doyle, and only one Sherlock Holmes.

At the height of his fame, Conan Doyle had actually received letters from people in trouble, with inquiries about Sherlock Holmes, his whereabouts and fees. They wanted Holmes for detection of crimes of which they were victims. These enquiries are tributes unknowingly paid, compared to which volumes of eulogy are mere prattle. Even the other day, many remained under the illusion that Sherlock Holmes was a character of reality and planned interviews with him. They even fancied that they could recognize him at first sight, so alive was the picture of Holmes in their imagination.

But what is more, it was Conan Doyle, and he alone, who raised the genre of crime fiction to the level of literature. And his Holmes stories have a permanent place in English literature. He was the first to show that there were immense possibilities in the medium. Thus when in 1889 his "A Study In Scarlet" was published, he at once won the day and leapt to fame. And since then his pen has poured out stories after stories, all having Sherlock Holmes in the centre as the master detective, which won universal appraisal.

When the first story was published in a Magazine, everybody's attention was attracted to it and demand for more stories became high. So when Doyle ended the brilliant career of Sherlock Holmes in 'Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes', there was a great commotion among readers who demanded immediate revival of the great detective. Doyle had no other way but to revive Holmes and then one after another came out of his pen the sparkling records of crime detection which satisfied the public and gave Doyle both money and fame.

It is really difficult, everybody must admit, to write a good detective story, because the writer has to think out the problem and its solution before he actually puts them in the form of a story. He has to arrange them in a proper order so as to create a sense of continuous action. Doyle attains perfection in this matter. His stories are never lagging; they move smoothly from start to finish. And the reason is that the action is not interrupted by the analysis and explanation in the middle of its progress. The reader is always kept alert, he is always anxious as to the outcome of every particular detail and he cannot make out beforehand what would be the result—who would be detected as the culprit. And this interest on the part of the reader is kept by Doyle with a just degree of mystification. When the end comes, when the mystery is unravelled, the reader enjoys a feeling of surprise mixed with a feeling of pleasure of expectations satisfied. There is thrill, there is interest, there is enough action, expectation and surprise in a Holmes story. As one critic has pointed out, "A Holmes story is never heavy with the scientific approach to a problem or the tedious reconstruction of events that are the stock-in-trade of a modern writer of this type of fiction. The details are never over-looked but they do not obtrude. The reconstruction is never avcided but it is always palpable". Another particular feature of Doyle's Sherlock Holmes stories is that there are no unnecessary murders or acts of extreme brutality. There is thrill no doubt, for the absence of it would make the stories dull, but this is not of a crude type. The presence of a refined mind behind them is always felt.

Sherlock Holmes was not, however, completely a product of Doyle's brain although he did not exist in reality as Sherlock Holmes. Doyle created Holmes and Dr. Watson from living models. But he was also influenced to some extent by characters created by some of his predecessors and contemporaries. In the first place when Doyle was a student in the Edinburgh University, some of his professors made a deep impression on him. The most notable of them was Dr. Joseph Bell. Doyle observed the nature and habits of Dr. Bell, made some changes in them and created Sherlock Holmes. Hasketh Pearson gives a fine description of Dr. Bell: "Bell, a thin, wiry, dark man, had sharp, piercing, gray eyes, an eagle nose, and a high and strident voice. Sitting back in his chair with fingers together, he would quickly note the peculiarities of the patients ushered into his room by Doyle, whom he had appointed his out-patient clerk." And then he used to describe the details about the patient—his occupation, his particular habits, etc.

Secondly, in creating Holmes Doyle took help from some more sources besides Dr. Bell. They are as follows: Voltaire's Zading; Dickens's Inspector Burbel; Wilkie Collin's Sergeant Cuff; and Edgar Allan Poe's Dupin. Each of these persons had shortcomings but Doyle left no loophole in his characterisation of Holmes. Poe's influence was somewhat greater because Poe's Dupin had some particular characteristics that appeared in Holmes—as for example, he was a chain-smoker, and his opinion of the official detectives who thought themselves very clever was very low. According to Pearson Dr. Watson was Doyle himself. Doyle had a fine story-telling capacity; he was a man of action and he was a doctor himself. These qualities have been faithfully represented in the character of Dr. Watson.

Before writing his Sherlock Holmes stories Doyle was in a fix as to what should be the name of his hero. At first he thought it should be 'Sherringford', but could not settle whether it would be 'Holmes' or 'Hope'. He thought some other names which he did not like so much. But finally he was satisfied with the name 'Sherlock Holmes'.

MODERN GALAHAD

Sherlock Holmes is the greatest detective in world's suspense literature. He leaves not a single loophole in his detection of crime. He could cling tightly to a problem like a hound and, like a bull-dog he was grimly ferocious. His judgement is faultless. He is, as Holmes himself says, "the last court of appeal." When all the official detectives fail to trace a clue, or when none can give any help to the sufferer, Sherlock Holmes is there to solve everything, to explain every problem, however intricate it may be, and to help his client with all his powers. He is impartial in the proper distribution of judgement. When a man goes to him for help, he is sure that his problem will be cleared up and thus he feels a satisfaction which is the greatest prize of the detective. "He is the modern Galahad, . . . a figure of folk-lore with the lineaments of real life." But there is no mystery about him. He is an ordinary human being whose faculties are sharpened and refined by observation and intelligence. The same problem is related before both Holmes and Watson. But Holmes solves it whereas Watson makes neither head nor tail of it. This is because his intelligence is very refined and his power of observation very sharp. This sharpness and refinement Watson lacks. The energy and observation of Holmes are phenomenal and these are combined in a perfect whole. He observes every detail and so his deductions are simplicity itself, though they seem startling to his fellow men. When his conclusion has been formed, he verifies it again and again so as to leave in them no loophole. At that time he knows no rest. He has the strength, cunning, and courage of a master detective. His deductions are so faultless that the culprit has no way open before him through which to escape: he has to surrender without any opposition.

Holmes is not devoid of manly qualities and behind his iron mask there lies a soft heart, though he seldom exposes it. He is a loving friend; he is sympathetic with his clients and in his treatment of the victims, too, he is, in proper cases, moderate. He thinks that if a man who has committed a crime for the first time is sent to prison, he is ruined for ever. But if you forgive him once and let him follow a good path in life, he will do wrong never again in his life. Herein lies his greatness. He does not hanker after fame and money: he solves the cases and the official detectives enjoy the benefit of it; their names are published in newspapers and the public applause goes to them. But Holmes is not sorry for this. He wants to remain unknown and he works only for his own enjoyment. "Like Hamlet, Sherlock Holmes is what every man desires to be: like Don Quixote, he is a Knight-errant who rescues the unfortunate and fights single-handed against the powers of darkness, and like Quixote he has Sancho Panza in the person of Dr. Watson."

In his behaviour, Holmes is a perfect gentleman; he never does despise any of his clients, however poor he might be. In some cases Kings and Queens and ministers and great dignitaries of states have asked for his help; he has showed due respect to each one of them. He is polite and gentle in his behaviour and that is the reason why his clients do not feel the slightest hesitation when they come to him for advice. He is sometimes humorous too and he has a love for mystification. He often describes the particular traits of his clients or of his friend Watson with such accuracy, that they are completely taken by surprise and then he enjoys their bewilderment with a gentle smile. But then he clears up everything and saves them from this embarrassment. He is, as Doyle tells us, a good writer also. He has written several monographs on tobacco ashes and their relation to crime, on fingerprints, foot-prints and uses of Paris plaster, on the typewriter and its relation to crime, on cipher messages and codes, on handwriting and on many other subjects that are intimately connected with crime. He has a good memory and when a case or problem is presented to him, he immediately remembers hundreds of similar other cases. He has in store every bit of information about the whole criminal world and about hundreds of men and women—which are very helpful in his investigation and detection of crime.

Sherlock Holmes has some particular characteristics of his own. He is a chain-smoker and his pipe is always ready at hand. When he is thinking deeply about something, he smokes his pipe, and is lost in thought. "It is a three-pipe problem", says he, when thinking of the problem of the Red-Headed League. His features are sharp and thin; he has piercing eyes and an eagle nose. He often sits back on his chair. Sometimes he is extremely lazy but when occasion demands he is most alert and efficient. Holmes thinks that work is his only friend. "My

MARTIN BURN LOOK BACK TO OVER 180 YEARS OF SERVICE TO INDIA

...to be able to compute this service by decades, not by years alone... to recall that our creed has consistently been the development of our country's resources through engineering and allied enterprises.. to take pride in planning that makes the many units in our organization fall into a rational and complementary group and each one a leader in its particular field, a position which some of them, early pioneers in India, held even in the last century. For us looking back is a worthwhile proposition —an incentive to move forward.

AMONG THE COMPANIES IN THE MARTIN BURN GROUP ARE:

THE INDIAN IRON & STEEL CO. LTD.: With a million ton integrated steel plant at Burnpur, the largest foundry in the Commonwealth at Kulti and its own collieries and iron ore mines, IISCO has an enviable record in production efficiency.

BURN & CO. LTD., HOWRAH WORKS: Pioneers in foundry practice in India, in structural steelwork fabrication and the manufacture of rolling stock—the origins of the Company go back to the year 1781.

BURN & CO. LTD., REFRACTORY & CERAMIC GROUP: Apart from stoneware pipes and chemical stoneware, the works of this group—eight in number and located in four states—manufacture nearly all types of refractories to meet the requirements of India's steel industry, power undertakings, railways, ordnance factories—in fact, any industry requiring refractory material for the maintenance of furnaces.

THE INDIAN STANDARD WAGON CO. LTD., SANTA: The oldest Indian unit started for the specific purpose of manufacturing railway rolling stock—has been mainly responsible for building up the wagon building industry. Also manufactures springs, forgings, pressings and stampings for heavy industry as well as automotive components.

THE HOOGHLY DOCKING & ENGINEERING CO. LTD.: Established in 1819, the Company has a shipbuilding yard, a dry dock and extensive workshops at Salkia.

ROBERT HUDSON (INDIA) LTD.: A premier concern in its own field, the Company devotes itself to all types of light railway engineering—has important connections with the mining industries.

LIGHT RAILWAY COMPANIES: Some of the first feeder light railways in India, with six systems in five states.

ELECTRIC SUPPLY COMPANIES: Pioneers again in the generation and distribution of domestic power in India—serve 45 towns in Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh.

THE VAUGHAN BURN CRANE COMPANY LTD.: A collaboration with The Vaughan Crane Company Ltd. of Manchester — manufactures hand operated and electric overhead travelling cranes and chain pulley blocks.

mind", he says, "rebels at stagnation. Give me problems, give me work, give me the most abstruse cryptogram, or the most intricate analysis and I am in my own proper atmosphere. I can dispense then with artificial stimulants. But I abhor the dull routine of existence. I crave for mental exaltation. That is why I have chosen my own particular profession, or rather created it, for I am the only one in the world." He often draws his knees together to his breast, places the head on them, and is absorbed in thought. He loves music very much and he is a good composer himself. He is a good violin-player and is often lost in music. "All the afternoon he sat in the stalls wrapped in the most perfect happiness, gently waving his long, thin fingers in time to the music, while his gently smiling face and his languid dreamy eyes were as unlike those of Holmes the sleuth-hound, Holmes the relentless, keen-witted, ready-handed criminal agent, as it was possible to conceive." This shows his love of music and also his extreme concentration on the subject which he undertook to do. Doyle thus describes his hero: "In his singular character the dual nature alternately asserted itself, and his extreme exactness and astuteness represented, as I have often thought, the reaction against the poetic and contemplative mood which occasionally predominated in him. The swing of his nature took him from extreme langour to devouring energy; and, as I know well, he was never so truly formidable as when, for days on end, he had been lounging on his arm-chair amid his improvisations and his black-letter editions. Then it was that the lust of the chase would suddenly come upon him, and that his brilliant reasoning power would rise to the level of intuition, until those who were unacquainted with his methods would look askance at him as on a man whose knowledge was not that of other mortals." This is perhaps the finest estimate of the character of the master-detective. Sherlock Holmes is a bachelor and he wishes to be so for ever. He can not love any woman. The reason for this is very interesting. "Love is an emotional thing," he says, "and whatever is emotional is opposed to that true cold reason which I place above all thing. I should never marry myself, lest I bias my judgment."

DR. WATSON

Holmes and Watson are nothing but the two forms of the same soul. They are inseparable. Watson is the friend and colleague of Sherlock Holmes. He is a retired army doctor. He took much interest in the brilliant achievements of Holmes and recorded them faithfully in the form of stories. But Sherlock Holmes sometimes criticised them severely. Regarding one of such narratives he remarked, "Honestly I cannot congratulate you upon it. Detection is, or ought to be, an exact science, and should be treated in the same cold and unemotional manner. You have attempted to tinge it with romanticism, which produces much the same effect as if you worked a love-story or an elopement into the fifth proposition of Euclid." He is a plain and simple man but he is always energetic and active. He often expressed his opinions on the problems presented to Holmes and some of them gained Holmes' appraisal at times. He questioned Holmes again and again about his deductions and his methods of investigation which often helped the great detective in his work. He could not think swiftly and his intelligence also was not very sharp. But he understood his defects well and was not shy in expressing them. He says: "I trust that I am not more dense than my neighbours, but I was always oppressed with a sense of my own stupidity in my dealings with Sherlock Holmes. I had heard what he had heard, I had seen what he had seen, and yet from his words it was evident that he saw clearly not only what had happened, but what was about to happen, while to me the whole business was still confused and grotesque". But still there was necessity of Watson in the work of Sherlock Holmes. As one critic has put it: "A Watson was necessary for the existence of a Sherlock Holmes. He was the whetstone for Holmes's mind. He stimulated Holmes. His presence made it possible for the detective to think aloud and pursue his deductions." Dr. Watson himself was fully conscious of his necessity in the workings of Sherlock Holmes. On one occasion he said, "As an institution I was like the violin, the shag tobacco, the old black pipe, the index books, and others perhaps less excusable. When it was a case of active work and a comrade was needed upon whose nerve he could place some reliance, my role was obvious. But apart from these I had uses. I was a whetstone for his mind. I stimulated him. He liked to think aloud in my presence.....If I irritated him by a certain methodical slowness in my mentality, that irritation served only to make his own flame-like intuitions and impressions flash up the more vividly and swiftly." Hence rightly has Pearson called him Sancho Panza in relation to the almost Quixotic Holmes.

Doyle wrote eight books in all that are included in his Sherlock Holmes series. They are: Adventures, Case-Book, Memoirs and Return of Sherlock Holmes, His Last Bow, The Sign of Four, The Hound of the Baskervilles and The Valley of Fear. The first five of these books are collections of short stories and the last three are big novels. The stories are different in subject-matter and their movement from the first to the last can be divided into four parts: exposition, complication, climax, and solution. First of all, the problem is related to the detective in all its details; i.e. in exposition every detail about the case is supplied. Then comes complication: the detective has begun his work and one after another he comes across many knots in the case which he tries to clear up. The third part is climax. At this stage the detective has all the clues in his hand and the reader is expectant as to the end of the problem; he is eager and waits in suspense as to the final issue. Then comes solution or untying of the knots; the culprit has been arrested and the detective explains how he came to the solution of the problem. All the time the interest of the reader is held in grip and he cannot make out what is going to happen. Doyle never loses his grip on the reader's attention and thus the stories become very interesting in the end. Sherlock Holmes fails to reach the solution of the problem in two or three cases but the rest mark his triumphant glory.

Though Doyle's detective fictions are so popular, surprisingly very little good critical work has been done regarding them. There is lack of a good biography of Conan Doyle. Dickson Carr and Hasketh Pearson have done much to bring Conan Doyle to light. But little has been written and much more remains yet to be said about Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and his art.

The Cholaganga TEMPLES

By B. VENKATARAMAN, I.A.S.

KALINGA is the ancient name of the territory now comprised of the three modern districts, two of them, Vishakapatnam and Srikakulam lying in Andhra Pradesh, and the third, Ganjam, in Orissa. Very frequently, the extent of this region under a powerful monarch spilled beyond the traditional limits and covered substantial areas of Orissa and Andhra Pradesh while, when the fortunes ebbed, the territory was hardly a viable unit of administration.

Of the very many dynasties that held sway over this and its neighbouring areas, the Eastern Gangas stand out as the most prominent, the most brilliant and the most long-lasting dynasty ever to rule this territory. The Gangas, whose origin is lost in the misty past, came, according to local traditions, from near the former princely State of Mysore, and established the line of Eastern Gangas around 626-27 A.D. in the region between the Godavari and the Rishikulya rivers. This line is divided into three groups, the early Gangas, the medieval Gangas and the later Gangas. The last of the Gangas died around 1434 A.D. thus bringing to an end a dynasty that lasted for more than 800 years.

Between Kulottunga I, grandson of Rajendra Chola I, famous in history as the one who conquered the land watered by the Ganga (Gangaikondan; Kondan one who conquered) and his contemporary Eastern Ganga ruler of Kalinga, Rajaraja alias Devendra Varman, there were dynastic feuds but marital alliances as well; in fact such alliances were fairly common between the Chola-Vengi and Kalinga rulers for many generations before and after. Kulottunga I, alias Rajendra married his daughter Rajasundari to Devendravarman of Kalinga.

Of this wedlock was born the illustrious ruler, Ananta Varma Chola-Ganga who, coming to the throne very early in his life (he was hardly 11 years old) ruled his kingdom from the capital city of Kalinganagaram (near modern Chicacole) for nearly 35 years at the end of which he defeated the last of the Somavamsi rulers of Orissa, and shifted his capital to the Mahanadi delta around 1112 A.D. His new capital could have been Varanasi-kataka, the modern Cuttack-Choudwar area or Yayatinagara or Modern Jajpur in Cuttack district, probably the former. From here he ruled for another thirty seven years his now vastly expanded empire and died a grand old man of 81. Anantavarman Chola-Ganga as he called himself was a contemporary of the Chola ruler Kulottunga I (of Tanjore) and was the first great ruler of the later Gangas. He assumed the dynastic appellation of Chola-Ganga in honour of his mother Rajasundari, the Chola princess. At the height of his rule, Anantavarman's (1077-1150 A.D.) empire of Kalinga extended from the Godavari in the south to the Bhagirathi (the Ganga) in the north. With the amalgamation of Utkal in his empire around 1110 A.D., he bent his energies to the stabilisation of the empire, and by 1135 A.D. had routed the powerful Kalachuris of the north-west; and with the consolidation of the kingdom brought about with the suppression of the last of his enemies viz., the Kalachuris, he turned his attention to works of piety and devotion.

JAGANNATH TEMPLE

The present Jagannath temple at Puri was constructed by Anantavarman Chola-Ganga. Started some time about 1130 A.D. this enormous temple at Puri (or Purushottama-kshetra as the inscriptions term it) dedicated to Lord Jagannath is a handiwork of Chola-Ganga who was a devout Saivaite calling himself a 'Paramamahesvara', but later became a staunch Vaishnavite, taking on such appellations as 'Parama-Bhattaraka' and 'Parama-Vaishnava' under the influence of the great Vaishnavite saint Ramanujacharya, who was a contemporary of Chola-Ganga and twice visited Puri, once in 1122 A.D. and again in 1137 A.D. It was not that Lord Jagannath was Chola-Ganga's creation. Puri had been the immemorial seat of the Lord who had been the guardian deity of all the empires that rose and fell in this region. Yayati Kesari, an illustrious ruler of the Somavamsi dynasty that ruled over Orissa between 930 A.D. and 1110 A.D. and a great builder of temples, gave the Lord, then housed in a dilapidated shrine, a fitting sanctum which however was again replaced two hundred years later by Chola-Ganga by the present majestic and commanding structure befitting the growing stature of the Lord.

THE DRUM CHRONICLE

There is a unique document preserved in the Puri temple called the 'madala panji' "Drum-Chronicle"—a name given to it because of its similarity to this percussion instrument. This records the history of the temple from its hoary origin to the 16th century when it was written. This chronicle (half tradition and half history) has been of invaluable assistance in writing the history of Orissa which can be described not inaccurately as the history of the Lord of Puri.

According to this temple chronicle, the construction of the present structure cost the exchequer five lakh tolas of gold while Chola-Ganga endowed the deities with ornaments worth 125,000 tolas of gold. Built on high ground, named the Nilachala (the Blue-hill) the Jagannath temple faces east removed about a mile from the sea. The Orissan temple has already stabilised itself in its evolution into a bi-cameral structure when Anantavarman came to build this shrine. We find the basic constituents of the Orissan temples, the Deul or the Sri Mandir or the sanctum sanctorum and the Jagamohan or the nave. The bhogamandapa or the Hall of offering and the natamandir or the hall of dance we find today are later accretions erected in the 15th century attributed to Purushottama Deva. This quadricameral temple presents a magnificent silhouette against the back-drop of the blue of the sky and the coconut studded green of the horizon, visible for miles on end. The cardinal points on the three walls of the garbhagriha are adorned with niches housing Vishnu in his Vamana, Varaha and Narasimha avataras. The bhogamandapa and the natamandir, which as mentioned earlier are later additions are studded with numerous panels depicting the pranks and feats of Krishna. The temple is girded by two concentric rectangular walls of enclosure, the outer one being 665' x 640'. An enormous monolithic chlorite dwajasthambha forty feet in height stands majestically in front of the main entrance to the temple. This dwajasthambha which once stood in front of the Sun temple at Konarak was uprooted from there and transported to Puri by a later Maratha chief named Guru Brahmachari who re-erected it in front of the temple of Lord Jagannath.

Yet another illustrious scion of this dynasty was Anantavaraman's grandson Rajaraja III's grandson Narasimha I (1245-64 A.D.) who built at the mouth of the Chandrabhaga river, a tributary of the Mahanadi, the grandest of Orissan temples, dedicated to the Sun God. Built between 1245 and 1256 A.D. on a cosmic conception of a heavenly chariot-on-wheels, the temple which faces east has the garbhagriha and the Jagamohan built on a single podium borne on twenty four wheels and drawn by seven horses, which flank the gracefully ascending flight of steps leading to the fantastically carved green chlorite porch of the Jagamohan. The Puri dwajasthamba must have faced this flight of steps a few feet away. Unlike at Puri, the natamandir, which in this case, is co-eval with the main temple, and is roofless, stands isolated between the main entrance at the Eastern wall and the steps to the Jagamohan.

The entire campus is enclosed by a compound wall 850' x 540'. Of its original height of 14' hardly 6' remains and the sand dunes have built up the ground level to the height of the walls with the result that the temple gives an impression of being sunk in sand, which it was for centuries till Lord Curzon disinterred it from oblivion and took up its renovation and preservation. The main tower over the garbhagriha called the gandi in the language of the Orissan architect is no longer there having collapsed at least a few centuries back while the tower over the jagamohan has been luckily preserved for us by the efforts of the pioneering work of the early archaeologists at the turn of the century, who has filled the hollow of the Jagamohan with rubble and sand to support the roof.

The garbhagriha walls house in the external niches of the three cardinal directions three exquisite and fortunately well preserved man-size green chlorite icons of the Sun God, two standing and one riding a horse, while the basement of the panel depicts the seven straining horses whose reins are held by Aruna shown between the feet of the deity.

UNBELIEVABLE STONE CARVINGS

The outer surface of the garbhagriha and the Jagamohan is one mass of sculpture, scroll work, and glyptic riot that passes description. For such enormous surface work on stone, with such diligent care

RABINDRANATH TAGORE AND HIS SOCIO-ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

By S. B. SARKAR

IT does not seem to be an easy task to isolate and marshal the social and economic ideas of an individual whose main province was neither sociology nor economics. Men of creative imagination, however, almost invariably leave behind discernible imprints, though in a more or less fragmentary manner, of their vision and outlook on many subjects other than their major creative arena. Rabindranath Tagore, a versatile genius of our times, was no exception. Essentially a literary personality of high distinction, Tagore freely allowed his creative thinking to hover over matters which, strictly speaking, bore no direct relationship with his literary pursuits. It is therefore but natural that we often come across glimpses of his ideas much of which can conveniently be classed as socio-economic, and yet Tagore was not an economic thinker or a social scientist in the modern sense of the term. He can perhaps more precisely be called a social reformer, but the field of social action conceived and at times even practised by him speaks of underlying economic considerations.

Tagore lived and worked in those troubled days of pre-independent India when nationalistic sentiments and patriotic fervour were reigning supreme in the entire socio-political scene of the country. Dwelling on the subject of evolution of economic thinking in India an eminent economist has aptly observed that "the seeds of nationalistic economics sown by Naoroji and nurtured to growth by Ranade bore ample fruits in the twentieth century partly in the period of the Swadeshi Movement of 1905 and after, and mostly in the inter-war period from 1919 to 1939. During the entire period of the first four decades of the present century, economic thinking in India was intensely nationalistic." * Indeed centuries of political bondage and economic exploitation quite naturally inspired, in those days, a class of Indian nationalist intellectuals to embark on bold schemes of political action the raison d'etre of which was very often social injustice and economic misery. Abject poverty of the Indian masses coupled with perpetual economic backwardness, the inglorious role of a potentially rich country as a traditional market for British manufactured goods, absence of any positive action on the part of the alien rulers to improve the economic well-being of the people—all contributed to the emergence of a plethora of progressively nationalistic ideas the like of which was not witnessed before.

It is singularly unfortunate that Tagore did not live to see the much-desired independence of India but he, like many others, had his unmistakable share in its achievement. Independence of the country which, historically speaking, was rather destined to suffer prolonged neglect and centuries of social and economic stagnation, brought in its wake renewed hopes and aspirations for a better and prosperous future. It must be recalled that Tagore, in no small measure, helped to kindle such hopes among the people especially during the days of the freedom struggle. We have, however, travelled a long way since independence and have been fortunate enough to witness the changing face of our backward country through a series of Five-Year Plans.

Perhaps it is not widely known that practically every facet of our socio-economic life engaged Tagore's attention and kept him occupied throughout his eventful life. A sensitive individual as he was, his absorbing interest in every possible aspect of human existence was almost a layman's puzzle. Indeed Tagore's concern for the suffering humanity, his sympathy for the neglected and downtrodden, his abiding faith in man as the creator of his own destiny, his emphasis on universal brotherhood and unified approach to human problems are all living inspirations to the present-day world torn by trouble and turmoil. It is unfortunate that today in our eagerness to attempt a materialistic interpretation of the contemporary history we are fast losing grip over our destiny and consequently are thrown in the whirlpool of devastation and despair. There seems to be hardly any escape for us from this tangled mass of events unless we make our imagination more balanced and realistic. True is the maxim—'as civilization advances poetry declines'—and it is even more true in the context of our present-day civilization which is creating problems faster than it can possibly solve.

SYMBOL OF UNITY

A rich product of Bengal, Tagore was a symbol of Indian unity, for he realised that collective good to the people could only be brought about by collective action. This realisation prompted him to denounce narrow provincialism and linguism in so many words. Even today, long after independence, we are often tormented by the prevalence of narrow localised interests which cut at the root of national unity and cohesion and, in a bid to end all these, are straining our nerves to bring about what is called an 'emotional integration' of the people. The remarkable thing about Tagore's farsightedness is that he realised its necessity long before and took enormous pains to inculcate the true ideals of unity among the Indian people. His immortal 'Jana Gana Mana' stands out prominently as a fitting contribution to the cause of resurgent Indian nationalism and national unity.

India is still a land of mass illiteracy and millions in the countryside are not capable of understanding even the alphabets. Doubtless this is a serious impediment on our way to material progress, for without sufficient education and enlightenment of its population a nation however big in other respects is likely to remain backward not only politically but also socially and economically. Tagore appreciated the gravity of this formidable problem but he was no believer in the traditional system of education. It was Tagore who probably, for the first time in this country, felt the imperative need for purposeful education and started work in that direction. As regards education his was a novel concept. True to his uncommon poetic bent of mind and progressive ideas he devised a system of education which mingled man with nature, for he despised learning within the four walls of a traditional educational institution. Essentially a lover of nature he could not possibly conceive man divorced from nature's overpowering influence and naturally thought that it was nature which alone could exert the most powerful influence to shape human character and destiny. Tagore's Viswa-Bharati, now grown into the stature of an internationally known university, was born out of this vital need for purposeful education. His contributions in this regard were truly that of a pioneer. Students' indiscipline has lately become a problem of no small dimension and the educationists and planners in our country are continuously grappling with this problem without any appreciable measure of success. Tagore's ideals of education embracing within its fold the concept of natural development of human faculties and basic discipline could perhaps afford a possible line of solution to this problem so common these days.

It needs no renewed recital of the fact that the importance of small-scale and cottage industries as effective instruments for achieving the twin objective of rapid industrialisation and relieving unemployment has come to be recognised in unmistakable terms ever since the beginning of the planning era in India. Development of rural industries with the object of mitigating the rigours of rural unemployment is a vital part of our planned programmes. In fact, it is now the declared policy of the Government to bring about a revival of these hitherto dying industries for purely economic reasons. True that Tagore was unaware, at his times of the various strategies of economic development but when he conceived the idea of Sriniketan surely he had in mind the pains and penalties of the vast number of unemployed and under-employed rural folk. He might have been ignorant of the niceties of modern economic doctrines and their application to specific economic problems but his conception in this regard was fundamentally sound and was calculated to promote real welfare of the poor and economically handicapped village artisans. His heart ached at the untold sufferings of the millions of unemployed and under-employed in the countryside and by establishing an institution like Sriniketan he endeavoured to provide a solution to this problem in his own characteristic way.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

The philosophy behind the Community Development Projects in our country on the success of which material prosperity of rural India largely depends is, in a real sense, a restatement of the ideals of self-help and co-operation so gallantly championed by Tagore. Characterising the first impact of the Swadeshi Movement of 1905 as "to some extent romantic" Dr. Bhabatosh Datta has observed that during this period "there were writings and lectures in which patriotism was the dominant element and sometimes patriotism clashed with practical wisdom . . . . . But this romantic phase performed the valuable task of turning the attention of the educated classes to rural reconstruction, revival of handicrafts and co-operation. Rabindranath Tagore's famous essay "Swadeshi Samaj" expressed forcefully what many Indians were thinking about the reconstruction of Indian village life through self-help and idealistic leadership; Tagore gave a well-knit logic which has again been revived in support of community project schemes."

Plentiful labour supply and relatively poor capital resources have prompted the Indian planners to concentrate mainly on labour-intensive schemes of development. To man our growing industries we also need a large number of skilled personnel but unfortunately the skill-building programmes in our country are still inadequate. To make matters worse, the youths of this country have an undue preference for white collar jobs and the dignity of labour is yet to be appreciated in its true perspective. It has often been said, and not without reason, that Bengali youths, even when they are full of possibilities, prefer to go unemployed rather than to accept a situation involving manual labour even for the sake of their livelihood. Tagore's understanding of the problem was basically correct and he deprecated this aversion of the Bengali youths to manual labour apart from emphasizing the dignity of labour in unambiguous terms. He seemed to be a realist when he made an apparently uncharitable suggestion that the Bengali youths should be mercilessly driven out of their cosy homes so that they might be obliged to set foot on the road to adventure and perforce become capable of assuming risks and shouldering responsibilities in the practical fields of active life. It might be pointed out here that assumption of risks is essentially an economic function which goes a long way to promote economic advance, and Tagore's reflection on this score, although occasioned by his concern for unenterprising Bengali youths, bears eloquent testimony to his economic vision.

It can hardly be denied that economic exploitation of many by a few is still one of our major economic ills. In fact, the Indian socio-economic scene presents an unhappy spectacle of glaring inequalities. Reduction of inequality and an even distribution of economic power are naturally among the declared objectives of our Five-Year Plans. India is truly a land of variety and the diverse pattern of her economic existence at once prove to be somewhat confusing. Probably no social malady clouds the Indian economic scene in a more undignified way than the presence of high incidence of inequality among the people. A land of strange paradox, India embraces within her fold both the abnormally rich and the miserably poor, the latter in depressingly larger proportion. Tagore was fully conscious of this unfortunate social phenomenon and his 'Dui Bigha Jami' speaks of his awareness of the novel methods of exploitation of the poor by the rich. Even though Tagore had no concrete solutions to offer, his acquaintance with a modern economic problem is significant. His idea of the role of zamindars as trustees originated from his concern for the poor peasants who were almost defenceless against economic exploitation. Tagore strove for equality and sought to achieve social harmony which is yet a distant objective in our country even after a decade of conscious and calculated planning.

ECHO IN U. N. CHARTER

Tagore's emphasis on the reduction of inequality, his deep concern for the under-privileged and last but not the least, his intense inclination to preserve human rights afford valuable glimpses of his mature and refined socio-economic outlook. The United Nations Organisation today stands, among other things, for the preservation of human rights and without undue exaggeration we may perhaps say that the image of Tagore's vision is clearly reflected in the U.N. Charter.

The social and economic plight of women figured prominently in the writings of Tagore. He repeatedly emphasized that women must have their rightful place in the social set-up of a country if it is to maintain an even rate of socio-economic progress. Early during the present century, Tagore's writings on the trend of civilization in relation to the role of women are worth reckoning. He wrote—"At the present stage of history civilization is almost exclusively masculine, a civilization of power, in which woman has been thrust aside in shade. Therefore it has lost its balance and it is moving by hoping from war to war . . . . . Today's civilization, it is hoped, will be based not merely upon economic and political competition and exploitation but upon worldwide social co-operation, upon spiritual ideals of reciprocity, and not upon economic ideals of efficiency and then women will have their true place." (Personality—Woman, 1917-18). The Indian Constitution has recognised the equality of rights among men and women and has ruled out the possibility of any discrimination between the sexes in political, social and economic fields. The economic and social status of women in our country has thus been elevated to keep pace with the progressive ideas of our times. It is significant to note that writing in 1917 Tagore was not only alive to the social handicaps of women but also pleaded for their early removal.

The farsightedness of Tagore was indeed remarkable. In one of his famous addresses (Crisis in Civilization) written on the occasion of his eightieth birthday when the prospects of independence was simply a matter of pious optimism Tagore declared in clear and candid language that "the wheels of Fate will some day compel the English to give up their Indian Empire. But what kind of India will they leave behind, what stark misery? When the stream of their two centuries' administration runs dry at last, what a waste of mud and filth they will leave behind them!" Thus the great poet observed like a prophet and visualised the shape of things to come like a realist. What actually pained him was the nature of neglect and the extent of exploitation the Indian people suffered at the hands of their unkind alien rulers. Needless to add only a true patriot with a crusading zeal for social reform could have such a clear vision and forward-looking frame of mind. In fact, Tagore's richness of imagination and maturity of thought on all conceivable human problems startled the whole world. It is really difficult to imagine how a man who was essentially a poet could afford to th nk so much about so many things that affect humanity.

CHOLAGANGA TEMPLES

for detail, Konarak has very few parallels, and close approximations will be found in the Chandella temple-complex at Khajuraho or the Hoysala temples of Mysore. Animal life, vegetation, exotic as well as indigenous, fantastic animal figurines, naga and nagini images, erotic representations of men and women i inconceivable poses, dancing girls and gigant.c femal instrumentalists mantle every square inch of the structure, which even in its ruins stun the on-looker with its overpowering grandeur as a lithic repertoire of Orissan art. One has to stretch one's imagination to strained limits to share the feelings of the Chola-Ganga prince Narasimha I when he stood on the Chandrabhaga sanghama and drank of the idyllic beauty of this enormous embodiment of his cosmic concept.

Certainly no patch on this grandest piece of Eastern Indian art, but with its own right to its claim of a superb piece of architecture, is the shy delicate and beautifully built temple of Ananta Vasudeva, on the eastern bank of Vidusarovar, the sacred tank of Bhubaneswar.

Even as early as 1212 A.D. when Anangabhima Deva III, father of Narasimha Deva I came to the throne, the Sultan of Bengal had declared himself independent of Delhi and made inroads into Orissa, which were effectively resisted by both the father and the son. The Haihaya prince, Paramardi Deva, who was married to Narasimha I's sister, Chandrika Devi was one of Narasimha's able generals. It was in one of these border wars fought to contend the Sultan of Bengal that Paramardi Deva the Haihaya prince lost his life; and the pious widowed princess Chandrika who was a great devotee of Lord Krishna even from her childhood built and dedicated this temple to Sri Krishna and his brother Balarama. When it came to be built in 1278 A.D., a few decades after Konarak, the Orissan temple had evolved itself into its maturity of the full complement of the four components, viz., the Sri Mandir or the deul, the Jagamohan, the Bhogamandir and the Natamandir. Vaishnavism by this time had taken deep root in Orissa and even in an essentially Saivaite centre, like Bhubaneswar, a temple dedicated to Krishna and Balarama came to be built. The deul is cruciform-shaped, which marks it from the rest of the Orissan temples, while the three halls in front are crowned in true Orissan style by tiered roofs (called pidha). The niches on the garbhagriha walls also enshrine Vaishnavite deities.

Innumerable smaller shrines were built by the Chola Gangas over three centuries of their rule. One sees them dotting the Mahanadi delta where their glory rose to its greatest heights. They and the rulers of their predecessor dynasty, the Somavamsis have left a veritable storehouse of art and architecture, that is the wonder of Orissa.

THE MOTHER BENIGN

By Dr. ROMA CHAUDHURI

"She creates the world of souls and Matter,
This Universe vast and fine.
And graciously brings salvation to all,
She, the Mother Benign."
(Sri Sri Candi. 1.56)

COILS and coils of incensed smoke, rising proudly out of the holy sacrificial fire, lit exhilaratingly on the occasion of the joyous Mother-Worship, go up and up, up and up, across the hills and the dales, over the seas and rivers, beyond the horizons and the quarters, carrying the eternal fragrance of the All-Beautiful, All-Blissful, All-Benign Mother — "the Barada". With these, go up our in most, intense, incessant prayers also, again and again —

"Be gracious, O Goddess, the Saviour of devotees,
Be gracious, O Mother Benign,
Be gracious, O Mother of the World and save it,
O Mistress of the Universe fine."
(Sri Sri Candi. 11.3)

Again and again —

"The Goddess who brings us Heaven or Salvation,
Whose form is the world lovable,
When she is eulogised by us all,
What's Her homage suitable?"
(Sri Sri Candi 11.7)

"Barada!"—the Gracious Giver of Boons, the Benevolent Benefactor of Salvation, the Sweet

Saviour of Mankind! Why do we call Her so? Simply because we feel that our whole existence depends on Her and Her alone. But how do you know that — a critic might intrude in here. But we reply: We do not know, we simply feel. Knowing requires explanation, Feeling does not. The questions of 'How' and 'Why' are essential in the case of "Knowing"; never in that of "Feeling". For "Feeling" is just "Being", a kind of direct experience, a kind of total realisation, a kind of universal apprehension, beyond all doubts, above all quibblings, away, aside, apart from all hair-splitting arguments of Reason, of any kind.

But Life is not so easy for all. It is an organic whole, and so it has necessarily to work out a harmony amongst its different sides — Reason and Feeling. So, this very fundamental feeling of absolute dependence on God has, too, been subjected to a through searching, logical and philosophical criticism. Hence let us be bold, face it and have done with it first. For, who can proceed for long, proceed further with the shadow of total annihilation hanging over one's head?

Philosophical Objection: The Law of Karma. The philosophical objection to the above Theory of Grace is based on the well-known Law of Karma, one of the main pillars of our age-old Indian Philosophy. On the surface, it is a simple enough Law: "As you sow, so you reap." According to this Law, thus, Karma and Karma-phala, an action and its appropriate result, are necessarily related, like a cause and its effect. In fact, a cause is a cause, only because it is fully capable of producing its effect by itself, without waiting for anything else—otherwise, it is not a "cause" at all.

In exactly the same manner, an action, the cause, by itself, brings about its result, the effect. Nothing else is necessary here. Thus, different kinds of Karmas, naturally, bring about different Phalas. Some lead to worldly results, like health, wealth happiness (or their opposites); some, Svarga or Naraka or results to be experienced in the next world, viz. in Heaven or Hell; some, Moksa or Salvation. But in all cases without distinction, a particular kind of Karma brings about its particular kind of Phala automatically, necessarily, independently.

But, what do we find, alas, in the above Theory of Grace? Here, we have the illogical, insupportable, intolerable intrusion of an outside something —Divine Grace! If our Karmas make us eligible for this or that kind of result — well and good — let us have those, let us have Svarga (Heaven), let us have Moksa — who objects, who does ever object, who can ever object? But God? However mighty and majestic He may be, however benign and benevolent, let Him remain there in His lofty isolation in His lovely 'Loka'; but let Him not come down from His high pedestal to the dust and din of our world, impose His will on us, intervene in our affairs, interfere with the course of Justice. Yes, let Him not do that; let Him honour His own supreme Law of Justice; let Him preserve His own great gift of Free Will and Independence to Mankind.

Hence, how can the Supreme Mother be called "Barada", or "Svarga — Moksa — Data? In fact, She cannot grant us boons — we ourselves alone can do so. She cannot lead us to Heaven or Salvation — we ourselves alone can do so. So, what is the use of endowing Her with attributes which, we know, according to all canons of Philosophy and Justice, can never really belong to her?

Even if it be said that She alone, being the Supreme Cause, whatever is produced, must be due to Her and Her alone, still then, it has to be said that there is no question of Her graciously granting us anything, as She has to do so, according to our own Karmas. Hence, it is not necessary for us to beg anything from Her; rather we have every right to demand everything from Her, according to our own Karmas, straightway, without fear.

So, how can she be "Barada", the Mother Benign, the Giver Gracious, the Benefactor Benevolent of this or that to us?

Mystical Reply: Law of Love. As rational beings, we are, undoubtedly, all philosophers. But is not the end of Philosophy Mysticism,—not in a narrow, depressing sense of denying Reason and deifying Blind Faith; but in a wide, exhilarating sense of elevating analytic Reason to Synthetic Realisation? Thus, Mysticism does not nullify Reason, but pacifies it, purifies it, perfects it. How? It pacifies its insatiable pride, it purifies its intrinsic blind spots; it perfects its inherent gaps. And what has it to say to us from this standpoint?

Only this: The Law of Karma, the Law of Justice cannot, of course, be denied. Still, provisions will have to be made for its proper application in the spiritual realm.

Now, from the spiritual standpoint, what is the relation between God and the Soul? According to all views, the best, nay, the only relation is one of Love—not of awe, not even of reverence, but, finally and fundamentally, one of Love, and Love alone. Thus, the first and the last word here is: We love God, God loves us. And, the Law of Love is, indeed, a Law of Justice; but never a Law of Demand, a Law of Exaction, a Law of Force.

See, a son loves his father, and knows that his father loves him. Now, he also knows that socially, legally, he has certain rights in the family, rights of maintenance, rights of education, rights of property, and so on. But does he demand all these from his parents in a usurious, exacting, pound-shilling-pence counting spirit? Never. For, will it not at once destroy the very parent-son relation for good? In fact, as soon as a son thinks of demanding something from his father at the point of a sword, he simultaneously ceases to be a son, and becomes a mere outside lender, who can, with a clear conscience, demand his money back from his borrower.

Hence, a son, a real son never demands — at most, he may beg, he may request, he may ask for favours; but he never demands. Rather, he never even does all these — for he knows fully that he will get what is beneficial for him from his father always.

Has he, then, no real rights to the above: maintenance education, property, and all the rest? Yes, of course, he has real rights; yet he fully knows that his father will voluntarily, without any demanding from him, gladly, lovingly do whatever is necessary for him.

Such is the Law of Love. There is no compulsion here, no exaction; there is only a spontaneous union between two hearts in eternal understanding, faith, trust. What more is needed?

The Mother Benign. So, who can prevent us from singing out eternally from the depths of our hearts —

"Be gracious, O Goddess, the Remover of sorrows,
Whom all of the three worlds adore,
Grant boons to them who take refuge
Grant boons to all, more and more"
(Sri Sri Candi 11.35.)

It is, indeed, no reflection on us, on our freedom, on our Capacities, on our self-confidence, at

The Impact of the XIX Century

by Hiraunmay Banerjee

WITH the consolidation of British power in India towards the end of the eighteenth century, two distinct cultures came into close contact with each other. On the one side there was the old Indian culture which traces its growth to the Vedic literature. On the other, the new conquerors brought the message of a vigorous culture founded on Science and technology. An impact did take place, but it is generally believed that it produced effect only on one side. It is believed that the robust culture of the West roused India from the soporific effect of her own decaying culture, it helped to break her slumber and to modify her cultural life in many ways, but it did not produce any result on the other side. Evidently, it was felt that it was after all an unequal contest and age was bound to give way to youth.

This view does not, however, appear to bear scrutiny. It does not seem to give a correct idea of the total effect of the impact. There are good reasons to believe that it was not a one-sided affair and in fact both cultures were influenced by this close contact. It was more or less of the nature of a two way traffic. The result of the impact on Indian culture appears to have received adequate attention. An effort will, therefore, be made in the following pages to trace out the major effects produced by it on Western culture.

The contact between the two cultures at the initial stage was somewhat superficial. After all, the East India Company came to India to push their commercial interests. It was by a twist of luck that they found themselves installed as the ruling power in the eastern part of India and this in its turn, released a series of chain actions which helped them to expand and consolidate their political power. With the new burden of administration to discharge, men of high intellectual calibre had to be appointed to fill up important political as well as judicial posts.

It was by a happy stroke of luck that in this connection, Sir William Jones came to be appointed a Judge in the Supreme Court of Calcutta established by the East India Company. Barely thirty-seven years of age, he had already established his reputation as a linguist and jurist of great eminence. Master of all the important languages of the East and the West, he had translated important treatises, in English from diverse languages. He studied law to such perfection that he came to occupy the post of the Commissioner of Bankruptcy. He was knighted in 1783. The same year he came to Calcutta to take charge of his new post as a Judge of the Supreme Court.

Immediately after his arrival he founded the Asiatic Society in 1784 with a view to exploring the different fields of culture of Asia. He also started learning Sanskrit and with his characteristic vigour acquired such deep mastery over this language in a few years' time, that he was able to bring out an English translation of "Shakuntala" the famous drama of Kalidasa in 1789. This was followed by a translation of the "Ritu-Sambara," the "Hitopadesha," the "Gitagovinda" and considerable portions of the Vedas.

This is how Kalidasa's "Shakuntala" came to Europe for the first time. The impact was considerable and worked in two ways. At the first instance, it worked as an incentive to philological studies. The close affinity of the teutonic and latin languages of Europe had been already noticed by European linguists. It came, however, as a great surprise to them, when they made their acquaintance with Sanskrit, that it also bore close affinity to these languages, though it had thriven remotely away from them in a different continent. It was this affinity of the Indo-European group of languages that stimulated linguistic studies. The great German scholar Bopp found in Sanskrit a handy term of comparison with the European languages and demonstrated their close affinity with one another. He thus came to found the Science of linguistic philology, popularly known as comparative philology.

The second way it worked was more romantic. The translation of "Shakuntala" reached the hands of Goethe, who no sooner he went through it, fell literally in love with it. His admiration for the literary merit of this great drama was so profound that he lavished on it such words of praise as had never been uttered for any book. It thus made literary history. His utterances are well known and need not be quoted here. In substance, he said that if anybody was interested to see the good things of life on earth and the good things of heaven together, he has only to read Kalidasa's "Shakuntala." It appears that his admiration for this book overflowed the literary contents and even extended to its form.

It is part of the dramatic form in Sanskrit dramas to have a prelude in which the Manager is expected to introduce the audience into the heart of the drama through some talks with the members of his staff. This technique of introducing the drama proper through a prelude is unknown to the West and had never been practised before When Goethe was introduced to it through the reading of the "Shakuntala," he so liked it that he adopted it in his Faust.

There is good reason to support this inference. The translation of Kalidasa's "Shakuntala" in 1789 introduced it to the European reader for the first time. That Goethe became intimately acquainted with this work is confirmed by the high tribute he paid to this work. On the other hand. Goethe took as long as 43 years to complete his great drama "Faust" in two Parts. He began it at the age of twenty and gave the final touch to the Second Part in the year of his death in 1832. "Faust" made its first appearrance as 'Faust in Fragments' in 1790 in the form of a loosely connected sequence It underwent a second spurt of growth in about 1897, when a substantial portion of the First Part was written out, the complete First Part making its appearance long after, in 1808 To the second phase of growth in 1797 belong the "Dedication," "The Prologue to Heaven" and the 'Prelude upon the Stage." The insertion of a prologue at the beginning of a drama is an old practice which continues from the time of the Greek tragedies It also finds a place in some of Shakespeare's dramas But the introduction of the "Prelude" is altogether a new feature.

The "Prelude" in Part I of Goethe's "Faust" introduces a discussion between the Manager, Merry Andrew and the Poet of a company of strolling players This feature where the Manager carries on a discussion with other members of the theatrical staff, is a regular part of Sanskrit dramatic form Evidently the Manager has been painted after the model of "Sutradharas" of Sankrit dramas. We may, therefore, justifiably conclude that Goethe drew his inspiration for the "Prelude upon the Stage" from Kalidasa's "Shakuntala"

The second wave of the impact came through a different channel and was evidently of a bigger dimension. The Upanishads represent the quintessence of Indian thought but had remained undiscovered to the Western people for hundreds of years. They contain the germs of the different schools of Indian Philosophy that grew up later As pure metaphysical thoughts, they attained a degree of excellence which is yet to be excelled anywhere in the world It lies to the credit of Dara Shiko the eldest son of Emperor Shajehar who tragically lost his life untimely in a scramble for political power, for forging a key for entry to this treasure house. On first acquaintance, he fell so much in love with it that he decided to have it translated into Persian, so that people unacquainted with Sanskrit could have access to it. This translation into Persian was completed in 1657, and thus began its journey westward.

This Persian version of the Upanishads in the long run profoundly influenced Western thought. A French Scholar named Anquetil Dupperron happened to find a copy of the Persian version and decided to translate it into French. He collated his French translation in 1775. French occupied then the position of an international language in the European continent Consequently, this translation introduced the Upanishads to the intellectual world of Europe as a whole.

In this manner, it reached the hands of German philosophers like Schopenhauer and Schelling. Schopenhauer admits his close intimacy with them clearly in his writings, but Schelling does not. There is, however, good collateral evidence to show that he came in colse contact with the texts and collected annotations on them and profoundly admired them. In fact, Schopenhauer fell in love with them even as Goethe fell in love with Kalidasa's "Shakuntala." A pessimist by temperament and a recluse by habit, who shuned society and kept for company only his pet dog, he at last found solace in the teachings of these Upanishads Like Goethe he lavished the highest words of praise for them We may profitably quote some of his observations in this connection, to show the depth of his feelings. He considered the access to the Upanishads through the French translation to be the "Greatest privilege which this still young century (1818) may claim before all centuries." He observed that the "influence of Sanskrit literature will not be less profound than the revival of Greek in the fourteenth century."

Elsewhere, he observed: "In the whole world there is no study, except that of the originals, so beneficial and so elevating as that of the Oupnekhat (Upanishad). It has been the solace of my life, it will be the solace of my death." (Parergo II p.426).

PANTHEISM

Evidently, this contact with the Upanishads caused a deep stir in the mind of the European Philosophers of the time There is no doubt that Schopenhauer himself was profoundly influenced by them. Although his philosophical thinking betrays a spirit of extreme pessimism, which is contrary to the spirit of the genuine Upanishads, his approach to the problems bears the stamp of the Upanishads.

What is more striking is that it was about this time, that pantheism as a philosophical concept made its appearance for the first time in Western Philosophy In India pantheism can be traced even to the Vedas in a germinal form It attained maturity in the Upanishads In substance, it propounds a theory that a single principle pervades the entire universe and works in and through nature including man It was Schelling who propounded a similar kind of pantheism in the West for the first time. Like the Brahman of the Upanishads, his God is an impersonal principle. He is conceived as a universal creative force which is the absolute ground or source of all things, a single all pervading world spirit from which everything springs up

The proposition that a mature form of pantheism first made its appearance in Schelling's writings in West may perhaps be disputed A little clarification on this point is, therefore, called for. Geordano Breno (1568-1639) developed a system which has been labelled pantheistic He held the view that God is immanent and expresses Himself in the living world Even so, he believed that things are composed of uncaused and imperishable elementary parts called monads and the soul itself is an immortal monad and God is the monad of monads. In ultimate analysis, therefore, his theory resolves itself into a pluralistic concept the universe with a dominating principle exercising a general influence over the constituent parts It is not pantheism properly so called

Among other predecessors of Schelling Malebranche's (1638-1715) Philosophy has been acclaimed as pantheistic in conception. He propounded a view that things have no objective basis, what we see as things are not extended things, but ideas in the mind of a thinking God It appears to bear more

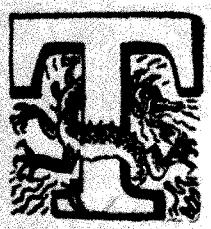
Angry YOUNG POETS

By Haydn Moore Williams



THE poet was once considered to be identical with the vates or prophet of the tribe, and even in modern sophisticated times he occasionally plays a role not unlike that of the ancient Hebrew prophet, the scourge of complacent man. The difference lies in audience reaction: the terrible ancient prophet was frequently heeded and hated, whereas the modern poet is either ignored altogether or has to address his remarks to an increasingly narrow circle. English poets have frequently played the part of prophets crying in the wilderness of the last fifty years, and the story of recent English poetry is the story of the poet's love-hate relationship with the non-poetic world. This dialectic process can be traced from the "Waste Land" era (implicit and explicit recoil from the modern world), through the Left-Wing Auden & Co. of the Thirties (identification with "progressivism"), to the "Apocalypse" and Dylan Thomas in the war-years and the aftermath (exuberance and excess against austerity and sacrifice).

But on the whole the poet is happier when he is against the "establishment" than when he is forced (as in some Communist countries) to identify with an official position.

This has been particularly true of poetry in English since about the middle of the nineteen fifties. In the years that followed the second World War, Britain was a bleak place, and perhaps one reason for the amazing popularity of Dylan Thomas was not merely his attractive broadcasting personality but the direct challenge his verse made to the austerity of the English scene. His sensational death in New York as the climax of a long spell of hard drinking gave an extra fillip to his reputation. This event (in 1953) coincided with Britain's belated emergence into affluence. The problem of delinquency was now related not to poverty but to expensively clad and well-paid "Teddy Boys". Here was a new, more comfortable world, yet in many ways much more frightening, a world under the terrible shadow of the H-bomb, a world of senseless violence and vague anxiety.

It is significant that in this brighter and stranger Britain the younger writers began to turn away from the gay and ebullient figure of Thomas the Rhymer, back to realism and social commentary and satire.

For this was a period of iconoclasm and protest. Novels started appearing which made fun of some of the prominent features of English life, like Kingsley Amis's Lucky Jim with its anti-hero who won't coform to culture snobbery and makes rude noises at polite society. Then John Osborne's Look Back in Anger dropped like a bomb in the West-End Theatre and started a cult of its own—projecting the image of an anguished bitter young man fighting not poverty (after all, haven't we got a Welfare State and all that!) but the more insidious and shadowy enemies of integrity and freedom—snobbery, the Establishment, the Chuch, tradition, even women! Both Amis (comically) and Osborne (seriously) presented literature of cynical rejection and dissidence, combining a vague "leftism" in politics with a contempt for all orthodoxies of Left and Right and Middle too. This attitude might appear now to be too negative and even juvenile to pass for genuine satire; but the point was that it had dramatic impact and a strategy of shock which enlivened and illuminated the literary world of the Fifties. Now some of the ideas and typical attitudes of these so-called "Angry Young Men" found their way into the poetry too.

The anthology New Lines edited by Robert Conquest appeared in 1956—a significant year for Britain witnessing the collapse of her power in the Middle East with the withdrawal from Suez, and the Soviet suppression of the Hungarian revolution. These events though they are rarely mentioned directly (the Suez intervention is only a background element in Osborne's The Entertainer) had a great deal if indirect influence on the development of the Angry Young Man cult and therefore on the emergence of a new type of poetry. New Lines presented nine poets: Philip Larkin, John Wain, Kingsley Amis, Thom Gunn, Elisabeth Jennings, D. J. Enright, John Holloway, Donald Davie, and Robert Conquest. Conquest claimed that the poetry of New Lines was "free from mystical and logical compulsions and—like modern philosophy—is empirical in its attitude to all that comes. This reverence for the real person or event is, indeed a part of the general intellectual ambience...." Conquest stresses the need for honesty and a characteristic distaste for ideology which he claims are trends shared by all these poets, but actually they have little in common. Gunn and Larkin are poles apart; Amis and Wain were both successful novelists vaguely and erroneously dubbed "Angry Young Men"—but there the resemblance ends. Their deliberate rejection of the influence of Dylan Thomas is understandable in a new set of writers determined to say something new in a new way.

But they also broke away from Auden and the "political" poetry of the Thirties, and professed weariness with the learned "cosmopolitan" poetry of Pound and Eliot. This was part of the attempt to restore poetry to a concern with everyday working life, and thus to identify the poet with the 'man in the street". So realism, naturalism, was combined with some ferocious social satire in the manner of Osborne and Wain.

Philip Larkin represents the quietly sceptical side of New Lines with no "Angry" ranting. His most famous piece, Church Going, suffers from a failure of nerve. The "awkward reverence" of the poet in his bicycle clips in the first part (splendidly described) doesn't issue in anything positive in the second part. True, Larkin thinks the Church will always remain and be needed if only to remind us of the dead, but we feel that Larkin doesn't even consider this comment to be a serious one. Yet, the poem has great merits. Although he prefers the luke-warm to the ebullient, Larkin has a firm grip on reality and makes you sensuously aware of the "feel" of modern English life. This awareness of the contemporary world is shared by Kingsley Amis. He too has a technical mastery of form and a witty colloquial style which links the facetiously termed "Movement" with the Augustans. Amis adds however his own spice of merry impertinence. Take Dirty Story with its wit and economy :

"Today a butcher, you cuckolded the grocer,
Fouling his sugar, in thirty seconds only,
All the while tickling a pretty customer."

Not merely funny this, but subtly ambiguous as if Donne were to be rewritten by P. G. Wodehouse and Max Shulman.

In 1957 another anthology, Mavericks (edited by Danny Abse and Howard Sergeant) was put forward as a corrective to New Lines. The editors of this new anthology alleged that New Lines lacked the necessary tension between "Dionysian" subject and craftsmanship. Mavericks featured David Wright, Michael Hamburger, Jon Silkin and Vernon Scannell. Something which the two anthologies had in common was the so-called classical element of good craftsmanship, a return to a formal structure, rhyme, metre, etc. This is particularly true of Kingsley Amis (see his Ode to the East-North-East-by-East Wind, etc.) and Jon Silkin.

It is interesting that Thom Gunn should be associated with New Lines. He might equally well have aligned himself with Mavericks. He is a "classical" poet with a highly "romantic" imagination. He deviated totally from Larkin's quietism, but his wit is more metaphysical than the leg-pulling witty style of Kingsley Amis. He has matured steadily from Fighting Terms (1954) to My Sad Captains (1961). He reacts sensitively to the contemporary scene ; he is a realist like Crabbe or Burns. The world of the Fifties comes alive for us in On the Move with its black-jacketed motor-cyclists:

"On motorcycles, up the road, they come:
Small, black, as flies hanging in heat, the Boys,
Until the distance throws them forth, their hum
Bulges to thunder held by calf and thigh.
In goggles, donned impersonality,
In gleaming jackets trophied with the dust,
They strap in doubt—by hiding it, robust—
And almost hear a meaning in their noise."

Here Gunn has caught the paradox of the teenage "rebel without a cause" of our time: the taste for speed and violence that conceals the uncertainty, the fear, the feeling of inferiority ("They strap in doubt"). This poem has become prophetically relevant in view of the recent "mods and rockers" riots in England. Though he describes the world of the Fifties in all its graphic reality, Gunn is essentially a philosophical poet, intensely intellectually curious about human behaviour. He is particularly good at exploring the consciousness of young teenagers, abnormal psychology, the strangeness of people, and the problems of living in an affluent society under the shadow of the H-bomb. The psychology of a gang-member in Black Jackets for whom even defeat is welcome if it increases his sense of solidarity with the "gang" is especially well done:

"It was only loss he wore,
He wore it to assert, with fierce devotion,
Complicity and nothing more."

Thom Gunn like Amis is a considerable social critic with a lively sympathetic — but candid— appreciation of the dilemma of the half-articulate youthful product of the "affluent" working class, apotheosised in an exaggerated form in the life-style of the Teddy Boy, Black Jacket, Stilyagi, cultus. There is a strongly intellectual strain in Gunn's poetry ; it suffers to some extent from its "metaphysicalness." It is gratifying to note the mellower emotional atmosphere of the poems in My Sad Captains. One of the best poems in this collection is Claus von Stauffenberg, a poem about the aristocratic Roman Catholic German officer who attempted to assassinate Hitler by planting a time-bomb in his bunker in July 1944. Von Stauffenberg had fought loyally for Germany suffering severe mutilating wounds which removed him from the front line to a Staff appointment. He became convinced that Hitler was Anti-Christ and was the leading spirit in the German resistance movement. The bomb blew up the bunker killing several of Hitler's aides but Hitler though wounded was not killed. The planned Army coup d'etat failed and Von Stauffenberg and others were shot. Gunn pictures the heroic mutilated soldier as a second Brutus :

"The maimed young Colonel who can calculate
On two remaining fingers and a will,
Takes lessons from the past, to detonate
A bomb that Brutus rendered possible."

The scene in the bunker where Hitler pores over the maps with his staff just before the bomb goes off is seen as a symbolic confrontation between two traditions, the rational and Christian versus the irrational and materialistic:

"Over the maps a moment, face to face ;
Across from Hitler, whose grey eyes have filled
A nation with the illogic of their gaze,
The rational man is poised, to break, to build."

The intellectual is not the most obvious characteristic of the poetry of Ted Hughes born in 1930, a year later than Gunn. Hughes's poems have a richly sensuous texture which aims primarily at affecting us through the senses and feelings. But the intellectual sub-structure is there. Hughes is a sort of belated "Maverick". The Dionysian subject-matter is certainly there. Animals fascinate him. In A Dream of Horses, the grooms dream of a stampede:

"We crouched at our lantern, our bodies drank the din,
And we longed for death trampled by such horses
As every grain of the earth had hooves and mane."

Hughes's poetry is not so much rational meditation as an excited and exciting exploration through the nerve-ends, more "Romantic" than "Augustan" but with reminiscences of seventeenth century poetry too. His poetry is passionate and ebullient and even boisterous, a poetry of exclamation rather than quiet statement or ironical interrogation. Could this signal a return to Dylan Thomas? Certainly Hughes is a dissident figure in the chorus of terse and witty satirists, and is never afraid of rhetoric and over-statement. Wind is a typical sound-poem, onomatopoeic and highly alliterative. The woods "crash" and the hills "boom", and there are also sharply visual images:

". . . . . then under an orange sky
The hills had no places, and wind wielded
Blade-like, luminous black and emerald,
Flexing like the lens of a mad eye. . . . ."

Animals are for Hughes the living symbols of irrational forces, the elemental forces of Nature which are opposed to civilisation and reason. The hawk recurs as an image of terror. In Hawk Roosting Hughes makes his hawk say wittily:

"I kill where I please because it is all mine.

There is no sophistry in my body:
My manners are tearing off heads."

Hughes's poetry is refreshingly rural in contrast to the urban poetry of Thom Gunn. The countryside is a character in his poems; and his subjects have included birds, fish, bulls, horses, even a dead pig. But Hughes's Nature is fallen not innocent. He rejects Rousseau and Wordsworth, but has something in common with D. H. Lawrence and J. M. Hopkins, the pagan and the Christian priest! Even the thrush is portrayed as the terrible monster he appears to worms:

"Nothing but bounce and stab
And a ravening second."

To Ted Hughes life seems to be fascinating but terrifying too, a mixture of beauty and pain, violence and tenderness in paradoxical embrace. The pain is relieved by colour, vitality, passion, a kind of splendid viciousness. The hawk with its patient controlled, lethalness, its disciplined madness, its logical paranoia, is yet a figure of awesome beauty—Blakean innocence impinges on experiences. The martyrdom of the Protestant Bishop Farrar by Bloody Mary's men in the Welsh town of Carmarthen becomes a terrible but wildly fascinating (Elizabethan) orgy of bursting organs and steaming blood, and yet Hughes implies that all this horror may have meaning, a sermon in blood of God's love for fallen man, and of man's adherence to what he believes to be God's truth:

"The sullen-jowled watching Welsh townspeople
Hear him crack in the fire's mouth; they see what Black oozing twist of stuff bubbles the smell
That tars and retches their lungs: no pulpit
Of his ever held their eyes so still,
Never, as now his agony, his wit. . . . ."

These two, Gunn and Hughes, are perhaps the most important and promising poets now writing. They link British and American poetry, for Gunn now lectures in an American University and Hughes is widely appreciated in America too. We may say that they loosely represent the classical (Gunn) and the romantic (Hughes) sides of the poetry of the Fifties. Ted Hughes will probably have a wider appeal because he is not afraid of passion and risks sheer excess. Yet he combines his furious delight in words with an acute sense of disciplined form, and his poetry is a vehicle which can convey a comic as well as a tragic vision of life.

I wish I had space to write about several other poets like the Welsh priest R. S. Thomas and the energetic ebullient David Holbrook who cannot be included in any "movement" or "trend" but who nevertheless have written some of the best poetry of our time. These must be left for another occasion.

IMPACT OF THE 19TH CENTURY

resemblance to the Subjective Idealism of Bishop Berkeley (1685-1753) than to pantheism properly so called.

In this connection Spinoza's (1632-1677) grand concept of God as Substance comprehending everything is recalled to mind. It, however, conceived of reality as two completely detached parallel processes as manifest in matter and mind without interaction. It thus substitutes the dualism of substance by the dualism of attributes. It is not Pantheism proper.

Two points stand out prominently from the above analysis. The Upanishads reached the hands of Western Philosophers through the French translation of their Persian version compiled by Dara Shiko, towards the end of the eighteenth century. It caused a great stir among German Philosphers evidently, early in the nineteenth century. Schopenhauer's reference to the privilege of access to the Upanishads in "the still young century" appears to bear this out. The other fact is that Schelling's pantheism bears a close similarity to the pantheism as evolved in the old Upanishads. It is probable, therefore, that Schelling's thinking was greatly influenced by the Upanishads.

There is additional evidence to show that the degree of probability in this case is very high. There is clear evidence that Schelling not only came in contact with the teachings of the Upanishads, but he also admired them as much as Schopenhauer. The following quotation from Maxmuller taken from the Introduction of Volume I of the "Sacred Books of the East" will confirm this:—

"That Schelling and his school should use rapturous language about the Upanishads might carry little weight with the large class of philosophers by whom everything beyond the clouds of their own horizon is labelled mysticism."

Evidently. Maxmuller speaks here from his personal knowledge as he had attended lectures of Schelling at Berlin and as a pupil had come in close contact with him. The following quotation from another part of the same 'Introduction' will confirm this:

"My real love for Sanskrit literature was first kindled by the Upanishads. It was in the year 1844, when attending Schelling's lectures at Berlin, that my attention was drawn to those ancient theosophic treatises and I still possess my collection of the Sanskrit manuscript which had then just arrived at Berlin, the Chambers collection and my copies of commentaries which I made at the time. Some of the translation which I left with Schelling, I have never been able to recover."

It may, therefore, be justifiably assumed that the second contact through the Upanishads, brought about more significant consequences. It profoundly influenced the philosophical thought of the West and gave birth to true Pantheism.

OBSCENITY and PORNOGRAPHY

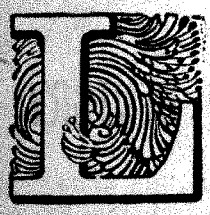
By SADHAN KUMAR GHOSH



LADY CHATTERLEY has had rough luck. She has been dragged into the courts of the three continents, and the famous four-letter word—which forms part of the general currency of teddy-boy conversation, and can be overheard anytime in a tea shop or cafe—has been invested with a spurious glamour. Her worst piece of ill-luck is that she has been lumped with Fanny Hill. But a criminal prosecution is the sort of adversity that really brings strange bedfellows. First Mellor (but that was good while it lasted) and now Fanny Hill. Ladies are not overfond of each other, and this prosecution has really been conducted by the ghost of Mrs. Grundy.

Any trial for obscenity has its comic side. One recalls Ashenden's remark in The Round Dozen: "I remember Rhoda Broughton telling me once that when she was young people said her books were fast and when she was old they said they were slow and it was very hard since she had written exactly the same sort of book for forty years." Talk of Equity varying with the Lord Chancellor's foot! Obscenity varies with the responses of the Director of Prosecutions. And, of course, with Anno Domini.

The criterion of obscenity is the famous Hicklin test—whether the intention is "to deprave and corrupt." The test is easy to apply when pornography wears no masks as in the case of "Romance of Lust" or "Adventures of Lady Harper." It is less easy in the case of books with an ostensibly different intent—"The Naked and the Dead," for example or "For ever Amber."

In 1954, Messrs. Secker and Warburg were prosecuted for having published The Philanderer which was a sort of Fanny Hill in reverse but containing some very good writing. In this case Mr. Justice Stable applied the Hicklin test with great liberality. He directed the jury to read as a whole and to remember the distinction between obscenity and pornography. On the important words to deprave and corrupt the learned judge said:

> Remember the charge is a charge that the tendency of the book is to corrupt and deprave. The charge is not that the tendency of the book is either to shock or disgust. That is not a criminal offence. Then you say: 'Well, corrupt or deprave whom?' and again the test; those whose mind's are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands a publication of this kind may fall. What exactly does that mean? Are we to take our literary standards as being the level of something that is suitable for a fourteen-year old school girl?

Justice Cockburn, in R. Vs. Hicklin had explained that by "to deprave and corrupt" he meant the stirring up of libidinous thoughts. However, this cannot explain the various prosecutions conducted in the twenties and thirties at the instance of Sir William Joynson Hicks. The most notorious of these cases was the one against Radclyffe Hall's The Well of Loneliness. This was an exploration of Lesbian love. John Chandos describes this as a "long, sad, dull book about a sexual relationship between two women." The Director of Public Prosecutions asked Arnold Bennett, one of the chief witnesses for the defence, whether he knew what women did with each other, when they took off their clothes. James Douglas, a yellow Press journalist caused some sensation by declaring: "I would rather put a phial of prussic acid in the hands of a healthy boy or girl than the book in question." Bernard Shaw offered to produce the phial, the book and the children, if James Douglas guaranteed to administer the prussic acid rather than the book. The book was banned and all existing copies ordered to be destroyed. Against this perverse judgment, almost every writer of note including Bernard Shaw, Arnold Bennett, T. S. Eliot and Lytton Strachey protested.

E. M. Forster told me at King's College in 1959 that there had been an earlier furore about H. G. Well's Ann Veronica. (It seems a very tame book to-day). It did not come to a prosecution but copies were being withdrawn from the circulating libraries. Then, as now, the Spectator was on the other side—i.e. the side of bishops, Home Secretaries, and Mrs. Grundy. E. M. Forster and Thomas Hardy wrote a letter to the Spectator, protesting against the persecution of H. G. Wells. The Spectator sent the cryptic and discourteous reply: "We are not impressed by famous names." I clearly remember E. M. Forster saying pathetically "It just showed how insignificant we writers were."

Long before this, Thomas Hardy himself had to fight his publishers over the alleged immorality of Tess of the D'Urbervilles. He had to compromise with his conscience and his needs by expurgating whole chapters and changing others. He even introduced a wheelbarrow at one point so that Clare might carry the dairymaids across a flooded lane without the distressing implication of physical contiguity between the man and the girls. But he made a private resolution to publish the excised chapters when he could elsewhere and finally the complete book in its original form was published in the last decade of the nineteenth century to loud cries of protest from the censor-perverts.

In 1935 proceedings were instituted against The Sexual Impulse by Edward Charles. Sir Julian Huxley had provided a Foreword to the book which was an effort to provide a corrective guide to perplexed, persons, written in a pleasant, tete'-a-tete', untechnical language. Professor Malinowski, the anthropologist said in evidence that open discussion of problems of sex such as those contained in the book in question was necessary in the interests of marriage and the family. Professor J. B. S. Haldane, the great scientist and humanist, who has made India his home said that this book dealt with various positions of coitus and was, therefore, valuable because a knowledge of variety was often necessary to avoid pain. The Bench ordered the destruction of the book, after a lengthy trial. Mr. E. M. Forster protested unavailingly against the destruction of this book at the International Conference of Authors in Paris in June 1935.

The boundaries between pornography and literature were not sharply defined before the nineteenth century. The first example of predominant obscenity was the Earl of Rochester's play Sodom. The theme of the play was the tyranny of a paederast, King Bolloxinian, who forbids all normal sexual transactions and enforces homosexuality by law. The play opens in the royal palace with the news of the arrival of gifts from a neighbouring sovereign.

COURTIER: My liege, a stranger at yon royal gate
Does from Gomorrah with a message wait
And forty stripling for a present bring.

KING: Oh it's a present from our brother King
Conduct them in, it was very kindly done

The theme entered satirical literature too and we find Charles Churchill writing in 1764:

Women are kept for nothing but the breed
For pleasure we must have a Ganymede
A fine fresh Hylas, a delicious boy
To serve our purposes of beastly joy.

And then there is John Cleland's Fanny Hill. It is generally supposed to be the best English erotic work, not cent per cent pornography. Cleland invokes the name of sentimental love which the average pornographer does not but this is mere decor.

Sylvia Beach, who ran the famous "Shakespeare and Company" bookshop on the Left Bank has left a fascinating account of how Ulysses came to be published, in her memoirs Shakespeare and Company published by Faber. When Joyce came to Paris, Ulysses was appearing in the Little Review which had to close down. No English or American publisher would touch the manuscript. Sylvia Beach says: "Three seizures of the magazine by officials of the United States Post Office, on the grounds of obscenity, failed to break the spirit of the editors, Margaret Anderson and Jane Heap; but a fourth one, which was instigated by John Sumner of the Society for the Suppression of Vice put an end to the magazine . . . . . Joyce came to announce the news. It was a heavy blow for him, and I felt, too, that his pride was hurt. In a tone of complete discouragement, he said "My book will never come out now." All hope of publication in the English-speaking countries, at least for a long time to come, was gone. And here in my little bookshop sat James Joyce, sighing deeply.

It occurred to me that something might be done and I asked: "Would you let Shakespeare and Company have the honour of bringing out your Ulysses ?"

He accepted my offer immediately and joyfully (Shakespeare and Company. Pp. 56-57).

And that is how James Joyce's Ulysses, supposedly one of this century's masterpieces was published.

Standards of obscenity, therefore, are like fashions in millinary; they change from age to age. Even in the same age, it is conditioned by personal responses. The obscene element in Lolita for example is indispensable to the story. But apart from the frequent bottom-pinching, the theme is ideal material for pornography. But so fine and discerning a judge as Somerset Maugham found Lolita not obscene but dull and unreadable. On the other hand, Nabokov himself has pronounced Lady Chatterley's Lover to be a mass of obscenities, thus contradicting the consensus which includes Helen Gardner F. R. Leavis and Walter Allen.

There remain, however, a pair of poems allegedly by Lord Byron—Don Leon and Arabella —the obscenity of which has not been properly tested. These poems, also known as An Epistle from Lord Byron to Lady Byron are supposed to have been found near Pisa. The poems are not in fact by Byron at least not in their entirety. But it is difficult to agree with those modern biographers of Byron who argue that they are not his work at all. The poems are so thoroughly Byronic that one always feels the author of Don Juan must have lent a hand in their composition, although there must be considerable interpolations.

John Chandos contends that the poems are not really obscene but constitute 'literature'. "There are two central themes: an examination of the nature of and an apologia for paederasty and an account of the circumstances leading to the commission by Byron upon his wife of the practice, usually associated with paederasty, which, it was alleged, was a cause of Lady Byron's estrangement from her husband" (John Chandos: Unicorns at Play). It is, in any case the most satisfactory explanation of the separation. She knew about Byron's incest and his other amours, but being a high-strung and peculiar person herself was shocked by the suggestion of unnatural coitus.

There are many quotable passages, but there is space for only three:

(1)

I love a youth but Horace did the same;
If he's absolved say why am I to blame?
When young Alexis claimed a Virgil's sighs
He told the world his choice and may not I ?

(2)

O lovely woman by your maker's hand
For man's delight and solace wisely planned
Thankless is she who nature's bounty mocks
Nor gives love entrance where he knocks.

(3)

An other path untrodden yet remains,
Where pleasure in her close recesses reigns,
The neophyte to that more hallowed spot
But rarely ventures 'tis the favourite grot
Where sages, prelates Kings and bards retire
To quench the rage of Priapean fire.
Then turn thee round, indulge a husband's wish
And taste with me this truly classic dish

Pornography flourishes and literature withers under censorship. The popular objection to pornography is that it corrupts i.e., leads to the indulgence of sexual practices which would otherwise not have been thought of. There is no evidence that this is so. There is ample evidence that pornography which is a form of fantasy-writing is generally depressing. That, however, is an aesthetic, not a moral aspect. Very eminent men have sometimes been addicted to pornography. In Victorian England the list would include Richard Monckton Milnes, first Baron Houghton, Coventry Patmore and even the poet Tennyson. My contention is that bad pornography—and much of it is inept writing —has a protective rather than a corrupting effect, precisely because it represents sex in a crude and loathsome manner. Good pornography i.e. alluring pornography has a cathartic effect. The fantasy is gone through in the mind and thus eliminated from the system. The only one who corrupts and depraves is the censor for he invests pornography with a false, spurious glamour. As Helen Gardner said in her evidence at the trial of Lady Chatterley's Lover: "I think Lawrence's intention was to make

THE SOCIAL LADDER CLIMBING

by Mukul Gupta

MY friend, who had had his upbringing in rural environs and could hardly boast of any lining of urban sophistication, was considerably intrigued, during his brief stay in Calcutta, by the words that head-lined what were supposed to be news of social interest featured in the English daily that he had been reading that morning. Accustomed to the language papers in his village home, he did not come across such captions as 'Marriage in High Life' and 'Society Wedding.' Marriage was marriage, normally a simple and straightforward affair to be performed according to the ancient prescribed formula which was applicable equally to all. And life was life. What, then, he puzzled was the import of this profound adjective 'high'? And, again, wedding was a social affair, by all reckoning. What was, their, the special virtue in fan-faring a wedding as a society one, he wondered.

I explained to him that life and society were entirely different in Calcutta and, for that matter' in all aristocratic cities, from what they were in the rural and suburban sectors. Every metropolis had its own definition of culture and classification of the people who lived there. There was, I told him, in every cultured city a ladder with several rungs. The cultured people of the city, men and women, would make it a point to climb up the rungs of the ladder, not, of course, for constitutional exercise but with the avowed oblect of raising their status. The exercise was euphemistically called social climbing. Whether one would be classified under 'high life' or not would depend on the position of the rung of the ladder one had manoeuvred to climb in one's desperate attempt to be reckoned as a member of the Society — with a capital and not small S.

When there was a social function, such as marriage, in such a Society, the newspapers described it as marriage in high life or a society wedding. My friend extended me the courtesy of listening to my explanation, but I could realize that it was too fantastic an exposition for him to swallow.

Indeed, the high society life, as it exists in the so-called aristocratic cities in India, is an amalgam of an insensible zeal for social climbing and an unrestrained indulgence in superficial sophistication. The denizens of this society have their own vocabulary, own codes of conduct, own canons of etiquette and courtesy and, what they vainly call their own high standard of living. The popularity of a member of this high society is measured by the frequency of the parties, cocktail or dinner, he can throw and the profusion of hard drinks in which he can make his guests sink or swim. Such parties and meetings are invariably reported in vivid details in the fashion papers which, again, have their own formula for reporting from which they would hardly ever deviate. For instance, whatever saree a woman guest might wear it would invariably be described as elegantly beautiful and however forbidding her physical dimensions might be, she would be pictured as charmingly pretty and delightfully slim!

It is always the ladies who lend life and zest to these mightly gatherings and a measure of success of such high society parties would be how late in the morning they continued and to what extent the guests were tipsy. The first item of conversation invariably is the weather — "how nice it is for a long drive" or 'how sultry it is for staying in' or 'just imagine how wretched it would have been had we not had our lounge and bed-rooms air-conditioned quite some time ahead of the Calcutta summer!" "Mind you," another butter-fly, scantily clothed, perhaps in sympathy with the masses of the country who perforce have to go half-naked, would butt in and sermonize: "Well, it is really bad economy not to have your home air-cooled. After these strenuous get-togethers one could pardonably expect a span of good sleep. I really wonder how people could manage in Calcutta without this simple, and, of course, inexpensive air-conditioning. I warned Lolita in time but she thought money was more precious than minimum comforts and now she regrets."

It is the height of bad manners to contradict one on weather. If one should say that the day was lovely though, in fact, it was anything but that, the reply should be 'Oh, yes, how lovely it was." I am tempted to quote from George Mikes a few specimens of stereotyped conversation pieces on weather with minor amendments.

For good weather, the set of routine questions and answers are :

(a) "Lovely day, isn't it ?" "Oh, yes, couldn't be better."

(b) "Isn't it beautiful ?" "Divinely so."

(c) "The sun, isn't it gorgeous ?" "Never saw a lovelier sun."

(d) "It is so nice and hot." "Personally, I think it is so nice when it's hot."

(e) "I simply adore the weather, don't you ?" "One must be awkwardly dull if one doesn't."

For bad weather, the set of questions and answers are :

(a) "Nasty day, isn't it ?" "Isn't it dreadful ?"

(b) "The rain ....., I do really hate rain." "I don't like it at all. It keeps you sticking to home."

(c) "Fancy such a day in July. Rain in the morning, then a bit of sunshine, and then rain, rain, rain, all day long." "Could anything make life more miserable?"

(d) "I remember exactly the same July day in 1936."

"Yes, I remember too."
"Or was it in 1928."
"Yes, it was."
"No, no, it must have been in 1939."
"Yes, that's right, I should have thought so."

Next in priority in the stereotyped schedule of conversational etiquette is the animated talk about the saree and the choli. However grotesque in design and loud in colours the saree may be, the first query, obviously born of pretended curiosity, is : "My goodness, how lovely is the saree and how nicely it has gone with your choli ? You have really a delightful sense of matching. I wouldn't dare ask you the price as that must be very high and, surely, beyond me." Immensely flattered, the hefty content of the saree would fling back : "Yes, everyone thinks that I wear costly stuff. But, would you be surprised if I should say that I have paid only Rs. 600 for that ? Isn't that just for a song ? It is a modest birthday present from Tutul ! The conversation ends as artificially as it had begun. The saree might have been just for a song, but poor Tutul, the harassed husband must have felt the strain for calling the tune !

Age always is an item of animated and fraudulent conversation. Two things, they say, which a woman can peep secret are her own age and her husband's income. Invariably, one lady would ask another in a party the secrets of her keeping herself so young and petite. Though she might be on the wrong side of forty — her age being betrayed by the uncontrollable wrinkles on her heavily furnished face—and though the other lady might be fully knowing her real age, the accepted convention of the high society would enjoin on her to give her an over-draft of at least fifteen years. "You don't look a day older than thirty," would be the pattern of the query, "and do please tell me how do keep yourself so young ? I am sure, you are dieting." Deliberately understating her age, the set reply would be : "You are not far off in your guess. I am thirty-two and not thirty. And two years in a woman's life, as you know, mean quite a lot. You ask my secret. Well, there is nothing secret about it. I make it a point to be away from the sultry summer of your wretched Calcutta for at least two months every year. But, I am afraid, I would not be able to continue — any longer this frugal holiday. Last season, believe me, Darjeeling was literally invaded by people whom one would not love to see crowding the Mall and spoiling its peace."

Slimming is a very favourite subject for conversation. It is common etiquette that every lady should have the honorific adjective of being described as slim, irrespective of whether she is heavy-weight, bantam-weight or feather-weight. To describe the weight of a lady in terms of stone or maund exceeds the bounds of decency. She should have her weight told in ounces or grammes. If a lady is complimented by another saying "you are looking quite slims." the courteous reply would invariably be "Oh, no, not half so slim as you" as Somerset Maugham would put it.

INTERIOR DECORATION

Competence in interior decorations is one of the latest specifications for measuring the success of a Society lady. The greater the use of trifles and odd rejections, the higher is the merit of interior decorations made up of them. The latest craze is to use liquor bottles, as they are, without the contents but with the labels untouched, to serve as vases for flowers and creepers. The room may be air-conditioned and fully modernized otherwise but it must have a rural or what is more sophisticatedly called an indigenous outlook. In quite a costly teakwood enclave, fabricated by some expensive furnishers, there must be kept a few cheap terra-cotta toys and figurines just to create the impression that the lady of the house is a connoisseur of village arts and patron of rural crafts. In nine out of ten cases, little is known to the architect of the interior decoration about the story and tradition of the village craftsmen whose handiwork was being displayed in quarters for which it was not destined. Guests would express routine admiration for the tiny pieces on display and — indulge in mechanical appreciation of the delicate taste of their hostess, no matter whether they inwardly realized what they were admiring and appreciating. Once Marie Corelli described the craze for household decoration by the wealthy people as "adorning by tawdry paraphernalia which is sometimes affected by the rich to create an art impression." It would be uncharitable to underestimate the efforts of the Society ladies to make their home beautiful to the extent that of the great Victorian authoress had cynically gone.

Every Society lady must exhibit some measure of active interest in 'fashionable social welfare work. She must be either the patron or the president or the member of the executive committee of the ad hoc body for the organization of variety entertainments for raising funds for the relief of the victims of flood, fire or communal disturbances. The function may be a musical soiree or a dance-drama but if the money is raised for contributing to the funds of any high dignitary, the function must be nothing short of a night-long calypso, made colourful by fancy dresses and attractive by open-all-night bars tended by the sweet society girls. The end may be relief of distress but that should not necessarily prescribe that the means should not be brimful of mirth and merry-making. Imagine for a moment how many pints of drinks, soft and hard, the gay participants in the calypso have to swallow to forget, as also to relieve, the miseries of their brethren in distress. And how many sleepless nights the society ladies have ungrudgingly to pass for their sisters in affliction !

The latest fad of the ladies, who aspire to be reckoned as land-marks in the high society, is to

Ramendra Sundar Trivedi

By R. K. Dasgupta

WHEN Ramendrasundar Trivedi was born on the 20th August 1864 the nineteenth century Bengali Renaissance had entered upon its second phase. Michael Madhusudan Datta's Meghnadbadhkavya, the most distinguished example of the new poetry was then about three years old, the Widow Remarriage Act, a fruit of Vidyasagar's reformist toils, had been in the statute book for eight years and although Bankimchandra was yet to produce his first Bengali novel, prose had already made some mark as language of reason. When he took his Master's degree in Calcutta University in 1887 both Vidyasagar and Bankim were alive and on the other hand Rabindranath had written twentytwo of his books including Prabhat Sangit, Kari O Komal and Rajarshi. He was twentyone when the Indian National Congress was founded in 1885 and was above forty when he was one of the inspirers of the Swadeshi Movement in 1905. So in Ramendrasundar we have a child of the nineteenth century Renaissance who had a creative role in the first two decades of the twentieth. This is important in a study of the man and his work for there is a certain severity of intellectual discipline in his writings which generally belongs to a latter-day thinker who is unaffected by the enthusiasms of early pioneers. He has indeed a large measure of that detachment which comes from the conviction of some maturity in the mental life of the community. Behind the quiet dignity of his prose there were the urgent pamphleteering of Raja Rammohan Roy, the insistent reasoning of Vidyasagar and the magnificent style of Bankimchandra Chatterji. He practised an economy of expression because he could distil his thought and feeling into ideas that could be stated in plainest words. In fact he achieved a style almost by shedding it.

Longinus discovered an element of 'weighty and sober magnificence' in Plato's prose which he called 'a gentle and noiseless flow of eloquence.' Certainly I do not call Ramendrasundar a Bengali Plato, but when I admire his prose I recall Longinus's appreciation of a gentle and noiseless flow of eloquence and if any one of us were to explain the beauty of Ramendrasudar's style he may spare much strain of analysis by quoting the same Greek critic's famous saying: 'beautiful words are the very light of thought.' The essence of the man and his work is in this light of thought. Those who knew him saw this light on his gentle face and Rabindranath saw this in the grace of his entire personality. In his personal address presented to Ramendrasundar on the occasion of his fiftieth birthday the poet said: "Tomar hriday sundar, tomar bakya sundar, tomar hasya sundar, he! Ramendrasundar ami tomake abhibadan karitechi." (There is grace in your soul, grace in your words, grace in your smile, Ramendrasundar I greet you.) This grace seemed remarkable in a man who from his early boyhood was well-known for his extraordinary intellectual gifts. He was the top boy of his class in primary school, stood first in the District Scholarship examination and in High School he stood second but once. In 1881 he stood first in his Matriculation examination and was admitted in Presidency College as a student in the First Arts course. He took the second place amongst successful candidates in this examination in 1883. In 1886 he took a first class in science in Calcutta University occupying the first position in the list and won the same distinction at M.A. in Physics and Chemistry the following year. After he had obtained Calcutta University's Premchand Roychand Studentship in Physics and Chemistry in 1888 his examiners remarked that "the candidate who took up Physics and Chemistry is perhaps the best student that has as yet taken up these subjects at this examination." This excellent academic achievement obtained for him an opportunity to pursue higher studies in science in the laboratory of the Presidency College. His relations advised him to study law for a prosperous career at the bar, but his temperament soon took him away from the course.

Professor Pedler of the Presidency College offered him an attractive appointment at Bangalore but he declined it on the ground that his relations would not welcome the separation. He also declined a teaching post in the Presidency College bacause he did not desire a transfer to a mofussil college. In 1892 he joined Ripon College as a Professor of Physics and Chemistry. He was the Principal of this college when he died on the 6th June, 1919.

His pupils admired his teaching and one of them recorded in a memoir that he had an extraordinary ability in explaining the mathematical portions of Physics without taking his students into the complexities of higher mathematics. The procedure would not be welcome to the advanced Physics Faculties of our universities today. But in days when teaching even in higher science was not in the hands of specialists the performance of Ramendrasundar in the class was certainly a pedagogical feat.

As a Principal too Ramendrasundar's achievement was very remarkable indeed. When he succeeded Krishnakamal Bhattacharya as Head of Ripon College in 1903 both students and teachers felt that the institution was being turned into a seminary of enquiring minds dedicated to the most important tasks of a civilized society. The first thing he did as Principal was that he made his colleagues feel that his high office would never isolate him from their company. He had no room of his own and when the University Inspector of Colleges criticized it as a deficiency he said that he could certainly operate the college machine from a cabin of his own, but he valued meeting of minds in an academic institution. He soon formed a teachers's association and although it had no constitution it achieved a character as a community of thinking men attending to the true vocation of university teachers. Many of his colleagues who never thought of writing a page presented papers to the association and Ramendrasundar's own addresses delivered before it were included in his work Jagat Katha.

As an educationist Ramendrasundar worked more through his own example than through periodic outbursts against a rotten system. But when the Calcutta University Commission headed by Sir Michael Sadler asked for a statement of his ideas in 1917 he sent a note which is one of the most important documents in the history of Indian education. But I am afraid it is now a forgotten document and is not known even to our specialists. Ramendrasundar's biographer has put it in an appendix to his work : I think it deserves a place in any collection of essays on Indian education. Here he speaks of a kind of academic freedom which could be so powerfully enunciated in the period between the Partition and Jalianwalabag only by the most courageous of minds. Commenting on the official control of Indian universities he said: 'The universities and educational establishments here in modern India are all machines that require constant care and constant control of an everwatchful Government and are in constant need of mending and repairing. As a necessary consequence they cannot be allowed the freedom of spontaneous development along the lines most suited to the needs of the people, lines most in accordance with the needs of organic life. The life of the teacher and the taught have to be fettered by mechanical regulations, by chains of restrictions forged at the official smithy' About his own University he remarked: 'The end of universities education, the advancement of learning, which my own university has accepted for its motto, has receded to distance and is half-forgotten in the striving for the maintenance of a suitable standard or test of fitness among the clamorous claimants for its degree.' Perhaps even more important was his observation on English education : 'Western education has given us much: we have been great gainers; but there has been a cost, a cost as regards culture, a cost as regards respect for self and reverence for others, a cost as regards the nobility and dignity of life.' We must not call this a reaction against the educational ideas of Rammohan, Derozio and Macaulay and Ramendra never encouraged any form of intellectual swadeshi. He realized about half a century ago that our university system was gradually losing in character. Reflecting on the words at this distance of time we seem to wonder if happier political circumstance has really brought us nearer to a better system.

Perhaps it was his despair of our university which prompted him to work with great enthusiasm for learned institutions like Bangiya Sahitya Parisad. This literary association was founded in July 1893 mainly at the initiative of a Frenchman named L. Leotard and was first known as Academy of Literature in its first year. In 1894 it was renamed as Bangiya Sahitya Parisad and Ramesh Chandra Dutt was elected its first President. Ramendrasundar joined this association in 1894 and within a few months was elected its Secretary. His ambition was to make the Parisad an instrument of intellectual progress in Bengal through the cultivation of science and letters. He soon took initiative in two important directions : He instituted series of lectures in Bengali on scientific subjects and made efforts to prepare a scientific terminology in the language.

In 1895 Ramendrasundar took another historic initiative for the promotion of Bengali learning. In that year the Parisad moved the University to introduce Bengali. The University did not listen to the Parisad's pleading. Ramendrasundar persisted in his efforts and years later the University introduced an optional paper in Bengali in the First Arts and B.A. Courses. When still later the University permitted its students to write their answers in the History paper in Bengali in the Matriculation examination it was due to the hard work of Ramendrasundar towards this end. Sir Asutosh Mukherjee found in Ramendrasundar an ardent collaborator in his endeavours to establish Bengali in the University, and when the Government of India sanctioned the institution of a Master's course in Bengali Sir Asutosh approached Ramendrasundar for advice.

But Ramendrasundar did not spend his energy on institution of Courses in Bengali alone. He realized that if Bengali was to be the medium of instruction in our university hard toil was yet necessary to make it a fine instrument of expression particularly in scientific discourse. As early as 1895 he wrote an article on chemical terms in Bengali in the journal of the Bangiya Sahitya Parisad. In this article he presented three principles for the preparation of a scientific terminology in Indian languages. (1) We must not coin new words for things for which we have already our own words, for example swarna, raupya, lauha, gandhak, parad etc. (2) The terms which have already entered our scientific vocabulary must not be discarded, for example, amlayan, yabaksharyan (3) The rest of our scientific terminology should just be English words in our script with appropriate phonetic changes to suit the genius of our language. This third principl was first enunciated by Rev. John Mack (1797-1845), a Professor of Serampore College whose Kimia Vidyar Sar, published in 1834 is the first text-book of Chemistry in Bengali. In his introduction to this book Mack says: 'The chief difficulty was to determine whether the European nomenclature should be put into Bengalee letters, or the European terms be entirely translated by Sanskrit, as bearing much the same relation to Bengalee as the Greek and Latin do to the English I have preferred expressing the European terms in Bengalee character, merely changing the prefixes and terminology so as decently to incorporate the new words into the language.' Ramendrasundar was so attracted by this idea that he wrote an article on this book in the journal of the Bangiya Sahitya Parisad in 1898. Rabindranath Tagore discovered Mack's book in the library of the 'Tattvabodhini Sabha' and showed it to Ramendrasundar who readily accepted its terminological principle. Ramendrasundar, had, however the support of Jogesh Chandra Rav Vidyanidhi who had adopted the principle in his Saral Rasayan published in 1898. Sir P C. Roy approved the system.

But terminology was but a means to an end and Ramendrasundar realized this. His main objective was to produce a scientific temper in Bengal and he thought that the best way to do it was to produce a popular scientific literature in Bengali. He knew that the language was stil to develop its idiom for the scientific thinker and he called his contemporaries to the task of creating it. He showed the way by delivering his lectures in Physics and Chemistry in his college in his own language and by writing the finest specimens of scientific prose in it. The Bengali scientist of today uses a sharper tongue in discouraging the use of English in science teaching but we do not seem to know much about his Bengali pen.

Ramendrasundar's work for the awakening of a scientific spirit in Bengal was only a part of his work for a social and intellectual regeneration of his people. In fact, he achieved a certain integrity of thought and action which gave a consistency to all that he did or said. To have such mental consistency in a life of such a variety of responsibilities as he took upon himself is very remarkable indeed. But to understand the man and his achievement in our generation it is important to understand this consistency in his character. In these later days we have developed different mental habits and different manners. Some of us would make of the man an image of an impossible moral rectitude, of high purpose and thought which we could salute from a distance as a gesture of patriotic homage to a great past. But we do not dare believe that we can have a Ramendrasundar in our midst today. And I imagine that those who will come after us would scarcely believe that such a man ever lived and breathed in Bengal. Should one of us still be able to write a readable biography of him they may take him to be a character in some ancient story, a hero of battles long ago the like of which we may not see again. When I think of him I wish my feeble imagination to give me a sight of the man in the company of Rabindranath a few days before his death. I call this a historic scene and this gives us a glimpse of the whole truth of his life, his love of the land and its culture and his faith in the dignity and the freedom of the human sprit. On the 30th May, 1919 Rabindranath relinquished his Knighthood as a mark of his protest against the massacre at Jalianwalabag and his letter to the Viceroy Lord Chelmsford appeared in the Statesman of June 3. Ramendrasundar was then suffering from a serious illness which ended his life on the 6th June. When the Bengali version of the poet's letter was published in Basumati he was in tears and sent his brother to the poet requesting him to pay him a visit and give him his blessings. Rabindranath was soon at his bedside when Ramendrasundar asked him to read unto him the letter to the Viceroy which the poet did in a moving voice. Ramendrasundar wept his last tears and in the traditional Indian manner took the dust of the poet's feet. No Bengali painter has reproduced the scene on a canvas and already it is getting blurred in our memory. But when we talk about the man to our children we may mention this tender episode which shows the man in the gentle light of his soul, the man who composed Bangalaksmi Bratakatha as the moral answer of his race to the political injustice of the Partition and who at the end of his life could now only shed a few tears of hope listening to the words of a braver protest against a greater injustice.

In Bengali literature Ramendrasundar lives as the master of scientific and philosophical prose. That prose is certainly one of the most civilized things in the language. But I fear the substance of that prose has ceased to be very important in Bengal today. It has ceased to be important because the pressure of our political and economic responsibilities has made us almost indifferent to the things of the mind. But if at any time we begin to realize the value of a mantal life and experience the tensions of the modern mind striving to preserve a life of the spirit in an age of science we may turn to writing of this man for some light on our way. Perhaps his works has something to give to the twentieth century man living in a split universe of diverse cultures. I do not say that Ramendrasundar could create for himself a unified universe of values ensuring a perfect philosophical contentment. Such a universe has never existed in the history of human civilization except in the private salvation of individuals. Throughout the history of human culture the higher intelligence of man has been striving to achieve some integrity of ideal, a happy consistency of thought and action as the highest satisfaction of the human spirit. To a later civilization the task is more difficult because of the large accumulations of human thought presenting a confusing variety of ideals. In the nineteenth century the impact of sciene was a fresh challenge to the life of the spirit. Bankimchandra, Vivekananda and Sri Aurobindo reaffirmed the idealism of the Hindu metaphysics and we listened to their powerful voice. In Ramendrasundar there is no doctrinal urgency, no desire for system-building. But he experienced the tensions of modern thought, had his moments of intellectual despair and strove to attain the truth of his life in steady and careful steps. His later writings are records of that striving. Those of us who have read them would believe that the danger of two cultures such as our C. P. Snows seem to have created for the modern man does not exist for a mind that really cares for a spiritual fulfilment.

us feel that the sexual act was not shameful and the word (the famous four-letter word) used in its original sense was not shameful either."

No writer in recent years has glamourised a forbidden subject i.e. incest between brother and sister as John Ford did in the seventeenth century. Giovanni is madly in love with his sister Annabella and declares his passion:

GIOVANNI: True, Annabella! it is no time to jest
I have too long suppressed my hidden flames,
That almost have consumed me. . . . It is my destiny.
That you must either love, or I must die.
* * * *
Must I now live or die?
ANNABELLA: Live; thou hast won
The field and never fought. What thou hast urged
My captive heart had long ago resolved
I blush to tell thee—but I tell thee now—
For every sigh that thou has spent for me,
I have sighed ten; for every tear shed twenty!
And not so much for that I loved, as that
I darest not say I loved, nor scarcely think it.

The censor is an enemy of civilisation. It is not so much the misuse but the whole concept of censorship which is malign. Censorship has an obvious attraction for the most intolerant and the least refined elements in society. And it is often a decoy operation. It does not speak much for the sanity of our society that road-hogs and road-house keepers go unpunished while vendors of pornography are persecuted. If pornography were sold freely, very few would read it. It is sad that the police are insufficiently vigilant about rash drivers whose homicide is always quietly condoned, or about children being kidnapped by sexual maniacs, not one of whom has heard of Lady Chatterley's Lover or Fanny Hill. And the debaser of English—now, alas, a familiar figure in all the Indian Universities—depraves the taste more thoroughly than the cheapest and the lowest form of pornography. The Police would be better employed in protecting the lives and ensuring the safety of citizens than in compiling an Index or an Index Expurgatorius. Our reading should be off their beat, anyway.

Remembering JAWAHARLAL

DILIPKUMAR ROY

AN epoch has ended. A memorable epoch rife with thrills and dreams of a new sunrise. And the one who was devoted all his life to the deepening of the new dawn is now no more. But let none give in to dejection even when the depressing shadows infiltrate relentlessly. For the one we mourn never gave in to the despair. He always looked beyond the night to the day. His idealism had a remarkable affinity with that of the Great philosopher Empedocles who said:

Fear not! life still Leaves human effort scope.
But since life teems with ill
Nurse no extravagant hope.

Because thou must not dream thou needst not then despair.

I will not try to appraise the inestimable value of the legacy Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has left us. I shall leave that to more competent assayers: the great historians of posterity. I will confine myself today to paying my personal tribute from the heart to one to whom I have owed much, thanks to his unfailing sympathy and responsive encouragement whenever I stood in need of the same. In a word, I will reminisce about him and endeavour, as best I can, to show up a few traits and impulses of his generous nature which made him so lovable the world over.

My friendship with him extends over four decades, dating from 1923, when I met him first in Delhi Congress whither my dearest friend, Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose had taken me in tow. I was to sing there some patriotic songs. Seated beside Panditji, I sang an Urdu national song—presumably Iqbal's. As I was singing it, thrilled—because of Panditji's contiguity—he nodded at me approvingly. His noble face was flushed and his luminous eyes shone with a hint of unshed tears, especially when I sang the hortatory couplet:

muhibbane vatan honge hazaron bevatan pahle:
phalega Hind piche aur bharega Andaman pahle that is:

Let thousands who love our India first live
As exiles, far from home,
In the desolate Andamans—for only then
She'll flower out in full bloom.

Since that memorable morning I have met and sung to him here and there many a time. One of my most cherished memories was when, at 1, Woodburn Park—the residence of Sarat Chandra Bose, Netaji's elder brother—I used to sing to him, seated beside Gandhiji. (I once sang there with my pupil Uma Bose, whom Mahatmaji called "the Nightingale." Panditji also loved her beautiful bhajans.) My heart tingled with joy every time he responded to my singing. I once told him laughingly that his ever-alert responsiveness seemed almost to add up to loyalty, a virtue he set store by all his life, whether dealing with his master or friends. I stress this as he not only never once let me down, but did not mind even when I wrote or spoke to him (as I sometimes did) taking exception to something he had written or said publicly. I refer to this astonishing tolerance on his part not only because it is so characteristic of him, but also because in this age of dark dictatorships we have a deal to learn from his soul of refinement which forbore to retaliate even when adversely criticised. To give an instance in point.

Once I wrote to him, in 1949, protesting against a political pronouncement of his. After posting my letter in haste I repented in leisure as my outburst was wholly uncalled-for. Then, in 1950, I gave a concert in Delhi at the Constitution House I went somewhat diffidently to invite him. To my agreeable surprise, there was no lack of response in his welcome. Taking heart, I told him about my object. He raised his hand and said: "Impossible, I have to move a resolution in the Lok Sabha."

"But after that?" I insisted.

"Well," he answered, "It will be too late. You see, to break in upon a musical soiree like a gust of wind when you would be singing—"

"Oh," I chimed in sweetly, "the breath of wind from the heights can't but be bracing in this noble instance."

"All right," he laughed, clapping me on the back. "Have it your own way: I capitulate." And he did come and stayed to the end.

Requests for favour used to flock to him in shoals as bees flock to flowers, but he seldom turned them down closing the petals of his bounty. It has been said of the celebrated moralist Thoreau that he said 'no' far more easily than 'yes'. With Panditji it was always the other way about, he having never been afflicted with the parsimony of spirit which so often goes hand in hand, alas, with diplomats and politicians. Had it been otherwise, he would have forfeited long ago the indefinable charm which girdled him like an aura—aye, charm, which a celebrated playwright has defined as "a sort of bloom" on a person. "If you have it," he assures us, "you don't have to have anything else; and if you don't have it, it doesn't matter what else you have." (Barry — What Every Woman Knows)

Which recalls to my mind a scene in Paris thirty-five years ago. I was the guest of a dear friend of mine, Vladmir Vanek, Consul of Czechoslovakia. His wife Marthe, the daughter of a Countess, had married him for love. She was idealistic by nature and cultured to her finger-tips. I had first met her in Switzerland under the aegis of Romain Rolland who genuinely admired her for her charm and idealism. Suddenly one morning, I received an invitation from the Indian students in Paris. They were giving a dinner at a big hotel in honour of Panditji who had just arrived in Paris en route to Moscow. I was asked to sing there the opening song. Marthe admired him and, as he knew French (for she didn't know English at all), she insisted that I must somehow bring him to tea with them at the Embassy. As I was placed next to Panditji at the dinner table, I could tell him all about Marthe and Vladimir. Panditji accepted their invitation readily and so we spent a delightful afternoon on the morrow at their lovely flat. I saw then once again how charming he could be with women of birth and breeding, and I was delighted to note that he spoke French with the fine accent he did: he coul pronounce even the glutteral "r"! After his departure, Marthe was in ecstasies over his charming personality. "Il est veritablement le Prince Charmant, Dilip" she said, borrowing from Oscar Wilde's novel, Picture of Dorian Grey. And, I was no less delighted to shine, albeit in a borrowed lustre.

Another incident, testifying to his charm, recurs to me. I was then singing away in Allahabad in company with Uma. I went to Ananda Bhavan and invited him. He at once promised to attend our musical soiree. Uma was aghast. "O Dada, how can I sing before him?" she stammered. "I. . . . my voice would be frozen!" "Not with horror, I hope?" I teased. When, I related this to Panditji, he laughed and drawing her to him said tenderly: "My child, how could you be afraid of one who knows nothing of music?" When he left, Uma clapped her hands in joy and said: "O Dada, what a charming man! I felt as if I had known him for ages!" Barry had not overrated the miracle power of personal charm.

But I must not forget to mention that our soiree, on that memorable night, was graced by another world-celebrity: Dr. Meghnad Saha. In passing, I happened to have blurted out that I admired Aldous Huxley. Dr. Saha was scandalised. "Oh, how can you admire such an author, Dilip!" he gasped. "He is downright immoral!" Panditji caught his breath and interjected: "But why do you call him immoral? He has only portrayed contemporary life in Europe. And he is a brilliant thinker." Panditji was not only steeped in the essential best of Western culture, but was gifted with a discerning mind utterly free from Puritanical inhibitions. That is why it was always a joy to converse with him on culture in its broadest sense.

And it was because his heart responded almost automatically to culture in the broadest sense that he could respond so vividly to the highest culture of the heart, to wit, the ideal of one world drawn together by the magnetism of love. That was why he was so moved by my father's (D. L. Roy's) masterpiece, the drama of Mevar Patan whose message is that our love must admit of no barriers of caste or creed, race or colour, nationality or religion. At least that is how I interpret his reaction to my translation enitled Fall of Mevar which I sent to him in 1946. He wrote to me:

> Thank you for sending me 'Fall of Mevar'. I have had little time in recent months to read books. I have now come here, a remote place in the Kumayun Hills, for just five days' quiet and rest. I brought a few books with me and among them was 'Mevar Patan'. This morning I read it under the pine trees and I liked it very much. It is powerful and moving. I wish I could read it in the original.
> Soon I shall have to leave the cool mountains and return to the hot and dusty city of Delhi with all its burdens.
> With good wishes.

But it was in 1952 that he put me under the deepest debt, coming like a veritable ray of God's own light when my world had toppled in darkness due to the sudden passing of my Gurudev, Sri Aurobindo, in 1950. I felt stifled in Pondichery and longed to get away to recuperate. An opportunity presented itself unexpectedly in 1951: Mr. Gainsborough of the American Academy for Asian Studies invited me to lecture on music at his college in San Francisco. But as I was a destitute at the time, there could be no question of my crossing the seven seas. However, it so happened that Panditji and Maulana Azad came to hear about it from a mutual friend and offered to finance our world-tour. Indira, my daughter-disciple was to dance to my singing and teach Bharat Natya to her pupils at San Francisco and I was to sing and lecture on music and philosophy. A very timely help, indeed, and given so gracefully at that—on a cultural mission, so dear to my heart. In fact it was not a human help but a godsend which came to me, like manna from the blue, in one of the darkest crises of my life. Had not Panditji and Maulana Azad volunteered to send us as their representatives, I could never have visited the great country of America and our temple-home, Hari Krishna Mandir at Poona, would not have come into being.

But it was not in this instance alone; he was always the soul of kindness and forbearance to all to whom he once offered his hand of friendship. I will give a typical instance to illustrate what I mean.

It was in January, 1948—a few month after India had attained her freedom. Wanting to see Panditji, I telephoned his Personal Secretary, who rang me up after a couple of days and said that Panditji had graciously consented to grant me an interview on the 9th at 5 in the afternoon. "But," he added, somewhat officiously, "he is a very very busy man you know, and probably won't be able to give you more than five minutes at most."

I felt hurt and, in a huff, despatched a letter to Panditji by a courier. "I am informed that you can't give me more than five minutes", I wrote. "So, I won't trouble you."

Panditji wrote back in his own hand:

". . . . . During the last few days I have lived in a kind of whirl . . . . . I was looking forward to meeting you and trying to find a suitable time for the purpose. At last I set aside an hour this afternoon. There was no question of my seeing you for five minutes and I don't know who told you so.

I still hope I shall be able to meet you before you return (to Pondichery)."

So it was arranged once again that I was to call on him.

I went there punctually, somewhat like a penitent, having realised by then the enormity of my 'gaffe': to have actually cancelled in hot haste an engagement with a man of his eminence, not to mention his status!

For all that, our meeting the next evening was as happy as happy could be.

After a little desultory talk on this and that he lighted a cigarette ensconced in a holder and asked me pointblank: "Tell me, Dilip Kumar, is Sri Aurobindo still interested in all that is happening in our mundane world, or is he immersed in meditation all the time?"

"He wrote to me once," I answered "that his life had been a battle all along and that he was still fighting the dark hosts with his Yogic force. I quote this from memory of course."

Panditji (after a pause): You mean he still believes in action?

Myself: I do. I can't throw and light on 'how' he acts, but I can tell you one thing: that as a tireless 'karmayogi' he can hold his own against any one in the world, I will give you just one instance Panditji, if you have time—

Panditji: Please go ahead.

Myself (heartened volubly): I joined his Ashram in 1928. From 1929 he began writing letters to us now and again in reply to our questions. But as his disciples increased in number, our letters also shot up in number and gained in volume. So, he began dealing regularly with his correspondence at 9 P.M. and wrote out his answers in an hour or two. By and by, two hours increased to three, three to four and so on till he had to go to bed towards the small hours of the morning. Once he wrote to me at 4 o'clock in the morning, and still he had not finished.

Panditji (aghast): My word! Till 4 o'clock in the morning? Writing for seven hours—nightly?

Myself (somewhat triumphantly): And not for a brief spell, acting under pressure for a few weeks or a month or two and then call it a day. He went on writing reams and reams of letters—let me see—he started in 1930 and ended in November, 1938 after nine long years. But it isn't a question only of writing letters to us to lead us on like a kindly light. He had multifarious work to do; compose his poems, write new books and last, though not least, to listen religiously—throughout the last War—to the war news over the radio thrice a day, without fail. He told us that the news helped him to direct and canalise his Yogic force against the Asuric forces which were phalanaxed behind Hitler, whom he called Enemy Number One of Civilisation and Liberty.

Panditji (cautiously): I don't know what to say about his Yogic Force, but I can say this that we all—barring a few—were glad to learn that he sided out and out with the Allies against Hitler.

Myself: He was no less glad that our Congress had ranged itself on the right side. He wrote to me in 1943 a long letter in answer to my question why he, a great Yogi, had chosen to throw in his weight with the Allies in their tussle with the Axis Powers. In this letter— which has since been published in a pamphlet form—he wrote that he supported the Allies not because they were angels or perfect, but only because they had ranged themselves on the side of the evolutionary forces which alone could lead man out of the wood, even as it had progressively lifted him out of the rut of his primitive animal state. But, he added, if Hitler —the stooge of the Asuric forces—won, it would spell the ruin of our hopes. And for this he gave not a little credit to you because your outlook was entirely right on this question. But I am getting too garrulous.

Panditji (pleased): Go on.

Myself (shaking my head): No. A truce now. For I came to hear from 'you', our King now, how you like your crown.

Panditji (smiling): Of thorns, you should have added. But first you must tell me more about Sri Aurobindo who remains still, for all his greatness, somewhat of an enigma to the likes of us.

Myself: But you are not like the rest of us, Panditji. And you can't possibly be unaware that you would stand out even in a crowd.

Panditji (deprecating): Oh, don't.—

Myself: But I must since this wasn't mine alone, but 'his' appraisement, too, of your character. In fact he wrote to me three or four letters about you in answers to my questions. In one he wrote—I am quoting from memory again—that you have the stamp of the 'sattwic' nature on your face and are a fine synthesis of the Indian and European culture, a man of admirable integrity of character and so on. And then—

Panditji: Wait a moment. May I know what was the occasion of his writing letters to you about me?

Myself: It all happened because I was deeply moved by your beautiful autobiography— as I wrote to you in more than one letter from Pondicherry. But what I did not tell you is that I was very sad to read that you felt a deep longing for peace—the peace of the Buddha as you have characterised it in your book, you remember? (He nodded). Well, after reading this I felt depressed and so wrote to Gurudev—as I always did, whenever I felt like a fuming pessimist: "Why on earth must such a noble soul like Panditji be so peaceless? Can't you send him a little peace, Gurudev? For if you decline I propose to pray for him, mind you!" And so I went on driving home my thesis that surely all was not right with the world even if it were with its Maker in high heaven.

Panditji (laughing, amused): Thank you, Dilip Kumar. But what was his reaction?

Myself (laughing): It 'is' difficult to draw him out. He evaded cleverly by saying that peace was a laurel hard to win and then added that he wondered if Buddha would have been able to stabilise his Peace had he undertaken to lead the Congress Movement today.

Panditji (after a brief pause): He is right, Dilip Kumar. But I must correct you on one point. It isn't that I have never savoured peace in my life. From time to time I have had interludes of exquisite peace. But you see, my trouble is that I can't sit still chewing the cud of my peace. I am too active by nature to be able to be a quietist. You wrote to me more than once that you had read my autobiography from cover to cover. So (with a smile) you may remember—and I know you have a good memory — that I have written in it somewhere that when one climbs a mountain the joy of climbing more than compensates one for the strain even when the breaths comes short. Gandhiji was wont to say that effort was not less rewarding than attainment. (A pause). But so far as I am concerned, what I strive for is neither peace to thrive on nor attainment to glory in. A number of incendiaries are busy setting fire to houses all over the place. What I am busy with is to circumvent them so that the fire may not spread. I am ready to sacrifice my personal peace to achieve this.

Myself (moved): The sentiment is, indeed, worthy of you Panditji. But I remember you wrote almost these identical words to me when I was in Pondicherry. Only I deeply regret that I have lost that valuable letter.

Panditji (with a nonchalant laugh): But since you remember the words, surely the loss of the letter can't be called a tragedy. Didn't Sri Ramakrishna once say that somebody wrote a letter to a friend giving him a list of things he wanted and the friend noted the things to be brought and then tore off the letter? (Laugh).

Myself (laughing in unison): Your love of laughter is priceless, Panditji. No wonder you admired Gandhiji so much for his love of laughter. But I mustn't presume too much upon your forbearance—your time is far too precious. Only one last word: Yesterday I explained in my letter all about Shrimati Subhalakshmi's film Mirabai. Please preside over the opening night if you possibly can. I ask this as a personal favour.

Panditji: Well, I would gladly comply; only you see, I can't promise unless they let me know in time the exact date when it is going to be released. You may tell them to notify me at least two weeks before.

* * * *

He did comply with my request. I read later in the paper that he had presided over the opening night of Mirabai and friends told me that he genuinely liked Subhalakshmi's Mirabhajans.

I have never had any occasion to hold converse with him about religion or mystic experience. But there is a good deal of evidence to prove that he reverenced all true saints and sages of India like Sri Ramakrishna, Vivekananda or Sri Aurobindo. I will quote only a part of the opening paragraph of his address on the 114th birthday anniversary of Sri Ramakrishna at the Ramakrishna Mission, New Delhi, on March 20, 1949:

"Swamiji, and friends", he said, "I am grateful for this invitation to come to this celebration and I am glad to take this opportunity to express my homage to the memory of Sri Ramakrishna Paramahansa. I do not know that I am particularly fitted to speak about the life and teachings of Sri Ramakrishna, because he was a man of God and I am a man of earth and engaged in earthly activities which consume all my energy. But even a man of earth can admire and perhaps be influenced by a man of God, and so I have been admiring godly men, though sometimes I do not altogether understand; and though I do not fully understand what they said, I have admired these great men of God. and have been influenced by reading what was written about them by their disciples. These extraordinary personalities have powerfully influenced their generation and the succeeding generations. They have powerfully influenced great men and changed the whole tenor of their lives. Sri Ramakrishna Paramahansa obviously was completely outside the run of average humanity. He appears to be in the tradition of the great rishis of India, who have come from time to time to draw our attention to the higher things of life and of the spirit".

I exchanged quite a few letters with him after the Chinese Aggression in 1963, when I restarted singing patriotic songs in different parts of India, as well as in our temple-soirees in Poona. He was so pleased that he wrote about it applauding me and then I was invited by the Delhi Radio authorities—presumably asked by him—to sing these national songs which were broadcast afterwards from Delhi, Calcutta and a few other centres.

I may mention that I raised for our troops about Rs. 2000 in Jaipur which I sent him duly. He thanked me and then went on to encourage me to stage our play on Mirabai—entitled, The Beggar Princess—at Poona. A few weeks before the performance I wrote to him putting him abreast of all that was happening on our side of the world. I told him about how hard Indira Devi was working coaching our Ashram devotees, boys and girls, including our two American friends who were staying with us at the time. In the end I wrote: "We are getting a lot of unexpected help from friends as well as strangers despite, alas, the malicious tongue-wagging of a few spiteful people. But then didn't Swami Vivekananda himself lash at those among us who specialise in jealousy and calumny? The poet Rabindranath Tagore told me more than once that we were a "suicidal" (atmaghati) race in that we love to belittle those who have raised our prestige all over the world. But let them wallow in their own saliva", I added determinedly, "for I am going to give a concert in Bombay too, God willing..... I want you to tell us to whom we are to hand over the money? To you, personally, or the Chief Minister? What is the correct procedure?"

He replied promptly, as usual, giving me once again his friendly hand-clasp:

> Your letter of the 12th January. I am glad to know of the success you are having in your work. Certainly you should give a concert in Bombay as arranged.
>
> It is unfortunately true that many people in India love to run down their fellow-countrymen. We have to put up with that and carry on our work. You have my good wishes.
> The money collected can be sent either to me or to the Chief Minister of Maharashtra. Probably, the Chief Minister will be glad to have it. He can forward it to me.

I have written at some length about his affectionate courtesy and steadfast sympathy which never failed me. I will end with an instance of his large-heartedness which has always been such a distinctive characteristic of his expansive nature.

I came to love years ago (in Berlin) a remarkable man: Shahid Suhrawardy, a poet, linguist, artist and idealist rolled in one. He was appointed Pakistan's Ambassador to Spain by his brother H. S, Suhrawardy of the Awami League. When Ayub Khan became the dictator, Shahid was recalled. He came back to Karachi a broken man, afflicted with serious heart-trouble and cataract of both eyes. I wrote to Panditji a long letter telling him all about Shahid's ailments and requested him to take my friend under his wing. He replied promptly (29.5.63):

> I am interested and rather sad to have news of Shahid Suhrawardy. I knew he had gone as Pakistan's Ambassador to Spain. After that I had no news of him.
>
> I would gladly help him or do something for him. But I do not quite know what I can do. If he can come to Delhi, I would welcome and try to help him. I do not think I should write to him directly. My writing to his brother, H. S. Suhrawardy will probably be misunderstood.
> If you can, you might write to him and tell him that I have very pleasant memories of him and am sorry to learn of his illness. If he can come to Delhi he would be welcome here.

I sent a copy of this letter to Shahid who wrote me back, moved:

> I am more than grateful to you for your love and friendship and through you also to Indira Devi for her kind wishes.....
> Your excerpts from Pundit Nehru's letter to you about me touched me to the quick. I was surprised that he still has thought for a poor person like myself when his mind is occupied with world questions. You will see from what I have written that no special sanatorium is needed by me. I have decided not to write to Pandit Nehru; should my heart, by some miracle, improve and I become normal, I shall go to Delhi myself; it would be better still, should you get an opportunity somewhere to meet him, if you could talk to him about me, express to him my gratefulness and how his words moved me to tears. I am the same age as he. I certainly believe that friends like you exist for me in spite of differences of regime. I think often of you and Indira Devi in my prayers and I beg you to pray for me.

Dostoievsky wrote in his Brothers Karamazov of the "tears of humanity with which our earth is soaked from crust to centre". But few, even among the humanitarians, feel this in the throb of their blood and the marrow of their bones—as Panditji did. No wonder he endeared himself to millions all over the world and thousands of derelicts wept like stricken souls.

People have written (and will write much more, I am sure) about ever so many traits and facets of his multifoliate character, and we all should, if only to feel stimulated by his many-mooded ideals and lonely strivings. Someday I, too, may write more about these. But as my tribute has already spun out to an unconscionable length, I will conclude with an instance of how he helped me once when I was in deep distress. Briefly, it happened like this:

Netaji once invited me—in 1924, I think—to his house to sing before a pleiad of our political luminaries. I had just begun my song when two of them started an animated discussion (presumably about the spectacular things they were going to achieve, stalking the land.) I stopped singing—rather abruptly. Subhas felt deeply embarrassed and apologised to me in a whisper, because, being the host himself, he could not very well reprimand his guests. I felt humiliated and was thinking of an excuse to make an exit when Panditji suddenly came to my rescue and thundered: "Gentlemen! If you don't care for music have some consideration at least for those who do care".

There was a startled hush: the situation was saved and I sang again.

THE MOTHER BENIGN

all, from any point of view whatsoever. What, after all are we? Can we ever have more separate existence than that of a tiny wave on the bosom of the infinite ocean, more freedom than that of a tiny leaf on a huge tree; more capacity than that of a tiny spark of a brightly burning fire; more self-confidence than that of a tiny grain of sand on the illimitable desert? This is our nature, this is our destiny, — what harm is there, what shame to admit this? On the contrary, it is our greatest Glory, it is our brightest beauty, it is our sweetest salvation — to have in this way, our essence in the Mother, our existence in the Mother, our exaltation in the Mother.

Sweet Paradox. In fact, what a sweet paradox Life is—free yet, fully dependent on Another; self-confident, yet eternally looking up towards Another: courageous, yet intensely hankering for Another! It is this 'beyond', it is this 'beside'; it is this 'above', it is this 'across'; it is this 'other', it is this 'onward' that constitute the very beauty, the very sweetness, the very grandeur, the very strength of Life! See, the small flower blooms forth on its small stalk, no doubt; but spreads out its petals all around, towards the horizons, towards Infinity. See, the small brooklet issues forth from a small hole of the mountain; but flows on and on, through wide tracts, towards the oceans, towards Infinity. See, the small gust of wind springs forth from a small corner of the sky; but blows forth gushingly towards the wide, wide world, towards Infinity.

Such is Life, such is our so-called puny, imperfect, miserable Life — from the physical side, smallest of the small; from the spiritual, greatest of the great! How beautifully does The Upanishad say —

> "The hundredth part of a hundredth part
> Of a hair-tip fine.
> This Soul, still it tends towards > Infinity, eternal shine."
> (Svetasvatara Upanishad)

So, let us not be confined to the four walls of our own selves alone. But let us all pledge ourselves anew, on this supremely auspicious occasion of this joyous Mother — Worship, to dedicate our lives for having such a supreme Expansion of life, such a sublime Exaltation of life, such a sweet Exhilaration of life. What more is needed?

And, this in fact, constitutes the quintessence of the lofty, lovely, lovable Philosophy of Sri Sri Durga Puja!

INDIA'S FOREIGN POLICY

By Prof. ANIL CHANDRA BANERJEE, M.A., Ph.D.

WHEN India was a part of the British Empire her foreign policy was determined, as a matter of course, by the British Government from London. The geography of the country, the distance between London and Calcutta, and the difficulty of communication between the two capitals vested the Governor-General-in-Council with a large measures of initiative and freedom, but this advantage was lost in the seventies of the last century when submarine cables connected Britain with India. The Government of India became a mere agency of the British Foreign Office so far as India's relations with her neighbours were concerned. Lord Morley observed, as Secretary of State for India, that the British Empire could not have two foreign policies. India had to conform to British Imperial policy in the sphere of international relations. Even a resourceful Governor-General like Lord Curzon had to modify his policy towards Tibet under imperious orders from London.

In those days the Governor-General personally controlled the Foreign and Political Department of the Government of India, but that Department was not really concerned with international affairs in the broadest sense; it dealt with matters connected with India's neighbours only. The great questions of foreign policy which disturbed the European Foreign Offices were beyond the scope of India's Foreign Department although she was not free from the consequences of conflict. For instance, India was dragged into the European War in 1914 although she had no voice at all in the march of events leading to that catastrophe. It goes without saying that India had no separate diplomatic representation at foreign capitals; the British Ambassador spoke for India if it was necesary to speak for her at all.

The War of 1914-18 initiated a process of change. The Imperial Conference of 1917 recognized the desirability of the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the parts of the British Empire "based upon a full recognition of the Dominions as autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth and of India as an important portion of the same" and the recognition of the right of the Dominions and India to an adequate voice in foreign policy. This recommendation of the Imperial Conference preceded the British Government's announcement of August 20, 1917, regarding the progressive realization of responsible government in India.

When the Peace Conference met at Versailles India's legal and constitutional position was unchanged; the declarations mentioned above had no formal effect or statutory force. "It was open to the British Government to insist on treating India as an integral part of the Empire for foreign policy. Instead, without any coercion, and rather to the surprise of those immediately concerned with Indian affairs, it was decided to treat India as a Dominion, to give India a distinct place in the negotiation of the treaty and its signature, and to secure for India separate membership of the League of Nations". Thus India became an Original Member of the League of Nations through the grace of Britain. She acquired an international status. In 1929 the Indian delegation to the League Assembly was headed by an Indian. India had a distinct representation on the Labour Organisation of the League.

But India's international status was not reflected in her internal constitutional position. Not to speak of the Act of 1919, even the Act of 1935 did not make her a Dominion in terms of the Statute of Westminster (1931). A British writer says: "In the long run an India which was merely a duplicate of the British Government would be an anomaly in League proceedings". In practice India's presence in the League meant little more than the addition of a vote for Britain. India secured no control over her foreign relations, no independent voice in the sphere of international relations. As in 1914, so in 1939, she was dragged into the European War as a part of the British Empire without being given any opportunity to make a decision for herself. Troops were despatched from India to Aden, Egypt and Singapore under orders of the British Government. The Central Legislature was bypassed, and Lord Zetland, Secretary of State for India, explained the position by saying that "It would clearly have been the height of folly to have given the world by discussion in the Legislature advance notice of our military dispositions".

Towards the close of the Second World War the precedent of 1919 was followed: India was made an Original Member of the United Nations. But the anomally of a dependent country acquiring a full-fledged international status persisted. India was not yet a free nation; therefore, de jure Indian representation meant de facto British representation. India's membership of the United Nations represented a process of historical continuity; it was a logical continuation of her membership of the League of Nations which had died meanwhile "unwept, unhonoured and unsung". It became a reality only when the Day of Deliverance arrived and Britain's link with India became a constitutional form rather than a political chain.

II

It was Jawaharlal Nehru who made the Indian National Congress really conscious of the intimate relation between domestic policy and foreign policy. For no less than half a century after its birth this premier national organisation concentrated its attention exclusively on domestic issues. The fate of Indians in South Africa, the victories of Germany in the First World War, the abolition of the Caliphate: such issues might stir the Indian nationalist conscience, but the leaders — not to speak of the masses—did not think of India as a unit of the world of colonial exploitation or as a member of the Family of Nations having rights and obligations in the international sphere. Raja Ram Mohan Roy was the first Indian to think internationally, to acclaim the victory of Revolution in Europe as a triumph of the human spirit. His mantle fell upon Rabindranath Tagore, who made internationalism a familiar concept in thought and literature. He was India's cultural ambassador to many countries in the West as well as in the East. In the purely political sphere, however, Jawaharlal Nehru practically took up the thread from where Raja Ram Mohan Roy had left it a century ago. He educated himself through intimate contact with the West; he saw the West at its best as also at its worst. And he educated the Congress through his untiring efforts to emphasize the significance of stirring developments in other parts of the world. He extended the horizon of our political thought even though, during the British regime, he was unable to extend the horizon of our political action.

In 1927 a Congress of oppressed nations was held at Brussels under the presidentship of the veteran Labour leader of Britain, George Lansbury It was attended by the spokesmen of many nations; delegates came from many European, Asian, African and Latin American countries. Nehru attended this congress as the sole representative of the Indian National Congress. It is necessary to remember that he was practically self-nominated, for it was he who suggested (he was in Europe at that time) that the Indian National Congress should send a representative to Brussels. The veterans of India's struggle for freedom were not yet aware of the significance of such international conferences.

Readers of Nehru's Autobiography need not be told how his mind was disturbed and his thought shaped by the victories of Fascism and Nazism in Europe. The Civil War in Spain and Japan's invasion of China moved him. He examined the Marxist line of thought and action. During the years 1934-39, when forces determined to crush Liberalism and Freedom appeared to be irresistible in Europe, Africa and Asia, Nehru's mind established a link between the destiny of India and that of other countries struggling to be free. The India of his dreams became a fighting writ in the great world crusade against Imperialism and Fascism. His influence was contagious. He persuaded his colleagues and fellow workers to see the truth, to realise that India's deliverance was by no means a local or isolated issue, and to broaden the perspective of her struggle for her birth right.

The new vision of the Congress was reflected in noble words in the resolution adopted by the Working Committee (September 14, 1939) as a protest against the British Government's action in dragging India into Hitler's War without asking for her consent. It is almost certain that the resolution was drafted by Nehru; in any case it breathes the new spirit which he had infused into the Congress. It says:

The Congress has repeatedly declared its entire disapproval of the ideology and practice of Fascism and Nazism and their glorification of war and violence and the suppression of the human spirit. It has condemned the aggression in which they have repeatedly indulged and their sweeping away of well established principles and recognised standards of civilized behaviour. It has seen in Fascism and Nazism the intensification of the principle of imperialism against which the Indian people have struggled for many years. The Working Committee must, therefore, unhesitatingly condemn the latest aggression of the Nazi Government in Germany against Poland and sympathise with those who resist it".

That sympathy, however, could not be mobilised into action by "orders issued by external authority". The resolution continues:

"A free democratic India will gladly associate herself with other free nations for mutual defence against aggression and for economic co-operation. She will work for the establishment of a real world order based on freedom and democracy, utilising the world's knowledge and resources for the progress and advancement of humanity".

In this passage we have a prophetic anticipation of the dual functions of the United Nations: (1) mutual defence against aggression, and (2) economic co-operation based on the utilization of the world's knowledge and resources. And even in those dark days India's potentiality as an important factor in international politics was not underestimated: "With her vast resources she must play an important part in any scheme of world reorganization". That such reorganization would be inevitable at the end of the War was clearly foreseen:

"The crisis that has overtaken Europe is not of Europe only but of humanity and will not pass like crisis of wars leaving the essential structures of the present-day world intact. It is likely to refashion the world for good or evil politically, socially and economically".

The war, says the resolution, means "no quarrel with the German people or the Japanese people or any other people"; it means the Indian people's "deep-rooted quarrel with the systems which deny freedom and are based on violence and aggression". And the picture of the refashioned world is drawn in the following words:

"They do not look forward to a victory of one people over another or to a dictated peace but a victory of real democracy for all the people of all the countries and a world freed from the nightmare of violence and imperialist aggression".

In conclusion, the resolution emphasizes the determination of the Indian people "to achieve the freedom of India within the larger freedom of the world".

III

This resolution of the Working Committee provided the basis for Free India's foreign policy. When the Congress took up the great task of framing the Constitution of India in accordance with the provisions of the Cabinet Mission Plan, the principles outlined in 1939 were given a more or less definite shape.

The Objectives Resolution which Nehru moved in the Constituent Assembly on December 13, 1946, contained the following words indicating the principles of foreign policy which India as "an independent, sovereign Republic" hoped to adopt:

"Wherein shall be maintained the integrity of the territory of the Republic and its sovereign rights on land, sea and air according to justice and the law of civilized nations, and this ancient land attain its rightful and honoured place in the world and make its full and willing contribution to the promotion of world peace and the welfare of mankind."

In his explanatory speech Nehru said:

". . . What we are going to do in India, is going to have a powerful effect on the rest of the world, not only because a new force, independent nation comes out into the arena of the world, but because of the very fact that India is such a country that by virtue, not only of her large size and population, but of her enormous resources, she can immediately play an important part in world affairs. Therefore, it is right that the framers of our Constitution should always bear this larger international aspect in mind.

"We approach the world in a friendly way. We want to make friends with all countries. We want to make friends, in spite of the long history of conflict in the past, with England also".

The decision "to make friends . . . with England also" explains India's "full membership of the Commonwealth of Nations and her acceptance of the King as the symbol of the free association of the independent nations and as such the Head of the Commonwealth". (Declaration of the Prime Minister's Conference, London, April 27, 1949). Here the emphasis is placed on the concept of "the free association of the independent nation". This "free association" is neither mentioned in nor prohibited by the Constitution of India; it is extra-legal. It is a voluntary association with the Commonwealth which India can cut off at any moment.

So far as the Constitution is concerned, its framers did bear the "larger international aspect in mind"'. Article 51 says:

"The State shall endeavour to—

(a) promote international peace and security;

(b) maintain just and honourable relations between nations;

(c) foster respect for international law and treaty obligations in the dealings of organised peoples with one another; and

(d) encourage settlement of international disputes by arbitration."

This provision reminds us of analogous provisions in the Constitutions of two foreign countries. Article 29 of the Constitution of Eire (1937) says:

"(1) Ireland affirms its devotion to the ideal of peace and friendly co-operation amongst nations founded on International law and morality.

(2) Ireland affirms its adherence to the principle of the pacific settlement of international disputes by international arbitration or judicial determination.

(3) Ireland accepts the generally recognized principles of International Law as its rule of conduct in its relations with other States."

The Preamble to the Constitution of the Fourth French Republic (1946) says:

"The French Republic, faithful to its traditions, abides by the rules of international public law. It will not undertake wars of conquest and will never use its arms against the freedom of any people. On condition of reciprocity, France accepts the limitations of sovereignty necessary to the organization and defence of peace."

Article 51 has been placed in Part IV of the Constitution under the heading "Directive Principles of State Policy." In introducing the Draft Constitution (November 4, 1948) Dr. Ambedkar told the Constituent Assembly:

"If it is said that the Directive Principles have no legal force behind them, I am prepared to admit it. But I am not prepared to admit that they have no sort of binding force at all. . . . whoever captures power will not be free to do what he likes with it. In the exercise of it, he will have to respect these . . . . Directive Principles. He cannot ignore them. He may not have to answer for their breach in a court of law. But he will certainly have to answer for them before the electorate at election time."

Indeed, the Constitution itself says that the Directive Principles "are . . . . fundamental in the governance of the country and it shall be the duty of the State to apply these principles in making laws" (Article 37).

Provision for "fostering respect for international law and treaty obligations" was made by Article 253 of the Constitution:

"Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of the Chapter (i.e., Part XI: Relations between the Union and the States), Parliament has power to make any law for the whole or any part of the territory of India for implementing any treaty, agreement or convention with any other country or countries or any decision made at any international conference, association or other body."

The power of making treaties and the duty of implementing them are vested in the Centre (Seventh Schedule: items 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 18, 21). In exercising this power and in performing this duty it may be necessary for the Centre to legislate on State subjects. The authority to do so is given by Article 253. In exercising these powers the Centre is required to be guided by the principles laid down in Article 51.

IV

The delicate task of evolving a foreign policy for Free India fell inevitably upon Nehru in 1947. It was a task very congenial for him, and having regard to his previous interest in international affairs and the part he had played in laying down the principles of international conduct he was obviously the fittest person to take charge of the Ministry of External Affairs. But to take direct charge of an important and expanding portfolio was to add to the heavy burden which he carried as Prime Minister. From a long-term point of view it was unwise to combine these two exacting offices. We follow British precedents, but only two British Prime Ministers—Lord Salisbury in the last century and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in the present century—made such an experiment.

In Nehru's case the combination of two offices had two results. In the first place, he was doubtless too busy to look after the details of the work done by the Ministry of External Affairs. He had to depend too much on the bureaucracy. This was particularly unfortunate in case of this Ministry, for it was staffed by officials who had no previous training for the task entrusted to them. As British India had no independent foreign policy the Government of India before 1947 had no Foreign Service. A handful of I.C.S. officers, not exceeding half a dozen in number, had been assigned jobs connected with the war after 1939, but they acquired no diplomatic experience worth the name. The average I.C.S. officer, however efficient, was a novice in the Ministry of External Affairs. He had to learn his job before he could advise his Minister. In Parliamentary Government Ministers are amateurs and have to depend on officials for technical advice. This system works well in Britain because the top officials in every Ministry are trained experts with long experience of the type of work assigned to them. The Permanent Under-Secretary in the Bri-

Tantric Concept of Animal Sacrifice

By K. M. Purakayastha

IT was in July 1920 that Mahatma Gandhi gave his call for "non - violent non - co-operation." Whether Gandhiji intended non-violence to be a creed of political resistance or whether he enunciated in it an all-pervasive philosophy of life is a matter on which opinion may well vary. But one thing is clear that where the tradition of Jainism and Vaishnavism failed to make a deep impression on public mind, Gandhiji's preaching succeeded in shaping public opinion to a large extent. As a signal point of illustration, it may be pointed out that animal sacrifice in connection with the worship of Mother Durga has in the recent decades largely been falling into disuse. In the several thousand community worship held in Calcutta every autumn, the worship is performed in most cases without animal sacrifice being made a part of it. There is a veiled revulsion against animal-killing being attuned to the worship of the benign Mother.

Three decades earlier than the call for non-violence was given by Gandhiji, the case against animal sacrifice in connection with the worship of a deity was most powerfully voiced by Tagore in his well-known melodrama entitled "Bisarjan." The plot was based on a medieval tradition of the Tripura Raj family entailing a grim duel between the reigning King and the official priest of the patron-Godess of the State. The crisis was worked out by the poet on the priest's man having taken away a beggar woman's child-goat for the purpose of sacrifice and the King on her complaint having peremptorily ordered the stoppage of animal killing in the deity's temple. The priest resisted the order by every means and at last amidst a tragic scene of self-slaughter offered by the beloved disciple of the priest, the deity was consigned and cast away to the flowing river of the capital. Emotionally, the case was hundred per cent lost by the traditionalist.

To every reader of Tagore the Shrieking and palpitating words of the goat-owning beggar girl, Aparna by name, have rung and rung in the years for the last six decades. She was a kind of mother to the child-goat tending and rearing its tiny limbs and she powerfully argued that the Godess, the Mother, could never accept the sacrifice of such a tender innocent thing. The priest Raghupati was incorrigibly unperturbed. Violence and destruction, he said, are foolish slogans; the whole world is a slaughter house and every particle of dust is studded with death and destruction. Crafty and dishonest as he was shown, the priests bizarre reasoning falls flat on the reader. The poet's sympathy could be clearly read even in the midst of dramatic detachment.

The point which I seek to raise is not whether animal sacrifice should be continued or scrapped in course of the mother-worship. That would depend on many things which cannot be argued here. But there should be some understanding of the Tantric concept of animal worship in any kind of Shakti Puja. To approach the question from an intellectual and sentimental point of view as often done, is however most unfortunate. All classical Hindu religious worships have nothing, if not a spiritul basis. For imstance, it might be open to a modern apologist of animal killing that it is a Nietzscheian prescription, calculated to still the heart of the worshipper and to remove charity, kindness and softness from human nature. Such an explanation would be diabolical. The Tantric mother is the Universal Prakriti she is the cosmic principle of dynamism in a spiritually personified sense. To worship her is to worship the individual will in a bid to indentify if with the Universal will of consciousness force or power-dynamism. Every inch of the life-process being spiritually real. Life must be experienced in its totality but in its never-failing spiritual depth of significance. All activities of life including the religious rites, are the way to worship the Mother. Indeed the activities themselves are the Mother, She being basically the Universal power-dynamism.

But as men act and experience life, a process of disintegration is concomitantly operative. According to Tantra, every act of human experience, mental or material, entails a corresponding disintegrating transformation of the creative cells constituting the human symbol. To re-create at one point, man has to disintegrate at another. There can be no attempt at worshipping the Universal Will, that is to say, realising It in the supra-mental consciousness of the worshipper, oblivious of this basic pattern of creative-destructive process. Bali or the animal sacrifice in Tantric worship is intended to emphasise that destructive impact of all creativity, to heighten the consciousness in the worshipper's mind that the Mother that creates is also the Mother that destroys. Without a reference to her destructive role the creative role of the Mother cannot be from a spiritual standpoint visualised.

For men and women treading their existence in every-day life, however, Tantric worship is

NALAK

By

ABANINDRANATH TAGORE

RISHI Debal was in meditation. Nalak — a boy of tender age — was waiting on him. The forest of Bardhan was already dark, dark was the foot of the banyan tree, while the gloom deepened along either bank of the Ganges. The stars twinkled on the dark sky in that quiescent night — the wind was asleep, a hush lay over the water and the leaves of trees were still. Then, there gleamed a light in that darkness, — it bloomed in rhytmic graduation as a flower blossoms, as the moon waxes — subtly and imperceptibly. The whole universe quivered like water-drops unsteady on a lotus-leaf swinging to and fro. Rishi opened his eyes and beheld an unearthly light in the sky. That was neither of the moon nor of the sun, but a light blended of lights that are never beheld. It oked like an ensign of rainbow-colour unfurled ross the sky by some unknown hand, like flights light built in the void by an architect for some d to descend on this earth.

Rishi stood up from his seat and said to Nalak y boy, Lord Buddha will be born in Kapilabastu. am leaving for that Kingdom, so that my eyes may st upon Him. Please remain careful.'

A narrow winding track led through the middle the forest. Rishi took that path and disappeared rthward. Nalak sank in meditation alone, amidst at solemn silence, while scene after scene passed efore his vision.

The royal palace of Kapilabastu appeared first. ueen Mayadebi was asleep on a golden bed-stead. n open verandah adjoining her room overlooked the rden, the city, temples and monasteries at a stance. Far beyond these rose the Himalayan ountains mantled in white snow. And, beyond at range an aureole of wonderful white light over-pped the whole horizon through which the sun owed like a vermilion speck.

King Suddhodan stared at that marvellous lumination, when Mayadevi woke up and called to e king—'Oh Lord! What a delightful dream I st have had! In my dream I saw that a white aby elephant with two tiny tusks curved like the escent moon, came across the clouds and descended n my lap; but thereafter I could not see where it isappeared. And oh! it bore a mark on its forehead ike a dot of red-vermilion'.

The King and the Queen talked about the dream; ne day had dawned. The court-pipers began playing n their instruments in the palace-portico; people oved about on the streets, sounds of conch-shells nd gongs poured from the temples; in the inner yard f the palace the maid-servants were carrying water n golden urns for Mayadevi to bathe in, the female ardeners were collecting flowers in golden latters to worship with, the pet peacock f the Queen flew down on the cornice of he roof, the pair of Suk-Sari inside the olden cage began quarrelling with the naid-servant for their breakfast, the eggar appeared on the doorway — 'Long ive our Queen Mother!' The dream of he Queen became a matter of discussion mong the palace-inmates.

King Suddhodan adorned the royal hrone with the brilliance of the morning un. He wore a crimson cloth made of ilk, bore on his head a crown set with ewels and had on his forehead a sacred nark of red-sandal. His chief councillor stood by his side, after him the sceptre-bearer holding a golden sceptre in his nand; on the other side stood the umbrella-bearer spreading open the white umbrella, and after him the Mayor of the city with sword and shield in his hand.

Two corridors lay along the two sides of the royal throne. One of them was reserved for the Brahmin scholars and the other made room for the subordinate kings and princes within the kingdom and outside. The royal court was surrounded by the common subjects of the kingdom, who were again encircled by sentries carrying stout clubs in their hands and wearing red turbans on their heads.

Just at the centre of the court were laid eight pieces of red-coloured blankets on the floor beneath the red-canopy, and on each of these eight seats eight fortune-tellers of the royal family sat together to interpret the Queen's dream with chalk in their hands and scriptures and almanacs opened before them. Some of these scholars were grey-haired, some bald, some with single tufts, some with moustache resembling the broomsticks. Each of them carried a box of snuff. Now, thus followed what those eight foretellers observed as the probable consequence of the dream of the Queen either by writing with the pen or by drawing lines with a chalk:—

'The dream concerning the sun indicates that the child born to the king shall be the greatest ruler and supreme in might. The lunar effect shall endow the Prince with physical grace, mental nobleness and enviable longevity. The white elephant signifies that the prince shall be calm, meditative, world's rarest and most renowned of the pious, supremely wise and a deliverer of the distressed. Oh king! be certain without the least stain of doubt that a saint is coming down to this Sakya dynasty. The writ on the scriptures never goes in vain! So, rejoice!'

Instantly, there rolled murmurs from every corner—'Rejoice, rejoice! Give alms to the poor, offer them food, clothings, candles, incense, land!' Chants of merriment rang through every quarter in Kapilabastu—in the royal palace, in tenants' huts, in fields and in forums, the sky dazzled in delight, the wind blew in a joy. The diamonds of the king's crown, pearl-set frills of the royal umbrella, the necklace round the neck of the chief councillor presented by the king, the Bhutanese red blankets gifted to the scholars by the queen, the red silken veils offered as charity to all the subjects irrespective of age and sex in and out of the palace began to dance and dangle in an atmosphere of joy and festivity.

Next was unveiled the picture of the vast garden before Nalak's inner eyes. It was an endless garden abounding in innumerable trees and green grass, having exhilerating lake-breeze, cool shades, twittering of birds, and fragrance of flowers. In the centre of the garden lay an expansive lotus-tank. On one of its edges stood a skyscraping 'sal' tree—its boughs and leaves profusely in blossoms. the southern breeze was letting down some of them on a marble-table beneath that tree.

Evening was creeping in slowly. Handsome maidens of the neighbourhood took their afternoon wash in that lotus-tank and left the garden. A group of gardeners with their hair tucked upwards in a sheaf, strings of beads round their neck and golden ear-rings, swept the withered leaves with brooms, watered the flower-plants and departed at the close of their work and of the day. Neither a particle of dust nor a fibre of hay did they leave anywhere within the garden,—either on the green grass, or on the shore of the tank or at the bottom of the tree.

Night was following by steps—a full-moon night of the holy Spring ! In the west, the sun was setting, while in the east the moon was getting up. One of the horizons looked hemmed in gold, while the other glittered in silver lining. The azure sky overhead was filled with countless stars and the sounds of gongs and conch-shells of the evening prayer. At such a juncture, Mayadevi, with her confidante, came for her evening walk in the garden in a golden palanquin fretted with silver lattice-work, followed by royal maids carrying floral fans and betel boxes. Placing her hand on her confidante's, the Queen leisurely rambled through the shades, and at last came to halt beneath that lofty 'sal' in the middle of the garden,—her left hand resting on the flowery bough of the 'sal' and her right hand on her waist.

Immediately, the day ended, the birds gave out their parting chirrups, the breeze streamed with the fragrance of flowers, the sky gleamed in the light of the stars. The round moon of the full-moon climbed on the east like a golden umbrella above the 'sal' tree. Just at that time, Lord Buddha was born resembling a doll made of gold, like another moon over this earth abounding in 'champaka' flowers. The surrounding area glowed in brightness, and not a speck of darkness remained anywhere. Holy Buddha came down on the lap of the Queen Mother, Mayadevi, and on the wide lap of this earth, like a tiny drop of dew on a lotus—serene and beautiful.

In no time, the garden of Lumbini swelled in streams of people; King Suddhodan attended by his councillors and followed by his courtiers came to look at his new-born son; the ladies of the royal palace welcomed the occasion by blowing conch-shells and yodelling.

The gods in Heaven welcomed the occasion with showers of flowers and sounds of large drums that resounded through the clouds; the sounds of conch-shells and gongs in every house of the mortals churned the air; the sounds of the kettle-drums and trumpets rolled and rattled within the nether-world. Lord Buddha was born amidst tumultuous cheers of the three worlds and advanced his first seven-steps on this earth. On each place where His seven graceful foot-prints were left, seven golden lotuses each resembling a spinning wheel of fire, emerged above the soil from within the unimaginable depths of the nether-world; and the seven sheets of clouds carried water from the seven seas to sprinkle gently on those seven lotuses.

Nalak was amazed to realise through his inner eyes that the gods and demons and men of the three worlds hailed the advent of Lord Buddha amidst those seven lotuses! In the meantime, Nalak's mother came there and called to him—'Naughty boy! Rishi is not here, I find, and you remain alone! Don't you at all feel the urge for either sleep or food or study, only wasting time on the pretence of a devotee! Eh! Chasing the shadow of an ascetic at the age when the cradle calls!'

With this, Nalak's mother began to drag him by the hand; the boy rolled on the dust and lamented—'Please, leave me, mother, let me go; let me see what comes next!'

And, the forests around echoed that lamentation—'Leave me, oh mother, let me go!' But all were in vain. The boy was imprisoned within the four walls of the room.

Nalak was now forcibly sent to the village primary school. The teacher there was giving lessons. But he was attentive neither to reading nor to writing. His soul flew to the shade of that banyan tree in the forests of Bardhan and to the capital of Kapilabastu.

A small window in the thatched hut of the primary school used to bring a glimpse of a tamarind tree, a portion of Kas-hedge and thorny shrubs, a cluster of bamboo plants, and a pond. At noon, a patch of sunshine shone on the spot, a wood-pecker with a crimson tuft on its head would perch on a shady branch and began to warble, a black hornet would drone around the flowers in the thorny hedges—once it came near the window, the next moment it flew back. Nalak stared at that fly and thought—'How I wish I had wings like that fly; then I could defy this confinement within this room and would reach the forest at one run'. Just at that moment, the teacher cried—'Well, write on, boys!' Immediately, the birds disappeared, and the pens ran rapidly on the palm-leaves. Alas! How others would feel what mental pangs distressed Nalak. His pen refused to write, still he would not be allowed to stop writing; tears trickled from his eyes, yet he would be forced to murmur the alphabets one after another—no matter it was summer or rain, day or noon.

When Nalak was led home back from the school by his mother, sometimes the easterly wind would perhaps blow shaking the palm-tops above the 'sal' and the crows cawed through fear within bamboo-bushes. Nalak desired there would occur such a strong gale as would smash and sweep away the whole village along with the straw-roof of the primary school; in that case, his parents would have no way but to reside in the forest, and he would be set free from such imprisonment. At night, as the wind squalled outside and the lightning flashed at intervals, Nalak prayed in his heart of hearts—'Oh! let there be storm, let there be rain, let the mud-wall give way, let the peg of the door be off its hinges!' And practically the storm came, the rain inundated the places around; but alas! never did the portals open and the wall give way—they remained closed for ever and for all time!

How then could he again return to that forest of Bardhan surrounded by wide meadows and expansive sky where the birds flew in merriment and the fawns skipped around in glee! Where there was none to hold him up in the shade of the trees and in the breeze of the meadows, — where freedom danced in every bird, beast and insect!

Nalak was yearning for the return of the Rishi. At the other end, Rishi Debal too, absorbed in mental pleasure to consecrate his body with the blessings of the holy dust of the feet of Buddhadeb, was returning homeward dancing with raised hands and singing all through the villages he crossed — "Bow to Thee, oh Sun, the Light of all lights! Bow to Thee, oh Moon! the Marvel of the Night! Bow to Thee, oh Treasure of Endless Qualities, the Holy Heir of Sakya Dynasty!"

It was then autumn. The sky glittered in golden sunshine. The meadows on either side of the road smiled in golden crops. The minds of the people declined to remain within. The Knights arrayed their cavalry to set out for triumphant war; the commoners spead abroad in different directions — some to the market-place with goods on their heads, some for weeding out their cornfields, some for trading across the rivers and the seas. People who had no occupation otherwise, also joined the Rishi in his melodious hymn—"Bow to Thee, oh Lord, the Sun of Wisdom!"

The evening had set in. The sky was perfectly blue without a speck of cloud, the moonlight streamed down to the earth from the heaven, the milky-way overhead shone like a piece of luminous lattice-work along north and south. Rishi Debal sang through the village - path — "Bow to Thee, oh Holy Heir of King Sakya". The children on their mothers' lap listened to those chants. Mothers standing on the mud-built verandah attended that. The old grand-mother heard that from inside the room, and at once called out everybody to bow down in reverence. Gongs and conchshells of the village temple resounded in harmony with the hymns of the Rishi—'Bow to Thee, oh Lord!' When the night approached dawn and the dew-laden lotuses bent to say 'Bow to Thee', and the moon leaning to the west prayed—'Bow to Thee', Nalak rose up from his sleep and saw the Rishi before him immediately on opening his eyes. The doors opened and allowed the golden rays into the room to rest directly on the head of Nalak. He bent down to the Rishi who blessed him—'Be Thou happy and emancipated!'

Holding Rishi by the hand, Nalak came down on the road; his mother begged the Rishi with tearful eyes—'I have none else in this world save only Nalak, so please do not take him away from me!'

The Rishi consoled her — 'Do not grieve, you shall get him back after thirty-five years from this day. Do not be afraid; come, dedicate your son to the feet of Buddhadeb'. Rishi uttered the incantations and the mother holding her son by his hands repeated—

'Beneath the cloudless sky, I worship Lord Buddha; I worship Him with Nalak, the loveliest of all flowers'.

The Rishi then held Nalak by his arms and disappeared towards the forest.

Again, they returned to the forest of Bardhan, to the foot of that banyan tree! Beneath that tree, Rishi Debal and a group of ascetics sat round the fire, their tridents glittering in the flames of that fire.

The forest was dense indeed. A profound darkness hung on all sides to leave nothing visible; only clusters of banyan leaves, the roots and the matted locks of the ascetics shone in the crimson flames of boiled gold like the lightning in a thunder-laden sky.

Amidst that darkness, Nalak silently sank in meditation. Over his head lay the blue sky, down in the forest reigned the undisturbed gloom. There was neither any stir nor any sound from any quarter; only, at intervals, Rishi Debal broke the silence—"Well, next?" And the scene rested before Nalak's eyes and he described:

'King Suddhodan adorned the ivory-throne covered with the skin of a deer, with Buddhadeb on his lap; on either of his sides four fortune-tellers took their seats, the sacrificial fire burnt in his front; on one side sat mother Gotami, surrounded by the twigs of grass and corns, gongs and conches, flowers and sandal paste, resin and incense.

The oblation was over. The king asked the Brahmins—"How do you want to name the prince?"

'The Brahmins answered—"We offer to call the Prince as Siddhartha, as all the material prosperities and religious attainments of the people of this earth will come from this Prince. Being a King, the Prince shall favour the people with his immense riches, and if he does not become a king, he shall enlighten this world by achieving omniscience, and after renouncing this mortal life shall identify himself with the final emancipation of Soul to the Spirit. Siddhartha is therefore a fit name for him".

'The king requested the Brahmins—"Please calculate unmistakably whether the Prince shall ascend the throne and rule his kingdom, or he shall renounce everything and proceed to the forest and devote his life to attain Divine Wisdom".

'The eight fortune-tellers of the King delivered their conclusive opinion in conformity with their astrological formula. Sri Ram Acharya, the foremost of the scholars observed by showing his two fingers to the King—"Oh king, the Prince may be either a King or a spiritual devotee. It is difficult to predict anything definitely as he possesses equal inclination for both". Lakshmana, his younger brother, endorsed his elder's opinion with his eyes shut. Jayadhwaj remarked by waving his palms — "It may be either 'yes' or 'no'" Srimanta swung his head on either side and put in—"I too bear the same opinion." Raising his two eyes, Bhoja commented—"This or that, both are correct". Sudatta declared turning his head right and left—"I verify both the sides as equal". Subam, the younger brother of Sudatta pushing two pinches of snuff inside his nostrils concluded—"In my opinion what my elder declares seems to be correct". Only Kaudinya, the youngest in age, but the greatest in learnings, raised only one finger to the King and affirmed "My Lord, there appears to be no 'either' in my calculation; I can assure you the Prince shall tread no other path of life than the path of spiritual emancipation. Under no circumstances shall he confine himself within the palace. On the very day he comes across an old man worn out by age, a destitute rendered skeleton by sickness, a corpse and a mendicant, this Prince Siddhartha shall renounce the pomps and pleasures of your palace leaving it to an abyss of grief,—as a bird flies away tearing the golden chain".'

The ascetics stood up in reverence. Nalak opened his eyes and saw it was dawn.

Nothing fresh passed before Nalak's eyes any more! From that day onward, whenever he sat in meditation, there appeared before his eyes a colossal, formidable golden wall built of gold-bricks, that obstructed the blue of the sky, checked the movement of the air and dazzled like a furnace in the rays of the sun. The wall had neither any beginning nor any end. The mind of Nalak now often flew like a bird through the air and returned with a check against that wall. In this way, the days and months and years rolled by. Siddhartha remained confined to the inner side of the wall while on the other side Nalak moved freely—like a bird in a cage and a bird in the bush.

King Suddhodan, out of fear, kept Siddhartha amidst lures of happy dreams, smiles and music, pomp and pleasure, like a bird in a golden cage, lest his son should quit his palace as a monk. When during summer, the sun became scorching, water dried up and the places around appeared to burn in the blazing winds; when in the rainy season, fresh clouds gathered in the sky, the earth was flooded, rivers swelled in spate; when in autumn, the sky wore blue, the white clouds sailed through the puffy winds, water of rivers receded and showed the sand-beds bare; when in winter, the snow and mist covered all sides, leaves of the trees withered, flowers were worn out; again in spring when the buds and blossoms laid a soft carpet, the air was filled with an aroma, happiness trickled from the southern breeze, the moon-beams and the songs of the birds, the soul of Siddhartha cried for getting out of the imprisonment within that golden wall like the bird fastened in the cage. As if, he heard that the whole world, the whole universe lamentingly implored him,—whether in summer noons or rainy nights, or in autumn evenings, or in wintry dawns, or in spring hours—sometimes in the cooing of the cuckoos, sometimes in the sighs of the wind, sometimes in the spatterings of the rain, sometimes in the shiverings of the winter, or sometimes in the rustlings of the leaves,—'Come Thou out, oh Lord, bring us Salvation! A furnace of miseries and death blazes continuously in this mortal world, lives shrink and shrivel in grief and in affliction. Behold, the drops of tears overflow the hearts, the tides of sorrows wash out the mind's confidence.

'Pleasure is like the lightning of the sky, that flickers and is gone; happiness is like the autumn-clouds that float away and never return. Life withers like the Sefali flowers on the dewy bed of the winter; songs of the Spring are transcient Alas! the fire of misery and the pyre of death smoulder day and night in this mortal earth! Who is there to quench that flame? Who is there except Thy Holiness to dispel fear from this earth? Do not remain under spell of allurements; leave the snare of flowers, come Thou out—deliver us! Bestow Thy courage on the mortals!'

The soul of Nalak, the souls of the mortals, the soul of the sky and the air impatiently longed to take a glance of Buddhadeb. The woes of their hearts sometimes dripped like rains, sometimes they struck the golden wall like a gale; 'Come Thou!' they begged in the form of light; 'deliver the people'! They prayed in the shape of darkness! Like the red flowers they blossomed and withered away like dried leaves,—the smiles and the tears, the birth and the death of the people of this earth bubbled around Siddhartha—by day and by night, through months and through years, in one form or the other, in this place or that.

One day he observed a flock of swans flying across the blue sky like a wreath of 'Parijat' flowers in unbounded ecstasy. Their thousand wings clapped in a harmonious cadence of swell and fall, their thousand voices quacked in unison, 'Let us march forward!" The sky responded to their call; clouds floated with white sails, the wind whistled through the clouds, the earth vibrated with their quacking. The river flowed to the sea, the sea returned to the river breaking the rocks and pushing through the sands. Amid such unending joy, an arrow shot by some cruel hand pierced the wings of a swan like a lightning, and instantly the whole universe shivered in a painful cry. Stained with blood ,the wounded bird swooned helplessly at the feet of Siddhartha like a withered flower from a torn wreath. All its raptures were lost in a moment—its rhythmic movement through the air, its quacking. All the rejoicings of this universe seemed to hush in a twinkling! The sky lay vacant, the air ceased to blow; only an arrow brought an end to everything—all sounds and stirs and endless raptures! Only from a distance mournings and wailings began to ring in the ears, in the heart of Siddhartha! An unceasing lamentation that rent one's heart. By day and by night, in labour and in leisure, at pleasure and at peace, at work and at rest, he began to hear that ceaseless, endless lamentation throughout this mortal earth.

After a continuous rain, storm and darkness for days and for nights, a bright cloudless morn visited the east; the sky smiled in joy, the air blew in merriment, a honey-coloured light shone on the clouds; the birds in the groves, the peasants in villages, the children at homes choired the prayers in delight. Standing on the Eastern Gate Siddhartha watched that there was no sorrow, no tears anywhere! As far as his eyes could see and ears could hear—there was joy everywhere, on all sides. Happiness smiled in the greenness of the fields, happiness waved across the flowers in groves and orchards, happiness glittered on the smiling faces of the children, in their coloured garments and toys; happiness streamed like showers of petals—from leaves and from creepers; happiness puffed about like golden dusts along the paths in clouds of red-vermillion.

The mind's chariot of Siddhartha—his golden chariot slowly advanced amidst that happiness towards the light of dawn, towards the end of darkness along the eastern path. No sorrow, no misery, no tear seemed to him to exist but happiness alone —happiness that vibrated in the waking after sleep, in th light after the dark, in the blooming of the flowers, in the waving of the garlands, in the music of the lute. Nothing withered or wore out in this earth—it seemed to him.

All on a sudden, an age-worn, toothless old man, stooping on a stick, magically appeared before his chariot blowing out that stainless, endless joy and happiness like a candle before a storm. He carried along only a litter of bones without a pinch of flesh over his skeleton. He was bent with age, his feet and hands and neck trembled, his words mere mumblings. He neither saw nor heard anything; but only stretched out his two shrunken, charred hands before him and walked from light into darkness—in a very slow pace and alone; He was completely out of strength and steadiness, bereft of any heir, relation or next of kin. Everything was lost to him, everything was dead to him, all the charms and chances were rinsed out of his life to the last drop. Light pained his eyes, music sounded hoarse in his ears, happiness brought gloom to his mind. Wrapped in a cloak of eternal darkness woes and miseries, pangs and sufferings like a tatter with numerous stitches and patches, he staggered alone in some direction—away from the lights and delights of the world. Life flew away from his neighbourhood, music ceased to hear his steps, happiness feared to come near him, beauty shrank in fright at his sight. Casting a grim shadow of darkness over the brightness of the day, and laughing a weird laugh that spectre-thin figure obstructed the path of Siddhartha and addressed, 'Behold me! I am Infirmity incarnate! No mortal can escape my grip, —I destroy everything, I wither away everything, I suck out everything, I devour everything! Mark me, oh Prince! You too shall fall a victim some day! Being a King's son, you cannot escape the grip of infirmity'. And he laughed a frightful laugh and turned his eyes to all directions. In a moment, the brightness of the heaven, the greenness of the earth faded out, fields and meadows blazed and burnt, rivers ran dry—everything that was new turned old, everything that was fresh became stale. Siddhartha observed that the mountains came tumbling down, trees were uprooted, everything was being found to dust—and through the raging portents, the ghastly figure of Infirmity staggered in slow, tottering pace waving his white hair, putting out all light, blowing out all the joys of the earth, crunching and squeezing everything, rattling in the litter of bones.

Another day his golden chariot wheeled on slowly through the southern gate of Kapilabastu fluttering the royal ensign in gentle breeze. The breeze sweetened by the fragrance of numberless flowers, sandal-wood, softly touched the skin, relieving all sufferings and afflictions. It was the sweet breeze that awakened the buds, that refreshed life, that brought to the ears the musical notes of a cowboy's flute from a distant field, the melodious songs of the cuckoos from distant thickets! Everybody was out in open air, under the starry sky—everybody was merry! Above in the sky lay a soft bluish lustre, down on the earth played a splendid network of numberless shadows; the fragrant breeze passed gently through the space—happiness sang everywhere, merriment rang everywhere—in water and in land, in woods and in groves, at home and abroad. Hearts swung, minds swelled in delight to bathe in that breeze. His mind's chariot sailed on dancing with the music of the boatmen's songs on the still water of the ocean of happiness. Venus stared at the earth from Heaven like a flower of a dreamland and the lustre of happiness streamed down, the breeze of happiness blew gently—in east and west, in north and south, at all ends and corners. Miseries appeared to fly away, misfortune appeared to exist nowhere; the whole universe, each and every mortal of the earth seemed to live in boundless comfort, peace and happiness.

Just about that time, the curtain rose, the dreams of happiness shattered and a pallid figure, stricken with fever and groaning with illness rose before his eyes. He was unable to stand, and trembled. He could not walk. Sometimes he shivered in chill, sometimes he cried for water in agony. All the blood of his veins and arteries seemed to force out through his eyes, that rendered the sky as red as fire. The blood of his body had turned water that streamed across his frozen, pallid body as white as a sheet of paper. The air became cold like ice to come in his contact. He seemed to suck out the soul of this earth by his inhalation. He appeared to spread by his exhalation all the maladies and malignance of his own life around this earth. Siddhartha observed that the light of the earth was gone, air was dead, all songs and murmurings were hushed. Only a sound like someone hammering violently on a stony wall came out from the heart of that soiled, untidy, fever-stricken pallid figure—'Drum, Drum!' And, with the rhythm of that sound, all the stars in Heaven twinkled and dwindled, the air blew and stopped alternately.

Siddhartha returned home with an impression of the frightful figure of disease; he walked into the pomps and riches, into the lap of happiness, but still he constantly heard that frightful drumming sound within his bones and ribs.

His mind's chariot—his golden chariot then set out through the western gate towards the west where the sun declined, where the day ended. Everybody was returning from that direction to their respective abodes. Birds returned to their nests in the boughs behind the leaves with parting chirrups, the lowing herds returned to their sheds along the meadows and river-side raising a cloud of golden dust of the dusk. The cowboys led their steps towards the lap of their mothers along the village path playing on their pipes. Everybody walked homeward from the distant markets and ghats. Everybody returned home—far and near. The starry sky showed light to those who were homeless. The large earthen-lamp at the foot of the holy altar burnt for those who were at work, who were reading, who were playing. Everybody came back either to his mother's lap, or to his friends, or to his brothers and sisters. Even, the beggar played on his single-stringed instrument and sang in delight the blessings of the Mother Earth. Heaven and earth, air and water were replete with charm and reverberated with the melodious tune of union, meeting and happy returns.

Siddhartha observed there was not the least want of happiness anywhere; there was not the smallest rift in that happiness which sorrow could enter through. Happiness flowed like a full-brimmed river, happiness flooded the earth. Nothing was left dry, nothing was left vacant. Happiness dashed through the doors, happiness burst into the rooms, happiness embraced happiness, happiness clung to hapiness. Everybody was happy to meet his dearest, to sit by his nearest, to talk to his loving best. He exclaimed to himself—"There is no sorrow, no tear, no pallor, no misery, but an unending flow of joy and happiness !" At the very moment, a brazen voice sounded in his ears as if in response to his joyous exclamation—'There it is ! This misery and this suffering!' And, instantly, there rolled and resounded heart-rending lamentation, that rent the sky, and pierced the air.

Siddhartha was abruptly awakened from his happy dream. He looked up to the heaven to see that the brightness of the stars was like the pupils of a dead man ! He turned his eyes to the earth to notice that a curtain of grey mist enveloped the earth and water—drawn quietly by some unknown hand. The burning lamps and candles in each house of the earth flickered, dimmed, and ultimately went out shrouding the earth in eternal gloom. The whole universe held breath. The sky became overcast with a dark water-laden cloud that was bent like lashes of two tearful eyes. Tears trickled in drops of rain on the soil of this earth.

Siddhartha with his inner eyes saw that a procession of people passed through that darkness carrying deadbodies laid under white sheets. They trod the soil without any sound, their hearts swelled in mournings without any utterance. Beyond the river where the sun set, the light of the day faded out, the darkness of the evening creeped in—these people led their hurried steps with a vacant look towards the vast cremation ground—away from their hearth and home, away from their joyful, peaceful abode of happiness, far from their warm bosoms, beyond the path of their happy return.

Tears of deaths and fires of pyres rolled and raged on either side of the path the people took to mourn and let others mourn. At times a gust of wind carried with it like a burning breath heaps of ashes and spilled them on the gasping, dying men ! The ashes turned the hairs of the people white, the colour of their skin bloodless. The hot ashes of the blazing fire were scattered on the air. Ashes of smouldering fire rose into the air; lives flew into the air as ashes, death hovered in the air as ashes ! Happiness, sorrow—everything of this earth, which was mortal, leapt into the air as ashes and spread far, far away like a grey sheet of cloud beneath the livid sky. And down on this earth, Siddhartha observed that a mother clinging her dead son to her breast, stared at him with listless eyes—and the wind moaned around in lamentation. Siddhartha returned to his palace and found that his golden flower-vase contained in place of a full-bloomed lily, a handful of ashes and a piece of cindered rib of a dead man.

The chilly wind that day pierced his heart like a dagger. The nature around came to be enveloped by the mists of the winter—neither the sun-shine nor the star-light gazed on the earth—the day and the night appeared to be the same. In the haze of that light, every colour looked black and white, everything appeared remote and distant—wrapped in smoke and blurred in dews.

Standing on the opened northern gate, Siddhartha watched that all the greenness of the earth with her flowers and leaves was obscured under snows and mists; all the roughness and ruggedness of the earth, her streets and meadows looked smooth and plain under the snow ! Not a bird crossed the air; not a puff of fragrance of flowers, not a drop of pleasing air, not a bit of music of happiness appeared to float in the air, everything was still and dumb like a stone-built statue amid white snows, wintry mists and intense cold—as if the earth had fallen into a swoon.

Day in and day out, Siddhartha stood amid cold mists and white snows of the north and pondered—'Will not light come again through that misty web? Will not happiness fill and overflow this earth again ?' Every corner and every quarter remained dumb to answer his question. Siddhartha tried to hear minutely if any sound entered his ears from anywhere. But nothing seemed to reach his ear through that chaotic gloom of day and night. He stood there speechless and motionless. As far as his sight could pierce through, he marked the barricade of ice and the curtain of mist. Infirmity peeped through that with his grey locks ; fever trembled with his pallied eyes and vacant look; death danced wrapped in a white shroud as cold as ice. Like the reflection of one's own self on a mirror, like the various sketches on a white sheet of paper, Siddhartha observed on the mirror of that frozen wall of ice prominent on that dense mist, that the mortal beings were being born, brought up and ultimately taken to grave; the Eternal Fear was chasing all these mortals with his blood-stained trident; fever, infirmity and death followed him like three hounds gnawing down everything to pieces with their fangs and claws. Nothing was spared, nothing was pardoned before their cruelty ! They jumped to the river, and the water dried in fear; they dashed against the rocks and the stones were pounded to dust and debris; they snatched away the babies from mothers' laps without pity or mercy. Everybody — whether a king or a commoner, high or low—withered before this Eternal Fear like dried leaves borne by the gust of wind. Everything trembled, everything swooned through fear. Everything was dried up, everything was destroyed by Fear—everything was puffed out like a candle flame before a storm. The heaven and the earth, the air and the water shook and shivered and surrendered to Fear —fear of fever, fear of infirmity, fear of death. Nothing was there,—neither peace, nor comfort nor happiness ! In the depth of his mind, Siddhartha felt that Fear, he saw that before his eyes; Fear roared like thunders above his head, Fear tormented the earth like an earthquake, Fear fettered the universe in an endless snare! Thousands of hands groped towards the sky for shelter, the air resounded with only one cry—'Relieve us, deliver us!' But who was there to deliver, to protect ? The whole mortal earth was trapped in a snare of Fear ! Who was there devoid of all fears, sorrows and afflictions ? Who was there so omnipotent as to deliver these mortal beings from the grip of this Eternal Fear ? Immediately the heaven and the earth, the air and the sea, the east and the west, the north and the south rang and reverberated with a sound as if in response—'There are the Saviours, there are the Deliverers ! The Omnipotent sons of Wisdom ! They guide the mortal beings towards the true path of emancipation. They bear the ever-burning torch of divine peace and happiness; they are true benefactors of the world; they are like a piece of floating log to one marooned, a shelter to the homeless, a refuge to the poor, a friend to an orphan, a hope to the disheartened, a last resort to those who are scared'.

And, gradually the picture of that Eternal Fear shadowing this mortal world dissolved from the mind, from the sight of Siddhartha like darkness followed by the brightness of light. He saw that the hanging mist streamed down to the earth like a flood of light. Ice melted away in that light adorning the earth again in green leaves and blooming flowers. Happiness began to glow in that light. Light enlivened the songs of the birds in wood and thickets. Music woke up, raptures overflowed and peace rejoiced in that light. The light opened wide the path of joy and merriment in the three worlds and fluttered the banner of peace of rainbow colour. And, through that flood of light, Siddhartha felt that he himself walked alone along that illumined path ! His feet were bare, his head uncovered. He had neither any fear, nor sorrow, nor suffering ! He walked through that mist and snow in an eternal pleasure, happiness and fearlessness — encouraging everybody, blessing everybody. That great fear trembled under his feet like a patch of shadow. The snare of allurements was torn down beneath his feet like pieces of clouds !

As on previous days, Siddhartha returned to his palace that day; but his mind refused to be confined any more within the four walls of his room fretted by a network of allurements and happy, golden dreams. His mind flew forlorn renouncing the fetters of his worldly attachments along the banks of so many unknown rivers and ravines, treading so many unfamiliar tracts of land,—alone, undaunted.

Like a bud blooming with the evening star, the tender and charming face of the new-born son, born to the new mother, Yashodhara, Siddhartha's consort, the unbeguiled smile of her attractive face, the joyous songs of her confidantes, the wreaths of illumination of rainbow colours in every hut and house of Kapilabastu—none of these could draw and divert the mind of the prince towards the worldly riches and responbilities. King Suddhodan being quite assured of Siddhartha's remaining in his palace for the attachment of his new-born son, called the baby by the name, Rahul. But he was soon to be disillusioned. Everything remained as it was—his son Rahul, his consort Yashodhara, his palace and his friends. Siddhartha left behind everything to the sole care and custody of his father, King Suddhodan and walked out unknown and unconcerned to the direction his mind led him.

That was the full-moon day of the month of Ashar (June). The hour indicated midnight. The inmates of the palace were all deep in slumber. Siddhartha stopped his musical hymns, put out his burning candle and called out, 'Chhandak, bring my horse'. Chhandak, the obedient servant of Siddhartha, harnessed the horse, Kantak, in golden saddles and bridles and led him to the palace at that time of night. Siddhartha rode on that horse till the bank of the river Anama. The palace of Kapilabastu faded and gradually sank into the darkness behind; and in his front lay the path flooded with the sublime rays of the full-moon.

Chandak returned towards Kapilabastu carrying with him the crown of Siddhartha, his bangles, his carcanet, his ear-rings and his horse, Kantak, while Siddhartha walked forward on foot towards the forest across the river to devote himself to meditation—to realise the final end of all mortal sufferings.

The river was thin and known as Nama; people called it by other names as well—Anama, Anoma. That side of the river from which Siddhartha descended to cross it was already having a slow and gradual erosion and abounding in thorns and rocks with no bathing ghat. And, the other side he ascended gradually sloped down to the edge of the water. The path along that side of the river was shaded by the trees and skirted by green grass and wild blossoms. The river Nama wound onward with a murmur in between these two banks. A fisherman was catching fish with a small net. Siddhartha exchanged his costly gold-bordered cloth for tatters of that fisherman and proceeded.

The river flowed in a zigzag course along the orchards of fruit-trees and by the small hillocks—moving sometimes towards the east, sometimes south. Siddhartha led his steps along the shaded path in an immeasurable ecstasy. The berry-trees laden with fruits and thickly covered with leaves almost bent on the river. Just at the foot of these trees lay the hermitage of the ascetics. Spending seven days and seven nights in that hermitage Siddhartha arrived at the city of Vaisali. There the matted-haired Ararh Kalam, the greatest scholar of the time, had settled on the outskirts of the city with his three-hundred disciples. Siddhartha took lessons on Sastras at his feet and came to acquire knowledge about meditation, Asanas, Yogas and Mantras but could not acquire that knowledge of how sufferings could be conquered.

Again, he walked on. The Vindhya hills stood high around him and the city of Rajagriha was at the middle of that range. Vimbisar, the King of Magadha, reigned there. Siddhartha took his shelter in a cave of the Ratnagiri hill by the side of the city. The night was approaching dawn. Siddhartha descended from that hill and stood on the highway stretching out his palms for alms. The sleeping city had just then woke up, and opening its eyes saw a young Sannyasi before it. The whole city was amazed and charmed to look at a person with such a bright complexion, such smiling lips blended in tenderness and compassion, such a graceful figure as if made of eternal cheerfulness, such gentle and sublime eyes, offering courage in one hand and begging alms in another, who had ever trodden and sanctified the dust of the city by his auspicious presence. People who crossed past him turned back; the children set aside their play and stopped before him; the women-folk removing their veils stared at him. Nobody was afraid of him, none felt shy to look at him. King Vimbisar himself came down on the street to take a glance at him ! So many ascetics walked along the streets of the city abegging, but none appeared so devoted as he did ! The city highway was crowded with people from end to end to gaze at him, to offer alms to him; the shop-keepers desired to offer their whole shops as alms, the tradesmen wanted to exhaust all they had at his feet, even the man who earned his living by begging from door to door sought to offer Siddhartha all his day's earnings from his begging-bowl. The outstretched palms of Siddhartha in the meantime overflowed with alms, yet the people were not content to serve him till their last might. They heaped up gems and jewels, gold and silver, fruits and flowers and all the commodities of their daily need at the feet of Siddhartha without the least heed to any objection or forbidding.

That day Siddhartha went abegging at each and every door of the city of Rajgriha—whether a King or a commoner, whether high or low and was so earnestly entertained by everybody to his heart's content as was never or could ever be dreamt of by any other Sannyasi. So much of gems and jewels, gold and silver, clothes and draperies were found to be strewn on the streets of the city as were enough to humble down the stores and treasures of any King of any Kingdom. But Siddhartha kept only a handful of dried rice for his own and distributed all the treasures he had among the poor and destitutes of Magadha before he left the city.

Pundit Udarak opened a 'Tol' (school for Sanskrit teachings) in Goyalipara with a troupe of seven hundred disciples. Here Siddhartha began to learn the 'Sastras' under different scholars. At that time, there was no rival to Pundit Udarak throughout this great land of India. Proverb ran that Udarak was gifted with the brain of Rishi Vyas and the belly of God Ganesh. Within a very short period, Siddhartha came to be an unchallenged scholar in all the teachings of the 'Sastras' and left no scripture unattended. At last, he asked the Guru (preceptor) one day — "Please teach me how the mortal sufferings can be overcome".

Udarak advised Siddhartha — 'My child, let us open a "Tol" together on a very large scale and send for students from far and near. They will flock here for learning and we shall live quite happily and merrily. This belly is the root of all sufferings. Pacify him and no trouble will torment you in the least.'

Bidding him good-bye from a distance, Siddhartha left the 'Tol'. On the way, he saw that the seven hundred disciples of that great scholar were carrying sweets in pails and buckets to keep the belly of their preceptor pacified.

Siddhartha left the village path and led his steps towards the forest. In this forest, he met Kaudinya who earlier presaged in the royal court of King Suddhodan that Siddhartha would renounce the Kingdom. Kaudinya was accompanied by four other Brahmin youths who had also left Kapilabastu as Sannyasis to wait upon Siddhartha in his penance.

The forest of Urail spread along the bank of the river Anjana. In that forest, Siddhartha sat in meditation. He meditated for years as ordained in the scriptures and the Sastras and as communicated to him by his preceptors.

He fasted, and without moving a fraction of an inch from his seat in sun, rain or cold, he continued his strict and stubborn penance ever inconceivable in the three worlds! His body was reduced to a piece of dried and fibrous wood and not a drop of blood appeared to exist within. It was difficult to say if he was dead or alive by just looking at him.

Everything that he had—the strength of his muscles, the grace and beauty of his physique, the everflowing pleasure and spirit of his mind — became lost in course of time due to austerity. He hardly looked to be a human being from his appearance and practically resembled a withered, worn-out tree.

In that way, so many years rolled by. The month of Baisakh welcomed the new year and along with it the tender foliage, young fruits and new blossoms. The birds, the butterflies, the fawns and the peacocks of the Urail forest started and skipped, hopped and hovered in an unknown and unbounded ecstasy. The five disciples of Siddhartha minutely listened to someone sing within the intense depth of the forest to the tunes of a one-stringed instrument. They also observed that after a lapse of so many years, the still and fixed eye-lashes of Siddhartha were that day trembling gently like dried petals shaking in a breeze. The light of the day was gradually waning; the crimson hue of the parting rays of the setting sun painted the foliage and besmeared the banks along the river like saffron cloth.

A pack of deer descended on the sand-bed to drink water, a peacock fluttering wide all its plumes in the cool breeze danced to its heart's content for the last time before the evening set in. Just about that time, Siddhartha opened his eyes and leaving his holy seat of meditation proceeded towards the river after a long lapse of years. His disciples noticed that he was too weak to walk. A myrobalan tree almost hung over the water. Siddhartha took hold of one of its branches and got into the water with extreme caution and slow steps. Thereafter, rising from the water, he plucked a few fruits of that myrobalan tree and was about to proceed towards the forest, when he fainted on the shore. His disciples rushed to him and carried him to the hermitage. There he recovered under their earnest care and nursing. Kaudinya asked him—'Oh Lord, have you come to realise the end of mortal sufferings?' Siddhartha replied with a nod—'No, not yet'. The remaining four begged him—'Lord, we pray to you therefore to take your holy seat once more, and to realise the final end of all sufferings'. Siddhartha kept silent.

Kaudinya humbly questioned — 'Oh Lord! Is there no way to know that?' Siddhartha replied—'I do not have the torch of the true path as yet, but I am already miserably weak, and physically ruined through fruitless penance. I shall have to replenish my lost strength before I can endeavour to search for the true path. A fatigued mind and a weak physique are barriers to any work. Keep your body fit and mind cheerful. Be neither luxurious nor apathetic. Do not lend your body and mind either to excessive relaxation or to much repression. In that case only, they will keep strong, fit for any work and able to proceed in search of the true path. As the string of a stringed instrument is ripped by hard pulling, so the body and the mind give in to excessive physical torture. As a string, if loosened, does not give rise to any music, so also the body and the mind given much ease and indolence become averse to any work. It is, therefore, wiser to choose the middle course than to follow the two extremes.'

From that day onward, his disciples observed that Siddhartha left aside all the rigid observances and obligations of the religion of an ascetic and walked like a mendicant along the village-roads to beg his daily living. He gladly wore the new cloth given by anybody and ate fresh sweets offered by any man. His disciples did not like that. They believed that to become a Yogi, 'one would pass through tests like burning fire round one in the sweltering summer, dipping the body in water throughout the chilly 'winter-night, raising hands upwards at times or hanging down from the branch of a tree with head downward. To get the result of penance, one should take only one plum throughout the whole day, and afterwards, only one wood-apple leaf, till one is used to absolute starvation. So, one night they left Siddhartha alone in that forest and led their steps towards Varanashi in search of a greater ascetic than he.

That part of the forest of Urail where Siddhartha was left alone was very desolate. A thick team of 'Sal' trees rendered the place shady. People seldom visited that place. Only the rustlings of the dried leaves caused by the movement of some dear and a few squirrels were there to suggest a living world.

Skirting this lonely and lifeless part of the forest, the narrow path leading to the village ended on the bank of the river Anjana. Just on the bank of the river stood a massive and ancient banyan tree. People worshipped that tree as the holy seat of unknown gods. It was learnt from the women-folk of the locality crossing the river at dawn for the purpose of worshipping that holy tree with the offerings of flowers and fruits that they saw a human figure wearing a saffron cloth sitting under the tree and vanishing immediately on their approach. Sometimes, the wood-cutters returning from their day's work beheld a god-like figure sitting with a bright halo round him! People believed that some god resided there! But nobody save only Punna saw the god vividly This Punna in her infancy was picked up from the foot of that tree by Sujata, the married daughter of the village Mukhiya while she was coming to worship the holy tree. Till that time, she was brought up as one of the members of the family in the house of the Mukhiya. She was now ten years of age. Sujata had no son, so she brought her up as her own daughter. She also took a vow that if she begot a male child, she would offer one earthen-lamp filled with 'ghee' each day throughout the year and worship the god of that holy tree to her heart's content on the eve of the full-moon day of the next year.

Her god however blessed her with a lovely son and that was why Punna came there down every evening to place that promised lamp at the foot of that holy tree. But she did not come across any god. Sometimes, that figure would fade out like a shadow; at other times, she would find the god sitting after she had returned placing the earthen lamp at the foot of that tree.

Recently, during these winter-months, she came across that spiritual figure like a shadow through a thin film of mist. She told this matter to Sujata only and to none else. Since that day, Sujata instructed Punna to take two fruits with her along with that lamp for that god. She further told her that if their god perchance appeared before her and talked to her, she would pray to Him to bless her father, her mother, her brother and her grandfather with good health and herself with a loving husband in due time.

In this way, Sujata used to send two fruits every day through Punna as her humble offerings to their god. But neither she nor Punna could ever know that every evening Siddhartha used to rest under that holy banyan tree.

That was the last day of the year; the day following was the full-moon day of the new year. So, on that day, Punna arrived at the foot of that tree earlier than previous days and began to arrange five earthen-lamps and five fruits on the marble altar surrounding the trunk of the tree, for her father, mother, younger brother, grandfather and herself. The golden rays of the setting sun shone on the tree. The river Anjana flowed with a murmur with streaks of liquid silver on the sun-burnt bed of sands. On the other side of the river lay a vast sheet of paddy field, and in their midst small villages skirted with orchards and groves. Their thatched roofs, mud-built walls, and at a further distance a row of hillocks looked like a sheet of grey cloud. The village-path ran straight along the bank like a thin white border on a green cloth. The peasant-women passed along that path with stacks of hay on their heads—wrapped in red cloths and wearing silver bangles; some had their babies asleep in the pouches slung from their shoulders. A gust of cool breeze from the river flew past their faces. A kite forming whirls in the air gently perched on the leafy branch of some tree.

The day was approaching dusk. A hard of black-skinned buffaloes, strode along the sand bed, and on one of them was seated the herdsman with a long, stout stick. Every evening he used to lead Punna home on the back of a buffalo. That day too he was coming, and he shouted from a long distance —'Oh Punna, have you finished?' The herdsman was named Swasti. Hearing him shout. Punna lighted the earthen lamps quickly and hastened to the direction from which the shout came.

In the meantime, the moon of the first fortnight was rising in the east like a golden sickle. Punna and Swasti moved homeward along the river-bed on the back of a buffalo. The tiny flames of the earthen-lamps at the foot of that holy tree on the elevated bank were flickering in the wind. In that distant light, both Punna and Swasti clearly observed that their god wearing saffron cloth sat on the altar.

Leaving Punna at the doorway of their home, Swasti went away. Sujata at that time was busy arranging the utensils meant for worship after fastening the cattle in the shed and patting her son to sleep. On entering the room, Punna told her mother, 'I am lucky, mother, to see our god clearly today; Swasti also has seen him. You can also see him if you can reach there quite early next day. But, mother, I forget to ask anything of him.'

Sujata jokingly enquired—'What would you ask of him, Punna, if you did not forget? Surely you would want Swasti as your husband, wouldn't you?'

But Punna had already slipped away from that place. She was already deeply in slumber beside her younger brother when Sujata entered her bed-room after tidying up her household for the next day.

Sujata, however, could not sleep the whole night. She roused Punna long before dawn. Punna burnt a lamp in one corner of the cowshed and began to milk the cows. The cool breeze of the dawn made the creatures shiver. They became as comforted as Punna patted their backs caressingly and called them by their names.

Sujata fired an oven in one corner of the yard and went to bathe. Punna finished her milking, poured the milk into a clean bowl, brought it to boil. Sujata put on a clean cloth and asked Punna 'pluck some flowers from the garden; I am attending to the milk.'

The flower-garden stretched by the side of their house. All the plants were in bloom. Punna strung a garland with some of the flowers, placed a quantity of oil and vermilion on the palm of a banyan leaf and called to her mother, 'Let us hurry up, mother, or it will be dawn and we shall miss the god.'

Pouring the boiled milk in a fresh earthen pot, Sujata handed it to Punna saying. 'You carry this milk, and I will carry this pallet and Manua ' Manua was the name of her son.

The village path was faintly visible in that misty haze of the early dawn. Punna led the way carrying that milk-bowl and raising a jingling sound in her anklets. Sujata followed her with that pallet in one hand and holding her baby-son in another. She was also a bit frightened to go with Punna alone. So, coming by the house of Swasti, she asked Punna to call him out. But, Swasti was ahead of any summon; at the sound of the foot-steps of Punna, he immediately got out with a club and a light.

The three villagers strode through the paddy-fields. The stars were awake in the sky. It was still some time to dawn; yet smoke from the burnt cow-dungs accumulated during the whole night were lifting like a grey curtain. The calls of patridges and other birds were forecasting the advent of dawn. A chaffinch flew across the meadow with a whistling sound. The thrushes began to hop down chirping beneath the mango-trees. Blowing out the light, Swasti came to stand on the bank of the river along with Sujata and Punna. From that place, Sujat observed that the human figure resting on the alta under that holy banyan tree, had illumined half o the grey sky of the dawn above the forest with th crimson tinge of his ochre-coloured cloth he wore Sujata and Punna worshipped Siddhartha t their heart's content and left the place with hi blessings. Swasti could not offer him anything. So weaving a mat of 'mutha' grass with earnest skil and care he brought it to Siddhartha. Siddhartha did not yet arrive. Swasti spread his humble offer ing on the altar and bowing down to Siddhartha in his mind crossed the river.

It was nearing evening. Siddhartha took his bath in the water of Anjana and sat on that mat offered by Swasti. The sweet fragrance of 'mutha' gras moistened with water pleased his mind. His eye seemed to penetrate till the extreme end of the world in that clear transparent rays of the full moon.

Sitting on the mat Siddhartha took a solemn vow, 'Whether I live or die, I must realise the end of all sufferings; I must not leave this seat until I acquire Divine Wisdom and attain Spiritual Emancipation.'

Then, the throne of the Satan of passions, six in number — that rule and control this mortal world, that whisper ill-thoughts, ugly words and evil deeds into one's ears and mind shook violently. With a furious face livid with rage, the Satan himself rushed to Siddhartha with all his fangs and ferocities.

The evil spirits of passion and temptation were up in arms against the meditation of Siddhartha. Sins and vices, woes and afflictions, were let loose in all directions. They spread a black curtain over the rays of the full-moon, and from within that black curtain the moon looked like a blood-shot eye! And from that eye gushed out only stream of blood in place of moon-beams! The stars blotched by that blood ceased to twinkle.

Grabbing the sky in one hand and trampling the nether-world under a foot, the demon of passions stood in front of Siddhartha in his original form. He was clad in a red-coloured robe dyed as it were in human blood. A sword of lightning was hanging from his waist, a large pendant of blood-coloured ruby was dangling from his crown, from his ears were swinging alluring rings and round his breast was dancing a wreath of flames strung in a thread of fire!

With all arrogance and defiance in his tone, the demon challenged Siddhartha, 'In vain do you sit in meditation! Worship me—I am Passion Incarnate! There is no one in this world that can conquer me! Go, get away, do not try to challenge me! Be servile to me, I shall offer you the treasures of Indra and let you rule this earth. It is absolutely fruitless to perish by penance. I am the monarch of the three worlds!'

Siddhartha replied, 'Oh Passion Incarnate! For several births am I engaged in meditation to acquire Divine Wisdom. This time, I must attain that Wisdom and leave this seat, or I shall die! This is my solemn vow'

Thrice the demon repeated, 'Go, get away, give up your meditation!' Thrice Siddhartha replied in the negative.

At this, the demon of Passions swelled in a furious wrath and with blood-shot eyes pulled out the sky with a thunderous roar. The blue sky so magnificently studded with the largest gem of the moon and sparkling jewels of numberless stars was torn and tattered like a blue curtain. Then, there was no moon overhead, nor the stars; what remained was only a colossal emptiness and an unfathomed abyss of darkness, as if swooping down agape with frightfully wide jaws. The plains and plateaux seemed to be overshadowed by the black secretion as dark as clotted blood trickling from its dark tongue between the jaws. As soon as the demon looked at that dark, gaping mouth, the two rows of white teeth flashed and rattled in the air like lightnings, and his vassals and vanguards rushed out from that omnivorous gutter of darkness with a deafening roar. The moon and the sun revolved in their hands like two discs of fire. Whirling and swirling in the air and darkening the whole universe, the masquerades of the demon were rushing forth raising a thick cloud of dusts in all directions. They hurled the comets down from that emptiness like brooms of fire! Snatching the trees out of their roots and dragging the mountains off their seats they swung them over their heads and flung them like a ceaseless hail storm in all and every direction. Like millions of wild horses, retinue of the demon swelled and circled around Siddhartha! Lightning flashed from their hoofs, the blazing foams of blood spluttered in streams from their mouths around that 'Bodhi' tree and the marble altar.

Each and every tree of the forest with its leaves and blossoms, even the single blade of grass of the forest of Urail, became ablaze; the water of Anjana ran in streams of boiled blood. These indestructible pests of passions sharpening their swords in the flashes of lightning and crawling out of that impregnable darkness plunged and pounced upon Siddharta in millions to overpower him. The sky melted away in their hot breaths, the air became ablaze, the earth looked like a piece of burning coal, revolving in space spreading splinters of fire.

Then the Plague of passions surged out tearing open the nether world with its fangs and claws. Wrapped in an impenetrable darkness of the nether world the Plague forced out bursting into a frantic laugh. Its dust-stained locks of grey hair fluttered in the air like clouds of meteors. Waves of wailing billowed from every direction and the three worlds quaked severely. The mountains were pounded to dust, the rocks were powdered to rubble, the groves and orchards were set on fire, the rivers and seas were dried up. Not a speck of green was seen anywhere but a vast, endless desert of ashes and cinders! Nothing was heard but a continuous rumbling of the boisterous roars of the plague of passions! Nothing could be breathed but a stinky, nauseating odour of brunt flesh of human bodies.

It was the first quarter of the night. The gangs of Plague and Pestilence howled and whined about like hordes of bloodthirsty hyaenas and blood-sucking vampires. The sky wheeled frantically overhead, the earth spun violently below like a grinding machine trying as it were to crush Siddhartha in between them! Holding a torch of lightning in his hands, the demon shouted to Siddhartha, 'Fly off, I say; still there is time!' Siddhartha neither paid any heed to that shout nor cared for his warning. 'Kamana' (Desire) the eldest daughter of the demon, came along with her two younger sisters 'Chhala-Kala' (guild and blandishment) to entice Siddhartha in various ways to give up his meditation—sometimes in the human form of Mother Gotami, sometimes in the guise of Yashodhara weeping and begging to Siddhartha with folded palms. They sang and danced in the guise of heavenly fairies to seduce and subjugate Siddhartha, but failed. They turned out to be too insignificant to move him from his seat of solemn decision and concentration!

The demon of passions who frightened and shook the three worlds by his indomitable power, who subjugated all the Gods and Goddesses of Heaven under his feet was forced to yield to the spiritual strength of Lord Buddha ! He could not touch a single hair of Buddhadeva, nor could he wither a leaf of that Immortal Banyan tree ! How could he have that courage to stand face to face with Lord Buddha even for a moment ! He fled away from that place with all his gangs inside the unimaginable depth of the eternal darkness of the Hell. Only Lord Buddha remained there in his decisive meditation within that pervading, impregnable darkness—alone and unmoved.

By this time, the night was coming to an end. But the world was still shaking occasionally for fear of the demon of passions; the moon was afraid to rise up, and the light of the day to show its face; about that time, Lord Buddha rose up from his seat of meditation ! He had conquered the demon of passions, he had dispelled fear from this earth and Heaven. Now, he had attained Spiritual Emancipation, had acquired Divine Wisdom and had come to realise the end of all human sufferings. With his right hand, he blessed the mortals and with his left, he offered security to the Gods and Goddesses of Heaven. A bright and brilliant halo of rainbow colour encircled his godly figure. And in that marvellous illumination, the earth and Heaven, the air and the sea woke up in an unbounded joy of triumph with new lives and fresh longings. The river Nairanjana glided on with a happy murmur beneath the foot of Lord Buddha sprinkling her holy water on either side.

The Ganges took a bend near Varanashi like a sharp sword. At the foot of the hermitage, the sloping edge of the river Baruna was as hard as rocks. The temple of Sarnath stood just above the bank skirted by the holy groves of the ascetics pleasantly shaded by trees. Here lived those who really practised religious austerities. The deer were not afraid of them and the birds did not fly at their sight. They did not wound any body. At an early hour of the dawn, they only for once came out of their huts and took their bath in the river before anybody else was awoke, and for the rest of the day they remained within. There in that forest, Rishi Debal along with Nalak was staying at the foot of a banyan tree.

It was the month of Ashar. The day lingered longer than usual, and also the rays of the sun. The gongs and conch-shells of evening prayer were ringing in the temple of Sarnath. The golden rays of the long-lived Ashar days were glittering on the tree-tops and the little birds were hopping and twittering on the spot where the sun still shone. Does were gently grazing on the grass. Sitting by the bank alone, Nalak stared silently at the full-brimmed river of the rainy season. A white she-heron repeatedly flew across either bank in indecision, unable to determine the better site for her nest.

The ceaseless current of the rain-fed river influenced Nalak throughout the day and drew his mind towards that forest of Bardhan, towards his village. Sometimes his mind flew across to the peaceful lap of his mother who stayed in their mud-built hut under the shade of that lofty tamarind tree longing for his return, but the next moment it changed. He did not want to leave the Rishi alone in that forest. His mind, too, like that hereon was swinging in the balance of indecision.

In the meantime, Rishi Debal permitted Nalak to return to his mother. He learnt from Debal as well that Lord Buddha was coming to that holy forest ! It was long since he had left his village ho and his mother ! On the other hand, he could give up his earnest desire to rest his eyes up Lord Buddha once for all ! So, he was think alone whether or not to go ! So many boats sai up and down. So many boatmen shouted at h offering to take him home.

Evening was, by this time, drawing near. O one more boat smaller in size and sailing from long distance was approaching his direction. tiny light appeared to him as a tiny earthen la flowing with the streams of the river in a thousa bits of gold and silver. That was the last boat th would pass by him, he knew. Nalak humbly bow to the Rishi in his thought and prayed, 'Oh Lor bless me that I may rest my eyes upon Lo Buddha !'

Within a very short time, the boat touched edge of the river near that holy grove of the h mits. Nalak boarded that boat and sailed for village-home to rest with his mother. It was a lo long time since he last saw his mother. Just abo that time, Lord Buddha stepped in that holy for of Sarnath crossing the river Baruna.

The boat carrying Nalak was sailing through many unknown cities and villages—touching a halting at so many river-ghats and canals—appro ches every evening, discharging passengers at th destinations, and taking new passengers. In this wa that small boat sometimes skidded like an arrow the direction of the favourable morning wind, a sometimes approached gently in the dark nig drawing a continuous thin line of a flickering lig The river fed by the rain water was reaching high levels day by day. At first, only the elevated ban of the river were visible, now with the passing of t days, the plains and meadows beyond the banks, t trees and huts of the villages, even the dome of t distant temple appeared in sight. The swollen riv had inundated the sand-beds.

The boat left Nalak at his village ghat in t month of Sravan. The ceaseless torren of rain had sent the roots of the bambo plants under water along the bank of the rive Places around him were all under water ! All t canals, ponds, pools and ditches were full. Standi on the bank, Nalak observed a small flower broug down by the currents of the river from some u known land stopping at one corner of their riv ghat. The ripples of the water sometimes thrust th flower playfully towards the edge and drew it in the stream in the next moment. Nalak picked up th flower from the water, worshipped Lord Buddh with it in his thoughts and let it flow again in mi stream. After that, he turned back towards his hom drenching in rain. A long, long time ago, when could not recall, Nalak had drifted with Rishi Deb from his mother and his village-home like that tin flower. Again, after a lapse of so many years he w brought down in the same way into the peaceful la of his mother by the unending stream of the mort earth. He longed earnestly for that day when Lo Buddha would sanctify their village by His gracio presence and bless him with eternal happiness.

On his way home, Nalak could see from a di tance their thatched hut and his mother on its muc built verandah listening to a musical hymn chante by a mendicant to the tune of his one-stringe instrument :

"Inscrutable are Thy ways, oh Lord !"

The WRIST-WATCH

By NARENDRA NATH MITRA

JUST as he was leaving for work Asit got involved in an argument with his wife. All he did was to ask his daughter to find out what the time was from the people next door. That started it.

"No, she won't go. Bothering the neighbours all hours of the day. Bring your own watch yourself", said his wife indignantly.

"I didn't ask you to send the watch for repair. You gave it to Saroj. He could have brought it back, couldn't he?" Asit said.

"For your information, I didn't give it away" said Supriti, "If he doesn't have the time, why don't you go and get it. Anything wrong in it?"

Asit said, "Don't start again. It's none of your business when I go, get my watch, it's mine."

"Why of course!" Supriti was sarcastic. "Even if you had bought it with your own money! Have you bought a single thing in all these seven years? If you had then you would have cared".

In her arguments she would often allude to the rich dowry she had brought from her parent's home and the worthlessness of her husband who hasn't been able to add a single piece of household goods so far.

"You got as much as you could out of my poor father. Now why should you care two hoots—"

"All right, all right". Asit quickly came out, it was already getting late. This was not how he usually took leave of his wife. After the meal he usually sat at ease on the cot chewing the pan his wife brought him indulging in a brief tete-a-tete. But this day started with a wrong note.

He missed the bus for a second. Asit winced as he thought of the greeting he would get from the new manager. He was very particular about punctuality. All this for that watch his friend forgot to return—he thought in great annoyance. Supriti was right after all—how could one get out in time unless one had a watch? What kind of a man was this friend of his any way? He insisted on having the watch fixed, and conveniently forgot to give it back. How very thoughtless of him!

That was Saroj for him. He was angry with his friend.

When he reached office, precariously hanging by the handle of the next bus it was already a quarter after ten. The attendance register was sent to the manager's room. Asit walked in submissively.

The manager looked up. "Well Mr. Banerjee?" he said.

"It's the watch, Sir. I can hardly keep time without it".

"Why, what's wrong with it?"

"Gave it to a friend for repair, he hasn't given it back", said Asit.

"Maybe he has sent it to Switzerland. See that this doesn't happen again", he turned to his files.

But he had said enough to spoil the day. As he went back to work the thought of his irresponsible friend, Saroj was uppermost in his mind. It was two months since he took that watch, why couldn't he show himself once during all this time?

The watch had stopped one day. Asit gave it a good shake, but it showed no signs of working. He flung it inside a drawer and tried to forget all about it.

But Supriti kept on reminding him that it should be sent for repair. Asit was lazy by nature and his wife knew it well. If it came to a question of shopping or getting anything done, it was next to impossible to make him move. It was here that their family friend Saroj came in as a great help. Fixing a harmonium took him barely a couple of weeks.

Supriti held Saroj in great esteem. "He is a man of many qualities", she would often remark to her husband.

"Ah well", Asit would smile, "he is very handsome". As if that was the real point.

Like Asit his friend was in his early thirties. He was tall, fair and good looking. His features were sharp. Asit on the contrary was dark and short, though not exactly ugly. He always found this difference in looks amusing and he never failed to tease his wife for her preference. By temperament Saroj was gay, witty and sociable, he possessed the very qualities his friend lacked.

Supriti always took advantage of his willingness to help.

That day Saroj had dropped in for a visit. Supriti handed him the watch. "Will you see what's wrong, Saroj babu?"

Saroj asked his friend, "What happened to your watch?"

Asit took it easy. "It works—sometimes it stops, just as it pleases".

"Sounds exactly like my household", Saroj tried to be gay. But Asit felt sad. He knew how hard up Saroj was. He lost his job of a salesman for joining a strike. That was the end of his career. He thought business would bring him luck. But on the contrary he lost whatever small capital he had in the course of a year. He could be called a jack of all trades now but without a regular job.

He said sympathetically, "I told you so many times that you should look for a job—"

"Once you've tasted freedom you wouldn't like to be in chains." Saroj attempted to be humorous. After a careful examination of the interior of the watch he declared, "Looks like the hair spring is damaged, it's beyond my comprehension."

Supriti complained about her husband's apathy. "I've been asking him to get it done, but he wouldn't listen."

Asit said, "Of course I listen but when I think of my empty pocket there's no other way than to pretend to be deaf. Last year only oiling cost me ten bucks. Can a poor man afford such a white elephant. My father-in-law did not think of the maintenance when he dumped it on me". Asit glanced slyly at his wife. Supriti was a little on the bulky side, though she had a pleasing demeanour on the whole.

"Did you listen to him? Supriti said in mock anger. Saroj laughed. "He meant the wrist watch, not you. All right, I'll take care of this, Asit. I'll send it to a reliable repair shop they won't steal or do a bad job. The small shops are not to be trusted."

Supriti was surprised. "What can they possibly steal?"

"Why, the jewels, the only things capable of being stolen", Saroj smiled at her. Supriti blushed for no reason. Then after a while she said, "Don't send it to those cheats then. Take it to some one you know. Your friend would keep it inside the drawer till eternity."

Saroj clasped the band round his wrist. "All right, I take the charge", he said.

That was two months back. Saroj had not turned up since in spite of repeated reminders. In the meantime how can a clerk in a merchant's office do without his wrist watch? Asit was annoyed to the extreme.

Supriti was pestering him day in and day out "It belongs to you after all. Go, get it yourself. It's not such a great distance either".

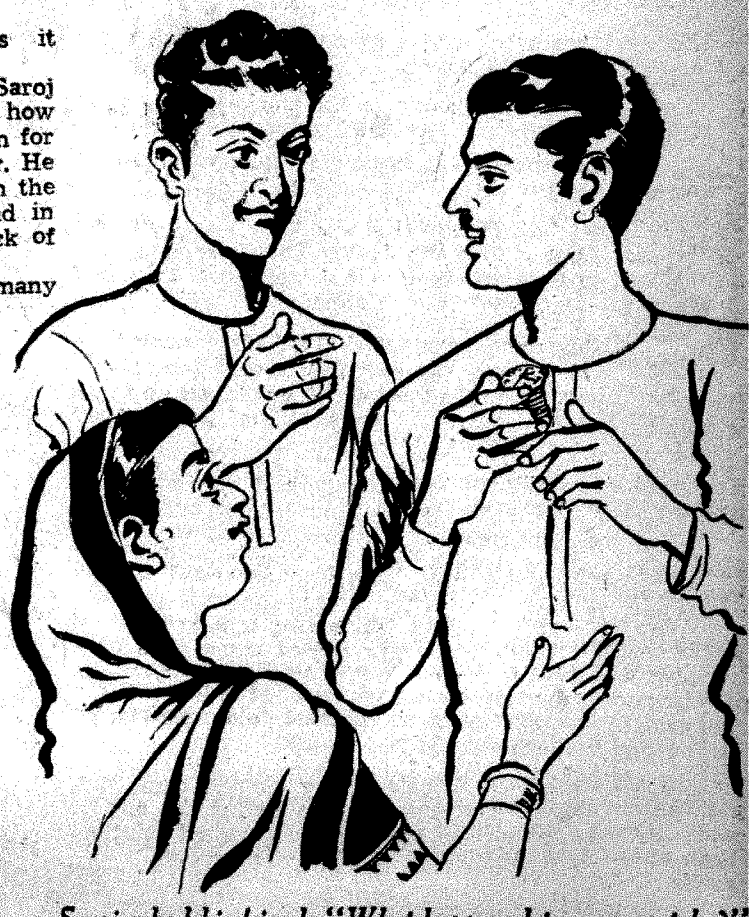
One Saturday after office Asit decided to spend his afternoon in persuit of his lost treasure. Before he set out for the suburbs he thought it would be wise to drop in at Vijaya Cabin, the favourite haunt of his friend.

The owner of the tea shop was their common friend. Saroj usually made it a practice to drop in there for a free cup of tea and gossip.

Asit saw the owner presiding morosely over an almost empty room.

"How are you Kalipada?"

Kalipada was not having a good time it seemed



Saroj asked his friend, "What happened to your watch ?"

"..... took my costly pen for repair and just disappeared".

Business was slack and a new waiter had run away with 37 rupees 13 annas.

"Don't trust any one in the world—that's what I say" Kalipada philosophised.

Asit expressed his sincere sympathy. Then he enquired about the whereabouts of Saroj.

"Don't talk of him. He is a fine man, doesn't bother about paying his dues. Then he took my costly pen for repair and just disappeared. That pen is gone, I tell you", said Kalipada.

At this announcement Asit's heart missed a beat. "Why do you say so?" He asked anxiously. "Why? Because that's the line he has taken up these days? Hope he hasn't taken anything from you? Care for a cup of tea ?"

Asit declined it with thanks and hurried out of the shop on the pretext of some urgent business to see to.

Should he take the train from Sealdah? He did a brief mental calculation. Finally he took the bus. After an hour's journey which cost him exactly six annas he arrived at Saroj's rented house in a narrow lane in Uttarpara.

At the door of a dilapidated old one-storied house he knocked.

"Who is it?" A pale young woman came out, she hesitated for a moment then pulled the end of her old soiled sari on her head and smiled faintly.

"Oh it's you, please come in".

'Is Saroj in?" demanded Asit.

"He'll be back shortly", said Nirmala. "Why don't you come in?"

Asit walked into the small room. A wooden cot covered three fourths of it. A bedding lay rolled in a corner. Nirmala spread a mat. "How is everyone? Is Supriti well ?"

Asit answered curtly, "Yes".

Suddenly a boy came rushing to him. He edged close to Asit and said, "Uncle, what have you brought for me to-day, candy or biscuits?"

He used to bring something for this charming little son of his friend. But today he was hardly in a mood to bring gifts. Nirmala scolded her son "Habul, for shame. What a greedy boy. Don't you ever have candy or biscuits ?"

Habul was on the point of crying. "No, I never have them. You never give me anything. You know uncle, mommy takes medicines in bottles but she doesn't give me that, never".

Nirmala hid a smile. "Keep your mouth shut, naughty boy. Go and play."

Habul went quietly back to his corner and got busy with his broken pieces of toys, a bit of card board, a torn mat, part of a slate. His mother watched him play, then she focussed her attention on the guest.

"Let me make you a cup of tea", she proposed.

"Please don't bother. Let Saroj come, the tea can wait till then. Could I ask you something?"

Nirmala tried to force a smile.

"Of course".

"Saroj took my watch for repair. I haven't heard from him since. Has the watch been repaired?" asked Asit.

"To tell you the truth, I haven't seen that watch, so I couldn't say", replied Nirmala. Her gesture of friendliness increased his anger. "Oh yes you know, but only act innocent"—he said to himself.

It wasn't too long before Saroj made his entrance—haggard and unshaven, he looked ill in his cheap and dirty dress.

When he saw Asit he was taken aback. "Hello, how come you're here? Lost your way?" He tried to be jovial.

"Since you don't give us the pleasure of your company any more, what else could I do? Even when we write you keep mum. What's the matter with you?" said Asit.

"Can't help" Saroj smiled as he tried to defend himself.

"Unfortunately there is no post-card in the house, and when I'm walking near the post office there's no money in the pocket".

Without much ado Asit came to the point. "What happened to my watch? Has it been fixed?"

His friend paused before he could answer. "No. As a matter of fact it is still at the repair shop, where I'd given it for regulating". "Enough of regulating", Asit was impatient, "I think I've had enough. Can I please have my watch back?"

"Well a couple of days more and it should be ready".

"A couple of days? I want it to-day. Come, take me to whatever repair shop it is in. Its taking awfully long to regulate a watch".

Saroj apologised, "It's my fault, really. My wife was sick; she had to be taken to the hospital. I had no time to enquire. The sickness meant so much money".

"Aha, perhaps my watch has been a contribution to it?" Asit was determined to be unkind.

Saroj was suddenly left without a word. He looked guilty.

"For shame, for shame", Asit went on, "who could have believed you to be such a sneak. Why didn't you come to me for help. I would have begged from others. You know I've done that for you. Is this how you repay such services? I've never seen such ungratefulness in my life".

Nirmala fixed her gaze at the floor, her husband's humiliation kept her dumb, only Habul did not understand what was going on. He looked up at Asit, in innocent surprise. Heedless of the pain he was inflicting on them Asit went on, "Give me the address of the pawn shop. I'll buy it back. It was a gift, did you know that?"

"Your watch has not been pawned", Saroj kept saying. "I'll get it myself and give it to you". Asit said "I don't trust a word of what you say, you swindler, robber, cheat". He flung the ugliest words he knew and then came out burning in anger, leaving the couple silent as stone.

Asit was walking towards the bus-stop when he heard a little boy call "Uncle, uncle".

It was Habul. Barefooted, without a shirt, he somehow looked like a miniature version of his father.

Asit made faces at him. "What, you son of a thief, what do you want now, candy?"

Undaunted, Habul came up to him, "Uncle, did father take away your watch? Is that why you are cross".

"Yes he did."

"I've brought it, uncle".

"Is that so?" Asit cheered up in an instant. "So he had the watch in the house all this time. Now after I've opened my mind he is scared. He is afraid I might report it to the police. So to save face he sends it back. Let me have it", he said.

Habul opened his closed fist. "Take mine, and don't shout at father. Promise, uncle". It was a cheap toy; a tiny, green, Japanese wrist-watch. "Mother bought me this".

Asit stared at the lovely face of the child. He spoke softly "All right Habul, I promise".

Then he quickly walked away towards the main road, holding the toy watch in his hand. He had to catch the bus. He looked at it, then put it fondly in his pocket.

THE WASP

By KAMAKSHIPRASAD CHATTOPADHYAYA

IT was a relentless day of Baisakh. The whole firmament seemed stricken with terrible fever. The earth looked desiccated like over-burnt bricks. There was not even a damned corner to shelter from the deadly fire. I had to be out on work of inspection right in the morning. Canals were being dug in the neighbouring places of Burdwan and the responsibility of supervision fell on me. The places I had to visit were not connected by roads, properly so called. My hope lay in an old and worn-out jeep, a noble legacy of the second world war. It was impeccably coated with dust. Its hood was in tatters. When it rushed ahead through the undulating open meadow the tattered pieces beat violently against the wind making strange and funny noise like a frightened bird in a cage. Springs were all gone from the seat only the leather cover remained with innumerable patches. But I have noticed that if you ride a jeep over an undulating land as if by some magic your capacity to bear shocks and shakes increases immensely. You could then easily dissociate yourself from your physical entity and observe with a sense of amusement how this strange improvisation lightly played with your body.

Still you could not force out of your mind this unforgiving cruel day of Baisakh. The leafless dusty trees, the pale warm sky, the strong gale that often raises a cloud of dust—all these had a strange fascination. Instinctively you would be seized with a desire to drive eternally through these skeletons of trees, grassless meadow and infinite expanse of sand. Your sunglasses would help. Their pale green colour would cast a wonderful spell over you.

I inspected the work of construction of the concrete bed of the canal stemming out the river Banka, noted the progress of the lock-gate near Sadarghat and took a look at the old elevated road, built alongside the left bank of Damodar for catching flood water. My eyes fell upon the sandy bed of the dried-up river, void as a desert, gasping helplessly in the scorching heat of summer. I saw something more. I saw the bare backs of day-labourers—black as ebony, a rickety bus loaded from end to end, stark naked crowd of children reduced to skin and bone by hunger, and, just for a moment, I caught sight of a newly-wed bride in red sari by the side of a pond surrounded by tall palms. She looked around her furtively and then took a bite from a green mango.

My precious jeep then rushed towards the Burdwan station raising a thick trail of dust behind it. I must be back to Calcutta by the train that would leave at two. I reached the station at one, bathed in red dust from head to foot. How thirsty I was! Every pore of my body was crying for a drop of water. My face betrayed an intensely thirsty look and my whole being revolted for a drop of water. The thought of water occupied every inch of my heart—the transparent greenish water in autumn rivers, water in ponds at the fag end of the monsoon when lotuses bloom, the deep blue water of the sea at Puri and even the water in a cold earthen jar—oh, the thought of water of every description came crowding to my mind.

In this state of mind I entered the refreshment room and washed hands and face with water that would reach boiling point in no time. I then emptied two glasses of iced-water. The meal was laid before me, but I could not swallow even a morsel. That painful thirst was still there. The breeze of the swiftly moving electric fan seemed absolutely unbearable and I preferred to loiter on the hot railway platform. And there was not much time left for the train to arrive. I would be off in a moment from this terrible hell. I was travelling light. My kit consisted of a handbag, a camera and a small hold-all. My chaprasi was smoking a biri as he kept watch over my kit. As soon as he saw me he put it out in no time by rubbing the burning end against the palm of his hand. Then regaining his composure he informed me that the train was running late by half an hour.

The platform was crowded and all the benches were occupied. I placed my hold-all on the ground and sat upon it. Suddenly I took off my pair of spectacles, ostensibly for no reason, and then placed it again on the nose. I lighted a cigarette, took a puff or two at it and then threw it away. A young shoe-shine picked up the stump eagerly and went at once towards the other end of the platform puffing out tobacco smoke as he went.

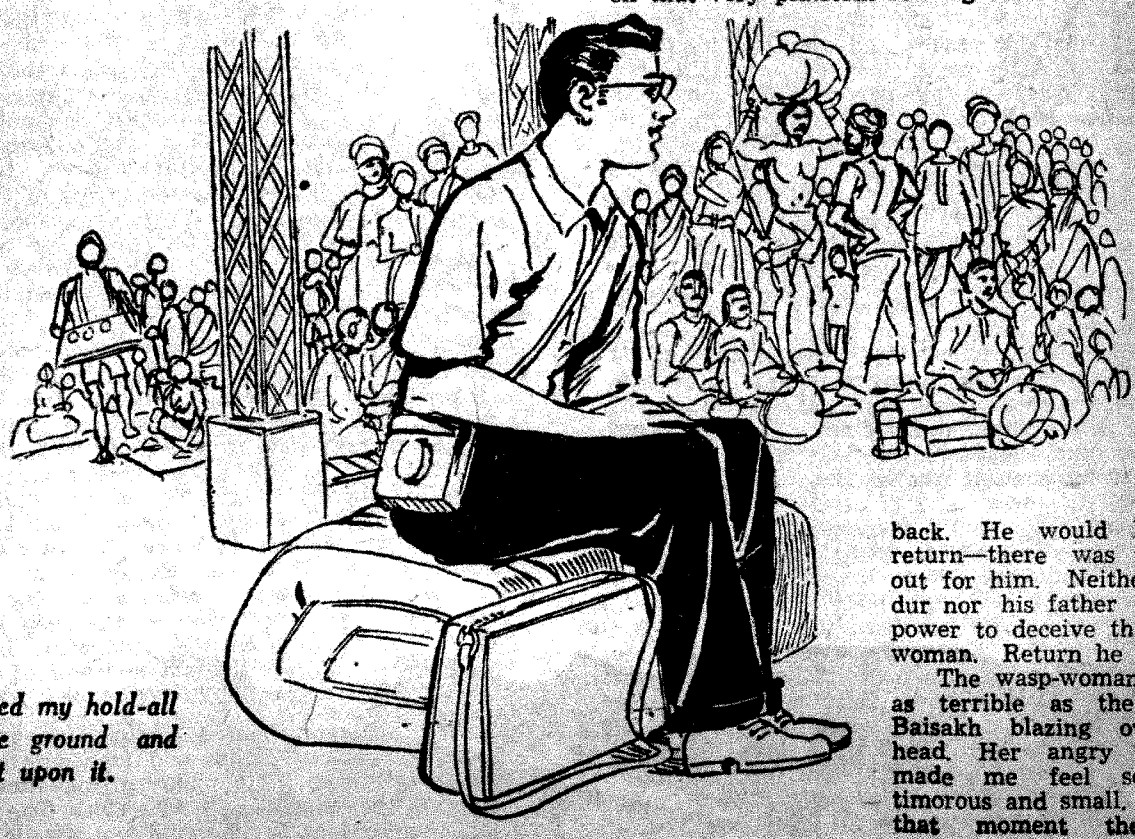
It was a passenger train and was already late by half an hour. No doubt its arrival at Calcutta would be further delayed on the way and I wouldn't be back to my den before 7 p.m. By then the sun would set and the charming evening breeze of Calcutta would begin to blow from the south. Garlands of bel would be selling in the street and the tap water would be cool again. Perhaps I was lost in a reversi as I thought of the pleasant prospect of a bath in cold water. Or, was I napping ?

I started on hearing an uproar a few yards away from me. I noticed that a crowd had gathered round a young woman. Her features told me that she was from the hills. The woman said something in an excited voice and the mob around her commented as they liked.

What was the matter ? I never knew how at one moment I myself had mingled with that curious and gaping crowd.

Just as my eyes fell upon that woman I instinctively thought of a wasp. She was flat-nosed and chub-faced as all hill people are. In anger and excitement, and possibly on account of the blazing heat of summer, her face was burning. She had a well-knit body. She was a perfect specimen of health and her waist was wonderfully thin. The end of her green sari, somewhat soiled and crumpled was tightly drawn round her waist. Possibly the extreme thinness of her waist reminded me of a wasp—she had a wasp-waist. Was that all? Oh, no! Something else was there—her arrogant and fiery looks and stinging words also aided my imagination.

A girl, barely seven years old, stood by her side perhaps her daughter. She looked utterly confounded and cast her naive glances upon the faces that surrounded them. The woman held a letter—a dirty piece of paper in her hand. She explained to the crowd that Bahadur had asked her to come down from Nepal with her daughter. She had suffered a lot of trouble before she could reach the place. But how irresponsible Bahadur was ! He had left Burdwan for Calcutta to work as a motor driver there. She had not the wherewithal to return to Nepal—not even a farthing. Let Bahadur go to hell—how could she get out of this predicament now ? How could she return to Nepal with her daughter ? Some one from the crowd, plump and podgy, offered her shelter in his house till Bahadur came or was found out. He said that he would help them to return to Nepal if he could not find out Bahadur's whereabouts. To be candid, the man repelled me even at first sight and when I found that the wasp-woman reacted sharply against his proposal I felt that my diagnosis was not wrong. She told him straight away that she was no cheap whore and the man at once melted into the crowd. By now the crowd had almost closed in upon her, but as soon as they had a taste of the fire she could spit at will they made a wide berth for her. I had no doubt the wasp-woman could easily size up a person. She kept muttering in an angry undertone that she would wait on that very platform so long as Bahadur was not back. He would have to return—there was no way out for him. Neither Bahadur nor his father had the power to deceive that wasp-woman. Return he must.



I placed my hold-all on the ground and sat upon it.

The wasp-woman looked as terrible as the sun of Baisakh blazing over my head. Her angry outburst made me feel somewhat timorous and small. Just at that moment the train arrived and as I slipped into a second class compartment I heaved a sigh of relief.

The compartment was empty when I entered. I deposited my meagre belongings at one corner and then placing the hold-all on one side of the padded seat I reclined on it. At once I was assailed by the thought if a cauldron of boiling oil would be more comfortable or painful than this fiery surrounding when I was startled by the heavy footsteps of someone coming in. He was a military officer, clad in khaki trousers and bush-coat. He was huge of build and not less than six feet six inches in height. From what I could see of his muscles he seemed to be an exceptionally strong man. A revolver was hanging from his leather belt. He sat down on the bench facing me as noisily as he had entered and then spoke to me in English with a rather amazing smartness. "It is atrocious", he said, "damned hot, you see, and the train is late by half an hour! The drivers should get their due—they should be whipped".

I could not reply at once but responded with a strange gurgling voice. It certaintly meant that I did not come across anything so atrocious ever in my life and that the remedy for such atrocity lay in the proper use of rods. But, for some reason which I could never divine, my thirst suddenly became too acute to bear. A lemonade vendor was, just at that moment, passing by our compartment. I bought a bottle of iced lemonade and was about to empty the bottle.

The sitting volcano erupted again, "It's foolish to drink such filthy water—very foolish indeed".

In spite of his terrible voice and frightening look I was able to raise the bottle of lemonade to my lips. At once the man-mountain shouted to an icecream vendor and bought four pieces, wrapped in paper. He sent them all, one by one, down the throat with an amazing quickness. The train started.

The train stopped at every station Immediately after it steamed off a station another was in sight. At each station my worthy companion bought all sorts of titbits and snacks and went on munching continuously. After some time he seemed to feel very hot and began to take off his clothes one piece after another. It began with his hat Then he untied his leather belt with his revolver. The bush-coat, trousers, stockings and the pair of boots—all were taken off in turn. Only the underpant and the sleeveless vest remained. When he had thus denuded himself he released a roar of relief. It was a marvellous sight. I could not remember if I ever came across such a huge man with taut muscles on every inch of his body.

Suddenly my fellow-traveller looked at me through the corner of his eye and thought something. He jumped up noisily and tied again the leather belt with the revolver round his girth. Then he paced majestically up and down the floor of the compartment for some time. It was obvious that he took me for nothing more important than a fly or a mosquito at its last gasp and untied the belt as quickly as he had worn it. He then placed the ornament on the upper berth.

I wore an expression on my face that would tell any one that I was dead already and that rigor mortis had started. I shut my eyes and lay motionless like a piece of wood. There was a to-and-fro motion as the train rushed along. The thought of evening breeze and the pleasant cold shower appeared, disappeared and reappeared in my mind. A sense of languidness slowly overcome me. Perhaps I fell asleep.

How long I was in this state of stupor I do not know. At some moment I felt that the train was not moving and my sleepiness at once left me. I sat up. The sun was nearing the western fringe of the horizon and the wind was no longer so warm. The train stood in the midst of a vast meadow as the line was not clear. Our compartment was filled with the soft warm smell of grass around us. I looked out and all on a sudden my eyes caught sight of a small hive of wasps on a date-palm by my window. Numerous wasps went in and out of the window and you could hear their subdued humming.

At once I was reminded of the wasp-woman I saw at the Burdwan station. Just then the engine whistled and the train began to move. A wasp flew into our compartment wafted by the odorous breeze that pervaded the whole meadow and sat quietly upon the leather case of the revolver.

I was assailed by a strange feeling of pity as I looked at the wasp and in a while I was napping again. In that state of half-consciousness I reflected whether the wasps suffer pangs of separation when they are away from their kins. Could our fellow wasp ever conceive that it would never unite with its kith and kin humming round the hive on the date-palm we had left behind? Has the wasp a mind such as we humans have? The thought lulled me into sleep again.

The sun had set when I awoke. The train was entering the platform of the Howrah station. The whole place was illumined by electric lights and the charming breeze was blowing. The military officer —my fellow passenger—stood up and got into his bush-coat again. He then stretched his arm towards the revolver that was on the upper berth.

Suddenly I was reminded of the wasp. I looked closely and discovered that it was still sitting on the revolver case as quietly as before.

The gentleman in uniform was livid with rage as he saw it. "Blast you", he shouted and in a moment brushed it down on the floor and then trampled it to death under his heavy boot. He then got off as noisily as he had come in.

From THE DIARY OF A Journalist

By TUSHAR KANTI GHOSH, W. B. C. S.

AT last, I have received reports from all concerned. I was waiting for Labanya's letter. My waiting for her has been rewarded, as you will find that her letter has given the most likeable report.

The most commonplace report is, however, of myself. I thought without wasting the day like other days in vain work or leisure I would read some books of Rabindranath and some critical studies. But—I could get up from bed not before 8 o'clock when the sunrays had fallen straight on my face. The usual cup of tea and shaving took me to 10 o'clock and then I was ready. For whom? Please do not ask because I have no answer. I should have got up much earlier. 'He who sleeps has his fate sleeping, too.' I could dispense with shaving without any harm. The cup of tea, shaving, attending office—all this is the usual routine, which could have been shortened on the day. But I could not. Pardon me, please. Then, I brought out the 'Sanchayita' and really and sincerely begun to recite some of my best favourite poems. Suddenly the Deputy babu entered the room loudly, gave a slap on my back, closed the book, brought out a pack of cards and lighting a cigarette settled on the sofa. Almost immediately came two other friends from nowhere. During the whole morning, noon and afternoon we were in the land of cards. Suddenly it flashed on us that Mrs. Bose would stage a dance drama of Rabindranath at the club. We got up and drove straight to the club. When I returned home, it was past midnight. So the day of all days passed. I know you will think that my doom is near at hand. I do not deny. But I am really sorry, believe me.

From Santiniketan Manikana Banerji has sent a short report: . . When I came here on the previous day I got all the information. Everything was pre-planned. Girls had completed their rehearsal of 'Tasher Desh' and 'Dakghar' There was not much to worry about music. It was a certainty that many famous singers would arrive from Calcutta, after completing their Radio engagements. The invitation sent to the Vice-chancellor had been gladly accepted and he would preside over the function. So everything was O.K. People from Akashbani, Calcutta had arrived already—they would tape-record the entire function. Nine conch shells had been kept ready; decorations below the trees had been complete. Extra seats had been provided in the Guest House and China Bhavan. So, right from dawn, the celebrations commenced and proceeded according to the programme, without any deviation. The conch shells were blown by nine well-dressed girls, then there were the incantation, music, dance, drama and speeches. When the girls had been passing barefooted, with their hair locks flowing uncared for, I was suddenly mistaken and I thought that they were going to stage one of the dramas of Rabindranath. Later I found that it was not so—on the day they fly about in that manner, like sweet Muses incarnate. Leaves from the Chhatim tree dropped down, the dry wind tossed some sand, and the celebration came to a close. There were sounds of many cars passing way. The night regained its calm atmosphere. I also ook leave and came away'. This is the report of Manikana. You will perhaps say that this is the nevitable end of a day of celebration. All will agree hat unless the end is cruel, the tragedy does not ecome a success. But still one feels sad.

Manikana had sent reports like a real journalist. also got information about the celebrations of alcutta from her letter. She began with the reports f Jorasanko. The flowers and sandal, the conch shells nd august assemblage of foreign and local dignitaies, Rabindra sangeet, dance and drama—nothing as wanting. She had jotted down a bit of her sore nind at the later portion of her letter: "Everything as very nice, indeed. But,—the southern verandah f the house remained mute. One could not discern he shadow of the cloud there—lost amongst the crowd f thousands of people. The water-carrier did not gain pass along the lane in the front, carrying his vater-bag. The holiday noons did not again make heir lone appearances before the gloomy boy."

Thereafter Manikana had written about the arious functions that took place here and there—at Mahajati Sadan, at Ashutosh Building, at Rabindaadan etc. etc. She closed her inimitable description with an unusual information. "Now, to tell the most iptodate news. You will perhaps like it, because very often I heard you saying that your critics were your best friends. Those 'best friends' — have formed an association—'Nabya Kalikata Sanskrit Sangha' they have celebrated 25th Baisakh this year in a novel way. You will perhaps remember that these young men joined some time ago in criticising Saratchandra and Bankimchandra. That Sarat Chandra was unreal, that Bankim could not go beyond the boundary of 19th Century—these were some of their propositions. Now they have selected Rabindranath as their target. These angry young men are good students of the University. They are not indifferent to Bengali literature and its future. To summarise their viewpoints—they say. we should now increase the carrying capacity of our Bengali literature by giving Rabindranath a distant chair with the other classiasts like Shakespeare, Valmiki etc. They accept with gratitude the sweetness, thought and serenity of Rabindra literature, but they want to stop there, saying that as Rabindranath did not pose the problems of a modern life of the middle-class, of the down trodden, to the best of his undoubtable ability, they would not seek solutions in him regarding those burning problems. They say, we have no longer any time to give company to a man in his solitude, we can not afford to proceed at a snail's pace in order to catch up with the fast world around us. They further say —if Rabindranath still occupies the major space of our literature like an ancient banyan tree, spreading out his branches and leaves and roots all over our life, then where is the hope for future Bengali literature and culture to thrive and prosper? They say, we shall present Rabindranath's romantic poetry-books to the newly-wed people, but for the normal adults, there is no further need of the shadow of the cloud, of the smell of the rain, and of the beckon of the flower. In the latter part of their speeches however, politics inevitably makes it appearance. They say, the border of our country is now threatened, the soil of our land is today rent with the cries of the oppressed and down-trodden and our glory is now only in the past. They say, we should take this solemn vow on this 25th Baisakh that we must not show disrespect to Rabindranath; whenever we shall be in doubt, or difficulty, we shall refer to Rabindranath. In our literary pursuits, they say, let Rabindranath, therefore, remain like Valmiki and Shakespeare as a trusted lexicon, but let us not follow him like fools in our day-to-day pursuits".

Here ends Manikana's report. From Bombay a report has arrived that they built an enormous building named 'Rabindra Smarani' at a cost of twentyfive lakhs of rupees and that on the opening ceremony on 25th Baisakh, they spent a little over thirteen thousand rupees. I have not yet received any information from Delhi. I presume there has been no dearth of pomp there also. From foreign lands, some reports have arrived. The Bengalis and other people of India living abroad had almost everywhere made the function a neat success by staging dance and drama of Rabindranath and reciting his music and poems.

Gradually many girls gathered there.

So—I come to the end of my journalism to you. As promised earlier, I am closing this with Labanya's letter. I dare not change even a word of hers.

"My dear—

I have come to the Shilabati barrage rest-house with my husband. The wayward, hilly rivulet is flowing down, crossing the pebbles, splashing the water in the process, and singing with a tinge of monsoon murmur. My bungalow, with its red tiled shed, is over-looking the rivulet from a hill-top. They will bring down the thirst-quenching water through the canals curved out of the barren, unfertile soil on to the doors of the peasants—this is the vow of my husband and other Bhagiraths; and in order to fulfil the vow, my husband had long been off in his jeep early in the morning, perhaps in search of the source of that Bhagirathi. In the distance I can see the hillock partly shading the blazing sun from the fields. The breeze has also become wayward — it is clasping me with all its power. In the murmur of the rivulet I am hearing as if the river, the sal and the palas forest are beckoning at me to join them. Disregarding the objections of my servant, I started for them, alone. I slightly hurt my feet against the uneven rocks. The pathway was my guide and it took me to the small, Santhali hamlet. On both sides small palas trees had been spreading out their rather big leaves. It was the Saldhaka village. I learnt the name of the village by asking a small boy who was tending cattle. He was not taken aback on seeing me. I entered the middle of the village. Young boys and girls were playing by the wayside with pebbles. A black hen accompanied by many young chickens was finding out food particles from inside the earth by means of her legs. I went forward along the road. Santhali girls were taking water from a public well. They had not the veils on their head, they had no disposition to get ashamed. They looked at me in curiosity a silk-clad fair woman in their midst ! I could not decide how to begin the conversation, when one of them came to my rescue. She said, in her native, sweet style, "Where will you go ?" I said I came for a walk in their village. She asked where my residence was. I told her my town. Gradually many girls gathered there. I went with them and entered into somebody's house. A girl gave me a seat. I chatted with them. They laughed and gave replies to my querries. I asked them what they did from morning till night. 'What else shall we do—we bring water, we bring fuel, we work in the field' —they said. Their children did not go to school. Some of them tended cattle, some just sat idle. The youths went to canal for work, some to their cultivation. There was no school in the village, and nobody cared for books or study. It was growing dark I got up. They laughed out together in a chorus. I would never be able to laugh in that way. I resumed my return journey to my bungalow. The little village of the tribals remained in the back. After some time I reached the bungalow, to the relief of the servants. I looked back at the village. Darkness had descended there. My mind also was covered with darkness. I did not forget that the day was 25th Baisakh. I thought I would go that unknown village amidst sal and mahua trees and would tell the boys and the girls about Rabindranath, would sing Rabindra Sangeet. But, I had to come back disappointed. Terrible and impregnable darkness was on the other side of the rivulet. Who was there to give light to those blind people, to inject life into those dead bodies ?

I took a chair in the open, looked at the Great Bear in the clear sky, and thought — what message was brought to those people by so many birth-days of Rabindranath ?

No more to-day. If you can, please do not let others know of this letter.

Yours—
Banya"

I have not kept the request of Labanya. But here my letter also is closed. You will be hurt on going through some portions of this letter, I know, but I must do the duty with which you yourself entrusted me. I would only pray—if you can, please relieve me of this journalism from the next year.

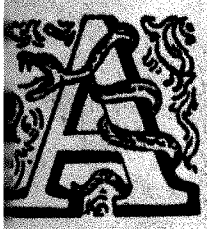
THE UNEQUAL MATCH

By DHIRENDRA NARAYAN ROY



S I was casually looking through the advertisement columns of the daily I became much amused by a rather intriguing insertion, and laughed aloud to myself. The insertion was in the matrimonial column and the advertiser wanted a suitable bride. Information regarding the groom stated hat the candidate was aged only forty-five, had lready three sons and four daughters and it was nly for bringing them up that he was going to narry, and for that purpose needed rather an lderly bride, but he had no objection to any young irl who however would get the first preference. here was no question of dowry — education of the ride was immaterial. Applications to be sent to uch and such address.

My colleague and class-mate, Bankim, fondly alled Bakkeswar, was present by my side at the ime. He was curious to know the cause of my aughter. I read out to him that portion of the anted column. He was very prompt with a remark:

"How do you believe it,—have you lost your ead? The groom is surely twenty years older than eclared — he must be about sixty-five — almost he age for the Domesday Book. At least he must e fifty-five. Forty-five is incredible.

We were enjoying ourselves with jokes and aughters over this topic when Arjun Sen, the nuch-talked-of hunter, entered the room. He had een my guest since a couple of days back. He too oined us without, however, knowing the subject nd then paused for a while and enquired about it. When he was apprised of the text of the advertisement, he too laughed, but under his luxuriant noustache. He appeared to sneeze at the idea and nade a wise comment:

"Oh, a young wife for an old fool? That's unny but examples are not rare. Just as in the world of the wild animals — it is quite common in human society. There is no difference altogether."

"But, how do you say so?

"Then follow me, and soon you will see."

"Yes, I know you have a repertoire of hunting tales up in your sleeves. I am ready to listen, if of course you can avoid giving a long introduction."

A strong wind was blowing at high speed outside the room. Inside was going our preparations for a proper atmosphere for an engaging story.

Arjun Sen made no preface to his story and came to it straightway:

It has been my experience through what I have seen and gone that, like tigers, bears also pounce upon offenders in a frontal attack if they get them and chew them to pieces. In the North Cachar Hills, you can find innumerable stone quarries which were made for the purpose of lime. Those quarries lie unused for a considerable period of time and then become full of jungles and excellent resorts of the bears. One day, I made for one such quarry. My ever-faithful Valtu was with me.

My guide, Tankanath, gave me cautious indications in advance:

"Well, Sahib, be on strict watch. The female bear is a man-eater and relishes nothing better than human flesh. She is of gigantic proportions and weight and has a ferocious modus operendi. Very often she invades the rice fields and if a prey is spotted, she knocks him down and has a sumptuous feast."

"How can it be? Indian bears are known to be vegetarians. They do not like meats."

Tankanath nodded a dissent, and said:

"That was also our information, but how can I believe it even after seeing the contrary with my own eyes?

Valtu was silent all through. Now he thought he should say something to prove his importance. So he put forward his learned opinion:

"I think it is a Siberian bear. Somehow it had lost its way and, forlorn, passed through the Tibetan valley and come down to this area. These bears are mostly carnivorous.

"But, experience so far is something different to what I hear now. So, I cannot fully rely on it till I see it."

Tankanath showed me the way and leading me on to the abode of the she-bear began to describe some of the horrible events of this dreadful animal:

"This is a female bear, Sahib. She has a demon-like body and her savage attack is terrible. Her method is to watch for a single cultivator working in the field near the edge of the forest — and when one is thus spotted, she rushes out and knocks him down by slashing him over the thighs and hips, after which she stands with her two forepaws on the body, ripping open the flesh with her teeth. Curiously enough, she nearly always tries to eat the face and if the body lies face downwards, she will turn him over in order to make her grisly meal."

This man-eater bear must be living somewhere in one of these lime-quarries — local people were telling me.

Tankanath assured me that he had seen the she-bear with his own eyes and he very well knew her habitual haunts. He was indeed a precious guide and an able companion. Soon he led us by a circuitous way, which though rather embarrassing, was very convenient for our purpose, for, it took us very near the spot believed to the lair of the bear. Tankanath was very much animated to find his direction so effective.

We had climbed the hill from behind. The lair was on the left side and in front of us were found some stone chips and blocks scattered here and there over-grown in places with shrubs. We crept to hide ourselves behind a thicket. On my attempt to reconnoitre the place, my eyes were attracted to the almost dismal sight that lay ahead. In front there was a huge cave with gaping jaws and by its outer wall, leaning against a rock, like an old lady reclining in an easy chair, sat the bear with her two hind legs spread out in front of her, while she was busy chewing some fresh meat held in her forepaws. Her chin was smeered with the saliva that came out from the corners of her mouth. He whole attitude and her immense figure wer sufficient to convince me of her choice of foo and the information which Tankanath was eagerly apprising me of so long was not at a incorrect.

But it was not the time, however, for cogit tions and my 500 Express bullet through the brai put an end to the old lady's depredations.

At the sound of the shot, a somewhat lou reply was heard within the cave. I was sure tha the male bear was inside and his figure too mus be like his consort's. So, I kept myself fully read

But the next moment something scuttled ou of the cave opposite which the female bear wa sitting and presently ran down the slope of th hill, and then taken by some sort of curiosity, th beast retraced its steps towards us. Coming to th spot where the female bear lay prostrate, the beas came to realise that something untoward happened It was a bear — probably nervous at the sight o

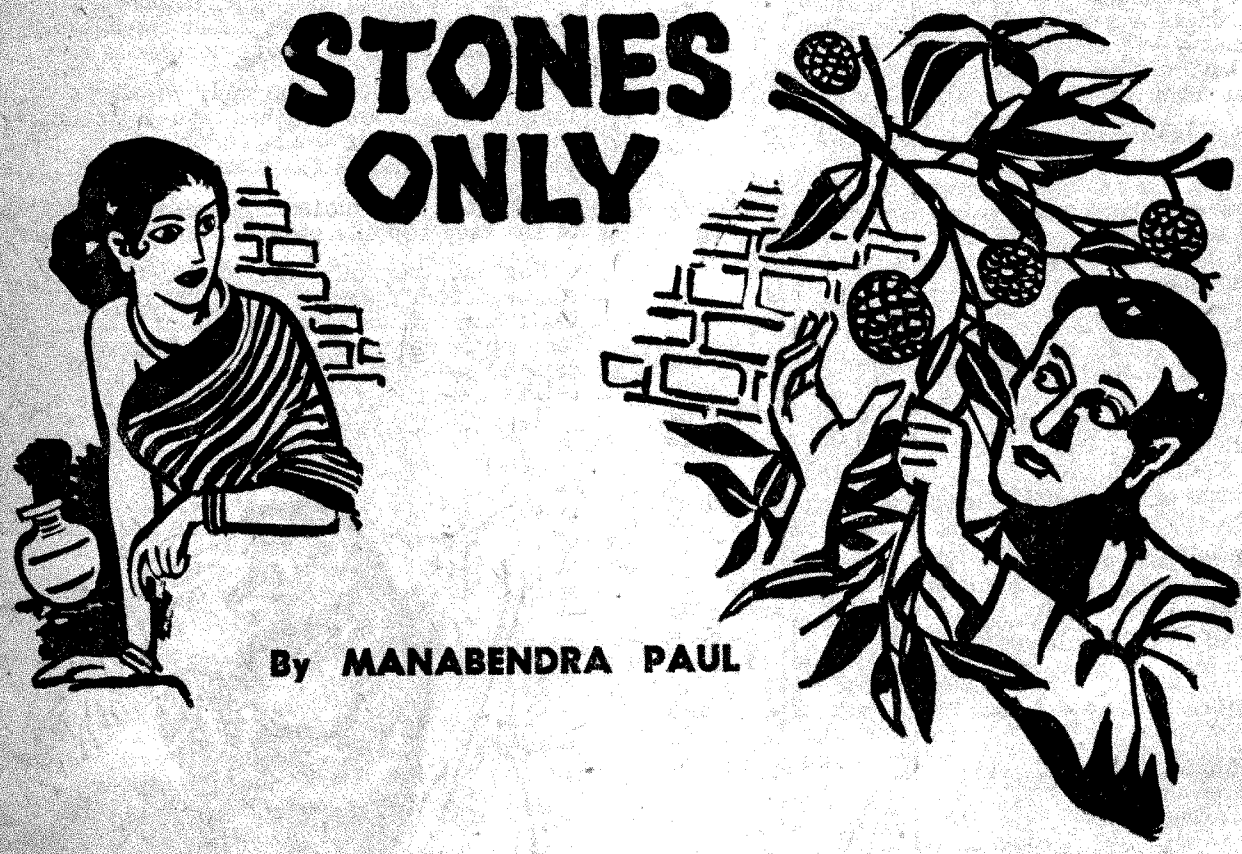
Her whole attitude and her immense figure were sufficient to convince me of her choice of food . . .

what happened. And then the natural inquisitive ness goaded it to stop and examine all around Moving like a border sentinel, the animal stood on his hind legs and placing one of the forelegs on the forehead, he began his scrutiny of the surroundings. Thus he exposed the white spot o his bosom and I took a second to get him down by my second bullet. I waited there for a short while Valtu was no less forward for he too had experiences of fighting a bear. He stepped forward and took up a few stone chips to throw at the cave — but there was hardly any further response.

I moved on slowly with measured steps and on examining found that the male bear was rather an old one, a small and lean bear-personality who had been living a worried life under the despotic tutelage of his voluptuous wife. Today, he had been doubly relieved of his wife and life by a sing stroke.

You follow now, what I said about these things being common both in the human world and amongst the wild beasts.

STONES ONLY



By MANABENDRA PAUL

WHAT a hilly country! You see stones all around, stones everywhere. The land is hard and ragged, with plenty of ups and downs; you have to walk over crunching gravel and grit, never on smooth pathways. Look ahead near and far, your eyes encounter only hills and hillocks and mounds. In the distance the range of Pareshnath hills stretch along the horizon, its blueblack outline fading into the smiling bright blue of the sky above.

And this place happens to be so near green, softsoiled Bengal! This is place for a change indeed, specially for us, the delicate people of Bengal, and so many come here to enjoy it during vacations. The place is known as Pathrol, which means stony. The nearest hill is Patharda.

There is a small river nearby, rather a zigzag rivulet, very turbulent and noisy, with a strong current, although the water is only kneedeep, running through plenty of boulders.

This year the changers were scarce, and we were lucky to get a small house close to the river. Hence for strolling I had not to go very far, the riverside was my limit. I went there every morning and evening and sat upon a big slab of stone and looked for whatever was in sight. People frequently coming and going across the river, specially on market days; local goalas with shiny jetblack bodies carrying big pitchers of milk hanging on bamboo yokes over the shoulders; strong and healthy Santhal girls with flower-adorned heads and scantly covered bodies carrying varieties of saleable domestic stuff; almost naked cowherds driving the cattle with sticks in hand, unkempt and rugged as the land itself.

One day I was silently enjoying the sunset behind the hills, sitting upon the selected slab of stone. The surrounding was lovely and lonely, the atmosphere serene, there was no disturbing sound except the murmur of the rippling river flowing over boulders.

I was rather in a lofty mood, when suddenly I was disturbed by an eager call from behind — "Hallo Mr. Goorgay!" I was startled and turned round to see who was calling. An unknown old gentleman was rapidly coming to me with outstretched hands calling myself by an unknown name. Not a very pleasing person, — he was an emaciated man with grey and black unshaven beard covering the chin, a thick pair of shell-rimmed glasses on his nose through which he was staring at me, wearing a threadbare long coat although it was only October, hurriedly approaching me with a stout stick in his hand.

He came closer with a joyous smile and blurted out — "Here you are Mr. Goorgay; I knew that you are sure to come back. But you should have come to me straight. Well, well —".

And then he stopped abruptly, his smile disappearing. He adjusted his glasses closer and stooped down to observe my face closely, then mildly said with a sigh—"I am sorry. Excuse me".

I got up from my seat and out of courtesy folded my hands in an attitude of namaskar. But he immediately caught hold of my hands and amiably apologised, saying—"I made a terrible mistake. But I hope you did not mind?"

I said—"No, no, that is quite all right. Rather it give me an opportunity for introduction. I am a newcome here".

The gentleman seemed much pleased. His awkwardness was gone, and shaking my hands he said eagerly—"Then you are welcome to my place, let us have a pleasant evening. It is very near, you see that tower of my house. Please come".

I was hesitating, but he began to pull my hand eagerly, so I had to follow him reluctantly.

Behind some tall Eucalyptus trees there appeared a towerlike structure over a dilapidated house. It was a desolate place near the Christian burial ground. I had no idea that somebody lived in that forsaken place.

We entered into the outer room of the house. There was a small table upon which a hurricane lantern was dimly burning. The room was very untidy and unclean. There were two broken chairs, two broken almirahs wide open for want of shutters, filled with heaps of litter and disintegrating books. A clock on the wall was loudly ticking. An old picture of crucified Christ was hanging close to it.

The old man made the light brighter by raising the wick and asked me politely—"Please take your seat".

I had to sit cautiously on a chair with shaky legs. He took the other chair and sat in front of me.

—"How to address you? May I know your name?"

Humbly I replied—"Manik Basu", —"Wherefrom?"
—"From Calcutta".

—"But where are you staying?"
—"Very near". I showed him the place.
—"Ah, then you are our nextdoor neighbour. Very good. Excellent".

I sat silently, and he took a pinch of snuff enthusiastically.

After a while he put a question suddenly—"Manik Babu did you say"? and when I said "Yes", he began to muse and tapped the table with his fingers. Then he spoke out—"Manik, that means a rare gem, isn't it? But what is the significance of this name?"

I was amused. What significance can there be in a name! I simply told in reply — "How many people can justify their names?"

"Quite so, quite so"—he said, repeatedly shaking his head.

—"Yet there are some people who try to succeed in justifying their names, knowingly or unknowingly. For instance, there was one Jnanesh Babu who devoted his whole life in quest of knowledge and was a great scholar. He even died with a book in his hand, heart failure it was".

—"But such instances are very rare".

The old man bent over the table with some excitement and said—"I can quote more instances. Take the name Ratneswar, a grandiose word, that means possesser of diamonds. This kind of name should not go in vain, what?"

A funny idea indeed! I asked in jest, "was he really a possessor of diamonds, this Ratneswar?"

He was about to say something when a youthful girl appeared at the back door and called sweetly and anxiously — "Uncle!"

The gentleman abruptly checked himself like a car suddenly braked while in speed. He looked as if a culprit is caught redhanded.

The girl remained standing where she was, frowning at me as at an unwelcome intruder. And then she went away.

The man remained dumb for a while, then said in a husky voice—"Mr. Bose, our discussion is postponed for the present. She came to give me notice. So you should now go".

Next day while wandering about the place aimlessly, I came round from the sandy riverside to a boundary wall broken down at places. There I noticed several trees of custard-apple which overhung their branches from inside the compound, with ripe and tempting fruits hanging from them, and within my easy reach. I leapt up to catch hold of a good sized specimen, thereby giving the branches a violent shake. Just then I heard a female voice from inside—"Who is there?"

Startled, I looked through a gap in the wall and was nonplussed to meet the same young girl of yesterday, who also saw me there.....I had no notion that it was the back side of their same house, and that the old man's niece would be there just at the moment drawing water from the well, and find me. Much abashed I slipped away then and there.

The same evening a bare-bodied local boy came to my room with a plate covered by handkerchief and put it on my table. I removed the handkerchief and saw to my wonder four ripe fruits of custard-apple of good size on the plates, with a folded piece of paper. I unfolded it and read this note—

"I am terribly sorry for what happened this afternoon. Will you kindly pardon me? Also if you don't mind, I request you to come to our house tomorrow, which is Sunday, just in the evening, when I will wait for you. Please come. Namaste. Anjali".

The girl remained standing where she was frowning at me as at an unwelcome intruder.

The handwriting was neat, without a single spelling mistake.

I was astonished but pleased. I told the boy that it's all right.

Next day I went there just in the evening as directed. Anjali was waiting for me in the same outer room. I could now observe her closely. A plain unassuming young girl with a healthy wellbuilt figure. Not a striking beauty, but she had an unusual feminine grace and sweetness in the intelligent face, that made her attractive.

She told me with a bashful smile—"Before I say anything, I want to know whether you have pardoned me for yesterday's fault".

I said—"It was not your fault but mine. There can be no question of any pardon. But I did not misunderstand you".

She said with relief—"Oh then thank you, thank you very much".

—"Now tell me why you have called me here"

—"Yes, I must finish quickly before Uncle returns".

—"Where is he now?"

—"Gone to pray in the church. Now kindly listen".

With a cautious eye towards the door she told her sorrowful tale without unnecessary elaboration. I listened with rapt attention. She told everything in a gentle and sweet voice and there was deep pathos in it mixed with anxious foreboding.

After finishing her story she immediately got up and said—"Now you should depart, as uncle may come any moment now". She escorted me up to the latchdoor. I said—"Well, good bye".

She did not return my greeting, but said with a pent up emotion in her voice—"Please try to save my uncle from utter disaster. He is being cheated all along, and yet does not see it. All his money is gone, I don't know what fate awaits us". Her voice was almost choked with tears.

Lying on my bed at night I pondered over the whole situation that was disclosed by Anjali. She had left nothing hazy.

For several years they are living in this place. The uncle has no children and Anjali being an orphan he has adopted her. His wife is a worthless maniac, so Anjali looks after everything. Her uncle has some cash money and some property of paddy fields on the other side of the river. They could have lived quite happily with this asset, but the old man is running after some will-o-the-wisp, he dreams of getting tremendously rich, and has started acting like a child.

Ten years ago a Santhal cultivator came to him and showed him a big pebble from inside his cloth asking mysteriously—"Look at this Babu, can you tell me what thing is this?"

Babu was then reading Andrews' autobiography. He took it in hand and said unmindfully—"It is stone".

—"Only stone? Look closely".

—"Well, a brighter looking pebble. What else?"

The Santhal said in a hushed voice—"You see, it is a very costly stone. Pay me only two scores of rupees and keep it".

He refused and drove the man away. But after the man had disappeared, her uncle started regretting. Suppose it was a raw diamond! What a bad luck, he carelessly missed the prize! Only for forty rupees he could have secured it, and now it is out of his reach. His head began to reel.

Now he was convinced that real diamond are sometimes to be found out among stray riverside stones. They are now blasting the hillside with dynamite about five miles away, why? There may be some diamond mine. He heard stories of emeralds being found and thrown away as useless green beryl. For that matter, the famous Kohinoor was found in the bed of some remote Krishna river.

"But don't take him to be lunatic".

He conducted thorough search for the Santhal fellow but in vain. The matter would have ended there, but by the nature of his eager enquiry all the local Santhal folk came to know the weak point of this crazy gentleman. Since then those people frequently come to him with some unusual looking stone or pebble in their hands and tell him stealthily—"Keep this Babu, a very rare stone. Take it to Calcutta and get it tested". Atonce his mind is shaken, for it may prove to be a diamond or something like it. Once he has unfortunately made a blunder, he won't do it again. He therefore buys the stone paying considerable amount of money for it. Not only that, he even pays to people who give him information.

After narrating all this, Anjali said with pathetic eyes—"Thus my uncle is being repeatedly robbed and cheated and yet his credulity is not shaken. He talks of such stones with everybody. That is why he also invited you here the other day. He talks like this to the new changers that come, some of whom laugh at him and some think him mad. I, therefore, wanted to warn you from beforehand and ask for your help. For none will understand him, they will judge him by his outer behaviour. He only sticks to his fond belief, and you know that one whose staunch belief is shattered is to be much pitied. He believes in all this because he believes in himself. If that is broken, it may kill him. But don't take him to be a lunatic".

With tears in her eyes she at last appealed to me—"It is my earnest request, please try to point out his mistakes as gently as possible. You being a cultured man from Calcutta, he might listen to you".

I had assured her that I will try.

And then thanking me profusely she asked me to depart.

For the following two days I met none of them. On the third day I came across the old gentleman in the riverside. He immediately came to me and caught my hand saying—"I longed to see you but missed you. Where had you been these days?"

I said—"I had been going to other directions".

—"Oh, that's why. You see, it is my duty to enquire about you, as you are a guest here. We are permanent dwellers, and you are only a short time changer, you will forget everything when you go away, except what dealings you get here. How many changers have remembered us? I should say none. But I believe only Mr. Goorgay is an exception, he remembers us and is sure to come back some day".

Again that Mr. Goorgay! I asked—"I heard his name from you once before. I wonder who he may be".

He at once became grave, thought something, and said with some hesitation—"Well, I will tell you everything. When you have become our friend, I should not hide anything from you. Just come along with me to our house. My niece is now absent, so we can talk freely".

I did not feel encouraged, but for courtesy had to follow him.

We went together into the same room. Anjali being absent, the lantern was not lit. He himself lit it and sat beside me.

And then he began to say—"I have got a rare opportunity for letting you know the secret, as there is nobody to overhear. I will have to be quick about it, otherwise if Anjali comes along she may be annoyed".

I said—"If it is something about your private family affairs, I don't think it advisable to—".

He instantly stopped me saying—"No no, none of that, it is entirely personal, my own affair. Only Anjali does not support me. All my pet ambition she takes to be moonshine".

I asked—"Where is Anjali gone?"

He said—"She has gone to the padre for some music lesson, may come back in half an hour. Now listen".

He took a pinch of snuff.

—"You see, the whole gist of the Bible may be condensed into a single word of five letters—FAITH. That should be the mainstay of our life. Your religion also teaches the same thing—"By faith only you can attain, not by any argument". Hence I believe in believing. And since you are a friend, I will tell you about it unreservedly. It is for you to judge whether I am running after truth or after wild goose."

I felt somewhat uneasy and remained staring behind him at the enlarged black shadow of the man on the wall.

— "Well now, Ratneswar happens to be my own name, and I think it must have some inherent significance. I have got a clue on that line and I am striving after that for the last ten years. It has been revealed to me that amongst the hillside and riverside stones and pebbles are hidden pure diamonds that can be found—yes, the rare real stuff, and I want to find them. Although the hint has come to me very late, yet I may live long enough to succeed. Do you believe it ?"

I felt awkward, but he was eagerly stretching his neck to hear my opinion. So I said—"One who can prop one's life upon faith and hope, which is the highest sentiment of human dignity, is never frustrated or defeated. "But"—he interrupted me by saying — "Very nicely said, a very well-spoken word. And so also was the opinion of Mr. Goorgay. But he had a restless nature, being younger than you. He had some reasons for it. Generally the non-Bengalis think less and run about more. But let that be. I should now inform you that I have spent a good deal of money to collect precious stones, and what I got in return is not very insignificant. Wait, I will show you."

He went inside making a hurried noise of his slippers outside the window. The darkness became darker. Nothing was visible except the long stems of Eucalyptus trees looking like stalwart giants standing on guard. Chill wind was blowing from the side of the burial ground reminding the biting oncoming winter of the hills.

I had not to wait long. The hurried noise of the slippers was heard again. The gentleman came back with a wrapped up bundle from which, he brought out a rusty tin box. After looking with suspicious eyes on all sides, he carefully opened the tin. It contained more than a hundred pebbles of bright stone glittering in the light.

With a smile of ecstasy he said — 'Look at these, although none of them are diamonds. But they are surely very costly stones. Here is one called beryl, this is a red-lead, this one a black stone with white tint. This is Hakik, an Arabian variety. I once saw a black diamond and have already spent two hundred rupees for it. Now, what do you say ?"

I took out a peculiar stone and asked — "What is this called ?"

— "It is of the gamate variety."

— "And this !"

— "That may be Pokhraj. Mark the blue tint."

While speaking, Ratneswar suddenly looked towards the window and cried out — "Who's there ?" I also looked and saw a huge black head suddenly disappear.

It contained more than a hundred pebbles.

Ratneswar leapt up and shrieked "My gun! my gun!"

Both of us lurched through the window, but none was in sight outside.

Ratneswar said — "The fellow has escaped."

I asked — "Do you know who is the fellow ?"

He said — "Of course I know. He is Tikla Majhi, a Santhal. Lives across the river. He is after me since last year, although I repeatedly told him that the thing is not with me. But he thinks it is concealed here, hence he often raids the house. Anjali once saw him like this through the window and fainted."

I wanted to know why, and he told me the story.

"In July last year some Santhal came to inform me that Tikla Majhi has kept a precious stone in his hut that burns at night. He demanded a lot of money to show me the house.

"Mr. Goorgay was here at that time, being appointed Engineer for boring, and lodged at my place as paying guest. Hearing about the stone he atonce jumped up and said — Come on, let us raid the place together. Mr. Goorgay took my gun with him.

"This unexpected raid at this place unnerved the people. Mr. Goorgay forcibly entered the thatched mud house that was clean and tidy, with his shoes on. He had not to search for the stone—it was placed on a recess in the wall, religiously wrapped in a red cloth strewn with flowers, and smeared with vermilion and oil. Tikla was asked, for what price he would part with the stone. Tikla said with wonder in his eyes that it is their family deity, there can be no question of selling it at any price. It is their God that burns like fire. Thus refused, Goorgay snatched out the stone from its shelter, and after cleaning it put in his pocket. The womenfolk of the house began to weep. Tikla fell down on his feet and remonstrated, but Mr. Goorgay kicked him away and ran out of the house. Tikla was following but Goorgay raised the gun and fired a shot to frighten him, the shot hitting a crow that instantly fell down dead from a tree. So the people were checked and Goorgay came away. The wail and cry of the womenfolk could be heard from a distance.

"Since then Tikla is after me because he thinks the stone is with me. But actually it is with Mr. Goorgay who took it to Calcutta to test its value. It may be a real diamond, and he has promised to come back with it. He is an honest and amiable person and I know that he will keep his word. Only because he is perhaps somehow engaged, he can't make time and is delaying."

As my leave expired my sojourn was at last over. Before departing, I met Anjali alone. I was really sorry for her, so told her—"I am sorry I could do nothing to help you although I tried. But if you want to save your uncle's life and yours, I think you should leave this place, or else get back the stone from Goorgay."

Anjali was startled to hear me mentioning Goorgay's name. With astonishment she said — "Diamond you say !"

— "Yes, the object that was snatched away from Tikla's house by Goorgay. I have heard all about from your uncle".

She smiled and said — "Oh, but it was a stone only."

— "How do you know ? Did you see it yourself ?"

— "No but Mr. Goorgay assured me that it was nothing but a stone. If you think the Santhal will be satisfied in getting it back, I will certainly ask him to return it. He will surely do that, if I only ask him."

Very unwittingly I uttered the words — "Do you think he will ever come back here ? That he will return ?"

Her face flushed crimson up to the ears, and she hissed out with firm conviction—"Yes, he will, he said so, he will not betray."

I was stunned dumb. Whence this flow of spontaneous and unearthly undercurrent of so much trust and faith in this remote corner of our hardened earth ! Without any rhyme or reason, any doubt or discernments, any psychological complex, — simply this childlike faith and trust !

I did not talk any further but came away with bent head. I could not for the life of me, try to disillusion these people.

PUNISHMENT

A Story from Punjab

By BALWANT SINGH

IT was a small village, consisting mostly of mud houses, with the exception of one or two prosperous looking pucca ones. The village was, in fact, like any other village in the Punjab —a small pond, the familiar babul, reh and wild plum trees filling the landscape, the watering wheel somnolently making music under the dense peepul tree. As in other villages, here also the village belles thronged the wells in the morning; the old men whiled away the torpid afternoons playing chess or a game of dice and in the evening the village youths came out to play kabbadi. The placid nights rang with the recitation of Warisali Shah's Heer, and the spirited passage-at-arms between Heer and the quazi. The village belles strong-limbed and vivacious, the youths hefty and outspoken.

The evening had descended over the village.

Having nothing in the house to cook, Jeet Kaur tied a pice in the end of her dopatta and went out to buy some dal. She had hardly walked a few steps when she abruptly stopped in her tracks. Blocking her way, Phumman Singh was sitting on a cot under the peepul tree, twirling his moustache, a wooden mallet resting by his side.

Jeet Kaur knew that Phumman Singh would never miss the opportunity of teasing her. She gave up the idea of going to the shop and instead decided to pluck some leafy sag from the nearby field; thereby she would also save the pice for her younger brother, Chanan. Poor child, the whole afternoon he had cried his heart out for a few lemon drops.

The shadows of the sugarcanes and the accacia trees had lengthened. Lifting her salwar, Jeet Kaur picked her way through the knee-high thorny bushes. Near the jamun tree she came across a few wild berry bushes and stopped to pick a few wild berries for Chanan. She was angered at the thought that Phumman Singh teased her day in and day out. Why didn't he tease Sumitra who was no way less beautiful than she? He knew that even if he dared cast a glance at Sumitra, her three stalwart brothers would chop him to pieces. And then she remembered her own fifteen year old brother who had died three years ago. One afternoon, after taking his meal he had gone to the well where he had eaten a melon. By evening he had developed symptoms of cholera and died of the disease. Her brother was a fine youth, taller and sturdier than all the other youths of the village. His chest was broad like a millstone, his neck long and thick, and he had powerful hands. He excelled all at Kabbadi and bending the wrist. Once while playing kabbadi he had broken his adversary's collar-bone with one stroke of his palm. His memory brought tears to Jeet Kaur's eyes. Had he been living would Phumman Singh dare tease her? Only the other day the scoundrel had pulled away the dopatta from her head. The brazen faced fellow! All because the fellow was the village headman's son and they were under debt to his father. After her mother's death calamities visited the family in droves. First her father died and then her brother. Now she had no one to lean upon except her aged grand-father whom she addressed as Bapu. Or, there was Chanan, her brother—a mere child of six, the last vestige of her parent's hope. And as if the cup of her misery was not full, more troubles followed: A succession of poor crops put them under the headman's debt. The land had to be mortgaged and Bapu was too old to cope with the family's predicament. And to cap it all, that ruffian, Phumman Singh, followed her like a shadow all the time.

Jeet Kaur tingled with rage. She had developed a strong aversion for all men. "And there's Tara Singh!" she said to herself. "Without a care in the world. He has only his old mother to look after who is already on her last legs. A sizeable plot of land, a nice kuchcha house, three bullocks, a buffalo, not to speak of the cow—what more does he want? A carefree life has made him strong as a bull. And how shameless! He has nothing better to do than twirl his moustache and tease the village girls. I say, all men are brutes, scoundrels dyed in the blackest hue! Whenever I go to the well with the pitcher, he is always there, singing in a thick voice:

'O sweet one, carry a small pitcher,
Or, you'll twist your slender waist,
O, Lachchi, my sweet one!'

You steal the sag from my field every day, don't you ?

"Bapu thinks I should marry him. What an idea! Who would care to marry such a ruffian. Ofcourse, he does not try to be fresh with girls like Phumman Singh. So what? Does a decent man ever sing bawdy songs within the hearing of girls?"

Alas! If only Wahguru, the Almighty had given her the strength she would have put each one of these cocky youths in his proper place!

She stopped. In a vegetable patch, adjacent to the sugarcane field, mustard plants swayed in all their yellow and green glory. She looked around. The Persian wheel was working. A bullock was tied near it. The cattle shed seemed to be empty.

Making sure that no one was about, Jeet Kaur sat down on her haunches and started plucking the tender shoots of the mustard plants. Hearing a sound she quickly raised her head. Brandishing a spade, Tara Singh was rushing towards her, shouting abuses. A shiver ran through her body. She quickly threw the stalks on the ground, and putting on an innocent expression, she started walking in the other direction. But Tara Singh was already there. He picked up the mustard stalks, looked at them for an instant, and then in one mighty leap he was upon her. Jeet Kaur broke into a run. "Jeeto, you are trying to be clever with me?" he said firmly holding her by the wrist. "You steal the sag from my field every day, don't you? I've been keeping a watch. Today I've caught you".

"Let go of my hand". Jeeto started crying. "I've never come to your field before". She struggled to wrench her hand from his grip.

"Aha, ha, how you lie!" Taru said gritting his teeth. "Today I'll give you a taste of my beating".

He dragged her to the cattle shed. Kicking open the door, he pushed her in. She narrowly escaped dashing against the buffalo. One of her glass bangles broke.

"Look, what you have done to my bangle!" Jeeto said crying. "I had bought it at the village fair".

Taru saw blood oozing from her wrist where a piece of glass had pierced the flesh. Taru had never meant to be so hard on her.

"Jeeto, are you hurt?" he said advancing. "Let me....."

"Stand off, you black-faced ruffian! You are a rogue. A scoundrel"

Taru was subdued at this cascade of abuses. He wanted to tease her, just for the fun of it, as he enjoyed teasing girls. He never realised that the matter would go that far. He regretted his mulish behaviour.

Jeeto stood weeping by the wall. Taru scratched his neck, not knowing what to do. Then he came out and closing the door proceeded towards the field.

Soon he was back with a bundle of mustard stalks. Jeeto looked at him from a corner of her eyes. Her long eye lashes were moist with tears.

"Jeeto, here take this bundle and go home". He dumped the bundle at her feet.

Jeeto spilled over with rage. Picking up the bundle she dashed it against Taru's face. The stalks scattered on the floor, some pieces clinging to Taru's incipient beard.

Without a word, Taru started gathering the stalks. Jeeto came out of the shed. Taru overtook her in quick strides and walked by her side. She was about to jump over a runnel when her foot got stuck in the mud. As she pulled out her foot her slipper came loose and remained embedded in the soft mud. Taru retrieved the slipper. "Wait, I'll wash it for you".

"The village headman and his men were again here," Bapu said in a low voice.

Puffing out her cheeks, Jeeto archly sat down on a stone slab. Taru was overwhelmed by a desire to make an overture of peace, and he decided he would first wash the mustard stalks. "Jeeto", he said in a soft voice. "My buffalo has outlived its age. It now yields only three seers of milk. What use is such a buffalo? I've another buffalo in view. The animal is rather costly, but it's worth its price. You know, I'm fond of buffalos. I've saved a hundred and fifty rupees for the buffalo. Oh, what a difficult time I had scraping together this huge amount? But buy the buffalo I must. What's the use of keeping an animal which is nothing but a bundle of bones. A buffalo....."

As Taru droned on he suddenly realised that he was talking through his head. Without looking at Jeeto he finished washing the mustard stalks and tying them in a neat bundle he started cleaning up Jeeto's slippers.

"Jeeto", he said. "You know Varyam Singh, of course. He's very wicked. One day I found him twisting Chanan's ears. When I asked him the reason he started looking sideways and then said that the boy had stolen a melon from his field. Poor, child, how scared he looked. I caught Varyam by the neck and walloped him right and proper. 'Don't dare bully the child again!' I warned him. Do you know whose brother he is.....?"

Taru glanced at Jeeto from the corner of his eye. Still looking sullen she was scrubbing her feather-white feet with a pebble. Taru placed the slippers by her side, and put the bundle of sag in her lap. Getting into her slippers, Jeeto got up haughtily and walked off towards her house.

It was getting dark and she decided to take the shortest route home through the fields. Finding the fields flooded she took off the slippers and was about to wade through the water when Taru stepped forwrad and holding her hand said, "Better walk on the abutment. There are prickly bushes in the fields. Here, lean on my shoulder".

"I'll stand it no more!" Jeeto said pushing away his hand, "you menfolk are an evil minded lot. I've nothing to do with you".

Taru tried to plead his innocence. "I warn you," she exploded. "Don't try to touch me or, I'll break your hands".

Amused, Taru looked at her small, delicate hands and then at his own—big, rugged and dirty. A smile flit across his face.

Cut to the quick, Jeeto struck him on the face with her slipper.

"Jeeto!" Taru roared, livid with rage. They stood still for a moment, looking at each other. Then Jeeto pulled up her salwar and got into the water.

A nail sticking loosely from the slipper had grazed against Taru's forehead drawing blood. Heedless of the trickling blood he walked ahead of Jeeto, clearing the path of the prickly bushes with his spade. As Jeeto reached the other end of the field she momentarily looked at his blood stained kurta and walked away in the direction of her house.

She opened the door. An earthern lamp was burning in a corner. Bapu was chopping millet fodder while Chanan sat near the lamp making paper flowers. "Sister, is here, at last", he said looking up and got busy with the flowers. Bapu cast a quick glance at her and lowered his head.

Jeeto collected some cotton stalks from a corner and breaking them into small twigs she shoved them into the hearth. Placing cowdung cakes on the twigs she lighted up the hearth. Putting the mustard stalks in an earthern pot she placed it on the hearth.

"The village headman and his men were again here", Bapu said in a low voice. Jeeto's hands stopped working. She knew what was coming.

While eating his food Bapu told her that if they did not pay the headman his money by day after tomorrow he would have them ejected from their house and take possession of it.

When Bapu returned in the afternoon their fate was writ large on his sad wrinkled face. He had not been able to arrange for the money. He had been able to raise only eighty-two rupees by selling the last piece of ornament belonging to Jeeto's mother and he did not know where to get the rest of the money. No doubt, they could sell off their buffalos but that would have meant starvation; they lived on the sale of milk and ghee.

After finishing her daily chores Jeeto came out of the house and stood in the open. The headman had not yet come. But she knew he was sure to turn up. And tomorrow? She shuddered at the bleak prospects. When the headman would proceed to throw out their things people would stand around and watch the fun.

A storm rose and the sky was overcast with dark clouds.

Jeeto proceeded toward the gurdwara, the Sikh temple. It was an old building, in which three rooms had been set apart for travellers. It also boasted of a small garden.

The Sikh priest, who was friendly with Bapu, lived in the gurdwara. He used to narrate episodes from the lives of the Sikh saints, telling her of the sacrifices they had made to uphold the dignity of their religion. Jeeto's heart would be filled with veneration for the saints. The priest, Jeeto learnt, was away to the next village. She took a bath at the temple well, bowed before the Granth Saheb, the Holy Book, and lying in obeisance before the portrait of Baba Guru Nanak, broke into sobs, praying that her family may be saved from the impending calamity. Then she picked some yasmin flowers, and made them into a garland for Chanan.

Suddenly the rain came down in a heavy shower. It seemed the downpour would never cease. After a long wait the rain stopped but still there was no sign of the priest. Tying the garland round her bun of hair Jeeto proceeded towards the village.

The sky was still overcast adding to the gloom of the descending evening. As she neared her house, she saw the headman and a constable emerging from the door. Her feet froze to the ground. Tomorrow.....Yes, tomorrow they would auction away their house to the beat of the drum. Her mind became numb. She could not gather courage to enter the house and face her grandfather who, she realised would be in a terrible plight. She walked away in a daze, not knowing where her feet were carrying her. At last, tired she slumped down by the edge of a field.

A few stars had appeared in the sky. In the gathering dusk one could see the cattle slowly returning to the village through the fields. In the nearby pond the frogs had started croaking and the bushes were filled with shrill cries of crickets. A few vultures dozed in the branches.

Through the dusk Jeeto could see Taru's hut and the Persian wheel dimly outlined against the sky. She was deeply moved as she thought of Taru's well and the happenings of the previous evening flit across her mind. In the swift medley of images, her slippering Taru, his repentance which he showed by clearing the way for her through the prickly bushes and his bleeding forehead stood out vividly. Despite his many faults, Taru was perhaps not so bad at heart. She wished she could unburden her mind to some one. But in the whole village she could think of no one who would care to sympathise with her.

Taru's well—what a pleasant spot it was! The music of the Persian wheel punctuated by the jingle of bells round the bullock's necks were sufficient to cast a spell on any one. The tall shreh trees swayed in the breeze. A white mare stood gazing in the green field, and a little away in the sugarcane field the dogs were busy with their antics.

Threading her way through the shrubs Jeeto reached the well. A pleasant smell was oozing from the wet grass. Her eyes searched for Taru but he was not there. Hesitatingly, she knocked at the door of the mud house.

"Who's there ?" It was a gruff voice.

Silence.

"I say, who's there? Why don't you come in ? The door is not bolted".

Jeeto slowly pushed open the door. Taru was sitting on a low wicker stool leisurely sucking a sugarcane. He jumped up on seeing Jeeto. "Come in Jeeto. What brings you here?"

Jeeto stood confused, not knowing what to say. "I was passing by", she stammered. "I thought I would drop in for a minute to see your mother".

"My mother? But she rarely comes to the well. And if at all, she comes in the day. She must be at home now. She stays there most of the time".

Jeeto turned to go. "Jeeto, please sit down". Taru got up and pushed the stool towards her. "Please sit down, now that you are here. I mean, if you are in no hurry. Take some mustard stalks with you for cooking. Take some sugarcane for Chanan. Sugarcane this year is very sweet".

Jeeto sat down in a corner on the stool.

"We had a fine shower", Taru said sitting down on the mat by her side. "A cool breeze is blowing. Will you have some sherbet, I've got some excellent gur to make sherbet with. No? Then take the gur with you. Use it for sherbet tomorrow".

Jeeto imperceptibly nodded her head in assent.

"I had asked Chanan to take sugarcane. But he never turned up. Send him down to me. He knows the way. And you know, I've some wild plums growing here. Red, ripe and juicy. Very sweet plums. I don't allow others to pluck them. They are for Chanan. I know he's very fond of them. Remember, when we were his age we used to go out together in search of plums".

"Taru, this year you have an excellent sugarcane crop. Better than other years", Jeeto said changing the subject.

"Yes, it's all due to the blessings of the Wahguru. He's kind on me".

Jeeto became silent.

"May I bring some sugarcane for you?"

"No, Taru, I'm in no mood for sugarcane".

They were silent for a while.

"Jeeto, why are you so quiet today?" Taru said breaking the silence. "Is something worrying your mind?"

Jeeto's eyes filled with tears. "No, Taru, I'm allright". Taru did not see the tears in her eyes but he did not miss the tremulous note in her voice.

His eyes shone with anger. "Has Phumman Singh again been at his game?" he asked in a brittle voice. "Tell me, Jeeto. Do you see that kirpan hanging over there? I've sharpened it today. I know Phumman Singh, the rascal that he is. His death is hovering over him. The kirpan is thirsting for his blood."

"No, Taru", Jeeto said raising her hand. "It's not Phumman Singh, this time. I'll not hide anything from you. The fact is....."

Somebody flung open the door. Taru became alert like a panther and his hand fell on the handle of an axe lying by his side. Alarmed, Jeeto looked toward the door.

"Is my sister here?" Chanan's head appeared in the door.

"I'm here, my pet. Come in".

Chanan came in bouncing and sat down in his sister's lap. "I've found you atlast", he said. "I looked for you everywhere. Then it occurred to me that you must have gone to Taru's well to get some wild plums for me".

Jeeto pushed away a lock of hair from Chanan's forehead. "Aren't you afraid of the dark?"

"Me? oh no".

"Tiger cubs know no fear", Taru said.

Chanan looked at Taru. "You promised to give me sugarcane. Where is it? I must have a lot of it".

"Yes, have as much as you like".

Chanan was about to get out of his sister's lap, when he suddenly stopped. "Guess what?" he said blithely. "I know a secret. But I won't tell you". He took his mouth near his sister's ear. "Sister, give me a pice. You promised me a pice, didn't you?"

"Not now, my pet. You can have it when we are back home".

"But I must have it now".

"Be a good boy, Chanan. I don't have any money on me".

"Then ask Taru to give me a pice".

"He doesn't have it, either".

"Oh no, he has lot of money. Today when you were away, he came to our house. He counted out a lot of rupees and gave them to Bapu".

"Chanan!" Jeeto looked at her kid brother in surprise. But there was no stopping Chanan.

"But Bapu did a very wrong thing", Chanan said. "He gave away all the rupees to the headman."

Jeeto could not believe her ears. "Has someone been telling you stories".

"I saw the money myself", Chanan almost shouted. "Now tell me, may I ask Taru for a pice?"

Jeeto started looking in the air, as if the atmosphere had cleared up after a heavy storm, dissolving her worries. She was so absorbed in herself that she did not even know that Taru had given Chanan a pice, and that he had gone out of the hut and was now standing by the buffalo.

She suddenly came out of her reverie and thought of Taru. He was the only person whom she could count upon as a friend. In the course of his conversation, he had not even dropped a hint about what he had done for her. And imagine, she had called him evil-minded!

Taru was still standing near the buffalo with his back towards the hut. Jeeto's eyes filled with tears. "Look at me, Taru!"

"Jeeto why do you cry?" Taru said in a tremulous voice. "I've always looked for an opportunity to be of some service to you. I'm sorry for my behaviour that day".

Jeeto placed her hand on Taru's forehead and felt the spot where the nail had grazed his skin. "Taru, I must go now. I'll come someother time".

She went into the hut and putting on the slippers turned to go. She found Taru was standing in the door blocking the way.

"Jeeto", he said in a gruff voice. "Today evil thoughts have again possessed my mind. I am due for another punishment you must punish me, Jeeto".

Shyly Jeeto advanced toward him. She removed the garland from her hair and put it round his neck.

Taru opened the door for her. Chanan ran ahead of her, carrying a bundle of sugarcane. Taking away the bundle from him she lifted him in her arms.

"Sister, I like Taru. You also like him, don't you?"

Jeeto's face turned red. "Yes, I like him.....I mean, he is a good man". She said hiding her embarrassment.

Taru's coarse voice in her ears:

"O Sweet one, carry a small pitcher,
Or, you'll twist your slender waist,
O Lachchi, my sweet one!"

MYSTERY AT CARNIVAL LAKE

by W. T. BRANNON

DETECTIVE Jim Burgess ran to the window and looked out. Tires were still screaming as the two-tone convertible jolted to a stop at the curb in front of police headquarters. The driver leaned on the horn.

"What happened ?" asked Detective Tom Wall.

"I don't know, but that guy nearly tore up the pavement getting here. We'll go see."

Followed by his partner, Burgess sprinted for the front door. By the time they reached the sidewalk, there was a raucous din from the horn.

"Take it easy," Burgess shouted as he jerked the door open.

The driver was a man of about thirty with dark, badly rumpled curly hair. He was nude except for a shirt tied around his waist and a pair of untied sports shoes.

He kept his elbow on the horn as if blowing it were his only mission in life.

Burgess grabbed his arm and the noise ceased. "What's the matter ?" the detective demanded.

The man didn't answer but turned slowly, as if movement pained him, and pointed to the back seat.

Tom Wall had the rear door open. "There's a girl back here !" he exclaimed.

Burgess took one look and said : "Get a stretcher, Tom."

While his partner raced back into the police building, Burgess bent over the girl. She wasn't pretty now, but she was young and dark haired and she had once been beautiful. She was wedged on the floor, between the two seats, in a jackknife kneeling position, her head twisted around and resting on an outflung arm.

Blood trickled from her left ear and nostrils, and the dark hair was matted. The thin dress, her only garment, was pulled tight around her waist. A bloody froth had washed away the lipstick and her eyes were closed.

Two uniformed officers came with the stretcher and lifted the girl, wheeling her into the police emergency room.

"I called for the Doc and a rescue squad," Wall said.

Burgess nodded, then motioned to the driver of the convertible who had been watching with anguished eyes. The young man clambered out, hugging his shirt about him, and walked listlessly into the station with the detective.

Wall and the uniformed men had the girl stretched out now and were trying to revive her with artificial respiration. Her head was battered, her skull looked like it had been crushed; nasty bruises marked other parts of her body.

Burgess watched a moment, strode to a locker and found a slicker. He helped the young man into it.

"Now, how did this happen ?" he asked.

There was no answer. The man's eyes were fixed on the girl.

"I asked you a question," Burgess said, tapping him on the shoulder. "What's the matter, can't you talk ?"

The other shook his head.

"Are you a mute ?"

Again the man shook his head. He pointed to his mouth.

"All right, open," Burgess said.

He opened his mouth and Burgess peered in. What he could see was raw and bloody.

"Well, we've got to get the story somehow," Burgess said. "Any suggestions ?"

But the other man wasn't listening; all his concentration was on the efforts to revive the girl. Burgess grabbed his arm and repeated the question.

The man nodded and pointed to the pencil in the detective's breast pocket. He raised his hands and made motions as if to write.

"All right," said Burgess. "I'll get some paper and ask you questions and you write the answers. Is that what you're trying to say ?"

The man nodded vigorously.

Burgess handed him a pad and pencil. "What's your name and how old are you ?"

"Robert Freeman, 29", he wrote.

"What about the girl?"

"Martha Quane, 21."

Where do you live ?"

"Both live on Earle Street."

Before the detective could speak again, Freeman gestured impatiently and scribbled again on the pad :

"Don't talk. Get help for Martha."

"We're doing everything we can," Burgess said. "A doctor's on the way and here comes the rescue squad now."

Freeman jerked his head towards the door as it opened. He watched with avid interest as firemen hurried into the room with their rescue equipment. Freeman let the pad dangle at his side, his gaze on the firemen as they began working over the girl.

Burgess turned back to Freeman. "There's nothing more we can do. Now, tell me what this is all about."

"Wait," Freeman wrote, and there was pleading in his eyes. "I can't think. She's my girl. We're engaged."

"Okay." Burgess joined Freeman in watching the efforts of the firemen. He could tell from their expressions that they weren't having any luck.

They were ready to give up when the Medical Examiner arrived. Dr. George Allison was middle-aged, on the portly side and usually good natured. To the police and to thousands of patients, he was known as Doc.

Doc Allison hadn't taken the Medical Examiner's post because he needed more work; he had plenty already. But as everybody in the town knew, he had an almost insatiable curiosity. He liked to pry, especially into what made people tick. Those who didn't understand him had dubbed him a busybody.

Long before he had taken on an official status his curiosity had led him to delve into local crimes and he had helped the police to solve some baffling mysteries.

Now, he nodded curtly to Burgess and Wall, yanked open his medical kit and bent over the prostrate girl, quickly making certain routine tests. He couldn't find a pulse and his stethoscope failed to pick up a heartbeat.

Finally, Doc straightened and turned to the detectives. "No use," he said. "She's dead."

"Beaten to death, Doc ?" Burgess asked.

"Can't tell you till after an autopsy. Don't think so. Think she was strangled."

Freeman stared at Doc Allison and anguish clouded his features. As the full impact of the doctor's words sunk in, he buried his face in his hands. Burgess waited as he wept softly.

Finally, the detective put a gentle hand on his shoulder.

"You've got to pull yourself together and tell us what happened," he said. "She's been murdered and there's no time to lose if we are to catch the killer."

CHAPTER—II

DOC Allison ordered the body of Martha Quane removed to the morgue adjoining the autopsy room in the basement of the police building. As the shrouded figure was wheeled towards the elevator, Robert Freeman stared after it with glazed eyes, tears streaming down his cheeks.

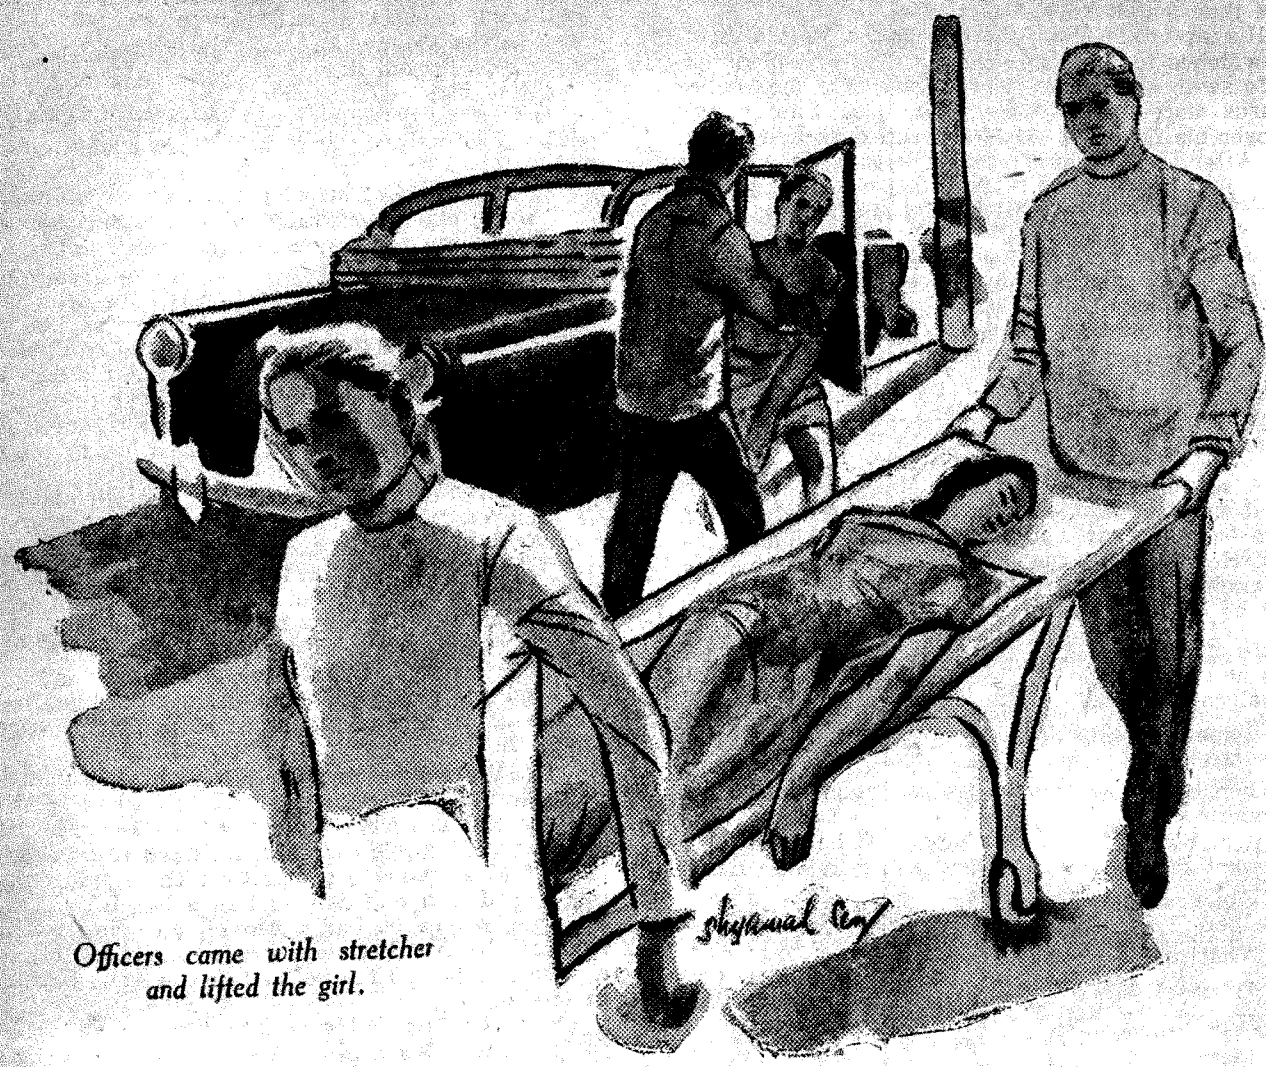
Burgess caught him gently by the arm and steered him towards an office. "We can talk better in here." He motioned to Tom Wall and Doc Allison.

Inside the office, Burgess indicated a chair and Freeman sat down. Doc Allison and Wall found other chairs.

"Now, you can write better," Burgess said. "Let's get the whole story."

Freeman sighed and began writing : "Martha's a secretary for a company downtown. I work for the Ace Packing Company. Research department. Martha lives at 1612 Earle Street. I live at 433 Earle Street —"

"All right," Burgess interrupted impatiently. "What happened ?"



Officers came with stretcher and lifted the girl.

Freeman gritted his teeth and gripped the pen-cil. He wrote in jerky sentences, often in answer to questions from Burgess, Tom Wall or Doc Allison. Eventually, they pieced together the story :

Bob and Martha had been out late—later than usual. They were driving along Disston Avenue when suddenly another car came up beside them. Two men were in the front seat and the driver kept crowding his car closer.

"I thought they were holdup men,", Freeman wrote. "I decided to stop."

A tall, broad shouldered man who had sat with the driver leaped out and crowded into the front seat beside Martha. He had a gun and he levelled it as he hunched back against the front door.

"Follow that car," he ordered, gesturing with the weapon. And as Martha looked as if she would scream: "Take it easy, baby. This gun's loaded."

The other car, which looked like a Frazer, pulled away and Freeman followed. He kept pace as the other car turned into Haines Road, went a few blocks and turned off into a side road.

Finally, the old car pulled off the road onto a grassy plot among some trees. Freeman had been there before. He knew that the site was a recreation area around Carnival Lake, a favourite outing place for picnickers and swimmers.

The other man climbed out of the old Frazer. He was shorter and of husky build. Both men appeared to be around thirty. But because of the darkness, Freeman didn't get a good look at their features.

The tall man ordered them out of the car and his companion grabbed the girl. Freeman, staring into the business end of a revolver, watched helplessly as Martha, one hand clamped over her mouth and an arm about her neck, was dragged out of sight among the trees.

Freeman's captor reached into the old car and brought out a bottle. "Drink this," he ordered.

"I refused," Freeman wrote, "but he put the gun in my ribs and said he would pull the trigger. So I drank." He shuddered. "I only took a few sips and handed the bottle back. It tasted like acid."

In the darkness, he couldn't read the label, but it was about the size and shape of a wine bottle.

The tall man then searched Freeman and took his wallet, containing seventy-six dollars. The man pocketed the wallet and picked up the bottle again. Threatened with the gun, Freeman drank again.

"It burned my mouth and throat," he wrote. "That's why I can't talk."

Apparently satisfied, his captor then ordered Freeman to take off his clothes and jump in the lake "He kept pointing the gun at me and playing with the trigger. So I undressed and got in the water."

At that point, there was no beach, but a level shore and a sheer drop to the surface. The lake in that section was more than ten feet deep and he had to keep swimming and treading water for more than a half hour.

His captor stayed on shore, near the water's edge, and watched to make sure that he didn't come out or try to swim away. Once when he tried to slip away towards more shallow water, a warning shot whistled over his head and slashed into the water behind him. After that, he didn't try to get away.

Occasionally, he could see the flame of a match flare up as his captor lighted a cigarette. Freeman's gaze swept the dark surroundings but he could see nothing but the dark outline of the hulking man on the shore and the trees and shrubs beyond. He heard no sound of a struggle or an outcry from Martha.

"It began to turn light and they got scared," Freeman continued. "Anyway, this guy who was watching me left and in a few minutes, I could hear the sound of a car engine."

A squealing of tires told him that the car had pulled out onto the road and was racing away. He swam to the water's edge and clambered onto the bank. He ran to his car and stepped into his shoes and grabbed up the shirt to hold around his middle. Then he began a frantic search for the girl.

He cried out to her, but there was no response. Then he realized that the acid had burned his throat so that no sound came out.

"I ran in circles for a while," he wrote, "looking under trees and behind bushes."

Then he calmed down some and made a more systematic search. He finally found her huddled in a clump of bushes. She was badly battered, unconscious and bloody.

"I picked her up and put her in the car and drove here," Freeman concluded.

"What time were you stopped?" Burgess asked.

"It was 4:35 a.m."

"How do you know?"

"Martha had just looked at her watch. She said it was late and we'd better be going home."

"What about the guns?" Burgess asked. "What kind were they?"

"I don't know much about guns. The big guy had a revolver. I think the other one had an automatic."

"Okay." Burgess said and turned to Dr. Allison. "You want to make an examination, Doc?"

"Yes" Doc Allison already had his bag open. He removed a cylindrical metal object with a long hose.

Freeman watched him with frightened eyes. His mouth worked in a frustrated effort to talk.

"Just take it easy," said Doc Allison. "This isn't as bad as it looks. Your throat's raw and it might hurt a little bit, but it's absolutely necessary that we pump your stomach to get the acid out."

Freeman shuddered and gulped distastefully, but at Doc Allison's urging submitted willingly.

Doc took a specimen of the stomach contents, sqinted at it, then hurried to the door. "I'm going to the lab," he said. "Be back in a minute."

Burgess put flame to a cigarette. "I'd offer you one, but doubt if you could smoke it," he told Freeman.

The young man nodded gratefully.

Only a few minutes had elapsed before Doc Allison was back. He was visibly excited, almost breathless.

"Quick," he said. "There's no time to lose. You've got to get this boy to a hospital right away."

Freeman looked up in alarm.

"You analyze everything already, Doc?" Burgess inquired as he rose and took Freeman's arm.

"No, that's being done now. But I saw enough. He's got to be treated fast or —" He left the sentence hanging.

Freeman was shuddering now and his step was unsteady as Burgess and Tom Wall, each grasping an arm, led him to a police car. They helped him into the back seat and Doc Allison climbed in with him, grasping a pulse.

"Step on it!" Doc said, his voice urgent.

A tall, broad shouldered man who had sat with the driver leaped out.....

CHAPTER—III

AT the hospital, Freeman was rushed into the emergency room, where Doc Allison held a whispered conference with the house physician. The patient's throat was swabbed, something was injected into his arm and intravenous feeding was started.

"All we can do is hope for the best," said Doc. "There's nothing more we can do here."

He led the way to the police car, clambered into the back.

"We'll drop you off at headquarters, Doc." Burgess said.

"You will not! Aren't you going out there to have a look around Carnival Lake?"

"Sure. But I thought you would want to analyze what you pumped out of Freeman's stomach."

"The technicians can do that." Doc Allison eyed Burgess suspiciously and bristled. "Are you trying to brush me off?"

Burgess grinned.

Tom Wall drove to the Carnival Lake recreation area which was about five minutes from police headquarters. The three got out and began prowling around. Doc Allison noted that it was 8.15 a.m.

"Here's her purse," Tom Wall called. The purse was white leather and it gaped open, some of the contents spilled on the ground.

Burgess poked around in it, disregarding the lipstick, compact and other articles usually carried by a woman. There was a plastic card case, with a Social Security card identifying Martha Quane.

"If these guys were robbers," Burgess said, puzzled, "why didn't they take these?" In his hand he held a rhinestone necklace, with earrings to match. "They look new, like they've never been worn."

"Maybe," said Wall, "they were interested only in cash."

"Maybe," Burgess agreed, unconvinced. "That girl was pretty and she must have put up a terrific struggle."

"Yeah, but where? I don't see any scuff marks."

"I don't either. But these weeds and grass are tough."

Doc Allison, meanwhile, had found a hollow tree and looked in. Inside was a bottle—the approximate size and shape of a quart wine bottle. He lifted it out gingerly holding it by the neck so that possible fingerprints wouldn't be spoiled.

The bottle contained a common brand of household ammonia and about four inches of the liquid was missing. There was foam on top of the remainder.

Doc found the two detectives and exhibited the bottle. "This is probably what Freeman had to drink," he said. Then he frowned. "It's still foaming. I wonder how long foam lasts after a bottle of ammonia is stirred up?"

"I don't know," said Burgess. "That's strictly your department, Doc."

Doc Allison grunted. "I suppose it isn't important, but when I have time, I intend to find out."

The detectives smiled. That was one thing about Doc Allison—he had an insatiable curiosity.

They returned to headquarters, where the ammonia bottle and purse were turned over to technicians. "Check 'em for prints," Burgess said. He gestured to Wall and Doc Allison. "Let's go take a look at that car."

Freeman's coat, trousers, socks and shorts had been tossed on the back seat. The girl's shoes and undergarments were in a crumpled heap on the front seat.

Burgess opened the glove compartment and looked in. In addition to a pair of pliers and other articles that didn't interest him, he found a white jewel box. It was empty, but there was a card inside and it was inscribed:

"To my honey, Martha, on her twenty-first birthday, with all my love. Bob."

"They look new, like they've never been worn."

"That's certainly a hell of a way for a birthday celebration to end," said Burgess. "This must be the box the necklace and earrings came in."

They went back into the station where an anguished man of middle age was waiting. He introduced himself as Ralph Quane, Martha's father.

"You saw the boy?" Burgess asked.

He nodded and his face clouded.

"I know it's tough on you, Mr. Quane," Burgess said, "but we'd like to ask you some questions. We're going to find this killer."

"I appreciate that," Quane said, his voice choked. Then he regained his composure. "I'll tell you anything I can."

"Suppose you tell us about your daughter and her romance."

She had been engaged to marry Freeman, Quane said. The only thing that had held up the wedding was lack of money. Freeman had wanted to be married, but Martha wanted to wait until they had a stake.

"When was the last time you saw her?" Burgess asked.

"Last night about eleven o'clolck when she came back home for a compact she had forgotten."

"You know where she was going then?"

"Yes, she said that Bob was taking her to the Town House for dinner and dancing. Last night was a sort of special occasion—they were celebrating Martha's twenty-first birthday and—". The father choked up again and Burgess waited.

"Do you know where they went earlier in the evening?" he asked.

"Yes, Bob took her to a movie."

"How long had Martha been engaged to Bob?"

"About a year."

"Did she have any other boy friends?" Burgess asked. "Any suitors before she met Bob?"

"Yes, she was a rather popular girl and she had several boy friends before she became engaged to Bob."

"Were any of them jealous of him?"

"Yes, I think so. Bob is older than Martha's regular crowd. They resented it when he came into the picture."

"Can you give me their names?" Burgess asked eagerly.

"You'd better talk to her mother. She knew a lot more about Martha's personal affairs than I did."

"We'll go to see her," said Burgess, "but we'll wait and give her a little time to get over the shock."

"Yes," said Quane, "that would be better."

After he had gone, Doc Allison got up. "I'm going to the morgue and see how the autopsy is coming along."

The technician came in with the purse and ammonia bottle and set them on Burgess's desk.

"A lot of prints," he said, "but they're all so blurred they're worthless."

Burgess nodded. "I expected that. Thanks." He studied the ammonia bottle, then turned to Tom Wall: "I want you to contact the manufacturer of this ammonia by long distance. Get a list of the whole-salers, then of every store in town that sells this brand. Maybe we can find out who bought this bottle."

"Okay," said Tom, "but that may be a big order. Practically every housewife in town uses household ammonia".

"Yeah, I know. But this brand may not sell so well. It's worth a try."

Tom went to his desk and picked up the phone. While he was talking, Burgess made rapid notes on a big pad on his desk—cryptic sentences, abbreviated words that were intelligible only to him. In numerous places, he made big question marks. On another sheet ,he drew long, crude lines and when he had finished, he had what looked like an unfinished map.

Tom Wall hung up and turned to Burgess. "The manufacturer's district sales manager has the list of local stores selling that brand. He's reading it over the phone now to one of the girls."

"All right, when she has the list, I want it distributed to precincts, with instructions for men on every beat to ask the store clerks to try to remember who has bought that brand of ammonia in the last two days. You can do some of the footwork, too."

Tom groaned. "Maybe the bottle was bought a week or a month ago."

"Maybe, but I have a hunch it wasn't."

Doc Allison came back in the office. "The post mortem is almost complete."

"What's the verdict, Doc?" Burgess asked. "A sex attack?"

"No. And no ammonia in her stomach. But practically everything else happened to her. She was beaten on the face and on the body. Her arms were twisted and two of her fingers were broken. Her skull was fractured and she was strangled. Whoever did that hated the girl. He was no stickup man. It was a brutal crime of vengeance."

CHAPTER—IV

THE copyist handed Tom Wall the copies of the list of stores selling the ammonia and he carried them outside to the sergeant, to whom he repeated Jim Burgess' instructions about checkups in all precincts. He shoved a copy in his pocket and stopped at Burgess' door to say, "I'm on my way."

Burgess crushed out his cigarette and spoke to the medical examiner. "Doc, I'm going out to see Mrs. Quane. Want to come along?"

"If you insist," Allison said, reaching for his hat.

The mother was still weeping softly when Burgess and the doctor arrived at the home on Earle Street. She dried her eyes and stared at Burgess for a moment as he apologized for intruding on her grief.

"It was that Dan Karl. I always told Martha he was no good—"

"Who is Dan Karl?" Burgess asked.

"He was her boy friend before she met Bob Freeman. He wanted to marry her. He threatened to break up her engagement. He said she'd be sorry if she married Bob."

"Tell us more about him," Burgess invited.

"Martha met him about three years ago at a dance. He's tall and broad shouldered and he appealed to her at first. But there were other things about him she didn't like."

"What were they?"

"He has a bad disposition at times and a very hot temper. And he drinks too much. Anyway, she tried to quit seeing him, but he was very persistent. She finally had to tell him not to come around and not to call her."

"Do you know if she has seen him since she started going with Bob Freeman?"

"Yes, a few times. He came to the house one night when he was very drunk. He made a horrible scene. He threatened her and said her marriage to Bob would never be a success."

"Do you know if she had heard from him lately?"

"No, but she may have. She—she didn't want to worry. me—" The mother broke off, sobbing again. Burgess waited. Doc Allison turned his head and cleared his throat. Finally, Mrs. Quane was composed again.

"We won't bother you any more than we have to," Burgess said. "Just a couple more questions. How old is this fellow?"

"He's twenty-four but he looks older. Maybe because he's so big and partly because he drinks so much."

"Does he have a job?"

"Yes, he does something at a chemical plant, though I don't know exactly what."

Doc Allison leaned forward. "Did you say he works at a chemical plant?"

"Yes, the Acme Chemical Company."

"Do you know if the plant makes household ammonia?"

"Why yes, I believe so."

Doc nodded, said nothing.

"What about other boy friends?" Burgess asked. "Those she went out with more than once."

Mrs. Quane considered this a moment, then supplied three names.

"Who were her closest girl friends."

"She was close with only one, Georgia Ross. She lives in the next block."

Burgess closed up his notebook. "Thank you very much, Mrs. Quane. I hope we won't have to disturb you any more".

When they were in the car again, Doc Allison said: "Where to now? You going to pick up this Dan Karl?"

"Not yet. I want to see how Bob Freeman is getting along".

It was past noon when they arrived at the hospital. Freeman had responded to treatment and his voice had been restored to the extent that he could talk in a hoarse whisper. He was refreshed by a nap induced by the sedatives, but the horror of the early morning ordeal was still mirrored in his face.

"Do you remember any more about the two men?" Burgess asked.

"It was too dark to see their features", Freeman replied. "But I do remember they both wore Panama hats and the tall one had on dark glasses."

"You don't know if they had been following you during the evening?"

"If they did, I didn't notice them."

"Where did you go last night? Suppose you give us your entire itinerary. Maybe we can find somebody who saw them."

Freeman said they had changed their plans and hadn't gone to the Town House, after all. They had stopped at another place, the Dutch Pantry, for dinner, then, because it was such a beautiful night, they had decided to go for a ride in the country. About 3:45, they had stopped at the Silver Castle for hamburgers and Cokes. Then they had started riding again. Martha had just looked at her watch and said it was 4:35 and they'd better be getting home when the two men in the old car approached.

"You know what time it was when you were forced to jump in the lake?" Burgess asked.

"About five o'clock."

"And you were in the water about half an hour?"

"Yes".

"Then you spent another half an hour looking for the girl?"

"Yes, that's right. And it took me about five minutes to drive to the police station."

Burgess made some entries in his notebook. "I just want to get the whole picture," he explained.

Doc Allison had brought the ammonia bottle. "Is this what they made you drink from?"

"I can't tell just from looking at it. It was too dark to see the label." Freeman put his left hand around the bottle. "It sure does feel like the same bottle."

"Did you ever hear of a man who was trying to force his attentions on Martha?" Burgess asked.

"Yes, Martha told me about him. But she didn't think too much of it. He had made some threats, but she thought it was mostly bluff."

"Was he one of the men who stopped you this morning?"

"I don't know," Freeman said. "I never met him."

The mother broke off, sobbing again.

"Did Martha give any indication that she recognized either of the men?"

"I didn't give it any thought at the time. But now that I think back, maybe she did. I know she was scared to death."

"If you saw him would you recognize him."

"I'm not sure. I wouldn't want to accuse the wrong man. But I surely hope you find him."

"I think we will," Doc Allison said. "In fact, I'm practically certain of it."

As they left the hospital, Doc said: "I want to stop at that store down the street. Got a little shopping to do."

Burgess waited until he came out, carrying a heavy bundle. "You must be thirsty, Doc," Burgess said, as he heard the gurgling of liquid.

"Well, I'm not going to drink this, "Doc said. "I picked up four bottles of ammonia. I want to drop them off at the lab."

While he was giving instructions to a technician.

Burgess stopped in his office and found a message from Tom Wall. He had canvassed a dozen stores with no luck; he said he would keep trying.

Doc came back and the two men were off again. "I want to talk to Georgia Ross," said Burgess.

They found the girl at home. Red rings around her eyes told them she had been weeping.

"Tell us about Dan Karl," Burgess invited.

She said he had annoyed Martha a great deal more than her parents knew about. "Martha didn't want to worry her folks. That's why she didn't tell them about the letter."

"What letter?"

"He wrote her a couple of days ago. It was a crazy, maudlin thing—about her twenty-first birthday, which she wouldn't share with him, and about his shattered dreams."

"Did he threaten her?" Burgess asked eagerly.

"I don't know whether you can call it a threat or not. He ended up by saying she would be to blame for anything that happened that night."

"Do you know what happened to the letter?"

"Yes, she burned it. She didn't want her folks to see it."

"Too bad," Burgess said regretfully. "Did she show it to her fiance?"

"No. She was afraid of what he might do. Bob is very strong. One of his hobbies is weight lifting. He is always practising some feat of strength. He spe ds a lot of time in the gym."

"Do you know why they had postponed their marriage?"

"Yes. They didn't have anything saved and Martha wanted to have a little money ahead before they tried to set up a home. This was strictly her idea, though. Bob was ready to marry on a shoestring."

After they had left the girl, Burgess said: "Now, I think it's time we had a little talk with Dan Karl."

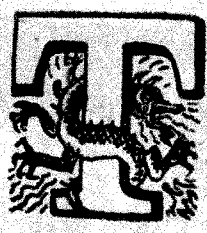
They drove to the Acme Chemical Company, a sprawling plant in an industrial section. The personnel manager referred to a card file, then dialled a number on the plant telephone system. He carried on a brief conversation hung up and turned to Burgess.

"Dan Karl is not here today," he said. "He hasn't been at work for the past two days."

"Did he call up?"

"No. He's absent without leave. His foreman tried to call him and got no answer."

CHAPTER—V



THE manager of a third-rate hotel on a shabby street admitted Burgess and Doc Allison to Dan Karl's room. The shades were drawn and the hotel official switched on a light. The room was a shambles. A chair had been overturned, the faded rug was rumpled, shoes, socks and a man's shirt were scattered on the floor. A man's coat had been thrown across the overturned chair. On an old dresser were two empty whisky bottles. A third, almost empty, rested on a bedside table beside an ashtray overflowing with cigarette butts.

A figure was sprawled across the bed. He was a husky, broad shouldered man, wearing wrinkled trousers and bare from the waist up. His mouth was open and he was snoring loudly.

Burgess stared down at him. His hair was dishevelled and heavy stubble covered his face. He might have been thirty, he might have been fifty. He stirred and made a reckless swing with one arm when Burgess shook him. He kept on snoring.

Doc Allison found water and a towel. He bent over, applied the wet cloth. The sleeping man opened his eyes, squinted at his visitors, then sat up unsteadily and stared at them, his features distorted in a baleful glare.

"Whaddaya want?"

Burgess showed his badge. "Police".

"Go away. I want to sleep".

"After you've answered some questions," Burgess said. "Why didn't you go to work yesterday and today?"

Karl's lips curled up in a snarl. "They got cops checkin' up on why I don't work?"

"Yes, especially when you didn't report after Martha Quane was murdered."

Karl sat up with a start. "What did you say?"

"I said Martha Quane was murdered and you didn't go to work. That's going to take some explaining, mister."

"Martha murdered? Is this a joke?"

"It's no joke. I think you'd better get on your clothes and come along with us."

Karl stood up, took an unsteady step, then grabbed up the whisky bottle. Before Burgess could stop him, he took a long pull. "Hair of the dog," he explained, then walked over to the untidy dresser and found a comb. With the wet towel he swabbed his face and neck.

On the way to headquarter, Karl stared out, anguish on his features. He was led into Burgess' office where he slumped into a chair. "How'd it happen?" he asked. "Who killed her? Why?"

"Maybe we better start at the beginning," said Burgesss, "Where were you yesterday? What did you do last night? Why didn't you go to work for two days?"

Karl stood up, his fists clenched. "You mean you think I killed her?"

"Take it easy," Burgess said calmly. "Nobody's accused you — yet. Suppose you answer my questions."

Karl opened his mouth as if to make an angry retort, then sank into the chair again. "Oh, hell," he said. "I might as well tell you."

"Go ahead."

'She was my girl. I was nuts about her. We were going to be married. Then this jerk came along and she gave me the air. I'm not blaming her. He's pretty and he's polished and he's older than I am. I guess that's enough to sweep a young girl off her feet."

Burgess waited while Karl nervously lighted a cigarette.

"She was twenty-one yesterday. That's when we were going to get married. But she had brushed me off completely She wouldn't even talk to me — she didn't even want me to call her up on the phone. But I was still crazy about her.

"I couldn't sleep, thinking about it. So yesterday morning, I went out and got some liquor. Instead of going to work, I stayed in my room and tied one on."

Karl grinned crookedly. "I guess you've already checked up on me. I guess you know when I tie one on, it's a real knot. I get drunk and I don't give a damn about anything." He spread his hands. "That's what I was doing — and that's all I was doing."

"Get your filthy hands off me!"

"Can you prove you were in your room at 4:30 this morning?"

"I can't prove a thing. You'll have to take my word for it."

"Your word may be good," Burgess admitted, "but we'll need more than that. Maybe you better think of something."

"I don't know what it would be."

"I don't either," said Burgess, "but it better be good." He pressed a buzzer on his desk and a uniformed officer came in. Burgess nodded towards Karl. "A new guest."

"Get your filthy hands off me!" Karl screamed as the officer advanced. He stood up, doubled up big fists and glared belligerently at the uniformed man.

"We're going to be nice to you — if you let us," Burgess said. "So you can have it either way you want. You can go quietly to a cell under your own power or we can throw you in."

"What are you locking me up for?" Karl demanded.

"To give you an opportunity to think. Maybe you can come up with an alibi."

"I can't. I told you that."

"Well, there's one other way. Are you willing to take a lie test?"

"Why should I? I didn't do anything."

"Then we'll have to hold you."

"Okay. Where's the clink?"

Burgess and Doc Allison watched as the officer led him away. "What do you think, Doc?" Burgess asked.

Before he could answer, the phone rang. It was Tom Wall. "I found a woman who sold a bottle of that ammonia to a man yesterday," he said. "I told her you'd want to talk to her."

"I will — tomorrow. Right now, I'm going home and try to grab a few winks. Doc and I are going to make a little trip starting at midnight. Want to come along?"

"Sure. I'm going to stop by the hospital a moment, then I'll go home. Where'll I meet you?"

"Be here at 11:30."

Tom was waiting when Burgess and Doc Allison reached headquarters at 11.30 that night. "Where are you going?"

"Over the route Freeman and the girl took last night. Maybe somebody saw them. More important, maybe somebody saw a car following them."

At midnight, they pulled away from the Dutch Pantry, where a waiter recalled serving Freeman and the girl. But he hadn't noticed anybody suspicious around them.

Burgess drove at a normal pace, following the itinerary Freeman had given him. At a filling station where Freeman said they had stopped for gas, the attendant remembered them. "Mainly," he said, "because the guy wanted a dollar's worth of gas. Most people say fill it up or ask for five or ten gallons."

"Did you see another car?" Burgess asked. "An old Frazer with two men in it?"

"No. It was late and I didn't see any other cars at all."

Burgess kept to the timetable and arrived at the Silver Castle, an all-night hamburger stand, at 3:42. Here he found several people who had seen Freeman come in. "He stopped to talk to another fellow before he came in and got two hamburgers and two Cokes."

"Did you recognize the man?" Burgess asked eagerly.

"Yes. His name is Sam Banas. He runs a poolroom down the street."

"You know where we can find him?"

"He may still be there. He closes at two, but he usually hangs around for an hour or two to do his book work and clean up the place."

Burgess drove to the poolroom and banged on the door. A door somewhere in the rear opened and a shaft of light was visible through the dirty glass door front. A man came across the room and peered through the clouded glass.

"What do you want?" he demanded.

"Police." Burgess displayed his badge.

Reluctantly, the man opened up and grudgingly admitted he was Sam Banas. "I'm clean," he said. "I close at two like I'm s'posed to."

Patiently, Burgess explained his mission. "I don't remember whether I saw Freeman or not," Banas said.

"We know you did. We want to know what you talked about."

"It wasn't illegal, so it's none of your business."

"We could," Burgess said, still patient, "take you in and ask you at headquarters."

"Oh, all right," Banas said. "It wasn't nothing much. He was broke and I let him take five bucks. That's all."

As they drove away, Doc Allison said: "Did you notice that guy is tall and husky and about thirty years old?"

"Yeah, I noticed," Burgess said. "Maybe we better check up on what kind of car he drives when we got back to the station."

They continued the trip, arriving at Carnival Lake a little before five. They got out and walked to the water's edge, then wandered around killing time until six. It took them five minutes to drive to the police station.

While Burgess was studying the notes he had made on the trip, Doc Allison went into the laboratory. When he came back, he had some figures written on a piece of paper.

"The technicians took four inches off the top of those three bottles of ammonia," he said, "and shook 'em up good. The foam was gone from the last one in two hours and eighteen minutes."

Burgess made a note. "You think that means anything, Doc?"

"I'm not sure, but it may lead us to the killer."

CHAPTER—VI

IT was past eight o'clock when Dan Karl was brought from his cell to Burgess' office. Though his chin stubble had grown some, he looked better. His belligerence of the day before had vanished.

"I've thought it over," he said, "and I'll take the lie test. I didn't do it, so what have I got to lose?"

"It may not be necessary," said Burgess. "You work for a chemical company where they make household ammonia, don't you?"

"Sure. I handle the stuff all the time."

"Ever drink any?"

"Do I look like I've got holes in my head?"

Burgess ignored this. "Well, what would happen if you forced somebody else to drink it?"

"But this is something the law will have to handle. You're free to go at any time."

"Thanks." Karl glanced at the clock. "Too late to go to work now, but maybe I ought to get cleaned up and square things with the boss."

As they watched him leave, Doc Allison said: "He's sort of rough, but I think he might have been a good man for Martha Quane."

Burgess nodded. "Let's go."

When they arrived at the hospital, Bob Freeman was propped up in bed smoking a cigarette. He waved cheerily.

"Feeling better?" Burgess asked.

"Yes. The acid burns are healing nicely."

"As you knew they would," said Doc.

"What do you mean?"

"You work in the research department at the Ace Packing Company," said Burgess. "That makes you a chemist, doesn't it?"

..... and she broke the engagement.

"If he drank much, it would burn his guts up." Karl turned to Doc Allison. "You ought to know that."

"I do," Doc admitted, "and that's why we're not going to hold you. We've got somebody else in mind."

"I wasn't worried", Karl said. "I knew I was innocent. But I might not be long if I could get my hands on the louse that killed my girl."

"I think I know how you feel," said Burgess.

"I'm an apprentice chemist — just learning."

"Low pay?"

"It isn't good, but —"

"Then why are you always broke?"

"I'm not that broke." Freeman smiled. "At least, I wasn't until those guys took my wallet."

"Let's quit stalling, Freeman," said Burgess. "We know your wallet didn't have much money in it — if you had a wallet."

Freeman bristled. "I told you —"

"Yeah, I know what you told us. If you had all that money, why did you borrow five dollars from Sam Banas?"

"Sam Banas? I never heard of the man."

"Too late for a denial now," said Burgess. "You want to tell us all about it?"

"I've told you all I know."

"No, you haven't. But I think I can guess. Want to hear it?"

Freeman was sullenly silent.

"All right, here's what happened. Martha Quane wanted to save money so you could get married. But you didn't save. Maybe you were gambling in Sam Banas' pool room. She didn't know until last night that you were dead broke. She had been looking forward to the evening at the Town House. You couldn't take her because you didn't have any money, so you compromised on the Dutch Pantry.

"You hurried her out of there and she was disappointed. Maybe you quarrelled then. You smoothed things over and took her for a ride. But after you bought gas, you didn't have enough even for hamburgers. Martha probably demanded an accounting. Maybe she wanted to know what had happened to the money you were supposed to be saving to get married. You couldn't give her a good answer.

"She realized then that if she married you, she probably would have to go on working and maybe even have to help support you. Her eyes were opened suddenly and she broke the engagement. You flew into a rage and began beating her. She fought back but she was no match for your superior strength. Maybe you intended to kill her, maybe not.

"She was unconscious, perhaps dead, when you stopped at the hamburger stand. You bought hamburgers and Cokes for two for an alibi. But you didn't have any money and had to borrow from Sam Banas. There's only one reason a character like Banas would let you have five dollars — you spent all your spare money in his place."

Burgess paused. "Is that right so far?"

Freeman's mouth curled. "It's your story, not mine."

"All right, I'll give you the rest of it. You discovered Martha was dead and you had to think up a good story. Maybe you had the ammonia in the car or maybe you went back home for it. You had to kill time some way. You didn't spend all that time at Carnival Lake."

"You don't know what you're talking about."

"I think I do We were there this morning. In fact, we went everywhere you said you did at approximately the same time. We were on Disston Avenue at 4:35, but we weren't hampered by darkness, because it was after dawn and we could see everything.

"We turned off at Haines Road and drove to Carnival Lake. We got there before five and the sun was coming up. That's how we know you weren't there at that time."

"I could have been mistaken about the time—"

"We thought of that, too. But we did find out you were at the Silver Castle to buy hamburgers at 3:45. You stopped a few minutes to borrow money from Sam Banas. You waited a few more minutes while the hamburgers were cooked and wrapped. By this time, it would be around four o'clock. Assuming you gulped the hamburgers in fifteen minutes, it would still take you until around 4:30 to reach Disston Avenue. And it wasn't dark.

"You were on Disston all right. You were at Carnival Lake, too. You went there to get your shirt wet and swish ammonia around in your mouth. Then you drove to the police station with that wild story. But you made a couple of mistakes and we knew almost from the start that you were not telling the truth."

Freeman was beginning to wilt. "What mistakes?"

"For instance, why did you wedge the girl in the back seat when it would have been so much easier to put her in the front? The reason is obvious: You had killed her before you went to the lake and you had to put her there so she wouldn't be seen.

"There was another big hole in your story. If you had swallowed so much ammonia — four inches were missing from the bottle — you probably would have been having convulsions. As soon as Doc pumped your stomach, he knew you hadn't actually swallowed any. That made us suspicious, but it was actually the time element that tripped you.

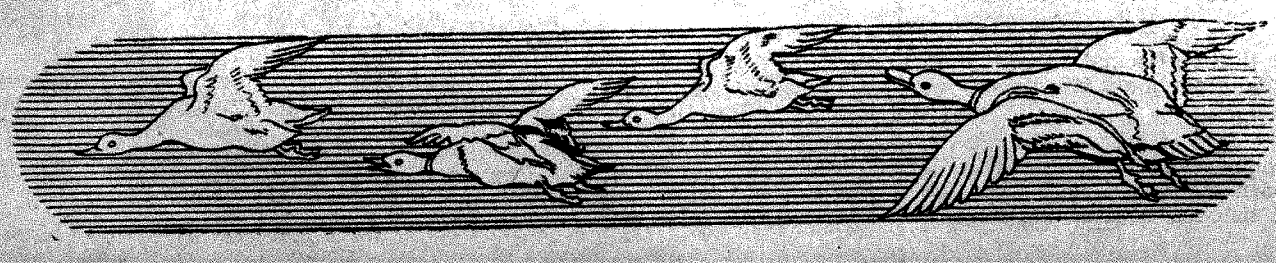
Doc discovered that particular discrepancy. You told us you were forced to drink the ammonia before five o'clock. We found the bottle almost three and a half hours later and there was still foam on the top. Doc didn't believe the foam would last that long and he made an experiment. Even though the test bottles were stirred up a lot more than a bottle would have been from just drinking out of it, the foam subsided in two hours and eighteen minutes. We were sure then that it was around six o'clock you put the bottle to your lips."

"All right," said Freeman, "what's the rest of it?"

"You bought the ammonia because you knew that Dan Karl worked in a plant where it's manufactured. You thought he would be blamed — and he almost was. But he didn't buy ammonia and you did. Tom found where you bought it and he brought the woman to the hospital last night. She took a look at you from the corridor and positively identified you as the man she sold it to."

Freeman was silent.

"Too bad you didn't finish your chemistry training and learn about foam," said Doc Allison.



Rebati

FROM AN ORIYA STORY by FAKIR SENAPATI

Fakir Mohan Senapati was a versatile author in Oriya. He is acclaimed as the father of short story writing in the language. His works comprising short stories, novels, autobiography etc. are treated as modern classics in Oriya literature and they are still avidly read by thousands in Orissa. "Rebati" was published in 1898 and is believed to be the first short story to be published in Oriya.

THE house at the far end of the village had four rooms, two in a row, with doors in front and at the back, and a thatched shed for paddy-husking attached to the wall of the courtyard. The room near the main entrance was a sort of waiting hall for callers and also for tenants who came to pay their rents. Shyambandhu Mohanty was the zamindar's clerk in the village. Patpur was the name of the village, which was in the Harispur Pargana in Cuttack district. With a pay of two rupees a month, and a little money that accrued to him for correction of receipts etc. his income came to rupees four a month. He could somehow make both ends meet with this. And why somehow, he managed it rather well. Nobody in the family ever complained. Besides the leafy and other vegetables in the kitchen garden, there were two trees yielding plenty of drumsticks (sajina), and two milch cows bearing calves every year so that a little milk or curd was always there in an earthen pot in his house. The old woman, his mother, prepared cakes of cowdung mixing it with husk; so fuel was no problem. The zamindar had given him three and a half acres of land for cultivation, so paddy was neither more than sufficient nor insufficient for the needs of the family.

Shyambandhu was a straightforward man and the tenants respected and loved him. He collected rents going round from door to door and using the words of endearment. He never extracted a single pie from anybody illegally. Tenants never demanded receipts after paying the rent but he always wrote them out on bits of palm-leaf and fixed them in their thatches. When the zamindar's peon came to the village, Shyambandhu did not leave him without greasing his palm. Shyambandhu's family consisted of four persons—himself and his wife, his old mother and a daughter aged ten, named Rebati.

In the evenings he sat on the verandah and sang, "Oh, the face of an ocean of mercy....." and other devotional songs. Occasionally, he placed a lamp on a wooden stand and read from the Bhagabata, and Rebati listened to it sitting near him. She had also picked up many devotional songs which heard sweet in her melodious young voice. When she sang those songs to her father, villagers came to listen. She had learnt a particular song from her father who became extremely happy to hear her sing it. She had to give a recital of it every evening to please her father.

Rebati sang:

"To whom shall I appeal;
Oh Lord, if you don't look up,
the poor will die:
Save me or not,
I've laid my life at Thy feet,
with Your name in my heart.
Without Thee, O Hari, the three-worlds are deserts,
Soothe my life by a gift of Thy love".

Two years back, the Deputy Inspector of Schools, while on a tour to rural areas had spent a night at Patpur. On the representation of some important persons of the village, the Deputy Inspector had moved the higher authorities for an Upper Primary School there. A school was eventually opened in the village, with a teacher on a pay of rupees four a month which was paid by the Government. It was supplemented by the tuition fees collected from students at the rate of one anna a month from each student. The teacher was elementary trained from the Cuttack Normal School. His name was Basudeva. Worthy of his name, he was both inherently and outwardly good. He never raised his head to look at anybody while walking through the village. He was about twenty with a beautiful appearance as if curved on a single grain of rice. In his childhood he had infantile epilepsy and his mother had branded his face with the mouth of a heated bottle, and the scar, which rather looked lovely on the face, was still visible. He was an orphan since his boyhood and was brought up by his maternal uncle. Basudeva was Karana by caste and so was Shyambandhu. On festive occasions when any special dishes were prepared in his house, Shyambandhu went to the school and said, "Basu, please come to our house in the evening; your aunt wants you". A kind of relationship had grown between them in the course of these visits. Rebati used to say about him, "Oh, the motherless man. There is nobody to see what he eats". Every evening Basu came to Shyambandhu and sat with him for some time.

"Brother Basu has come", cried out Rebati whenever she saw him coming at a distance. She sang the old songs every evening for Basu who enjoyed them as new ones. Once Shyambandhu heard from Basu that there was a Girls' school at Cuttack where girls learnt the three R's and sewing. Since that day, Shyambandhu desired to educate Rebati and communicated his feeling to Basu.

Basu respected him as his father. He said, "Yes, I was just going to suggest that to you".

They agreed about Rebati's education. Rebati heard it and darted into the house and informed her mother and grandma, "I'll go to school and read".

Her mother said, "All right, you will". Grandmother said, "What do you mean by reading ? You are a girl, what have you to do with reading ? It is enough if you learn to cook properly, to prepare cakes and sweets, to decorate a place with coloured rice powder, to churn the curd".

One evening sitting on a low stool of mango plank wood in the verandah, Shyambandhu was taking his meal. Rebati was also eating from his dishes. The old woman sitting before them ordered her daughter-in-law, "Get some more rice, some dal, and a pinch of salt". Then she asked, "Oh, Shyama, will Reba learn to read—but why should a girl read ?"

Shyambandhu said, "Let her read, she wants it. The girls of the Patnaik family of Jhankar can read Bhagabat, and sing Baidahis Bilas lyrics".

Rebati got annoyed and abused her grandmother in a low, inaudible voice, "You old fogey !" She said to her father, "No, father, I must read."

Shyambandhu assured her, "Yes, yes, you will read."

The matter ended there for the day.

Next day when Basudev gave a copy of the "First Book of Reading" by Sitanath Babu to Rebati, she avidly turned the pages of the book and glanced through it from beginning to end. She was enchanted to see the pictures of elephants, horses, cows etc. Kings are happy because they keep elephants and horses, some are happy because they ride on them, but Rebati was happy just to see their pictures. She ran to her mother and showed her the pictures. She then showed them to grandma who said peevishly, "Yes, yes, you go.....", Rebati retorted, "You get out, you get out."

It was an auspicious day—the day on which the Goddess of Learning is worshipped. Rebati took a plunging bath and wore a new sari and waited impatiently for Basu who would initiate her in reading the book. Just not to annoy grandma, no arrangement was made to celebrate the occasion. At six o'clock, Basu gave her the first lesson.

The study continued, and everyday Basu taught her in the evening. Within two years she progressed much. She could now read Madhu Rao's lyrics at ease.

One evening while Shyambandhu was taking his meal, the mother and the son had a discussion. It was in the trail of a conversation they had the day before.

Shyambandhu said, "Well mother, wouldn't it be nice ?"

The old woman replied, "Yes, it would be nice, but have you enquired about the caste ?"

"What else had I been enquiring all these days ? He is a Karan—a high caste. May be of a poor family, but of high caste", said Shyambandhu.

His mother quoted a verse. "Wealth and riches do not matter, about the caste first enquire" She asked, "Will he stay in our house ?

"Where shall he go ? After all he has only his uncle and aunt", said Shyambandhu.

Rebati listened to it sitting near him.

Rebati was eating her meal there. She guessed something from this talk, but her manners and behaviour changed completely from that day, She was bashful when Basu taught her before her father. With or without reason she felt like laughing but controlled herself tightening her lips and bending her head low. From now, while Basu taught her, she read silently or simply made a sound, "Hum, Hum" and ran into the house after the lesson was over laughing within her tightened lips. Every evening she expectantly looked for somebody at the front door but bolted into the house when Basu came. Grandma began to take exception to her going out of the house.

Two years elapsed. It is ordained by God that nobody should have the same time all through. It was early spring. All on a sudden cholera broke out in the village, and one morning Shyambandhu fell ill.

In the village nobody stirred out of home when there was an epidemic. Everybody believed that the old woman, Cholera, with a basket on her waist, kept herself busy picking up men and women from the road. There was chaos in Shyambanbhu's family. What could the two women do ? The young girl came out of doors and again entered the house all the time crying at the top of her voice. Basudev ran from the schooo the moment he heard about Shyambandhu's attack. Without fear, without care of his own safety, he sat by the side of Shyambandhu and nursed him. In the afternoon Shyambandhu stared at Basu's face and indistinctly uttered, "Rebati is now your responsibility".

Basu cried out loudly. There was a stir in the house. Rebati was rolling on the ground and the villagers said, "Perhaps the end has come". By evening it was all quiet. But what was to be done ? Basu was an inexperienced youth, the other two were women. Bana Sethi, the village washerman, was an experienced man, because during his life time he had disposed of about a hundred such dead bodies. He believed that every body must have to go, either today or tomorrow, but now there was the hope of getting a few pieces of cloth. Tightening the napkin around his waist and lifting the hatchet to his shoulder, he presented himself at Shyambandhu's house. It was the only house of a Karan in the entire village. So, the mother-in-law, the daughter-in-law and Basudev somehow got through the cremation. Passing a feverish night at the burning ghat, they returned home in the morning.

Just after Rebati's mother entered the house, she had began vomitting profusely, and by noon it was known in the village that she was no more.

Time and tide wait for none. As the rustic proverb goes, some have umbrella over their palanquin, while some have whipping in fetters. Any way, three months elapsed. Shyambandhu had two cows but the zamindar's men took them away for defaulted payment. Shyambandhu regarded the zamindar's due as sacred and had no sleep until he had deposited the same in the kutchery of the zamindar. At any rate, the zamindar knew them to be prize cows.

He took back the land given to Shyam. The servant engaged for tilling that land left them on the full moon day in early spring. The bullocks were sold for rupees seventeen and a half. The funerals took more than half the amount. The family pulled on with the balance with great difficulty for a month. Another month went by mortgaging and selling the household utensils. Basu came to the house twice daily and stayed till late in the evening and returned to his own house only when grandma and granddaughter went to bed.

Basu offered money, but both of them refused it. If Basu gave anything in spite of their protests, it was left in the niche untouched. Basu came to know of this and did not give anything thereafter. He took a few small coins from the old woman and purchased daily necessaries, with which they could manage for eight or ten days. The house needed thatching. Basu had purchased two rupees worth of straw but the thatching could not be done because the time was inauspicious.

Every evening the old woman wept. She spent the night on the ground where she fell crying and Rebati slept by her side. She became almost mad and her eye-sight was fast failing. Soon she stopped crying all the time, and begun to abuse Rebati, because she had by now come to the conclusion that Rebati was at the root of all the sufferings. It must be all due to Rebati's learning to read and write. So her son died, her daugher-in-law died, the servant left them, the bullocks were sold, the zamindar took away the cows. Grandma had no doubt about it. Her failing eye-sight was also attributed to Rebati's education. When, she abused her, Rebati could not stand near her and tears streamed down her cheeks. She turned her face to a corner of the room or to the back-door and stood like a statue. Basu also felt guilty because Rebati had read nothing till he began to teach her. But she could say nothing to Basu because without him it was impossible to live. Besides, the final settlement with the zamindar was still pending. The zamindar's men often came and demanded this or that account. Who else, except Basu, could search out the necessary papers from the old records ? When Basu was not present, the old woman expressed her opinion loudly.

Rebati was no longer the dancing doll frisking about in the house. Since the death of her parents nobody had ever seen her at the front door nor heard her voice. For a few days she cried aloud, but now she did not. Her two big eyes were always full of tears and looked like two small blue lilies on water. Her little life and her still little heart were completely shattered. Days and nights had become alike to her. There was no light in the sun and no darkness in the night, the entire world was a vacuum to her. Her parents' images always filled her heart. In her mind's eye she only saw, 'Here mother was sitting, there father was going.' She could not believe that they were dead and would never return. She had no hunger, no sleep but always thought of her parents. Out of fear for grandma, she sat at her meals but rarely got up from the place where she sat. She was reduced to a skeleton. Only when Basu came to their house, she got up and stared at him with her two big eyes and when Basu looked at her she heaved a little sigh and lowered her head. As long as Basu was with her, she stared at him and forgot everything else. She only saw Basudeva, thought of Basudeva, her entire heart was full of Basudeva.

It was the fifth month after Shyambandhu's death and the second month of the summer. Basu came to their house at midday. He never came at this hour. Grandma opened the door with difficulty.

"Grandma," (Basu used to call her grandma all along) "the Deputy Inspector will examine the students of the school at Hariharpur Police Station. Students of other schools will go there. I shall go there tomorrow morning with my pupils. It may take about five days."

Rebati heard this from behind the door and suddenly she sat down on the floor. Fortunately, she was holding the door, otherwise she would have fallen on the floor. Basu purchased rice, salt, oil and vegatables for five days and keeping them on the courtyard he made an obeisance to grandma and started on his journey.

The old woman advised him, "Well, son, don't expose yourself to sun, take care of your health and keep to your meal time." After saying this she heaved a sigh.

Rebati was looking at him with great concentration but her look was rather different from that of other days. Previously, she lowered her head when Basu stared at her, but today she was looking straight at him. Basu's look was not also like it was on other days when it appeared that though he had great desire to see Rebati thoroughly he could not look at her straight. On that day, their four eyes met and none had the control to turn the eyes away.

The day was out, Basu had gone away and everywhere there was darkness. Rebati was staring out as before but when the old woman called her, she got back to her senses and saw darkness everywhere.

Rebati was counting the days, it was the sixth day. She had not seen the front door since her parents died but today since morning she had come to the front door twice. In the afternoon, as soon as the school boys returned from Hariharpur, the villagers talked among themselves that the Pandit was attacked with cholera under the shade of a banyan tree at Gopalpur while returning from Hariharpur and after only four motions he died at midnight. The villagers mourned him. Boys and girls, mothers and other women cried out loudly. Some said, "Oh, what a beautiful appearance he had!" Some remarked, "How well behaved he was!" Some others observed, "He never cursed a fly while going on the road."

Rebati heard it, grandma heard it. Grandma's voice became choked. She could no longer cry. At last, she got up and said, "Oh, son, you came to a distant place and lost your life due to your own folly," meaning that Basudeva died because he taught lessons to Rebati. Rebati fell on the ground when she heard the news. The day passed and next morning grandma not finding Rebati near her called aloud, "Oh, Rebati," — she abused her, cursed her. She had become frenzied. She did not cry aloud but rebuked Rebati day and night in anger. The neighbours and passers-by heard at all time, "Oh, Rebati, Oh, evil spirit — Oh, witch!"

Their four eyes met . . .

Her eye-sight had completely failed. She groped about the house and at last found Rebati. She called her and getting no reply she touched her body and felt the high temperature she was running. She found Rebati unconscious. She sat there and began to think. What should she do, whom should she call? She searched her little world in her own mind but found none near. Unable to decide anything she muttered in anger, "What's the remedy for that which is your own creation?" meaning that the fever was due to Rebati's learning and what she could do.

The first two days passed, the third and fourth days also passed, even the fifth day; Rebati had become only skin and bone. She could not open her eyes. She gave no response to gradma's call, not even a little sound did she make. It was the sixth day. Rebati had loudly groaned twice or thrice since morning. Grandma went to her and felt her hands and feet. They were icy cold. She only uttered, "Hum, Hum". She was staring with her big eyes and was delirious. Had any Kaviraj seen her at that time, he should have repeated some lines from his text books, "Thirst, temperature, delirium, sure signs of collapse." But grandma became somewhat jubilant. The temperature had gone down. Rebati could now speak which she could not for the last six days. She had opened her eyes which were closed. She wanted a drink of water which she had not taken on her tongue for the last six days. She would certainly get up if only a little food could be thrust into her.

"You better lie down and let me prepare your diet," said grandma and came out of the room.

How could she prepare the diet? She searched everywhere but there was not even a handful of rice in the house. She sighed and sat down for a while. Basu had purchased provisions for five days, and it was ten, eleven day now. If grandma had her eyesight all right, she could have understand. A way could be found out if one sat and thought over it. There were no utensils in the house. She could pick up only a leaking water pot. She started for Hari Shaw's shop with that.

Hari Shaw's house was in the middle of the village. He had no regular grocery but stocked rice, pulse, salt, oil etc. and if by chance some strangers came to the village they purchased these things from him. Occasionally, the villagers also purchased their immediate requirements from him.

Grandma arrived at Hari Shaw's place with the water pot. Hari Shaw could well guess the purpose of her visit by merely seeing that water pot in her hand. When grandma expressed her desire, Hari took the water pot from her and holding it in his own hand began to examine it from different angles. Then he said, "No, no, I haven't got any rice in my store. Moreover, who would give rice on the mortgage of this leaking water pot?" It was not a fact that he had no rice in his house. He was also agreeable to give it but tried to bargain for getting the water pot cheap.

It was a bolt from the blue when she heard that there was no rice. She thought, "What shall I do? The girl has recovered from fever, what shall I feed her?" She sat there for a while. It was dusk. She gazed at Hari and said, "Let me go and see what the girl is doing now." As she was getting up with the

MY GENIAL HOST

By SHEILA CHAUDHURI

MY host had been most cordial, might one add, almost too much so. It was this completely unexpected consideration on his part that left me so vulnerable. One is unused to kindness.

I was at that time a dramatist. I use the term loosely, there being but one successful production to my name. I had tried most forms of self-expression, a little acting, art, journalism etc., and yet I thought of myself as being neither a dilettante nor extrovert but rather a man of catholic interest.

I am an experienced man, one who is fully cognizant of those pretentious beings who cling to the fringes of the world of literature, misquoting and idealizing one's work. But I am neither that famous nor revolutionary in style to warrant such a parasitic growth. My plays are simple social dramas, such as are pleasing to our Bengali audience. There is nothing of a world-shattering nature about them. And to be quite frank, I myself tend to be a little nondescript.

I had met the man at a party. I had been away from Calcutta for quite a few years and had lost touch with everyone. I am still not quite sure as to why I was invited. It was one of those upper-strata affairs where every second person is a stranger. Being reserved by nature and knowing neither my host nor hostess, I retired to a corner—not too far from the bar—and tried to be as unobstrusive as possible.

Couples wriggled to modern music, glasses clinked with cubes of ice, others sat smoking or making abortive attempts to speak to some important personage who stood surrounded by the usual satellites. It was a mixed gathering. My one-time fellow journalists down from Delhi, film people from Bombay, air-hostesses and society women weighed down by towering coiffures while sporting such a range of international fashion that it became obvious as to who were their escorts. The poor fellows looked so miserable.

One of the ladies invited me to dance with her. I refused with as much grace as possible, shrinking away and lamely waving my untouched drink as an excuse. She flicked a strand of beads in my face and swayed her hips in farewell. Frankly those ultra-modern women frighten me. Later, I heard her recounting the incident to a friend with an enormous posterior. Both appeared delighted that I had behaved in so boorish a manner. A writer apparently can do no wrong.

He introduced himself as Basu. I believe he was the only other Bengali, besides myself, to be there that evening. We drifted together as people do when belonging to the same club or minority factor. Had we been dogs, we would no doubt have wagged our tails. After all the odds were overwhelming.

We agreed that the party was boring, but that the drink was good. At least, they had not yet switched over to local whiskey as is usually the case at those affairs. And after a few more pegs, which made a pleasant blur of everything, I found myself leaning owlishly on his shoulder babbling a great deal of philosophic nonsense while being sober enough to accept a dinner invitation for the following day. Afterwards, in retrospect, I blamed the drinks. For I rarely dine out, having a strange aversion to seeing other people eat.

He drove the car—a new Herald—carefully, gently easing it past the worst potholes which showed me that the roads had not improved during my absence. China Town was also much the same, queer little shops, narrow ill-lit streets and an abundance of garishly dressed women patiently waiting for their first customers.

We chose a restaurant which I had been to before and to my relief were able to obtain an empty cabin. He ordered the usual thing, chicken fried rice, mixed chow and prawns, also one or two of the more expensive dishes showing that he was not worried as to the bill. My head was still a little fuzzy from the effects of the night before, but I accepted the cold beer that was set before me. One so rarely has the chance of a free drink.

We spoke of the weather and compared our impressions of the Capital, ending with some rather vulgar jokes. You know the type of thing. But the conversation was somewhat desultory and we were glad to spoon our way through steaming bowls of sharks-fin soup. I have tried, but could not get used to chopsticks. A pity, for using western cutlery for an oriental dish does offend my aesthetic taste.

Basu was a heavily built man who perspired a great deal. The restaurant was old and had not installed air-conditioning, relying on heavy-duty fans and the open windows to provide such ventilation as was possible. His obvious discomfort made me wonder as to why he had not chosen to dine in Park Street, I had observed that a lot of new places had opened. But then, what did I know of the man?

He mentioned one or two of my articles which had recently appeared in our local newspapers, trifles of a political nature. Later, he also casually referred to a drama of mine which had enjoyed a certain renown. I was surprised by his interest. I, in turn, more out of politeness than anything else, ventured one or two remarks as to his mode of income.

He stared at me rather intently for a few minutes, as though weighing something in the balance, then murmured that he was in plastics but was thinking of retiring. My expression no doubt registered my surprise, for he could not have been much senior to my own, which was at that time, forty-three. I also wondered how he was managing to take such a step in those whittling days of super-tax.

He laughed, wiping a remnant of soup from his mouth with a napkin. It appeared that he had found a more profitable line of business which would take him out of Calcutta a great deal. (If only one were a mind-reader). He mentioned his manager as being unreliable. (For one indignant second I thought he was going to offer me a job). And he continued, saying, that under the circumstance he considered it prudent to resign from his present commitments and start afresh.

The rest of the meal was eaten in quiet companionship. The prawns were delicious. I am not unduly curious of my fellow men and know even less as to the world of business and so felt quite satisfied by his explanation. I rather chose to concentrate my attention upon the best cuisine I had eaten in weeks.

You will gather from this that my circumstances were far from stable. That is unfortunately true. After coming back to Calcutta, I had rented a modest flat in an unfashionable quarter of the City—one room with a shared bathroom—spacious enough for a bachelor, yet offensive to my sense of hygiene. Having arranged my few personal effects, I was only too glad to wander forth to re-discover old haunts. I believe I lived on little but my reputation as a playwright and past laurels. I was always able to persuade someone to stand me a cup of coffee.

We spoke of the weather and compared our impressions of the Capital.

Her eyes were doe-like in their softness.....

It would be, I suppose, about two weeks later that I met Basu again. It was a hot day and he looked as though he had reached boiling point as he hurried along mopping his perspiring brow, the briefcase tucked carefully under his arm, going towards the general direction of the United Bank. He seemed delighted to see me. I on my part felt quite flattered by his continued interest. My personality being such that it usually arouses little response after the first two or three meetings.

He commented upon my health, saying that I was looking tired—I had been suffering from a severe bout of bronchitis—and as to the progress of my work, ending a rather one-sided conversation by absolutely insisting that I should dine with him again on the following Tuesday. This time, however, in the intimacy of his home. He wished, he said, to introduce me to his wife and would brook no refusal.

Having reached him through the cool portals of the Bank, I plunged back into the heat again and was lucky to hail a passing taxi. The solitude of my flat held no pleasure for me that day and so stripping down, I took a shower and engrossed myself in a crime story.

I walked through the overgrowth of an informal garden, following a half-hearted path past a group of banana and palm trees. A family of monkeys gibbered insults from the safety of a high wall, while overhead a multitude of brilliantly feathered birds screeched and chirruped while bedding down for the night. The house was imposing with the charm of age upon it. It had not grown old but rather had mellowed with the passing years. The brickwork, weather-worn, to a subdued hue.

My host greeted me with his customary warmth and yet, a slight constraint of manner as though other affairs pressed for his early attention. His wife was young, surprisingly so, for she could not have been more than eighteen or twenty years. Her eyes were doe-like in their softness, her hair styled in an old-fashioned coil upon the nape of her neck. Her figure was as slender as the unopened bud of a flower. She had indeed captivated me. My eyes, throughout the evening, refused to obey my command but strayed of their own will towards her. If my host observed their partiality, he made no comment but continued to treat me as a very dear friend.

Before I took my leave, he informed me in the tone of one vaguely embarrassed, that he had to leave for Bombay the next evening, on business matters pertaining to his new venture. His wife, unfortunately, would have to remain behind and he wondered—knowing of course that it was a great imposition—as to whether I could drop by a few times to see that all was well.

This strange request should have warned me. For such is not our custom in a respectable Bengali family. A female relation would always be sent for during such an emergency and in any case why did the couple live alone? But I was a little too desirous to comply with his wishes. To see her again, so intimately, was more than I could hope for. He had indeed chosen his victim well.

But O, the irony of fate! At that same time, a film-director who I had spoken to at the party—a decent sort of chap—brought along a very famous actor-producer who said he was interested in one of my plays. After a preliminary reading, the great man coughed, then stared out of the window before turning round and asking me as to whether I would be prepared to make a few changes. Who, in my circumstances, would not?

And so I found myself laboriously adding a larger speech here, a shorter one there, until the actor thundered his chosen role into the ears of the next-door cat and pronounced himself satisfied. I slammed the door upon his back and promptly fell asleep, while her face drifted into my dreams like an unobtainable mirage.

It was on the ninth day that the letter arrived and having quickly read its purport, I sat in a state of absolute perplexity. She had written to tell me that she missed me. That she would take it kindly if I could visit her. She mentioned both a day and an hour for what she termed, our re-union.

I felt shattered. Was this the innocent citadel which I had thought to take by storm. She writing to me? I pondered over the matter, half-ruefully sensing that something was wrong. I was both impetuous enough to go and yet cautious enough to discuss my dilemma with someone else.

I chose for my confidante an experienced woman of my acquaintance, one who had appealed to me in my younger days. We had ended our relationship with few regrets on either side and had been lucky enough to remain close friends. She was one of the few people who had bothered to keep in touch with me while I was away.

We sat upon her verandah which overlooked the lakes of South Calcutta. Her bearer, a discreet presence in the background, kept our glasses refilled. Her face was of one who had rode most storms and has at last found a safe harbour for her emotions. She listened attentively, although obviously amused by my poetical ravings, so reminiscent of the youth I had been those many years ago. Afterwards, she lit a cigarette and sat staring thoughtfully into the night while she pieced together the broken fragments of my story.

"Is it blackmail?" she said at last. "Is the little one the bait and you the too hungry fish, while the fisherman holds out not a basket but a blank cheque? Or is it simply a matter of....commerce?" She reached over for the letter which lay on the glass top of a small wrought-iron table between us. Her eyes hardened and she shrugged, calmly tearing it into pieces. I sprung up, indignation rendering me speechless, but she patted my hand and forced me to reseat myself. She always had been a domineering woman.

"Do you really wish to know?" She inquired shrewdly. "Is it not better to leave things as they are?"

I sat for many hours, feeling for the first time since my return to Calcutta, relaxed. Later, I renewed that phase of our life which had fallen into disuse. Not, may I add, without a smile of complacence for my triumph over my unknown rival.

Circumstance, however, caught up with me in the end. I was entering the coolness of a popular cafe the other morning, quietly congratulating myself on the successful box-office of my new play, when a familiar figure seated in an alcove caught my attention. It was Basu, still as genial as ever, entertaining a young man whose face had appeared on most cinema hordings in Bengal. With them sat —but could it be she? Her hair was bobbed into the latest style, her legs encased into a pair of striped jeans, she looked a typical hopeful candidate for an acting career and suddenly I burst out laughing. People stared but I could not stop, the whole thing was too funny. I remembered his questions as to my play and to the fact of his observing me talking to that fellow from Bombay. Her rather theatrical simplicity at the house and the subsequent worried tone of the letter. Blackmail? Of course not. The poor girl had only wanted to become an actress

It was much later that I paused to wonder where his obvious wealth had come from. But then, did I really wish to know?

REBATI

water pot, Hari said, "Give it, give it to me and let me see what is there in my house."

Hari kept the water pot and gave her about two seers of rice, half a seer of pulses and a little salt. Granny reached home after taking rest at several places. Till then she had not brushed her teeth, what to speak of the conditions of her body and mind. After reaching home, she called Rebati. She believed that Rebati was all right. She thought Rebati would draw water from the well and she would cook. When Rebati did not reply she got angry and cried out, "Oh, Rebati, Oh, evil spirit, O witch—". Still there was no reply.

Rebati was collapsing rapidly. She was suffering an intense pain, her body was gradually getting cold. She felt as if her tongue was being drawn inside with great thirst. She wanted to go to a cool place and came out of the room by rolling over the floor but found no relief in that. She came to the back door and sat there on the verandah.

The day was running out and there was a strong breeze. She sat there leaning to the fence. She looked at the garden. She thought, "This plantain sucker was planted by father last year. It has flowered. That guava tree was transplanted by mother two years back on which she had poured water drawing it from the well herself. It is now in bloom." These reminded her of her parents. Her thoughts were incoherent, her mind was unsteady. She could not recall anything clearly. The happy image of her mother did not leave her mind.

It was already evening. Darkness emerged from under the trees and from behind the branches and filled the entire garden till nothing was visible. She looked up at the sky. The evening star was emitting its rays. Rebati gazed at the star without a wink. The size of the star was gradually getting big. It became like a wheel and still increased in size and became brighter. Alas, whose image was there in that star? The soothing, the loving, the happy, the fearless image of her mother was there calling her affectionately to return to her lap. Mother had stretched her two yearning hands towards her. Those rays of light touched her eyes and entered her heart.

In the darkness, there was no other sound except that of respiration. That sound became louder, turned to gasping and ended in an indistinct sound, "Mother, Mother." The garden became calm and quiet.

Grandma reached the place where Rebati was sleeping with much difficulty and found nobody there. Rebati was nowhere, not in the house, nor in the courtyard, nor in the paddy-husking shed. Grandma thought that she was cured of fever and she must be strolling in the garden. Again she uttered the same call, "Oh, Rebati, Oh, evil spirit, O witch—".

She went to the backdoor and groped her way to the verandah which was two cubits high from the ground and a cubit wide.

"Oh, you are sitting here?" But grandma was startled when she touched Rebati's body. She again felt Rebati's body with her hands from top to toe. She held her fingers under her nostrills and suddenly uttered a heart-rending cry. There was a thud under the verandah.

Nobody in the world has ever seen any living being of Shyambandhu Mohanty's house since that day. The neighbours had heard the last voice at night, "Oh, Rebati, Oh, evil spirit, Oh, witch!"

FOLK SONGS AND DANCES OF UTTAR PRADESH

By Projesh Banerji

THE intimate life of a people are expressed through its folk songs and folk dances. The flok-dances depend mainly on the themes described in the folk-songs, with the accompaniment of which the folk-dances are enacted.

The folk-songs and like-wise the folk-dances are greatly influenced by natural phenomena; more specially the composers of songs and the artists, being surrounded by nature, merge themselves with their thoughts and actions in the beauty of nature. So in their art, and especially in the songs there are descriptions of natural beauty, human beauty, beauty of the village belles, and their psychological effect on the human mind. Apart from the religious tinge, blind faith and superstition, the psychological aspect of the villagers, as a consequence of all the phases of nature, which is around them, plays a very important role. For example, the beloved looking at the clouds, is reminded of her husband, who has gone abroad, requests him to come back through her songs, and weeps.

Like all other Indian States Uttar Pradesh is a rich storehouse of folk-lores. The words of the songs bear the touch of the simplicity of the rural dialect, and at the same time their meaning is deep. No hard labour towards metrical arrangement is evinced. The compositions are effortless but captivating, sweet and devoid of any sophistication. The songs are overflowed with the spontaneous joy of the yokel, their customs, their thoughts and sentiments, their sorrows, habits and everyday occurrences. There is no mission nor poetic embellishments embedded in classical tunes. But on the other hand the innocence of rustic hearts is dormant under the musical scores.

The villagers sing not for name or fame or money, but being prompted by the inner joy and impulse of the heart. When they are engaged in harvesting, repairing the leaking roof or grinding corn, they sing to get relief from exhaustion and try to express their feelings of the particular moments through the medium of tuneful words.

Regarding the basic technique of the folk-songs, it can be said that the songs range within a span from 'Sa' to 'Pa', and do not go further up, they may come lower down to two notes at the most. The modern sophistication has allowed a longer range for such songs, but the original compositions, even the tunes on the flutes, have a restricted field, though they may seem monotonous or bring boredom to an unaccustomed ear.

Moreover, many classical tunes are based upon folk-tunes, especially the seasonal tunes. Indian classical music and also dancing is folk in content and form. Kajri has affinity with Megh and Malhar is to be sung during the rainy season. Some Viraha songs of separation have similarity with the pathetic tune of Behag. The attributes of caste, colour, time and season in classical music are to life and nature and are wholly folk in origin. They have a rural growth.

One must not, however, think of folk-music as a spontaneous and formless outpouring of the soul. It has laws and principles which are nonetheless positive, because they are unconsciously obeyed. A folk-song or folk-dance does not simply spring out of the void in response to some emotion. However much an individual folk-singer or folk-dancer may extemporize, he is in the main following certain patterns which have been established by tradition and which he has inherited by oral transmission.

A folk-song differs from an art song, not because it is artless, but because, instead of being the work of one individual, it is the product of many generations of singers who by trial and error have found the mode of expression best suited to the genius of the community. So in talking of folk-music we must distinguish between genuine folk-music and popular music. Folk-music has come down to us from the past, but keeps its freshness and vitality by constant variations to which it has been subjected during the course of oral transmission. Popular music, on the other hand, is the composition of an individual which strikes the popular imagination but only superficially, and being without roots, usually withers away soon after it appears.

Music educators can perform a very valuable service to the culture and well-being of their fellows by recognising the true nature of folk-music and by presenting it as a thing of intrinsic beauty which is worth cultivating for its own sake. Folk-music has its limitations; the best of it is comparable to the work of the great masters.

Unhappily, in most countries considered to be in the van of progress, folk-music has been almost forgotten and has been retained only by those country people who are the least affected by modern civilisation.

The question is, can folk-music act as a social binding force internationally as well as nationally? I think, it can, with the proviso that a person should have a thorough knowledge of the folk-music of his own country before attempting to understand that of other nations. He will then be in a position to appreciate the diversity which makes for unity, and will not merely be cultivating a cosmopolitan taste.

Those who attend the festivals which the International Folk Music Council holds every year in different parts of the world never fail to find that despite the great diversity of style, there are common themes which run through the dances of countries several thousand miles apart.

Actually it is not surprising because folk-dances the world over originated in the rituals which were once associated with religious beliefs common to all mankind. These beliefs have many different forms of expression but in the main they may all be summed up in man's desire.

Coming to the particular kinds of songs of Uttar Pradesh, the various districts of the State have their own seasonal songs, religious songs and songs of chivalry. Among the seasonal songs the most prevalent and well-known are Kajri, Saoni, Holi, Phagua, Alha, Viraha, Purvi, Daramasa etc. Holi and Phagua are the songs for Spring, Viraha, Purvi and Baramasa are the types of songs sung all through the year, but particular songs are meant for particular seasons mentioned in the songs themselves. Kajri, Jhula, Saoni and Alha are songs specially sung during the rainy season. Alha is the harbinger of rains and depicts the heroic deeds of the two brave brothers, Alha and Udal. During the drizzles one finds from every country cottage a dim oil lamp burning on the outer verandah and the farmer after his day's toil on the fields, snatching a few moments for his rest with his 'Hukka', stammeringly reciting Alha with a loud voice in harmony with the background strain of the buzzing grasshopper.

Then comes the lyrical Kajri or Kajli, a song mainly of pathos and separation. The Kajri songs, like Jhula or Viraha ones, deal with the sublime love episodes of Radha and Krishna. Though the songs depict the pangs of separation between a lover and the beloved the themes eventually merge into Radha-Krishna narratives. "Kajri" comes from the word "Kajal" (collyrium, Sanskrit—"Kajjwal"), or the black eye-salve used by Indian women. This signifies that when the women suffer from separation from their beloveds the black paint comes down with the flow of tears and they sing this particular song during that period. Though the Kajri songs are prevalent throughout the State of Uttar Pradesh, still Mirzapur and Varanasi are famous for such songs. The beloved has left the village for long and is not coming, or he is coming from foreign land, —these are the themes of such songs. The maidens also dance with the accompaniment of such songs.

The particular sentiment is expressed in the following song: "Saavan ki raaat ayee, Badara ghir ghir ayee, Ab Aajaa piya more ghar."

"The night of Sawan has come, the rain-clouds have also spread, my darling, come home."

With the onset of the monsoon the 'Jhula" season begins, bringing with it much beauty and joy. The cool showers from the east bring relief from the terrible summer heat and the 'Loo' wind. The "Jhula" (swing) songs, which the village women sing with much abandon, and dance with the accompaniment of such songs with ecstasy, during the rainy season, express vividly, the joy of this relief. While one group swings high and low, another merrily dancing on the freshly sprinkled earth sings of the vast field springing to new life, of the grass which daily becomes greener, and of corn fields which grow taller with every shower. The "Jhula" songs mostly convey the themes of Radha-Krishna "Jhulan", the divine couple swinging, of "Jhanki" ceremonies during the "Janmashtami" (the auspicious days during the birth day celebrations of Lord Krishna). The "Jhula" songs are prevalent in Mathura and Mirzapur districts.

In every part of the province one comes across the village maidens singing while repairing the leaking roof.

Just after the rains the farmer is very happy and dances singing songs on harvest.

Baramasa songs are sung throughout the year. They have subdivisions, such as "Chhamasa" (six monthly), "Charmasa" (four monthly) etc. They are sung to the accompaniment of Dholak, Kartal and Kansi.

With the birth of the child the village belles sing and dance in the house where the child is born and pray for its long life and prosperity. The songs and dances are commonly known as "Sohar."

Over and above these we have "Kanhaiya", "Lamtera" and "Rasiya", sung by the males and "Matapujan" and "Rachhre" sung by the females. Shringara Rasa is the main theme of the songs. A boy attired in Krishna's dress, holding a flute and standing in the common pose of Krishna (Tribhanga), slightly bends on his two sides, and a few male dancers dance around him in a ring and sing Krishna episodes. They sometimes have little sticks in both their hands. This is found in Mathura district.

Exquisite compositions depicting the love and the divine frolics of Shri Krishna can profusely be found in the repertoire of folk-songs. In addition to these there are a number of songs dealing with chivalrous themes. Peasants sing these songs during specific periods of the year after the day's toil. These are prevalent in Bundelkhand escpecially in Jhansi.

There is a special category of songs in Bundelkhand known as "Soura". These songs, prevalent mostly among the peasants, are usually invocations to the mother-earth. This specific thought concept may have evolved from the Vedic period when invocations were prayer songs. Bundelkhandi folk composers addressed the mother earth in a personal manner. One particular poet says that when she puts on Kajal and Sindur and also wears a yellow robe, the whole humanity looks at her with wonder. The particular song starts with the following line:

"Dharti Mata tene kajar dewe."

But truly speaking these songs should be classed under the category of "Doha", because they are couplets, and for their devotional concepts.

my CRITICS HERE & ABROAD

By Uday Sankar

I HAVE often been asked about my critics, specially press reporters, how they deal with my productions and shows. Whether they understand correctly what I intend to express is the question. But I admit, my critics are a wonderful lot. With regard to my endeavour to express some emotion or theme or any artistic message I am not clear about myself. I do not know what I do and I do not mind if I don't know it. Something comes spontaneously into me, there is an urge and I execute it in whatever way I can. I cannot explain why I exhibit it in a particular manner. So I can never accuse my critics of either any adverse criticism or pat him on the back for an inclination towards encomiums.

Regarding understanding an art element, to my mind, understanding is not so important as feeling. An artistic creation must vibrate within the hearts of the people in order to make it an object of universal appeal. In the case of understanding many barriers come in the way in the shape of highly scientific technicalities, and language difficulties. There may be other obstacles as well, for example, lack of thorough knowledge and study of history, culture, mythology, religion and the like. But there is no man made shackle in the case of psychology of feeling, which is a free gift of nature and through which man of every nationality comes closer and becomes intimate forgetting all feuds and differences.

So an artiste who is sanguine about the artistic quality of his productions, or in other words, about striking the tender chords of sentiments in the human hearts, does not care for any contrary comment. And if there is such a comment he must take it for granted that his production fails in its mission, and he tries to improve thereafter. A true artiste is aware that the human being is endowed with a feeling of appreciation of beauty and, of course, the skill to awaken that feeling depends upon the artiste himself. Critic or no critic, he works hard to create beauty, because he knows that only beauty can move the human feelings.

Now, talking of critics, whose feelings are moved or who proverbially have a keener sense of appreciation of beauty in movements and lines, I must unhesitatingly say that all of them, without any exception, yield to the common blunder of falling a prey to the ravishing nature of beauty. In dealing with the aesthetic aspect of any creation they are unanimous in their opinions.

The critics everywhere are always eager to probe into the depths of the mystery of Indian art and ask questions to quench their thirst regarding it. What I strongly feel is that among the Indian critics there is a drawback of looking into the art of their own country through western eyes. Indian pressmen are not to blame. Not only they, everyone of us is educated in the western and more particularly, in the Anglicised way, so our approach has become foreign. We make this mistake without knowing that it is a mistake. The Western approach to Indian art is excusable in the case of a westerner.

Coming to the most important factor of judging my creations by Indian and western critics, I have often deciphered, though through a sophisticated balanced scale, that the respective approaches are very subtle, but nonetheless interesting. An Indian critic, as he is well versed in, and is a part and parcel of Indian culture, history and mythology, is vehement about any lapse or misstatement on that score, if by chance he comes across such an omission or commission. Generally he does not lose his energy for the cultural aspect. Owing to the new trends and development in thought in the realm of Indian dancing and due to their swift evolution, the critics here are naturally swept away by their currents and undercurrents. The result is that a change in their outlook towards dancing is evinced. Their judgments are more towards the scientific side than towards the artistic value. They are now anxious for understanding a thing with a complete negation of feeling it. The technical aspect apart from showmanship interests them more. They may try to scrutinise at present the correct exhibition of Mudras with their appropriate applications and how far those Mudras are able to convey the unspoken language of the dancing item, or which part of it falls strictly under the respective categories of classical schools and which part under folk, and whether it is authentic or otherwise.

SUMMUM BONUM

A western critic would always adhere to the spirit of Indian dancing, to the sublime aspect of the creation, to its total effect and would seldom indulge in the intricacies of colour, decor or crude lights. To him the summum bonum is what it matters. I am not afraid of saying that sometimes they go beyond the conception of the Indian critics in matters of judgment.

A concrete example will clarify this statement of mine. Once it so happened that a young and interesting New York art critic of the "New York Herald Tribune", Mr. Walter Terry, came to see me at my New York hotel. Mr. S. Hurok, my impressario, asked me to go downstairs and meet the critic. Mr. Hurok warned me by saying that Terry was a very influential personality in the art world. I am habitually shy to meet people although I am not shy on the stage. So I showed reluctance, but on the persuasions of the impressario I had to go and meet the newspaperman. The reporter did not impress me at all. He had neither personality nor power of speech. However, Mr. Terry talked for a a few minutes and thereafter went away. While going away he presented me a book. I put it on my dressing table and did not like to go through it then. After lunch I was sitting near the same table and my glances were attracted towards the book, a big album sort of thing. I saw that on the cover of that book it was inscribed "Uday Shankar's Indra Dance". Naturally the title caught my notice and I eagerly turned the pages of the book. I saw to my amazement that on every page a painting design, a pattern has been drawn. I pondered over such madness of the eminent art critic and could eventually disclose the mystery with all admiration for the man.

I started my career as a painter. The background of my imaginations is a conglomeration of designs and patterns of oriental drawings and lines. In my dances also those lines spontaneously creep in and come into play. I execute the patterns of painting by means of movements. My dance movements depict lotuses, flowers, Chakra (wheel), hills, headgear, bows and arrows and series of Alpana designs. My Indra dance is a harmonious mixture of these designs of arrows, bows, flowers, thunder, lightning and the like. Even my group compositions are executions of designs in movements by a number of dancers. The art critic has analytically noticed this charm and novelty and executed the mystery on pieces of papers. I bow down before that scholar's keen perception.

I wonder at the immense scholarship of my critics, the newspapermen of this country and abroad, for the way they sympathetically nourish my creations, in the beautiful language they speak about them, which unfolds before me another type of dancing beauty, a different type but more ravishing, passionate and charming than my own art.

The critics are themselves dance experts, otherwise it becomes difficult for a novice to dissect the beauty, to realise it and then to convey to the common man. I owe my gratitude to my critics.

FOLK SONGS & DANCES OF UTTAR PRADESH

numerous variations found a place in the repertoire of Bundelkahandi folk-songs. The strain of thought incorporated in the song,

"Umariya Saari Biti Jai, Baalam ub tak nahin aai," is not very difficult to understand. The effects of these songs are specially felt during the spring season when the mind longs to have the company of the beloved.

'Kajaliya' is a distinct variety of the repertoire of Bundelkhandi folk-songs. After the termination of Navaratri, the women-folk assemble and place flat urns filled up with new corns on their heads and sing songs swinging their bodies to and fro. The songs usually start with the catching phrase "Meri Maiya."

Another variety known as "Mamuliya" with its supplementary species "Suata" are exclusive specimens of ceremonial songs.

Viraha songs are mistakenly called songs of separation ("Viraha"). The word is not derived from the word meaning separation. But from the word "Rahi" (traveller). The villagers traverse long distances, from one place to another, and in order to get relief from exhaustion as a result of walking, and also to pass the time they sing these songs. The songs generally lack the sentiment of separation, and the tremolo sound at the end of every strain brings to memory the regular and measured movement of the palanquin bearers while carrying the heavy load.

The different races of Uttar Pradesh have their separate kinds of Viraha, as Ahir Viraha (of milkmen), Kahar Viraha (of palanquin bearers), Dhobi Viraha (of washermen) etc. Formerly the members of the K har caste were originally Palanquin bearers, but with the flow of time and other types of carriages taking place the palanquins lost their use, and by and by the Kahars have taken to the task of menial servants. But they still have retained their characteristic tribal Virahas.

The Ahir Virahas are very rich in ideas, expressions and emotions of bravery, as the race is noted for chivalry. According to the mythological legend they fought against Arjuna, while he was carrying away their daughter Subhadra, the sister of Krishna.

Every race has Virahas to be sung in the rainy season. Either they are sung solo or in a chorus. The whole of the province abounds in Viraha songs, but the most famous ones belong to Moghulsarai and Sarnath. Sarju Sayar and Chhedi Ahir of Sarnath and Moghulsarai respectively are the most famous Viraha, composers. Pieces of Viraha songs, either couplets, or quartrains, are known as "Latka", and Sulema Ki Latka are very popular amongst the rural population, "Sulema" being the pseudonym of Chhedi Ahir.

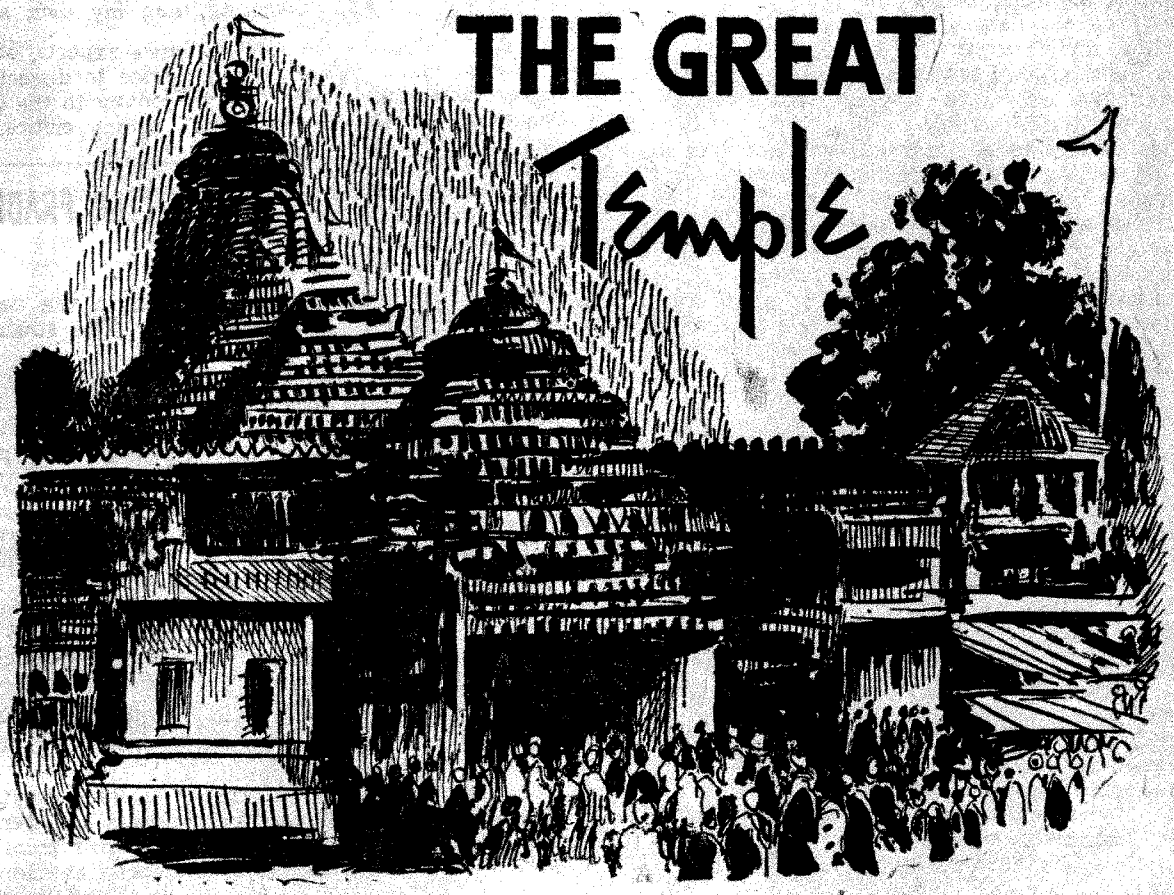
THE GREAT Temple



By SHEILA CHATTERJEE

RAMGOVIND was head priest of the Great Temple of Vishnu. He was slim and slightly built, with a gentle timid expression. At twenty three he looked seventeen. His office was hereditary. Of rights he was honoured by all the countless other priests of the Great Temple. Ramgovind was shy and self-effacing. He avoided meeting people, except when he took around pilgrims, whose ancestral names had been written down in the fat record books of his ancestors. They were his responsibility.

It was his honoured duty to open the massive silver gates of the sanctum at hazy dawn.

The moon was still seen, pale in the sky. In the horizon, the darkness of night had faded a little. Scores of singers sat in a double row, in the main audience hall before the sanctum. They sang hymns in Sanskrit to awaken Vishnu, as was done in ancient days to awaken a king. Their ritual besides the intricacies of worship preserved much of the court ettiquete of Hindu kings of the classic age. For Vishnu was worshipped in the great temple as emperor of the world. The enormous temple was a fort, encircled five times by giant stone walls. Within were many buildings, orchards, gardens, reservoirs and smaller temples scattered about the main temple of Vishnu.

Ramgovind was at his prayers for an hour before he came to the temple. He had prayed to the formless one. He was a scholar, learned in the philosophy of the Vedantas. As he faced the image of the four armed Vishnu, the formless infinity poured itself into the splendid form before him. Vishnu was the Hindu conception of God's endless energy in His aspect as Preserver. The deity was dressed in flowers, as when symbolically put to sleep amidst prayers and soft music, after a dawn to midnight ceaseless ritual worship. Few were in the temple then. Ramgovind liked this dawn of peace. The flutes of the "Sehnai" players welcomed dawn. Ramgovind bowed, stretching himself face downwards on the worn out stone floor of the sanctum. It seemed to him that the large eyed golden Vishnu looked down upon him and smiled faintly in recognition. Ramgovind was very devout. He kept his spiritual experiences to himself. There were cynical elderly money-making priests who laughed at him behind his back.

With the first pink of dawn the Great Temple was silhouetted against the sky. Red silk pennants flew from the massive golden spire. The temple was fabulously rich, built no one knew exactly by which king. Through time, Hindu rulers and merchants had added to its grandeur. Sometimes a fanatic iconoclast of another faith zealously came to destroy the temple, set fire to it, and loot the collected wealth. The Great Temple was too enormous to be destroyed. Exquisite carvings were effaced. Faultlessly beautiful heavenly nymphs had their noses cut off, their supple fingers broken. Yet they remained beautiful. The gold stripped spire had another plate of glittering metal put on. The priests always hid the image of Vishnu in secret underground vaults before the destroyers came and left in its place a gilded wooden idol, which was desecrated and hacked to pieces or burnt. When calm returned the golden image of the life sized Vishnu reappeared, wearing his diamond jewellery and pearl necklaces. Underneath the gold was a lovely stone image carved by an artist called Jayabrata. This information was inscribed in ancient script, on one of the stone pillars of the main audience hall.

Ramgovind stood on the paved stone terrace which surrounded the main temple. He marvelled always at the work of the forgotten artist Jayabrata. As a scholar Ramgovind went around the Great Temple reading inscriptions which recorded the gifts of king and subjects. Time was frozen in one mass, in layers seen easily imposed, one upon another. The time that was present was seen only in electric lights which had crept in, up to the main audience hall. The sanctum was still lit by brass lamps and torches held aloft by junior priests of a lower order.

There was an old Brahmin, white bearded, a top knot of loosely tied struggling white hair on his head. He looked regal. No one knew who he was or from where he had come. From midnight he sat outside on the terrace, resting his back against the temple. He read the Gita, the holy book of wisdom. He finished reading at dawn. When the silver doors were opened he came in and said his morning prayers, twining his sacred thread round one thumb.....

"A rich party of pilgrims arrived last evening of the house of Negi Pal. At least five widows in their party", said Kishanlal, an assistant of Ramgovind. There were many Brahmins to help Ramgovind show around the pilgrims. For this they got money. Kishanlal was poor and ill-educated. Ramgovind sighed, he smiled with understanding. Wisdom had erased in him the love of money or material gains. But the majority of people he knew were still in bondage to their unilluminated ignorance. "Have you looked after them well? Negi Pal's family has been in our record book for many generations. See that they are properly housed and fed". "They are in Lachmipati's pilgrim house. Guni Pal, the head of the family has come himself. He gave me five rupees just for showing him the Dharamsala. He has money to throw away." Kishanlal crowed with pleasure. He had a long bony face, with big teeth, stained brown by betel juice. Ramgovind could not be impolite to any one. It was against his nature. So he had to listen to Kishanlal's money talk. A few barefooted pilgrims began coming in One of them paused to touch his feet. Ramgovind escaped Kishanlal when he showed the pilgrims into the sanctum.....

Intricately carved ivory beds with Benares brocade covers were carried out of the sanctum. Vishnu and his Goddess Laxmi had awaken. Pilgrims filled the dimly lit stone sanctum. Priests sat in a row to perform morning worship, bathing Vishnu in his reflection on a golden metal mirror. They poured over the reflection milk and honey and water from the seven holy rivers with roses floating. Pilgrims stretched out eager cupped hands for the perfumed water of the symbolic bath. This they drank and smeared over face and head.

Then the temple door of the inner sanctum was closed again. Ramgovind was there, with three high priests who changed the simple white muslin bath robes of Vishnu for green and gold silks and fabulous jewellery. With the crowd of suffocating people gone Ramgovind lost his bearings and was in a trance of worship. He did not know what he worshipped, the divine in the flickering dancing flames of the brass lamps, as his earliest ancestors had done, or the glory within him, or the golden four armed image, decorated now like an emperor.

"We have to suffer for our deeds..,....."

When the door was reopened no one was allowed in the sanctum but watched from the main audience hall. Lines of cooks, who were also Brahmin priests, hurried in carrying huge platters loaded with food. They were pale brown, bare bodies, sweating men, dhotis tucked up above the knees for brisk movement, a piece of cloth covering their mouths. They chanted prayers as they came in. It was like the hum of a bee hive. They had brought Vishnu his breakfast of fruits and milk-made sweetmeats and fried flour and coconut sweets of countless varieties, and earthen pitchers of curds set at night. Ramgovind sat in the centre of the sanctum and offered this food, the essence of the food, in man's wish to do homage to Vishnu. He scattered flower petals on the offered food. The row of Brahmin cooks came in again and hurriedly carried the food offerings away. To be kept in a separate building, where part of it would be distributed to pilgrims and part sold to them. Another set of cooks got busy making the pre-lunch repast. They had a large building to themselves as kitchen.....

Ramgovind got up, and stretched his arms. He realised that he felt hungry. He wanted a cup of tea made by his wife, a pretty young girl who loved him deeply and yet was in awe of him, due to his scholarship and wisdom. His house was a small brick building in a narrow lane which branched out from the Great Temple. Kishanlal met him midway with a group of pilgrims. "Here they are, of Negi Pal's honoured house. We were going to you. They want the dust of your feet in worship and correct devotion. You can all bow down to him here now. This is the head of the house, Sriman Guni Pal." A fair, pock marked, short gentleman came forward. He had grey hair, a handsome face, stamped with the weakness and decay of a spent line of decadent noblemen. Beggars teemed about the Great Temple. A leper woman, with stumps of feet bandaged in rags, asked for alms, stretching two fingers of a festering hand from which the other fingers had rotted away. Ramgovind knew her. She was Mani, a blacksmith's wife, before she was driven out of home due to this illness. Guni Pal barked at her and asked her to get away, with needless abuse. Ramgovind had taken out some coins from the waist folds of his tussore silk dhoti. He never met a beggar without giving alms. Frightened by the abuse Mani hobbled away. Ramgovind said curtly, "I will meet you all at the temple for evening "Arati". I am going home now." "Thakur is never like this. What made him cross ?" said Kishanlal.....

Stars were strewn across the dark sky. Pilgrims came in dense crowds for evening worship. They came with offerings of flower garlands wrapped in banana leaves. Bright hand woven cotton skirts of silver ornamented peasant women mingled with costly silks and diamonds of the rich. Everyone pushed and shoved. Priests elbowed their way through crowds, guiding their own group of pilgrims. The temple was decorated with a myriad oil lamps. A tall gold plated, brass flag pole stood before the main temple. It had lamp sockets set in ornate discs, which went all the way up till they met the crouching "Garuda" crest. The Garuda, a mythical being, half man, half winger bird crouched, hands folded, facing the sanctum of Vishnu. The smell of close packed human bodies mingled with flowers and incense, sandalwood paste and burning oil lamps. The terrace was crowded with men who sat and recited from holy books or sang devotional songs. Each one had an admiring audience. Pilgrims had to circle round these islands of people.

Ramgovind was in the sanctum when Vishnu's afternoon clothes were changed for the most gorgeous gold-woven red brocades and jewelled crown. There were wide diamond anklets on Vishnu's feet. The idol was dimly seen through incense smoke and burning torches. A pair of big uncut diamonds glittered, set in the centre of Vishnu's large oblong eyes. Handsome priests of the highest order prepared the tiered brass lamps and camphor stands needed for the evening worship. Ramgovind stood with eyes closed, mind turned within, waiting to perform the "Arati". Kishanlal touched his shoulder lightly. "Guni Pal is here. Meet him after the worship". Guni Pal stood flattened against the sanctum wall. A few people were brought in by priests for they got paid handsomely for this.

Ramgovind took an hour to wave the many branched hundred wick lamps, the yak tail fly whisk, water filled conch, flowers and mirror and burning camphor in adoration before Vishnu. During this "Arati" ceremony the "Sehnai" played a gay tune. Conches blew, cymbals clashed and temple drums beat to a crescendo, drowning out the bell which Ramgovind tinkled in his left hand. Temple elephants came and stood in the main audience hall, raising decorated trunks in salute. Sweat trickled down Ramgovind's face, leaving wet patches on his cream silk dhoti. He forgot the world. He was in an ecstacy of happiness. The spluttering torches, the lamps, the diamond set gold face of the idol all blended together and faded out before the great glory in Ramgovind's heart.....

When the ritual worship was over, Ramgovind slumped tired on the marble steps of the main temple. Guni Pal touched his feet and sat down next to him. "Thakur, I am in trouble. That is why I came here. Vishnu has given me bad luck. My son is born sickly and deformed. He is getting ill and weak for no reason." Ramgovind stared at the dissipated face of Guni Pal and said nothing. "I want to offer prayers on a big scale. I will spend much money. One thousand and one rupees for the worship and then at your feet I will place hundred rupee notes. This son is my only heir."

Ramgovind was moved automatically to pity. He touched Guni Pal's head and said, "We have to suffer for our deeds. How can we blame Vishnu for that? Money cannot wash off the black stain of our own evil deeds. Only suffering and tears of conscious repentance can."

"Many people have reported miraculous recovery from illness when they came to worship at this Great Temple. If you spend with a large heart, of course your prayers will be answered," Kishanlal said, scared that his unpractical head priest would drive away this rich man.

"They who recovered had faith", Ramgovind said simply. "Money can not buy faith. It is something that is within. It is the rarest of blessings."

"The doctors say my son cannot live."

"Death comes to all, sooner or later. Prepare yourself to have courage," murmured Ramgovind.

Kishanlal laughed, a dry faked laugh. "You must plead properly, so that Thakur can have mercy on you and pray for the recovery of your son. Our Thakur is blameless, all his prayers are answered."

Ramgovind looked at Kishanlal with shocked eyes. "I never pray to ask for anything. That is desire. I am a Brahmin, by the grace of Vishnu I have achieved freedom from desire. There is great good in all the ever changing phenomena of life. Accept life and death equally as blessings."

"Then I would have become a monk", Guni Pal said exasperated. "I came to you for our family is in your list of devotees. I think I will go to another Pandit, more kind and sensible."

Kishanlal stood fuming with anger, as he saw Guni Pal walk off. "I too am a Brahmin. I need to fill my unlettered belly. See what you have done!"

Ramgovind smiled. "Some day perhaps Vishnu will make you a true Brahmin. Then you will be grateful to me for showing you the correct way."

"Thakur, you do not understand the needs of ordinary human beings."

"I don't?" Ramgovind looked at the stars in the sky and soon got absorbed in studying the constellations. This was another branch of ancient learning which he had imbibed. Bright stars dazzled like the diamond eyes of the golden Vishnu. Silk pennants flapped and fluttered in the evening breeze, on top of the towering spire of the Great Temple.

THE BURGLAR

By JATISH BOSE

ARUN got a telegram in the evening.

It ran thus: "Strange burglary in the house. Come immediately".

The words of the wire amazed Arun. What it meant by 'strange'. Surely, his father, who had wired him, knew that Arun would be off his guard by the word 'strange'. He had been all his life a teacher of English and was perfectly at home with words that might carry men off their feet.

It was about sunset. The golden hue of the setting sun could hold no charm for him. Instead he pondered and pondered over a cup of tea where his immediate task lay.

Not long after he made up his mind and immediately wrote a letter to his boss informing him of a week's absence.

Arun started for his village home by the night train. His mess-mates kept on wondering but Arun kept mum over his sudden departure.

A twelve-hour journey by train and the last two hours had to be covered by boat. The sun was blazing in full fury when he got down from the boat. Half a mile's walk and Arun reached his village.

* * * * *

A year ago Arun married Sita. She was a pretty girl. Unsophisticated, brought up far away from the influence of rouge-lipstick-society girls, she kept an abiding faith in rural scenic beauty and its evergreen freshness.

Arun's father, Harish Bose, was not very well-off. A graduate of nineties of the last century he was a man of strict principles and he chose teaching as the profession of his life.

His house portrayed the man he was. Simple and clean to the core, it shunned all artificial gaudiness. All the rooms had mud-built floors hedged around by corrugated sheets and the same metallic content on the roof-tops. The outer one, which housed him, and a bit spacious, had in it some old chairs and a table, a poor apology for modern costly furniture.

—Arun, Harish Babu called his son aside, you need not worry about the valuables. They are not even touched. But what strikes me is the burglar's choice of things.....

Arun looked rather bewildered and stood motionless gazing with vacant eyes at his father.

—Two portraits of Sita, one, a nice pre-marital oilpainting that was hung in her bedroom, and two of her favourite sarees have been burgled, Arun's father said.

—The night was dark and heavens opened to send down rain in torrents. Burglary that night connoted a great suffering for the burglar himself.

—Sita had Anuradha, your sister, as her companion in bed that night. As the night temperature sufficiently came down due to the showers, they lay in slumber like people struck violently by thrombosis.

—It was not till the next morning that we could detect it. A gaping hole in the mud wall first attracted your mother's attention.

—The police were informed, they held on-the-spot investigation, put searching questions to some of us, but no clue had yet been found. They wondered at the strange methods of the burglars.

* * * *

—Sita, Arun asked his lovingly youthful wife, did neither of you, Anuradha or you, get any slight sound on that fateful night ?

—No. Sita looked through her big black eyes to her husband.

She was looking enchanting, vivacious in her fully-bloomed youth.

It was dead of night, but the night was lovely. The bright fortnight of the waxing moon had begun. The village was 'dead', all enjoying the sweet slumber, that was generally associated with the new moon.

Married a year ago, Arun had little occasion to be intimate with his wife. He had to leave her behind on the sixth day after his marriage.

This was the second time he was meeting her. Arun looked intently at his wife. A girl so innately simple and charming could not but be pure and virtuous.

—Sita, burglaries are not uncommon in villages. But this one strikes me as something unusual. Arun had a touch of mellowness in his voice.

Sita had full vision of Arun's eyes. Those were the looks of affection and entreaty.

She moved closer to her husband. She realised that he was being tormented by some mental anguish.

—Sita, Arun said, more sweetly, I am fortunate in having you as my wife. May I, without hurting you, ask you a question ?

Sita nodded in full consent.

—Can you throw any light on the burglary ? I have a nagging suspicion that the burglar might be a known man, having some fond link with the articles burgled.

Sita too had that suspicion. Could it be he ? Memories of those days were still fresh in her mind. She strove hard to forget them, things that were beyond her reach, things that would always remain a dream to her.....could not Almighty give her power to bury those thoughts in dark oblivion ?

Tears rolled down her cheeks as those memories flashed in her mind.

Oh, no, she must make a clean breast of everything to her husband. It could not be otherwise....'

Arun was hurt. Had he done anything to wound her feelings ?

—Sita, he enquired pleadingly, why are you weeping ? Have I been very much rude to you?

—Oh, no, Sita replied in sobs, I am in great ferment. I shall have no peace of mind until I tear the pages of my early life to you.

* * * *

Several years ago. A boy and a girl were playing in a mango-grove. They had several playthings before them, dolls, trifles and crockery. The boy being senior to the girl by about five years, was directing the frolicsome operations.

—Sita, the boy cried out, you need not go home early to-day. Your father is out in the town. Besides we have a long series of rituals to go through as the dolls are just married.

Sita, looked at the boy's face.

—But if mother takes me to task.

—No, no, she will not. I will accompany you to your house. She likes me, she wants me to grow a big man.....

* * * *

A prosperous village. Haridhan Guha and Nirmal Mukherji were neighbours. Both of them

Tears rolled down her cheeks as those memories flashed in her mind.

were well-to-do, having inherited vast ancestral properties. Animosity or rancour never vitiated their breasts, probably because they were not of the same caste. Nirmal Mookherji had two brilliant sons in Subhankar and Dipankar. Of them Dipankar was more meritorious. After his noted academic career Subhankar was well placed in life having been in the Judicial Service. Dipankar won a scholarship in the School Final examination and was a student in a Calcutta college.

Haridhan Guha, on the other hand, was the proud father of two lovely girls, Sati and Sita. Sati had been married, her beauty providing her with a worthy husband.

The family-intimacy had its repercussions. Dipankar and Sita had been playmates in their childhood and as they grew in years this childhood friendship grew into intimacy. But this evaded the suspicion of the elders.

—Sita, Dipu in an imploring tone would say, do you not feel for me when I remain in Calcutta?

Sita suppressed her sigh. She had no answer to this vexed question.

She thought of their childhood days, those days when they relished the little green mangoes and swam in ponds in competition, oblivious of everything.

What pleasure they derived in roaming about in the gardens and running in the fields ?

Sita often asked :—Dipuda, will that day not be a great event for us when the University will shower the highest laurels on you and you become a great son of India?

Dipu replied : But who will be the happier on that day, I or you ?

Sita blushed : Certainly I.

Dipu knew it and felt this in his heart of hearts.

And he did not belie Sita's or his elders' expections.

He took a first in both B.A. and M.A. in English.

Sita had by this time grown to be a lovely girl with a sweet nature.

She shuddered when Dipankar's words flashed back to her memory.

—Sita, what will happen if we become separated for ever.....

Sita knew that caste stood as a formidable rock between them. Both of them came of conservative families where things had been going on in the same fashion since the days of yore. The vast changes that had been sweeping the country had little impact on the villages. Dipuda might be right when he said that everybody must move with the times but could she move on ? Could she defy her parents and the village society ?.....

Dipu did not lose heart. He could not imagine a life without Sita. He failed to take into account the fact, that women were often shy and coy ; they would break their hearts but would not open their mouth in revolt.

Dipu preferred to wait and watch. Meanwhile he got a State scholarship for two years for a doctorate degree of a foreign university.

An ambitious youth, an eager devotee in the pursuit of knowledge he saw in it a ray of light. He might build up a promising career for himself which might crash the barriers that surrounded them.

One sunny morning he took leave of all his near and dear ones in his village home and started for London to have a doctorate there.

* * * *

More than a year had rolled by. Unsuspectingly, Sita's father was in search of a suitable match for her.

About six miles away from their village Haridhan Babu finally chose Arun as his prospective son-in-law.

He did not come of a well-to-do family but what led to Haridhan Babu's final selection of him was his intelligence, education, good physique and features. It did not take long for a promising youth to prosper, he thought. Sita could not open her mouth though her heart broke in agony and remorse.

Sita was given in marriage to Arun and Dipankar remained in the dark all about it.

* * * *

The night was pitch dark. Rain fell in torrents. The village roads became slushy. It was sheer madness to come out in the open that night.

But Nature's fury was no barrier for a man who lost his mental equilibrium. He could brave anything. Scorning at the elemental unrest a man was seen rushing forth through these muddy roads with a shovel in one hand and a torch in the other. From his looks and gait he did not seem to be a man of the lower strata. But he was in great mental torpor, something had struck him to put his mind out of commission.

He was walking at a brisk pace. He would have to cover a great distance to carry out his mission and that before the dawn broke out. It was long past midnight when he reached the outskirts of a village. He had earlier in the day visited the village and the house of his 'mission' incognito.

He was dead tired. Rain drops blurred his vision but he was as determined as a wounded tiger to pounce upon the shikari. He must do his work in silence. With the shovel in hand he advanced towards the house and the room where lay in deep slumber his precious treasure.

The shovel worked on and on inside the earth until there was a big cavity. He was calm and serene from the rude shock he received on coming home after his long absence abroad.

Unaccustomed as he was he got in with difficulty through the cavity. For a moment he got back his former self, he flashed the torch across the room, saw the treasure of his life, took the photographs and sarees and then disappeared in darkness.

* * * *

Some time after Arun got a letter in his mess. It was written by an unknown hand. It ran thus :

Arun Babu,

I am a stranger to you but not to your wife, Sita. You have robbed me of the most valuable treasure of my life and in return I have taken away some trifles. I need these to sustain my life. May God keep both of you in happiness.

—Dipankar

"To die, to sleep,
And perchance to dream . . ."

ACT ONE

SCENE ONE

ASHA CHOUDHURY'S rented house is situated in a lonely spot in Calcutta, which cannot be perceived unless seen. If one walks some good distance along one of the two parallel roads opposite to the cricket ground in Ballygunge, one would reach an open ground. Although the asphalt road ends here, there is an improvised path through this space, which people use as a short-cut. Cars too utilise this way to travel easily to and fro. Washermen dry their clothes in this open ground, where also the children of the locality play. There is just one rented house on the other side of this ground, that of Asha Choudhury.

The play starts, progresses and ends in the front room of this house. Fine taste is discernible in the arrangement of the articles in the room: The window at the back and the two doors on the sides of the stage are provided with curtains. A light is hanging right in the middle of the room. A low big-sized divan is on the right side with pillows and cylindrical cushions, which is used for sitting as well as lying down. The pillow covers are of Shantineketan designs. A low sofa set is placed opposite the divan, with a flower vase on the centre table. Two hillscape paintings adorn the room. There is a book-shelf adjoining the left wall. At the other end is a chair, with a tall lamp-stand nearby, which affords comfortable reading. There is an almirah with drawers at the back wall, providing safe keeping of important papers. The floor is covered with a carpet. This room occupies four-fifths of the stage, while the balance shows the street by the side of the house with a gas lamp post at the further end of the street corner. Asha Choudhury's outer door stands in a slanting position, opening to the street, so that no inconvenience is felt to have the view on either side of the door.

Before the curtain rises, a lady's shriek is heard "Save me, save me, oh, I'm dead", which is immediately followed by a male voice, "Who's there? What's the matter"? The curtain rises.

The electric lamp in the middle of the room is swinging. In the dark room a lady is lying down, panting, and an excited gentleman is coming forward in the street outside from the direction of the lamp post. He is Prof. DEBABRATA GHOSH, aged thirty-six, well-built and bespectacled, and dressed in a dhoti, punjabi, shoes, with a lot of books in one hand and an umbrella in the other.

Realising that the woman's scream has come from within, Debabrata rushes forward and knocks at the door. He leaves the books and umbrella near the door, and goes to the back of the house, visibly disturbed. His knocks on the window, as he calls out to open up, are distinctly heard.

Then Debabrata himself opens the window and enters the room. The light above continues to swing. He advances towards the sofa set, to find Asha Choudhury lying unconscious; he gets startled and steps aside. He goes to the door leading to the interior and cries out "Is anybody in?" There being no response, he comes back, and approaches Asha Choudhury once again. The swinging of the electric lamp gradually slows down. Slowly he lifts Asha and places her on the divan. He finds a thin rope with a noose at one end on the ground, which he picks up. He then looks up to find another thin rope hanging from the rafter. A stool lies on its side on the ground. There is a letter on the table, which he picks up, reads and puts back. He brings water from a jug in the corner and sprinkles it on her face. He suddenly dashes into the street after opening the outer door, and comes back finding nobody there. Now he does not bolt the door, but keeps it closed.

ASHA : (Groans).
DEBA: (Approaches her) Does it pain?
ASHA: (Nodding) Yes.
DEBA: Where?
ASHA: (Groans again and points at her leg).
DEBA: Your leg! How did you get hurt?
ASHA: (Pause) Where am I?
DEBA: In your own house.
ASHA: House?
DEBA: Yes.
ASHA: Then—
DEBA: You haven't died.
ASHA: Oh! (Sighs deeply) Couldn't do it.
DEBA: No. (Pause) I have read your letter. You wanted to commit suicide, but fate was against you. That's why the cord snapped and bounced you back to life.
ASHA: (Sits up) Who are you?
DEBA: I'm just an ordinary man.
ASHA: Here?
DEBA: You mean how I came here? (Goes to the window) Through this window. It's all quite simple, you know. I was just passing this way after my tuitions. When I reached your house, I heard you screaming—"Save me, save me....."
ASHA: Dont tell me I screamed!
DEBA: Why, you don't believe it? I say, anybody would do it when scared.
ASHA: I wasn't scared.
DEBA: Do you think it's so simple as that? I have seen old hags of eighty. So unwilling to die. A professional murderer is mortally afraid of his own death. Anybody would get the creeps at the very thought of death. Of course, you may be different. (Smiles). Tell me honestly, did you wish to die at all?
ASHA: What do you mean?
DEBA: If you really meant to kill yourself, you would have certainly taken strong rope and not a cord like this. See, I can break it with my hands. (Breaks the cord). After all, you can't forget your weight.
ASHA: Please stop it, for Heaven's sake. (Pause). I fixed up everything and was about to put my neck in the noose. Then the stool slipped. The cord in my hand broke and I fell to the ground. What a shame!
DEBA: What's there to be ashamed of? Don't you remember Bankim's Saivalini? She couldn't die. Pratap dipped twice in water, and Saivalini swam ashore. Fear of death had become her tragedy.
ASHA: My tragedy is also there perhaps. I could'nt get any peace in life, and—DEBA: Who can assure of peace after death?
To die, to sleep,
And perchance to dream
Ah, there's the rub.
Hamlet too failed to die out of his fear,
ASHA: I think you read much.
DEBA: Yes, that's my profession—to read and to teach.
ASHA: Oh! (Sits up, with legs hanging down). Asha Choudhury looks much younger despite her thirtyfive years, and is quite attractive in a matching dress. She is now wearing an old plain sari and a blouse, and her hair is plaited. (Debabrata smiles)
ASHA: What's the matter?
DEBA: If you don't mind—?
ASHA: Not at all.
DEBA: Now you feel yourself a perfect fool, don't you? You prepared a definite plan for your final exit from the world by defeating your conscience, leaving a parting letter to whom it may concern, and probably even shedding a tear or two for your near and dear ones, but unfortunately the cord betrayed you.
ASHA: No jokes, please. Of course I've already become a laughing stock, and don't care for it now.
DEBA: Don't get excited. Really it beats my imagination about your being so dramatic regarding this affair.
ASHA: I don't follow.
DEBA: You could have taken poison. There are splendid ones, you know. Just put a drop on your tongue, and you won't have time even to turn your head.
ASHA: Where do you get them?
DEBA: How do I know? I've never attempted suicide.

I wish you won't mention this incident . . . . .

ASHA: Do you think it's so easy? I've tried my best, but failed miserably.
DEBA: Oh, forget it....Is there anybody else in this house?
ASHA: No.
DEBA: Excuse me for a personal question. Are you married?
ASHA: Yes.
DEBA: Your husband—
ASHA: —is alive, but not here.
Deba: I see. (Pause). Any relatives?
ASHA: They can't stand my sight.
DEBA: Oh (Pause). Then you are alone here?
ASHA: (With a pale smile) Absolutely. (Strokes her foot). Oh, God!
DEBA: Does it still pain you?
ASHA: Yes.
DEBA: Why don't you apply some medicine? There's nothing to be shy about. So long as you are alive, you have got to take care of your body. By the by, if you happen to consult a doctor, what story would you tell?.....Let me see, get up from there.

He holds her and makes her stand up.

ASHA: You bother too much!
DEBA: (Laughs loudly) My students feel the same about me. Nobody can bluff me in work. I insist on finishing the task at one stroke, and particularly students like you—

Asha goes to the table and takes her letter.

ASHA: Not me. I am past that age.
DEBA: How old are you? Twenty eight?
ASHA: Your guess is short by seven years.
DEBA: Oh, thirtyfive then? Doesn't matter. I am one year older than you. For the last thirteen years I've been teaching, and there are several girls of your age.

Asha tidies up the room.

DEBA: Why don't you drink something hot? It'll do you good.
ASHA: Let me see if I can make some tea.

Asha takes a few things and goes inside, Debabrata gets his books and umbrella from outside and talks loudly.

DEBA: This seems to be quite a solitary place. Don't you feel lonely here? What if a robber attacks you? No one would hear your screams even. It's indeed a pity having nobody to look after.

Debabrata turns the pages of a book, Asha enters a little later.

ASHA: I have a request.
DEBA: Yes?
ASHA: I wish you won't mention this incident to anyone.
DEBA: My goodness! What do you take me for? A street announcer? Besides, who would believe such a cock-and-bull story?
ASHA: What I mean is, we have met in peculiar circumstances, and unless I acquaint you with the broad details of my life, it'll be puzzling to you.
DEBA: Don't worry. Suppose we enter the theatre during the last act of the play. Yet we can easily be led to believe it's only the beginning....I didnt know it's so late. Let me get along.
ASHA: The kettle is on the fire, you know?
DEBA: Oh, I see. Then I wont miss my tea.
ASHA: What's that packet you are carrying?
DEBA: Lilies. Pala adores them. Pala is my wife. That's why I wanted to rush home. It sounds funny, but she has developed a habit of her own. If I reach home late in the evening, she will be on tenterhooks, pacing up and down the room and the verandah.
ASHA: Then I should'nt detain you.
DEBA: It's all right. An intellectual does not run away from his cup of tea. (Pause). My daughter is very mischievous. The moment she sees her mother walking to and fro, she catches her sari and follows her like a shadow.
ASHA: How many sons do you have?
DEBA: Two. Both of them are studying in High School. We five form our little family.
ASHA: You are a lucky man. A happy household. No counting the days.
DEBA: Pala is not much educated, but she is humane enough. When the girl was born after the two boys, I promised her a diamond ring. She longs for one.
ASHA: (Hurriedly getting up) Just a minute. The water must be boiling.

Asha goes inside. Debabrata arranges his books and puts them all together. Bimal enters calling out: "Sister! sister" Bimal is twentytwo years old, of good complexion, and his eyes and face indicate childishness. He wears a tropical suit. He looks at Debabrata and keeps quiet.

DEBA: She is in, preparing tea.
BIMAL: Thanks. Let me see. Sister, sister—

Bimal goes in. A few words are heard from inside. Bimal comes back.

BIMAL: She isn't in there.

DEBA: She will be back presently.
BIMAL: Hm. (Pause) Have I seen you here before ?
DEBA: Perhaps not.
BIMAL: But your face is familiar.
DEBA: May be. What's surprising about it ? I live in Calcutta every day of the year. You must have seen me in a bus or a tram, otherwise at some meeting.
BIMAL: Oh, no. Definitely not in a tram or bus. I have my own car. I used to go to school in trams, never afterwards. Wonder how people enjoy a tramride, packed like sardines.
DEBA: What else can they do ?
BIMAL: I hate crowds. Can't stand them. That's why I get out of Calcutta during the Pujas every year. I know the trains too are overcrowded, and so I don't go near them, not even planes. I go in my car, it costs me less. Of course, once in two years I have got to change my car for a new one. Old cars give a lot of trouble. I had a Jaguar previously. Now I have bought an Austin, A90, sporting model, convertible type.
DEBA: Very interesting.
BIMAL: (Opening his cigarette case) Cigarette?
DEBA: No, thanks. I don't smoke.
BIMAL: You seem to be a very calculating type, not even addicted to smoking. I'm dying with this habit. Must have at least thirty a day. Actually, I have to offer others more than what I smoke myself. I say, what's the matter with Calcutta ? Prices are spiralling from day to day. See, for instance, this suit. Very expensive, you know. It's not ready to wear, (Shows the label on the inside) John Burness, you see, and you know how costly it can be. But the cutting is superb.
DEBA: I've read their advertisements. They promise to make any village boor smart with their clothes.
BIMAL: (Without caring for his words). Look at the crease. I tried various tailors, but no one can beat these people. Of course, their charges are high. Have you seen this tie ? Anti-crease. Twist it whatever way you like. (Twists and shows). All silk, made in England. I got a dozen from a friend returning from abroad.
DEBA: Very interesting.
BIMAL: You know they say, 'A gentleman is known by his collar and shoes'. Look at my collar. My shoes, you know, (puts his leg on the table and shows) are Italian and they shine. I polish them daily myself, otherwise they won't last. (Suddenly looks at his wrist watch). What's happened to Sister Asha ? I'm in a hurry. I have purchased cinema tickets.
DEBA: Cinema ? At this time ?
BIMAL: Nine o'clock show. That's my habit. I don't go to any other show. Don't you—
DEBA: I seldom go since I have stopped seeing Hollywood pictures.
BIMAL: You are a wonderful man. What else do you see ? Hindi and Bengali ? The Bengali pictures lack the main dish of rice and curry while rare romantic delicacies are served at random. The Hindi pictures are a class by themselves. The heroine's father roars at the heroine to his heart's content and threatens to cut her to pieces and throw them to the birds of prey. Hah, ha, ha.....I like to sleep in those pictures.
DEBA: There is a reason for it.
BIMAL: What reason ?
DEBA: Bengalee's hate Bengali pictures most. Reason: they are understood fully. Hindi pictures are better, as they are less understood. They like English pictures best because they don't understand them at all.
BIMAL: Do you mean to say—. Here comes Sister Asha.

Asha brings three cups of tea in a tray. She puts aside Debabrata's umbrella and places the tea cups on the table.

BIMAL: You know what this gentleman is saying. Since we can't understand anything, we like English pictures—
ASHA: He's an English teacher, and thinks everybody is a fool.
BIMAL: Oh, I see. Now I remember you. Weren't you giving tuition to Sarama ?
DEBA: Which Sarama ?
BIMAL: Sarama Roy. Stays in Kyd Street. Her father is a barrister. There's a fox terrier in their house. Previously they had a Packard. Recently they have purchased an M.G.
DEBA: Yes. I used to go there. That was nearly four years back.
BIMAL: I saw you in their house. What funny jokes Sarama used to tell me about you !
DEBA: Jokes ? About me ?
BIMAL: (Laughing) One day Sarama made you stand in various poses and took photographs. In fact, the camera wasn't loaded at all. (Debabrata becomes slightly serious).
ASHA: What ? Now you feel you were fooled a bit, don't you ? How else can it be taken, if a renowned professor like you was made a victim of a practical joke by an ordinary girl student ?
DEBA: I see you have paid me in my own coin.
ASHA: What harm is there ? It's your own coin.
BIMAL: Sister has spoken the truth. If you read much, you will become a fat-head. That's why I put a stop to my studies.
DEBA: What do you do now?
BIMAL: Nothing.
DEBA: Nothing ?
BIMAL: Are you curious where I get my money ?
ASHA: He has a vast property.
DEBA: I don't think it'll last long, if he continues like this.
ASHA: It's not the usual property. His uncle is the famous writer—Purnachandra—
DEBA: Ow ! You are Purnachandra's nephew ?
ASHA: And his only successor, both to the cars and houses, and the royalties.
DEBA: Tell me one thing, if it is not too much to ask. How do you spend your time ?
BIMAL: (Laughs loudly) My dear sir, I don't get any time at all. Tennis, cricket, hockey, badminton, motor racing—
DEBA: Don't tell me you play all these games ?
BIMAL: I play some and see others. It all depends. Let me finish my avocations—motor racing, cinema, theatre, friends, relatives, hotels, restaurants, etc. Can you beat it ? I don't find time to meet any friend more than once in two months.
DEBA: I see. Somehow I can't understand this life.
BIMAL: My life moves like that. What can I do ? For instance, next week I'm starting in my car with sister Asha. At five in the morning my car will wait for her at her residence. The luggage will be kept in the car the previous evening itself. Breakfast at Burdwan, lunch at Asansol, and dinner at Ranchi B.N.R. Hotel.

DEBA: You will stay in Ranchi ?

BIMAL: Can't say. Suppose you wish to get out of Calcutta. How long would it take you to get ready ?

DEBA: I don't know. I have never had the experience.

BIMAL: Can you guess about me ? In case I feel like eating the famous Burdwan 'mihidana' as I am getting ready for bath, I get out of my bath and reach Burdwan by tea time—

ASHA: I tell you there's no end to Bimal's talks.

DEBA: Aren't you married as yet?

BIMAL: No. Why?

DEBA: Then you would talk less. I've stayed too long. I am off—

BIMAL: Come along with me. I'll give you a lift.

DEBA: Not bad. Which side are you going ?

BIMAL: North Calcutta.

DEBA: But I go South.

BIMAL: I see. Then ?

DEBA: You can do one thing. Leave me at the tramway.

BIMAL: Gladly. Let me have a small tete-a-tete with Asha-di.

DEBA: Then I'd be terribly late.

BIMAL: What do you say ? How can I waste any time now ? I've to rush home, pick up a friend, and then dash to the picture. Asha-di, I have completed all odd jobs : Number one, I have fixed up a luggage carrier on the top of the car ; Number two, I have booked the car for servicing ; Number three—

ASHA: It wasn't necessary to do all this. I told you not to do anything without telling me—

BIMAL: I hate to put off the work till the last minute. Are you sure of getting leave from your office ?

DEBA: You are employed I suppose.

ASHA: Yes, in a Travel Agency.

BIMAL: Good Heavens ! It slipped out of my mind altogether. Uncle has written from Delhi. There are two vacancies in the Education Department. They have advertised in the papers. Here is the cutting. If you are interested, I'll get all details.

ASHA: I don't want it for the present.

BIMAL: So, after all, better sense has prevailed on you. Good. You know, Sir, whenever a devil possesses Asha-di, she takes our life out. For some days now, she has been raving about a post in Delhi. Thank God, now she has given up the idea.

DEBA: But make sure that another devil hasn't possessed her again.

BIMAL: What do you mean ?

DEBA: It's a dreadful disease like malaria. You can't get rid of the complaint completely, once you get accustomed to woo the devil.

ASHA: (Laughs) You have a wonderful sense of humour. I tell you nobody will take you for a professor.

DEBA: What compliment is this ?

ASHA: Whatsoever you can make of it.

DEBA: Thanks. Let me get along now, as I'm sure you will still be delayed.

BIMAL: Oh, no. Come on, let's go. All right, Asha-di, if possible I'll call on you tomorrow again.

DEBA: Good night. Hope to meet you again.

ASHA: Please drop in, if you pass this way. We have touched many topics today, but couldn't conclude them. Let's try to bring out the underlying truths in our next meeting.

DEBA: Sure. So long, then.

Debabrata and Bimal talk to each other as they go out.

DEBA: You saved my walking today.

BIMAL: How far is the tram-stop ?

DEBA: About a mile.

BIMAL: Do you often come this way ?

DEBA: Thrice a week. I have a student here. He stays in the third left-hand lane down this road.

BIMAL: (Suddenly remembering) Will you excuse me for a minute, sir ? (Taking out a paper from his pocket) I forgot to hand this over to Asha-di.

Without waiting for his approval, Bimal rushes back into the house. Debabrata stands there, slightly impatient. Asha is replacing the cups in the tray.

ASHA: What, Bimal ? Why have you come back ?

BIMAL: I wanted to make sure you are doing well.

ASHA: Of course, I'm all right.

BIMAL: You don't look it. Tell me honestly. What's happened ?

ASHA: There's no point in making him wait. He's much delayed.

BIMAL: I'm off just now.

ASHA: No, I need you for a while.

BIMAL: Oh ! (Goes to the door) Sir, do you mind if I delay you a bit more ?

DEBA: No. I'm in a hurry. You'd better carry on. We shall certainly meet again.

BIMAL: So kind of you. As a matter of fact, I wanted to accompany you, but—

Debabrata goes away smiling, Bimal goes back into the room.

BIMAL: Quite a jolly fellow, but gets glued to his seat.

ASHA: I wish to clear a few matters with you.

BIMAL: Go ahead.

ASHA: I told you not to step in here. Why have you come ?

BIMAL: I know, but I had to give you a message.

ASHA : You are still young. Do you realise that ? Your people won't relish your coming here so often.

BIMAL: What do I care ? They are jealous of you and spread many a false tale about you.

ASHA: When you have to stay in their house, you can't afford to flout them. You have your whole future to think about. All of them look upto you to be made happy.

BIMAL: (Laughing) Why are you so strange today? What have I done now to make them unhappy? I come here, because I like you. What's there in it ? I knew from our first meeting in Madhupur how well you appreciated me.

ASHA: (Sighing deeply) I know it.

BIMAL: No, you don't. If you did, you won't chide me like this. There's a picture of you in my room. My aunt makes fun of it. Let her. I don't care. They don't know what I'm made of.

ASHA: Poor child! In what way can I make you learn how intricate and complex the world is. My only wish is that you don't get into trouble. If you really care for me, stop coming here. Promise me—

I got from you what I failed to get from my mother.

BIMAL: What are you talking, Asha-di ?

ASHA : (Excitedly) You heard me, didn't you ? I know how much they can harm you. I want you to go about freely in this wide world with a raised chin.

BIMAL: (Goes near her) I can't make any head or tail of what you say. Tell me exactly what's happened.

ASHA: I can't, Bimal, I can't. Please don't worry me further. Keep my word and go home.

BIMAL: All right, Asha-di. If that's what you want, I shalln't be here any more and be a nuisance to you. But I'm really surprised. I'm being pushed away by the one I love most. I lost my father, before I was old enough to understand him correctly. They say he used to dote on me. Nobody could replace his affection in my family, not even my mother. I tried my best, but somehow I couldn't get attached to my mother, as I should—

ASHA: It's not proper, Bimal. Your mother can never bear to be detached—

BIMAL: I got from you what I failed to get from my mother. I know what it is, but what's the use of recalling the past, when you turn me out like this. Still I respect you and I won't call on you for a few days.

ASHA : Not a few days. It should be till I send for you again.

BIMAL: As you say. (Pause) Send me a mesage when you would like to go to Hazaribagh.

ASHA: I've dropped the idea, Bimal.

BIMAL: What ? You won't see your boy ?

ASHA: (Sighing, deeply) No. I don't want to.

BIMAL: We planned so much and made so many arrangements including the booking of the travellers' bungalow, all because you appeared to be pining for your child. Now you cancel the whole programme !

ASHA: There's no use. I've given it careful thought. It's better to leave things as they are. I don't want him to have any connection with me.

BIMAL: It can't be. Don't you realise his happiness to have you back ? See reason and stop being obstinate. Let's visit him at Hazaribagh.

ASHA: No, I tell you. Let the boy prosper as he is. His mother is dead. Aren't there many motherless children ? He will be one of them.

BIMAL: What does he gain by it ?

ASHA: Why ? Don't you have respect and love for your father at his very memory? My boy will do likewise for his mother. That'll be my fond desire. I don't want to meet him even by a stray chance. If he comes to know of my present life, he would be much grieved and may even be ashamed to own me publicly. No, I wont see him.

BIMAL: Then you will slowly be reduced to ashes in your heart's flame, yearning for your son.

ASHA: I wish I were, but I'm not. My son has got his father, holds a respectable position in society, and is well provided for. He lacks nothing.

BIMAL: I don't follow you. Are you sure you aren't sick ?

ASHA: Now you get along, Bimal, and don't you call here again unless sent for. Promise me you will keep my word. I want you to become a great man, a respectable man, an idealistic man a—

BIMAL: I promise, sister. Bye bye. (EXIT)

After Bimal departs, Asha remains standing for a while and tidies up the room. She observes Debabrata's umbrella in the corner, takes it to the outer door, comes back and replaces it in the corner. She puts out the light and goes in. The gas light in the street is on. A little later, ROBI DUTT enters and stops under the gas light. Aged fortyfive, tall and hefty, pointed nose, curly hair, good personality. Wears a sweater with a round neck, over corduroy pants. Carries a portfolio bag and a few letter files. He takes out a key from his pocket, opens the door and enters the room. He puts the light on. With a tired feeling, he drops down in the sofa. After a few moments, he rises, opens the almirah with another key, brings out a whisky bottle, and places it on the table. He brings a glass tumbler and a bottle of soda water from the adjoining room. He pours a stiff drink, and begins to sip it.

Asha enters

ASHA: When did you come?

ROBI: Just now.

ASHA: Why haven't you called me?

ROBI: Awfully tired. Wanted a drink badly. Will you join me?

ASHA: No. I'm not well.

Both of them keep quiet. Asha takes a book and turns the pages. With glass in his hand, Robi broods.

ROBI: Has Bimal turned up?

ASHA: Yes.

ROBI: Have you asked him?

ASHA: No.

ROBI: Why did'nt you?

ASHA: Could'nt get a suitable opportunity.

Robi Dutt gazes intently at Asha.

ROBI: Will you answer me a question?

ASHA: Yes.

ROBI: If you get a chance, will you ask him?

ASHA: Perhaps not.

ROBI: (Gets angry) So you are fooling me all this time, are you? You have been tempting me for one week now.

ASHA: What shall I do? I can't.

ROBI: Why can't you? What's Bimal to you? A vagabond, loafer, rolling in money—it's a flea bite to him to finance for a picture.

ASHA: If the picture flops, and you incur loss?

ROBI: In business you must expect both profit and loss.

ASHA: Nevertheless, I can't ask him.

ROBI: (Gets up and walks to and fro) You are so concerned about Bimal's probable loss, but you don't even raise your little finger at my complete ruination.

ASHA: I can't suffer your taunts today, Robi. I'm indisposed. Let me go and lie down.

ROBI: I know your heart has strayed far away from me, but it doesn't matter. I won't be sorry, anyway.

Asha raises her eyes and gazes dreamily at him.

ROBI: Don't you gaze at me like that. Those eyes could fool me in the past, but not now.

ASHA: Believe me, Robi, I'm not well to-day, and you too, I think, are not very sober. To-morrow morning—

ROBI: 'Frailty! Thy name is woman'. There was a day when those very eyes begged my mercy. They are trying to devour me today. I was an idiot and I succumbed to your beauty.

ASHA: (Catching her head) Please stop it. I can't bear it any more. Do you wish to drive me mad with that prattle of yours every-day?

ROBI: No. If at all, it's I who will be doomed. Producer Robi Dutt, Director Robi Dutt, owner of mansions and motor cars—oh, what a nightmare! The pictures flopped one after another like a pack of cards, and I have been washed ashore the island of ignominy like a rotten weed. It's a problem now to get two square meals a day. With all this, I have to look after my family, and support a white elephant like you as well.

ASHA: I'll never forget what you've done for me. If you hadn't liberated me from my husband, I would have gradually perished in the clutches of that beastly drunk. Unhesitatingly, you gave me shelter. I wish you well always.

ROBI: Enough of your flattery. I know you well. For my sake, I brought you out of that spider's web. That's all. . . . Can you tell me why I've been reduced to such degradation as this?

ASHA: You have yourself to blame for all this. You were all the time bent on swindling others and making money at their cost with your pictures. You never exhibited your sincerity. This game doesn't last long and naturally you are no exception to it.

ROBI: (Mockingly claps hands) Hear, hear! Learnt by heart a wonderful dialogue. Who has written it? Your Bimal Babu?

ASHA: Whoever it is, can you deny it? You have saved me from your friend's hands, but you have done it with a purpose.

ROBI: What's it?

ASHA: Your idea was a heroine for your pictures without any expense. Unfortunately all the pictures, where I acted, proved miserable failures. Since then you have begun to fret and fume. If I turned out a successful actress, Robi Dutt wouldn't have been speaking like this.

ROBI: Don't you wish that I regain my lost glory, produce superb pictures again, become rich and hit the headlines?

ASHA: I do wish it. . . . . .

ROBI: (Appealingly) Then why don't you get me the funds from Bimal? Seventy to eighty thousand will do—a paltry amount to him. I can't fail this time. I've in view an outstanding story. There is everything in it—tragedy, comedy, songs, dances, in fact, all the ingredients for a marvellous picture. It'll be a pronounced success and will be released in four reputed theatres of Calcutta. You will find the posters on every wall, insertions in every paper, neon light advertisements overlooking Chowringhee, endless multitudes going to see the picture. — Oh, oh, thank you, thank you, thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen. I'm really honoured at your appreciation. Please stop your applause for a moment. I wish to acknowledge—(lifts up his whiskey glass).

ASHA: Stop drinking, Robi. You've had too much to-day.

ROBI: (Sighing deeply) No, I'm all right. Will you promise to get me the money? This will be my last effort. If you say, it'll be done. Bimal can't go against your word.

ASHA: (Firmly) That is why I'm unable to tell him.

ROBI: Won't you, Asha?

ASHA: No. It's better you don't produce that picture. Times have changed. Those songs, dances and cheap romantic situations we used to see in the pictures have no place now. People may care to receive some message, but even that not from you, I tell you.

ROBI: I won't raise this point with you again. But I will raise funds and certainly produce my picture. It's my look-out to adopt whatever means I please. One more thing. I'm completely broken. I can't maintain you any further.

ASHA: Probably you are unaware that I haven't taken any money from you for the last six months.

ROBI: (Enraged) The house rent is to be paid, you know that. It has come to one thousand rupees. The landlord is kicking up a row every day.

ASHA: It's all right. I'll arrange that.

ROBI: Bravo! If you can, why don't you give it just now? I'll clear myself off the debt.

ASHA: I don't have it with me.

ROBI: You will have to borrow from Bimal only, isn't it? Give me a note. I'll go and collect it from him.

ASHA: It won't be proper.

ROBI: I know. Nothing is proper. He may take it amiss. Why should I suffer any nonsense for his sake? I won't take a 'no' from you today. I want at least five hundred now. Come on, write a short note on this paper—

ASHA: No, I won't—

ROBI: I'll see how you don't.

Debabrata approaches the outer door slightly before this and now enters the room by pushing the door open.

DEBA: Excuse me.

ROBI: Who are you?

ASHA: (Surprised) Professor?

DEBA: I forgot my umbrella here.

ASHA: Oh, yes. (Gives him the umbrella).

DEBA: It's quite late, I know. After I passed three stops, I remembered my umbrella. I got down from the tram and came back.

ROBI: (Vexed) You got your umbrella. You may go now. Good-night.

DEBA: Would you lend me your pen please? (Sits down).

ROBI: Why?

DEBA: I said, give it.

ROBI: What do you mean? Who are you anyway?

DEBA: It won't help you. Please give me the pen.

Robi Dutt is surprised, mechanically he gives the pen.

ROBI: What are you writing?

DEBA: A cheque.

ROBI: For what?

DEBA: For the house rent. What's your name?

ROBI: Robi Dutt.

DEBA: I've crossed it. Five hundred rupees.

ROBI: Oh. (Taking the cheque in his hands) Five hundred in a jiffy. If you are so philanthropic, why don't you make it a thousand?

DEBA: I certainly would, but, sorry, there's no balance in the bank.

ROBI: Thanks. (Approaching Asha). I didn't know you had such a galaxy of friends.

Robi tries to go out before Asha raises her head. Debabrata gets up from his seat.

DEBA: Just a minute, mister.

ROBI: (From the outer door) You want me?

DEBA: Let me have a receipt.

ROBI: What receipt?

DEBA: For the cheque given.

ROBI: Oh. Where shall I write it?

DEBA: Write it at the back of my note-book.

ROBI: What shall I write?

DEBA: You write my name. I'm Prof. Debabrata Ghose, address: 30 Circus Avenue, Calcutta. Then the usual wording. (To Asha). By the way, what's your name, please?

ROBI: (Surprised) Don't know even the name, eh? Asha Choudhury.

DEBA: Good. Write that you've received five hundred rupees towards Asha Devi's house rent dues.

ROBI: (Handing back the receipt) Here it is.

DEBA: Now, I wish you good-night.

ROBI: Good-night. (Hurriedly goes out).

ASHA: Why did you think of insulting me like this?

DEBA: I don't get you.

ASHA: (Slowly) I don't know what he thought of me.

DEBA: What's there about it? He wanted money and I gave it. He should feel glad.

ASHA: Glad! Do you know who he is?

DEBA: No.

ASHA: In case he is my husband?

DEBA: I'd pray to God to rescue you.

ASHA: It's no laughing matter, I tell you. He's an old friend of mine. I'm obliged to him for a fresh lease of life he gave me.

DEBA: I took him otherwise from the way he was talking to you. He looked like an unscrupulous creditor. That's why, to save you—

ASHA: What? Who gave you the right to save me?

DEBA: Why? You yourself.

ASHA: I? What do you mean?

DEBA: This evening, after I entered your house on hearing your cries and pulled you out of the jaws of death, I became your friend.

ASHA: You are playing with fire, you know.

DEBA: If I decide to play at all at this fag-end of my life, I'd better do it with fire only.

ASHA: Oh, I see.

DEBA: Go ahead and see. I've no objection.... Oh, it's too late. Let me get along.

ASHA: (Closing the door) No, you are not going. Sit down.

DEBA: Why?....I've already told you how my wife would be restless till I reach home. By now she must have covered at least three miles walking in and out.

ASHA: Will you please keep quiet?

DEBA: God Almighty! You lose your temper with a helpless fellow like me! All the while you were like a kitten before your creditor.

ASHA: He isn't my creditor, I told you that.

DEBA: Oh, yes. I'm sorry. He is your fast friend. But, you know, many a time it happens that friends do change to creditors. We are naturally helped by our friends, who would collect the principal together with interest.

ASHA: Please note I'm in no mood to joke with you now.

DEBA: Very good. Then let me get out.

ASHA: (Firmly) No, I won't let you go. Sit down.

DEBA: Gosh! I'm done for. I think you won't allow me to go unless you feed me sumptuously for the little help I have given you.

ASHA: I said 'sit down'.

DEBA: (Sits) All right, I've sat down.

ASHA: Give me that note book.

DEBA: Have it. (Gives it to her).

ASHA: (Reads) 'No. 30, Circus Avenue'.

DEBA: Oh, I see, you want my address! It's so easy. If you go by bus, take number eight.

It'll cost you ten pice and takes half an hour. If you go by tram —

ASHA: If necessary, I'll go by car.

DEBA: Then it's slightly inconvenient. The car can't enter the narrow lane. You will have to walk a few paces. I tell you, Pala will be delighted to see you. She will prepare tasty snacks for you —

ASHA: Pala may not be so delighted as you make it.

DEBA: Why?

ASHA: How will you introduce me to her?

DEBA: Why? As my friend. Of course, if you don't have any objection —

ASHA: (Laughs) Why should I object? I only wonder which woman would welcome with a smiling face a husband's friend like me?

DEBA: What's wrong with you?

ASHA: I'm so unknown in this city. I came out of my husband's house. Many know me as a cinema actress. Pala will discover it soon, if she is not aware of it already. Do you think she will still be pleased?

DEBA: To be frank with you, I haven't thought in that way.

ASHA: You should have. Suppose Pala will come to know that you agreed to become my captive till ten in the night today. How will she take it?

DEBA: I'll tell her the whole truth.

ASHA: What? You would say a pretty girl was on the point of putting her head in a noose to hang herself, and to save her you jumped inside the room through a window. Then you wrote a cheque for five hundred rupees and managed to send away her creditor with it. Who would believe such a fantastic tale?

DEBA: Whatever it is, she will have more faith in me than you.

ASHA: Is it so? I can prove that you were here till this late hour. Bimal was a witness.

DEBA: Bimal!

ASHA: The fact that you gave a cheque to Robi can also be proved. The bank people will confirm it.

DEBA: Robi Dutt!

ASHA: The proof for the money given by you towards the house rent is the receipt itself.

DEBA: Are you determined to blackmail me? I fail to grasp your motive (Pause) You know what I have done? I have paid that amount from the money I saved for Pala's diamond ring. However, she won't misunderstand me, although she may in the beginning. But, believe me, I never wanted to do any harm to you.

ASHA: (Laughs) What's happened to your playing with fire?

DEBA: Enough of it. I've already burnt my hands.

ASHA: You thought of making me a slave of yours by issuing a cheque for five hundred rupees, isn't it? Has it now gone to your head that Asha Choudhury cannot be captured so easily? Once you set foot, you can't escape from my trap.

DEBA: You mean all this is a hoax — putting a noose to your neck, and shouting for help? Is this the method Robi Dutt adopts for his abominable business?

ASHA: Don't be alarmed. I won't ruin your life. (Laughs). I'm indeed obliged to you. But for you, I wouldn't have been living at this moment. Anyway, you will be responsible for this new life of mine.

DEBA: What are you driving at?

ASHA: You will have to meet all my expenses. Whenever you go this way for your tuitions, drop in here for a moment. I'll give you a list of my requirements.

DEBA: If I refuse to carry out your word?

ASHA: Then I'll be reluctantly compelled to visit Pala.

DEBA: Oh, no. Please don't. I'll call on you regularly.

ASHA: Very good. I don't need anything now. You can get the balance five hundred rupees of the house rent at your convenience.

DEBA: Hm!

ASHA: What are you thinking?

DEBA: Nothing at all. I've agreed to all your conditions.

ASHA: That's the way intellectuals behave.

DEBA: (Sighing deeply). May I leave now?

ASHA: With pleasure. (Opens the door).

DEBA: (Goes upto the door and stops). Will you do me a favour?

ASHA: What is it?

DEBA: Please don't break up my family. I can never survive if I lose my Pala.

ASHA: I give you my word that as long as you carry out my instructions, I won't wreck Pala's life.

DEBA: I depend upon you. Good night.

ASHA: Good night.

They part. Asha closes the door and thoughtfully opens the note-book. Debabrata stands near the lamp post and notes down the house number and address in his note-book. The curtain slowly comes down.

CURTAIN

ACT TWO Scene One

The same scene as before, after a few days. When the curtain rises, the room is in darkness. The gas lamp outside is lighted, but in the distance is seen the glow of the setting Sun. Debabrata enters as in the previous scene with his books and umbrella. He presses the calling bell of Asha Choudhury's house. After the bell rings twice, Asha Choudhury enters the room. She puts the light on. She is wearing an ordinary sari, and enters wiping her face, with a towel. She opens the door and is surprised to see Debabrata.

ASHA: You!

DEBA: Are you expecting somebody else?

ASHA: No.

DEBA: I think you didn't anticipate me so soon.

ASHA: (Slightly startled). Don't be standing there. Please come in.

DEBA: Thanks. (Places the books on the table). I have a tuition in this locality to-day. So I thought of giving my attendance to you.

ASHA: Oh. I see. If you remember our agreement, let me tell you I don't require anything for the present. You may attend to your tuitions.

DEBA: To tell you the truth, I started earlier so that I won't be late after spending some time with you. Now if you turn me out with one word, I shall have to wander on the roads.

ASHA: Then you may wait here.

DEBA: The pity of it is, we both have reached such a state that I'm frightened to speak freely to you.

ASHA: Why?

DEBA: If I talk unwarily a few words, which you judge as out of limits, who knows what traps might be laid for me. I am just a normal middle-class man, and how can I meet repeated demands for money?

ASHA: You are right, and the only solution is not to talk. You simply sit down and read those books of yours.

DEBA: There isn't a single book with me worth reading.

ASHA: How is it?

DEBA: Some are college text books, some are reference books and the others are notes. Today, I have to teach a poet, whom I don't like at all.

ASHA: Who is he?

DEBA: Tennyson. His writings are not extraordinary, but, of course, he became the Poet Laureate in Queen Victoria's time.

ASHA: I had a poem of his in my B.A. class. I liked it somehow.

DEBA: Which poem is it?

ASHA: I don't remember the title, but it's about a girl, who used to sit in a castle on the bank of a river. She would look at the world through a mirror, and when she tasted life for the first time, the mirror broke.

She made three' paces thro' the room
She saw the water-lily bloom
She saw the helmet and the plume
She looked down to Camelot
Out flew the web and floated wide
The mirror cracked from side to side
The curse is come upon me, cried,
The lady of Shallot."

ASHA: But I know many who are satisfied with the shadow of life. They have neither the courage nor the spirit to look at the real life.

DEBA: (Laughs) By your serious talk, one is led to believe that you have tasted life considerably.

ASHA: Of course, I have. At times I feel I shouldn't have gone so far.

DEBA: That's a sort of ego. Man feels he has suffered the maximum sorrow and hardship (Pause). I'd like to ask you a question, providing of course—

ASHA: What's it?

DEBA: How many children do you have?

ASHA: Only one son. He doesn't stay with me. Do you wish to see his photograph?

DEBA: Whose?

ASHA: (Rising) Just a minute. (Gets an album from the drawer). This is my son Saroj, when he was three years old. We used to be in Patna at that time.

DEBA: Patna?

ASHA: Yes. That's my husband's place.

DEBA: He is Mr. Choudhury, isn't it?

ASHA: Yes.

DEBA: What is he?

ASHA: Nothing at present. Previously he used to practise as a barrister. (Showing a photograph). Look at this, when my boy was a little older. He was six years.

DEBA: Don't you have any wedding photo?

ASHA: This photo was taken, when I had reached twenty one years, a little before marriage. I left college then.

DEBA: Hm. You were quite pretty.

ASHA: At least that's what they used to say. Otherwise, why would a rich barrister marry an ordinary middle class girl? (Showing another photograph) I purposely took this photo, seven days before I left my home and came away. It was on the day Saroj was forced to leave for Hazaribagh to stay in the hostel there.

DEBA: In the hostel? What was his age?

ASHA: He hadn't completed his seventh year.

DEBA: Then what was the hurry?

ASHA: It was his father's will and pleasure. Besides, who would object? Well, Professor, how old is your eldest son?

DEBA: About twelve.

ASHA: Twelve, is it? How tall is he? Upto your shoulders?

DEBA: (Rising) Without a doubt. In a short time he will be wearing my shirts. These boys, you know, grow up without being noticed. By the way, I think you haven't looked up Saroj recently.

ASHA: I saw him six years back.

DEBA: Then it may not be easy for you to recognise him now. He must have grown tall, his voice too might have changed, and the moustache must have begun to show itself out.

ASHA: (Suddenly rising). Will you have a cup of tea?

DEBA: I don't mind if it's there.

Asha hurriedly goes inside. Debabrata sets sticks of tuberoses in the flower vase. Asha returns with a tea tray.

DEBA: It sounds funny, but as Rabindranath puts it, we are no better than those fluttering mythical birds waiting anxiously for the first shower of the season to quench their thirst. Even before it is four o'clock, we are already restlessly craving for our evening tea. But I tell you this is an age-old practice. Some of the original inhabitants in the hilly tracts of India were in the habit of drinking the juice of——

ASHA: (Stopping him) Probably you've forgotten I'm not your student.

DEBA: Oh, yes. You're right. But isn't it interesting?

Asha serves him tea.

DEBA: By the by, I haven't given you this paper as yet. Here it is.

ASHA: What is it?

DEBA: The receipt for the balance five hundred rupees. I've paid it to your scrupulous friend and well-wisher.

ASHA: At this fag end of the month? How would you explain it to Pala?

DEBA: Don't worry. I can find a way out, but I won't disclose it to you and risk another trap. You know, there are many similarities between you and Pala. You have suddenly cut short my harangue on tea. I felt Pala herself spoke.

ASHA: Pala must be much younger than I.

DEBA: Of course, but she looks older.

ASHA: When you come next time, please get me a photograph of her. I wish to see.

DEBA: I tell you she doesn't look well in a photo. Her cheeks bulge like ripe tomatoes and that's why she never agrees to be photographed.

ASHA: I say, you seem to talk without end about her. Does she also go round talking about you?

DEBA: Oh, no. She is only mad after pictures. If she sees one picture, she narrates the story at twenty or thirty places. (Suddenly looks at the clock) Good Heavens, I've spent a long time. My students must have been tired of waiting for me. I'm off.

ASHA: I've been thinking if it would be proper on my part to trouble you a bit.

DEBA: Not at all. Come, what's it?

ASHA: Will you write one application for me?

DEBA: What for?

ASHA: For a job.

DEBA: But you have one.

ASHA: There's a better job in Delhi. I've the necessary qualifications. I mean trying for it.

DEBA: All right. Tell me what I should write.

ASHA: I've made a draft. Will you have a look at it?

DEBA: Give it to me.

Asha brings a paper and gives it to him.

DEBA: I can't wait any more to-day. I will take it and bring it back.

ASHA: That will do. Sorry to bother you.

Debabrata advances towards the door.

ASHA: Please don't forget about this. I've to send it tomorrow.

DEBA: How can I afford to forget your work? If I do, I know surely the report goes to Pala. (Laughs). So long.

ASHA: Good night.

Debabrata goes out. Asha closes the door and puts out the light. The gas lamp is alight. As before, Robi Dutt comes and opens the door with his key. He puts on the light and calls Asha.

ROBI: Asha, Asha!

ASHA: What's happened? I don't see you at all these days.

ROBI: Frightfully busy, and I didn't like to worry you often also.

ASHA: Oh!

ROBI: (Takes Debabrata's tea cup in his hand) Who's this lucky person who had tea with you today? (Asha remains silent). Is it the Professor? Why don't you answer? Professor, isn't it?

ASHA: Yes. Any objection?

ROBI: Not at all. I see you've caught hold of a good client. He looks an idiot and doesn't realise the money spent on you will go down the drain. He has paid me another five hundred today.

ASHA: I don't know if he is an idiot or not, but he is a model gentleman. He doesn't come to me with motives, as you all do.

ROBI: Wonderful! Professor comes here daily to teach you, I hope.

ASHA: I'm sorry I can't tell you all the facts. But, remember, he is a happy householder with his wife and children. He has been kind enough to help me out of my troubles. That's all—

ROBI: Asha, what do you take me for? I'm not such a fool as Bimal or Professor to believe whatever comes out of your mouth.

ASHA: I don't care whether you believe it or not, and I won't bother it any more. Understand?

ROBI: Surely there must be a rub between the husband and wife, or the professor is a rogue with the avowed purpose of humouring women.

ASHA: You don't know under what circumstances he had to give the money.

ROBI: (Laughs) Circumstances!. Don't you fly off at a tangent. I tell you. Whatever it is, I'm warning you beforehand. After all, he's an innocent fellow. Don't you dare to play ducks and drakes with his life. One day we might hear the Professor has become a confirmed drunkard, even if he started only to keep company with you while at home his wife couldn't endure it any longer and hanged herself to death. The flame is already kindled. Don't fan it any more.

ASHA: You needn't be afraid on that score, Robi. Professor will be safe, I assure you. I know I didn't derive any happiness in my life, but I won't be so mean as to spoil another's life, if I can help it.

— Do you want it ?

— Why not ? Especiall when you are serving it.

ROBI: Then why is it I'm reduced to this state?

ASHA: Anybody may be responsible for it, not me (Pause). Very soon I shall try to repay the thousand rupees to the Professor. Afterwards, he would stop coming here. I know his peculiar nature. Whenever he talks of his house, he forgets the whole world. Pala, Pala, and Pala. His entire life is centred round Pala.

ROBI: Will you please stop this useless talk? I've come to tell you something important. If you don't wish to hear it —

ASHA: Robi, can't you spend at least one day with me without fighting?

ROBI: What can I gain by it?

ASHA: There's no loss either.

ROBI: What are you doing?

Asha goes and gets whiskey and glasses.

ASHA: Don't you want it?

ROBI: Why not? Especially when you are serving it.

ASHA: I did it many times before.

ROBI: You remember those days? When I first brought you to this house, I named it "Madhukunja." Pleasure used to emanate from you. Laughter and music were continuously heard, as if the house itself began to sing.

ASHA: Really, Robi, do you remember how often I used to change the decoration of this house? I recall that day when I bought a carpet for five hundred rupees from one Englishman in Ballygunge, who was transferred from Calcutta. You were actually put out that day.

ROBI: Yes. This is that carpet, isn't it? It's beyond recognition now. The house hasn't been whitewashed for a long time. The curtains are soiled and spider webs are hanging from the ceiling. (Both of them look up).

ASHA: Let's both forget those good old days, Robi.

Robi Dutt pours whiskey in two glasses.

ROBI: Take care, this is country whiskey. You may get the kick easily.

ASHA: Don't worry. (Takes a gulp) Oh, marvellous. It's like meeting an old friend all of a sudden.

ROBI: For me this is the only friend remaining now. All the old friends are not to be traced. Rajani, I think, has expired. Pramatha has obviously left Calcutta. By the way, do you remember Rajsekhar?

ASHA: You mean him, whose poetry you used to like most?

ROBI: Yes. He was a real poet of heart and soul. Oh, what recollections I have! "When peace departs unnoticed, Its memory lags behind fully slouched, Emitting deep sighs in the solitary cell."

ASHA: You too seem to be composing poetry like Rajsekhar?

ROBI: "Laughter! Oh friend, we aren't in Heaven,
Reigns here thirst like floral vermin
In the castle of wishes, the heart's core
Hemmed in by desires more and more,
As the doting bee whirls round the lotus,
Although emptied, hoping for success.
Oh, friend, when peace departs unnoticed,
Its memory lags behind fully slouched,
Emitting deep sighs in the solitary cell:
Laughter is scarce in this land of Hell."

ASHA: Who says laughter is not easy? See, I'm laughing. Come on, Robi, join me.

ROBI: Stop that whiskey, I tell you. Even a little upsets you so much.

ASHA: You don't understand, Robi. I'm quite happy. I hear torrential rain outside. No, no, it's a harmonious symphony of sweet bells. Don't you hear it?

ROBI: Not with a small dose like this. If I take in excess, my mind gets numb. (Empties his glass and pours again). I don't get any pleasure out of it. But still I drink, as there is no alternative. I can't keep my mind at rest. Within the last few years my whole life has become topsy-turvy. You know what I think, Asha? We have started with the film industry. How can it get rid of us? Yet it's getting on, as I see.

ASHA: Don't you spoil your mind, Robi. All of them care for you, respect you.

ROBI: Whatever I earned was in this profession only. As I step in the studio, all the people there get up and greet me cordially. They think I don't know what they feel in their heart of hearts. As my back is turned, a mischievous smile creeps in their faces. They whisper among themselves that Robi Dutt is a dead horse. Why did it happen like this, Asha? I can't explain the reason.

ASHA: Please, Robi, you're becoming very serious today. Forget it for the time being.

ROBI: (Pauses a while) I can't. As long as money was coming, I failed to appreciate its mystery. How many contracts have I refused! I have lost my self-confidence now. My mind is disturbed. I know I didn't treat you also well that day. I'm really awfully sorry. How I wish I could have my last attempt and produce one successful picture!

Bimal comes and presses the calling bell.

ROBI: Who's that?

ASHA: How do I know?

ROBI: Is anybody expected?

ASHA: No.

ROBI: Go and see. If it's some useless fellow, send him away. I don't feel like wasting my time for nothing.

Asha goes to the door and waits.

ROBI: If it's Bimal by any chance, do bring him in.

Robi lies down on the divan. Asha opens the door, finds Bimal there, and standing on the threshold, draws the door close to her.

ASHA: Bimal, why have you come again?

BIMAL: I've come to this locality, and as I haven't called on you for many days, I thought of looking you up once.

ASHA: It isn't necessary. If I want you, I'd send for you. Get along now ——

BIMAL: Why are you so excited?

ASHA: No, I am not.

BIMAL. Then why are you standing here? Come on, let's go in.

ASHA: No, you are not going in.

BIMAL: What's the matter? Is there anybody in?

ASHA: That's none of your business. You can't come in.

BIMAL: Oh, I see, You're drinking again, Asha-di? You forgot your promise to me not to have a drop?

ASHA: I don't remember. Will you go now? My time is precious.

After I entered the temple, I lost sight of you.

BIMAL: My God! What's come over you, Asha-di? You appear as if you can't live unless you turn me out.

ASHA: Yes. Are you satisfied? Now please go away. Don't try my patience any more.

BIMAL: All right, I'm off. I have realised today that whatever my people say about you is correct. You are deviod of noble sentiments, and you are only self-centred. If it's otherwise, how can you forsake your family and run away as you have done? I should have understood you long ago.

ASHA: Any way, better late than never. Get out.

BIMAL: I thought you sincerely longed for Saroj and senselessly planned to fulfil your wish. Fie on you! With the setting Sun, you start your drinking bout, and you're ashamed of letting me in. You could have been plain in your talk, without mincing matters. All right, I'm going and I won't come back even if you send for me.

Bimal goes. Asha stares in that direction for a few moments, slowly goes in and closes the door. She looks at Robi lying down, approaches him and finds him asleep. She sits in a chair and finishes her drink in one gulp. She looks again at Robi and brings for him a shawl from the almirah.

ROBI: (A few moments later) Who's that, Asha?

ASHA: Yes?

ROBI: I had a sound sleep and dreamt as well. (Laughs).

ASHA: Why do you laugh?

ROBI: It's an interesting dream.

ASHA: In what way?

ROBI: I took you along with me to climb a mountain. On its top could be seen a temple without any path leading to it. With utmost difficulty we reached there panting. After we entered the temple, I lost sight of you. I searched everywhere, but couldn't find you. I got down and went up several times and no one seemed to have noticed you.

ASHA: Then?

ROBI: At last a cowboy led me to you. When you saw me, you burst out laughing. I woke up as you continued to laugh.

ASHA: What's so interesting about it? I too dream many meaningless things.

ROBI: He seemed familiar to me.

ASHA: Who?

ROBI: That cowboy. But for his appearance, his gait, manners, and accent were exactly those of Bimal.

ASHA: Bimal?

ROBI: Yes. Bimal showed me the way in my dream. I tell you, Asha, he will give me the money. Whatever you dream, it comes true.

ASHA: But, Robi —

ROBI: Now I know, Asha, I've made a mistake in telling you. There's a peculiar relationship between you both. He respects you, likes you and is very fond of you. How can you ask him for money? I'll have to do it, and he will surely agree.

ASHA: It's all right, Robi. Anyway, you can't talk to Bimal now. Go home early. Sarama will be pleased.

ROBI: (Dispiritedly) How can she?

ASHA: At your sight.

ROBI: Those days are gone. As I reach home, Sarama comes to me once without fail, but it's only to search my pockets for money. I'm surprised. So long I was earning, there was no complaint from Sarama, and she would never allow me to sleep without my food, however, late I returned. At dawn she would take the children away from my room lest my sleep should be disturbed. And now?

ASHA: Go on.

ROBI: She sets the children on me. They extend their hands like creditors. But for the word 'want' they haven't learnt any other vocabulary. I'm frightened to go home. Sarama's burning tears and the children's derisive laughter—I can't bear any more, Asha.

ASHA: You are too excited, Robi.

ROBI: No . . . . . Let me wash my face and hands. I'll be back.

ASHA: Listen. Don't fall asleep, as you did the other day while washing your face.

ROBI: What's there to lose even if I do. (Exit).

Asha sits along and has a drink. She hums a tune. A little later, Professor comes and presses the bell.

ASHA: (Opens the door and surprised) You?

DEBA: What's the matter, tell me? Whenever you see me, you get startled.

ASHA: No, it's not that. It's not the usual time of your visit.

DEBA: I have made your application ready. What you wrote was, of course, good, but I have made it better.

ASHA: I shall read it later. Thank you very much.

DEBA: Let me tell you clearly. These 'shalls' and 'wills' are not to my liking. I don't believe in future tense. Have a look at it just now.

ASHA: It's so late. That's why—

DEBA: What do you say? The night is still tender. It's not yet nine o'clock.

Debabrata walks into the room.

ASHA: Even then, Pala will be anxiously waiting for you and may misjudge you, if you're late.

DEBA: (Comes to the table) Oh, I see. That's why you are feeling so uncomfortable about letting me in. I'd assure you, though I'm a teetotaller, I'm not so averse to others drinking. Carry on with a free heart.

ASHA: No, I won't drink any more.

DEBA: (Taking the whiskey bottle in his hand) Excuse me, what exactly is this? What kind of nectar? Oh, this is whiskey (Laughs).

ASHA: What's funny about it?

DEBA: You know, once I took part in the drama 'Chirakumar Sabha'. The character was—what is it, what is it?. . . . . Yes, I remember—Darukeswar. There I sang a song also. (Sings)

ASHA: Believe it or not, you bore and entertain at the same time.

DEBA: How is it?

ASHA: To put it correctly, you are a fine jester.

DEBA: Hurray! You have begun to follow the college students.

ASHA: You mean the college students call you a jester?

DEBA: They know better ways of doing things. They write on the black-board: 'Prof. Ghosh is a clown'.

ASHA: I haven't heard anybody admitting how he is fooled.

DEBA: Doesn't matter. I have at last made you laugh. Otherwise, you always sit with a serious frown on your face.

ASHA: You're right. Laughter has evaporated from my life. Well, Professor, don't you ever commit mistakes?

DEBA: Where? In arithmetic?

ASHA: No, in the leaves of life.

DEBA: Of course, I do. I have indeed committed many mistakes. After all, it's in man's nature. And I'm not inhuman.

ASHA: No, not the ordinary mistakes, but slips, which if once committed, you will have to regret the rest of your life. I mean irretrievable mistakes.

DEBA: Why do you put me such a question?

ASHA: Suppose an ordinary middle-class girl, accustomed to simple food and habits, grows up in the midst of want like many others of her kind. If she is accidentally married to a very rich man, what would be her mental reaction?

DEBA: In the beginning she may be a fish out of water, but in due course she gets adjusted to the new surroundings, of course, if she co-operates towards this end.

ASHA: Who wouldn't co-operate, tell me? She tried heart and soul to please her husband. She erased out of her mind the sad memories of her father's poverty. She gave up the idea of looking up her mother on her death-bed, for fear of wounding her husband's feeling. (She closes her face in her hands.)

DEBA: Stop it, please. As I see, you're much disturbed.

ASHA: Professor, can you tell me why a boy had to come in between them? He entered into the sad farce of an unhappy couple's life and began playing with his tingling laughter and melodious hand claps (Stands up). An embodiment of innocence!—Probably I would have forgotten all my worries with this treasure, but even my child was snatched away from me. A child of six, he wouldn't stay away from me for a minute. Can you visualise the rest of the story, Professor?

DEBA: I can. That girl would find it impossible to remain in that house any longer. She would get out at a suitable opportunity to look after her future. There's every possibility for her to succeed, but in such cases some snag remains somewhere.

ASHA: With a view to record my silent protest, I came away to Calcutta without informing my husband. After seven days, when I cooled down and wanted to return home, I dashed against a dead-end. My way was blocked.

DEBA: Why? How?

ASHA: Religious sanction.

DEBA: Oh. Then!

ASHA: With a scandal on my head, I had become a scapegoat of society. One idea remained uppermost in my mind — vengeance. I wanted to see how my husband would go about as a gentleman of the town. I went to the other extreme. Being forced, I revived my acquaintance with Robi Dutt, started living with him openly in this house, entered the cinema and took to drink. When news reached me that my husband was humiliated amongst his circle of friends, I used to feel happy about it. You know what happened later?

DEBA: What.

ASHA: He came here.

DEBA: Who? Mr. Choudhury?

ASHA: Yes. He came and took the same seat where you are sitting now. His piercing looks weren't there. Appealing voice. He came to tell me how badly I treated him, as a result of which how he suffered. Then I broke into a guffaw of laughter before him.

DEBA: So you have won surely?

ASHA: No. He didn't allow me to win—the devil. When I paid a deaf ear to whatever he said, he stood at this door on his way out and told me—'For the sake of Saroj's future, I would request you sincerely to keep our differences with us only. Don't spoil his life'. It was nothing short of lashing across my face with a whip and stamping mercilessly my insulted motherhood with his foot. Then he went away. Day and night I brooded and brooded, couldn't feel happy for a single day, and I couldn't even die with the satisfaction of having hugged my darling son to me for once. Above all, I couldn't forget for a moment the piercing words he darted at me on the plea of bettering my son's lot. I stopped acting in films, kept myself aloof from all activities, and then—

DEBA: Then I know the rest. (He looks up and Asha too follows suit).

DEBA: Later our meeting had taken place, which resulted in the beginning of yet another drama.

ASHA: Professor!

Robi Dutt's voice is heard from inside.

ROBI: (From within) Asha, Asha!

ASHA: Coming (Frightened) You'd better leave now, Professor.

DEBA: Who's there? Robi Dutt?
ASHA: Yes.
ROBI: (From within) Whom have you there? (Sound of footsteps).
ASHA: Please go away, Professor. He's quite excited.
DEBA: I don't mind it.
ASHA: No, no, don't remain here any more. I've opened my heart to you and am very happy. I hate to have a reverse.
DEBA: All right. I shall try to come day after tomorrow.
ASHA: Please do.

Professor goes out. Asha closes the door. Almost simultaneously Robi Dutt comes from within.

ROBI: With whom were you talking? Who's come? What's the matter, you don't reply? Come on, out with it. Surely it's Bimal, isn't it? That's why you didn't give me an opportunity to speak to him. You know well he will agree to my proposal and advance me money. Why are you so hard-hearted? You hate my trials to come up again.
ASHA: It's not Bimal.
ROBI: Then who was it you were so attentive to?
ASHA: (Gazes intently at Robi Dutt's eyes) Professor.
ROBI: Professor? (Hangs down his head) Oh.

Professor is standing outside, and the curtain comes down.

Scene Two

The same scene as before, after a few days. When the curtain rises, Robi Dutt is seated and Bimal is playing recorded music.

BIMAL: Oh, wonderful. This is what music should be. Anybody is tempted to keep the beat.
ROBI: When you say, it'll be done.
BIMAL: I say, life must be there. You'd better bring your music director to me. I shall give him the necessary direction.
ROBI: I will. By the by, I had been to Karabi today, and practically fixed her up. I shall take you to her to-morrow.
BIMAL: At what time?
ROBI: In the evening, say at about 5 o'clock, if of course, it's convenient to you.
BIMAL: I shall make it convenient, and I shall pick you up. What shall I wear, tell me? I've recently made a suit of American cords from Ritz. It's really dazzling, you know.
ROBI: Karabi is a good girl. You'll rarely come across such a girl in the films. Good family, educated, and quite young.
BIMAL: She may look too young in the film.
ROBI: She's twenty—twenty one. Fine complexion. Dense long hair. Very pleasing appearance.
BIMAL: For Heaven's sake, don't you dare to tell Ashadi about Karabi. That will—ROBI: Do you take me for a madcap? These things aren't meant for—

Asha enters

ASHA: What's happening here?
BIMAL: Why didn't you tell me before.
ASHA: What?
BIMAL: About Mr. Robi Dutt.
ASHA: Robi, so you have done what you wanted.
BIMAL: I've heard his proposal and agreed to it. Why were you so worried, I don't understand? The money is lying idle in the bank and what harm is there to invest it in some good business!
ROBI: Asha! You must fix up an auspicious day for the inaugural.
ASHA: Why do you rope me into this?
BIMAL: That means, you don't like my becoming a Film Producer, isn't it?
ROBI: She likes it without a doubt, but you know it's natural for her to take it slightly amiss, since we both discussed the proposal and took the decision without telling her. Think of the reverse case, where Asha fixes up something without our knowledge. We would also take it otherwise.
BIMAL: (Goes near Asha) Asha-di, please, you must fix up an auspicious day for the inauguration. You will have to take full responsibility for the supervision of the function.
ROBI: I have worked up the details. Asha would be ready on that day with the clap-stick. How do you like it, Mr. Bimal?
BIMAL: Simply grand. Mr. Dutt has really got certain original ideas. Let us decide about the day.
ASHA: Then let me refer to the almanac.
BIMAL: I care a damn for the almanac. Whatever day you suggest is auspicious for me, I say, let us celebrate to-day. I shall arrange for some snacks. Driver! (Goes out).
ASHA: What an innocent boy! he can't see the intrigue!
ROBI: What if he can't?
ASHA: He'll suffer in life.
ROBI: I know many tricks, and yet I am suffering a lot.
ASHA: That's probably because you know too many tricks. Anyway, give up that topic—I tell you to give up the idea of producing a picture with Bimal's money.
ROBI: That means, you will obstruct him from helping me?
ASHA: Not exactly. I'll warn him, though. I've got to do it, as he is after all a mere boy.
ROBI: Do you realise the result? If you object, he won't advance the money. If he doesn't, I won't be able to produce the picture.
ASHA: I know. But what shall I do, tell me? When Bimal believes me so implicitly, how can I deceive him?
ROBI: Excellent! Bravo! (After a pause suddenly) I'm telling you what to do. If Bimal comes and asks your opinion, you must encourage him without a moment's hesitation. Understand?
ASHA: If I don't?
ROBI: Then you can't imagine the grim consequences.
ASHA: Don't you threaten me, Robi (Laughs). What do you think you can do to me?
ROBI: Suppose I break up your friendship with the Professor.
ASHA: (Laughs) Go ahead. It doesn't matter at all. Take it from me, I'll be least affected if he stops coming here. Our relationship is most casual.
ROBI: Suppose I go to his wife and describe fully in my own words the happy episode between you both.
ASHA: (Frightened). Don't be crazy.
ROBI: (Laughs) What's the matter? Are you frightened? But let me tell you, one day the Professor's life will be blasted to smithereens. On whose account? Not unlikely on yours. Why? Isn't it pleasant to hear? Who can say if it won't be to your advantage? Deserting the wife and child-abode to yours. Then how would you like if I bring out a headline in the papers 'Another triumph of Asha Choudhury?' (Asha keeps quiet). — What's happened? You are so silent. Don't tell me you prefer golden silence to silvery speech.

ASHA: I know you. There's nothing in the world to stop you from your evil designs. Doesn't it prick your conscience to wreck that family.

ROBI: Conscience! No. It's revenge. Get it? Revenge on Asha, the Beauty Queen. The address—No. 30 Circus Avenue—has become very familiar to me from the receipts I gave him. Name—Prof. Debabrata Ghosh. Ha, ha, ha . . . . .

ASHA: Enough of your pranks. Tell me what you want me to do.

ROBI: (Laughs) Come, come, that's the way to behave. I say, don't you be under the impression that I don't know you fully. I'm aware of the various reactions by pressing the different levers. I'll make you dance like a doll to-day.

ASHA: Hm ——

ROBI: Whatever Bimal says, you will approve with a smile.

From within—Asha-di, Asha-di

ROBI: Here comes Bimal. (Bimal enters).

BIMAL: Get the tea ready, Asha-di. I have sent for the snacks from Gariahat corner.

ROBI: I have already put the kettle on the fire.

ASHA: Let me see. Tea or coffee?

ROBI: Coffee without milk. (Asha goes in).

Sound of Bimal's car.

BIMAL: I think the car has returned. (Loudly) Asha-di, get the coffee. The snacks have come.

ASHA: Why do you shout? I'm not deaf.

BIMAL: Oh, come on. Shall I help you?

ASHA: Get the snacks from the car.

BIMAL: The driver will get them.

Meanwhile Debabrata comes to the door with a canvas bag containing books in his right hand, a packet of snacks in his left hand, and his umbrella under his arm. He puts the bag on the floor and presses the calling bell. Bimal opens the door and is surprised. Asha goes in by this time.

BIMAL: What's it you have brought?

DEBA: Snacks—the very same items you have asked your driver to fetch.

BIMAL: But why are you carrying them?

DEBA: First you take them. (Hands over the packet to him). I was returning home from my tuitions, when I met your driver coming here. He gave me a lift.

BIMAL: That doesn't matter, but he shouldn't have made you carry these things. It's his job ——

DEBA: In a way he's not to blame. I almost snatched it from his hands. Hallo, Mr. Dutt, Good evening. Am I to understand that I'm gate-crashing in a private party of yours?

BIMAL: No, sir. You're most welcome. We are actually celebrating —

DEBA: What for?

BIMAL: Bimal Production.

DEBA: Of what article?

BIMAL: We are starting a Film Company. Proprietor — Bimal Chatterjee. Director — Robi Dutt. Title—"Pluto's Love." How do you like it?

DEBA: Good.

BIMAL: What do you mean?

Are you frightened ? Let me tell you, one day the professor's life will blasted to smithercens

DEBA: Easy way.

BIMAL: For what?

DEBA: For evaporation of surplus money. If you produce a few pictures, there's nothing else to worry about. Your uncle's royalties can be fully utilised. But it's good in a way, you know. The more money in circulation, the better for the country.

ROBI: I'm afraid your remarks seem to be tainted.

DEBA: That must be due to your defective hearing. I am straightforward in what I say. By the by, what did you say the title is?

BIMAL: "Pluto's Love."

DEBA: Splendid. Even otherwise, Pluto's influence on you is obvious. I trust Shri Robi has himself written the script.

ROBI: Any objection?

DEBA: Why should I have any objection? As they say, Pluto is a deadly planet. If Robi, I mean the Sun, enters Pluto's house and is looked upon by the latter, then follows complete disaster.

Asha enters with tray containing coffee and notices Debabrata.

ASHA: When did you come?

DEBA: A few minutes—but Mr. Robi Dutt is already ruffled.

ASHA: Why?

ROBI: His talk is not to my taste. There's a loose screw in his head.

DEBA: I've mentioned to him an astrological phenomenon, which he didn't like.

ASHA: Forget it. Come on, will you have coffee?

DEBA: Sure; also Bimal Babu's snacks.

Asha serves snacks and coffee to all.

BIMAL: The theme is full of suspense. In one scene, Supriya is lying alone in a dark room, and there is low background music from a piano. At that time, an ugly looking person, having received a severe beating, enters the house. When his shadow falls on the glass door, Supriya shouts 'Who's there?' The man sneaks out silently but terrified. On his way out, he accidentally kicks a glass flower vase, which falls and breaks. The girl gets up shrieking. Can you imagine how the audience will receive this scene?

DEBA: Excellent. You have developed a thrilling situation, but people may think that you have lifted it from the "Hunchback of Notre Dame."

ROBI: What? How dare you say that? Do you think I'm a common thief?

DEBA: I can never think so, but you know often when we see an Indian picture, we feel as if we have read it somewhere. It's all due to too much reading, which I admit is a fault of mine.

ROBI: I'm sure you haven't seen my pictures, and if you see perhaps—

DEBA: Of course, I've seen. "Vijay-Jayanti," "Man Marmar," "Dhulidhusar"— the formula is the same for all—even the Chinese Chow-Chow cannot beat it.

ROBI: I don't follow. If we produce "Pluto's Love," will the people like it or not?

DEBA: You have thrown on me the horns of a dilemma. How can I enter the people's minds? But one thing. If people refuse to see the picture, we must conclude they have become shrewd enough. On the other hand, if they do see it, prayers must be conducted for their redemption.

ROBI: Asha, you've seen the rude tone of his talk. You'd better warn him in time.

ASHA: Professor, why don't you please change the subject of your conversation? Some other time—

ROBI: Besides, what does he know about the film industry?

DEBA: Nothing.

ROBI: Then why do you talk?

DEBA: I give my opinion as a spectator only. (Pause). Look here, Bimal Babu, if I am not very inquisitive, why did you think of this film production?

BIMAL: To make money, of course.

DEBA: (Laughs). For that you could take up any other business, where the risk of loss is less.

ROBI: Have you any idea of what the profit would be in pictures?

DEBA: I reckon it will be the same as would go out of your hands in case of loss.

ROBI: Money is not the only criterion, more important is fame.

DEBA: —and ill fame too!

ROBI: (Excitedly). Will you stop?

DEBA: Don't get excited. I am only answering your questions.

BIMAL: There's nothing wrong in what he said. We must think of the pros and cons.

DEBA: Just that. I never said anything else. I didn't suggest that Bimal Babu should not invest in this venture, or that Robi Babu being a broken man is not to be trusted, or that—

ROBI: Shut up.

ASHA: Professor, please be quiet.

DEBA: All right, I shall.

ROBI: I'm getting late. I'm off. Well, Bimal Babu, are you coming tomorrow evening?

BIMAL: Robi Babu, please give me a little time. It's better not to do anything in a haste.

ROBI: You mean you wish to back out when we have gone so far? I am a man of one word, and I have already fixed up several matters.

BIMAL: I'm very sorry. What shall I do, tell me? When doubt enters the mind, it's always desirable to clear it.

ROBI: Then, what do you want me to do? When shall I see you?

BIMAL: I'm also starting. We shall talk about it in the car.

ROBI: Let's go, then.

BIMAL: You, Sir?

DEBA: (Showing Asha) I've a little business with her.

BIMAL: We are off, Asha-di. I shall look you up tomorrow. Thank you very much, Sir, your suggestions are admirable.

ROBI: Bimal Babu, you'd better get along. I've got to square up a small matter here.

Bimal goes out. Robi stands close to Debabrata and speaks to him in a threatening tone.

ROBI: I don't understand why you pick upon me, but please note that Robi Dutt is not a simpleton. I will teach you a good lesson.

DEBA: I don't know if I've offended you unintentionally, but if I did, I'm awfully sorry.

ROBI: Cut out your acting. I tell you, if Bimal doesn't go ahead with my proposal, you will really be sorry.

ASHA: Robi, I shall explain to Bimal tomorrow. You'd better calm down.

ROBI: You too shut up. I know all of you planned to ruin me. Don't worry. I shall take care of it. (Goes out).

DEBA: (Goes to the door). Good Night.

Robi turns back and looks angrily at Debabrata and goes away. Asha sits down and holds her head with both hands.

ASHA: What have you done?

DEBA: Infinitesimal benevolence. I've saved a young innocent boy from the clutches of an unwary trap.

ASHA: I wasn't in this, you know.

DEBA: May be. To be a little blunt about it, how can I find out what is real and what is not? When Robi Dutt is after all your exclusive friend, and victimises simple people in your joint enterprise, I don't see any reason for a sudden break-up of your partnership.

ASHA: It is necessary to reveal certain facts to you today.

DEBA: You're welcome, if you feel like doing so. (Looks at the watch).

ASHA: (Sighing deeply). How I wish I got the Delhi job!

DEBA: Are you anxious to settle in Delhi?

ASHA: That will be best for all concerned.

DEBA: But what will happen to people like me, I mean, the sacrificial goats? Will you give us freedom before you leave? If so, I will pray to God from now onwards: "Oh, God, grant her the job, grant her the job."

ASHA: I assure you there's no pretence in what you saw on that first day when I lay unconscious here. I really wanted to die. (Pause) I know it's hard for you now to believe this, but I swear I'm not lying. (Pause). When I came to my senses, I didn't like you saving me. I was enraged with you later, when you advanced money to Robi. It set me thinking why you got mixed up with my miserable life. It is with the intention of putting an end to this relationship that I played the blackmail game. (Pause). What are you thinking?

You have done me a great service by saving Bimal.

DEBA: I'm not thinking. I'm listening.

ASHA: I shall return your money as soon as possible, probably next week.

DEBA: There's no hurry.

ASHA: I thank you sincerely for helping me out of that tight corner. I'm also sorry to have frightened you.

DEBA: You are thoroughly mistaken there, for I wasn't frightened at all. I knew full well you wouldn't harm me.

ASHA: How can you say that?

DEBA: There's an exact similarity between you and Pala in whatever you say or do. I know Pala completely. Such women can never be anything but good.

ASHA: I'm amazed at your implicit trust in me. You can be deceived later, you know that?

DEBA: I don't care for the probabilities. If I can't believe humanity for fear of deceit, what's the good of living in society? It's better to renounce the world and change your abode to a forest. (Pause). I was in fact afraid of Robi Dutt. If he perchance conceived a dirty plan, you would have become a mere doll in his hands. There are plenty of Robi Dutts in every stratum of society. They are selfish and self-centred, and can't stand the sight of others.

ASHA: But today you have floored him.

DEBA: What shall I do, tell me? I couldn't tolerate infanticide. Bimal can never gauge his structure.

Tears in Asha's eyes, and she covers her face with her sari.

DEBA: You're crying?

ASHA: You have done me a great service by saving Bimal. Though I wished too, I was helpless.

DEBA: How is it?

ASHA: Robi threatened me that if I didn't co-operate with him, he would go to your house and disclose everything to Pala. So I was afraid naturally.

DEBA: Hm.

ASHA: I suffered much in my life, Professor, and I wish nobody met such a fate. Robi will destroy all your happiness, if he goes to your house. It's therefore better if you tell her all the facts.

DEBA: (With a pale smile) I think I should.

ASHA: Let me wish you good-bye. Perhaps we won't meet again. I'll send you the money. Though we have come to know each other recently, I'll always remember you, if I'm alive. I don't know if you care to think of me at least now and then.

DEBA: What do you say? You will always be alive in the shape of my Pala—in her talk, her movements, and in every phase.

ASHA: If at all possible, please write me a letter. I'd be most anxious to hear how Pala reacted to your revelation of our episode.

DEBA: I will. (Laughs) May I leave now?

ASHA: God be with you.

DEBA: Thanks.

ASHA: Good Night.

DEBA: Good Night.

Debabrata goes out. As usual, Asha closes the door, and leans against the door for a while. Debabrata too waits standing outside. Asha moves in and puts out the light. Debabrata goes to the gas lamp and looks back. The curtain comes down.

ACT THREE

Same scene as before. When curtain rises, Bimal is talking to Asha in a gay mood. Asha is well dressed in a yellow blouse and light green sari. The hair is plaited and done up, with flowers in a semi-circle. Bimal appears to have rushed as he is, with a soiled pant and a shirt. It is evening, but still there is sunlight.

BIMAL: I told you it's very, very good news. Now you can guess it—

ASHA: What's the good news? Tell me.

BIMAL: No, I won't. Guess: one, two—

ASHA: Don't be childish. Tell me.

BIMAL: Will anybody give out good news so easily? Don't you see I have rushed here straight from the house? I haven't changed my shirt, haven't sent for the driver and I have driven the car myself. The speedometer was showing 50/60, and I didn't release my foot from the accelerator. Didn't apply the brake at all. The car was shooting like an arrow, and they were all aghast throughout the way.

ASHA: My Goodness! What's all this useless talk? Tell me the good news.

BIMAL: I give you three guesses, and if you are correct, I shall give you a prize. It may be useless talk, but it isn't harmful like Robi Babu's. I have brought you solid good news. When you hear, you will be startled and begin wondering how I happened to know it. My God, I think I'm caught now. Don't you understand what it is? You can't estimate my greatness? Come on, guess it. I told you I'll give you a prize.

ASHA: I don't want the prize. Tell me what it is.
BIMAL: Be a sport. I tell you. Guess.
ASHA: I see. I know what it is. You must have got a good match, and you will be married soon.
BIMAL: (Seriously) How did you know?
ASHA: Am I right? But for marriage, what else can it be? I knew it from the beginning. Where does the girl belong to? Who has made this match? Don't you give your consent without my seeing her, I tell you.
BIMAL: You will be very happy to see me married, won't you?
ASHA: Sure. Your happiness is my happiness.
BIMAL: (Sighing deeply) It's not about my marriage.
ASHA: Why do you sigh so deeply?
BIMAL: You got that job in Delhi.
ASHA: Who told you?
BIMAL: Uncle has written from Delhi. I've just got it. I knew you will be very happy to hear the news. I have dashed here. But now I feel it would have been better, if I didn't turn up.
ASHA Why, Bimal?
BIMAL: My mind is upset.
ASHA: (Goes to Bimal and fondles his hair) What's happened? Tell me, Why are you upset, Bimal?
BIMAL: You did not even tell me you were applying for that job.
ASHA: I was afraid.
BIMAL: Of what? You thought I was just a child, and might bungle the affair and you would miss the chance. Never treat me like that. If necessary—
ASHA: You would rush to Delhi and expedite my appointment. Again, if I get that post, you would miss me like this and regret my going away. I know everything.
BIMAL: (Pauses a while and looks intently at her). However, you are bubbling with joy. Don't you imagine I can't see you through, if you put up a serious countenance. You are justified, Asha-di. It is a great honour. After all, you will be working in the Capital.
ASHA: It's not that, my boy. I'm getting a poor pay in my present job and I find it very hard to maintain myself.
BIMAL: Why don't you take money from me? I asked you many times if you needed any. Always you put me off that you would take later, if necessary, but that 'later' remained 'later' without changing its colour.
ASHA: The time is not yet past. I want a loan of a thousand rupees before I leave for Delhi. Can you help me?
BIMAL: Loan? Are you still treating me as an outsider? Can't I give this small sum as a present? (Pause) Let me give it to you to-day itself.
ASHA: As a loan only. You'll have to take it back.
BIMAL: Let it be as you say. (Takes out the money from his pocket). Be careful lest you may lose it.
ASHA: Suppose I don't get that Delhi job?
BIMAL: So what?
ASHA: Then how shall I repay you this amount?
BIMAL: Oh, I see. You wish to rack your brains for this? Forget it. Incidentally, has the Professor called on you recently? He is a very nice fellow. But for him I would have been an easy victim of Robi's tricks and would have lost a good packet.
ASHA: What? You mean the devil which goaded you to become a film producer has flown away from your brain?
BIMAL: Decidedly. Of course, Robi Dutt is awfully annoyed with me, more so with the Professor.

Robi Dutt's cough is heard.

BIMAL: (Startled) My God! Robi Dutt is coming. (Frightened) What shall I do?
ASHA: Nothing.

Robi Dutt enters the room and seriously looks at them both. All are silent for a few moments.

ASHA: What happened, Robi? You are quite serious.
ROBI: Where's the Professor?
ASHA: How do I know?
ROBI: Hasn't he come here?
ASHA: No.
ROBI: Then where has he gone?
ASHA: Must have gone home.
ROBI: I'm coming from there.
ASHA: From his house? That means, you have done what you said. Have you told Pala everything? (Robi Dutt wrinkles his eyes and laughs). Do you realise what you've done? The family will surely break up, and the Professor won't survive this calamity. I know it.
ROBI: What do you know?
ASHA: His whole life is centred round Pala, his sons, his daughter and his happy home. No, no. I can't bear it. I'll go and try to mend matters.
ROBI: (Seriously) With whom?
ASHA: With Pala.
ROBI: There's no Pala.
ASHA: No Pala? What happened? (Pause) Speak out.

The professor is a cheat and a bare-faced liar.

ROBI: There's nobody named Pala. There never was.
ASHA: What do you mean ?
ROBI: The Professor is a cheat and a bare-faced liar.
ASHA: What are you saying ?
ROBI: The plain truth. He stays in a hotel. I have gathered all information about him from his room-mate. He has made some money, but hasn't got a wife or family. I was suspecting him from the beginning. He is a bachelor.
ASHA: What do you gain by telling me all this, Robi ?
ROBI: To whom should I speak ? If I meet him face to face, I would have given him a pretty bit of my mind.
ASHA: Do it by all means.
ROBI: Why not to you also ? You're such a fast friend of his.
BIMAL: Robi Babu, why do you waste your breath with Asha-di ? What does she know ?
ROBI: All of you deified him and made me a fool. A polished scoundrel, indeed !
BIMAL: Please calm down. You'd better go and sit in my car. I shall drop you at your place.
ROBI: Nobody need worry about me.
BIMAL: I will get along.

ROBI: But I won't leave the Professor scot-free.
BIMAL: (Takes out Robi by pushing him). All right, all right. You will deal with him later.

Bimal returns after leaving Robi outside. Asha continues to sit dazed as before.

BIMAL: What are you brooding over?
ASHA: Strange. Is it possible? Sons, daughter, wife—all this a got up tale?
BIMAL: Has he himself told you all these things?
ASHA: How else should I know? He has also written me a letter (Fetches it from the drawer). Read it out. I'll hear it once again.
BIMAL: (Takes it in his hand, turns it over once or twice and then reads).

"Srimati Asha Devi,

As promised, I write you this letter. On returning home last night, I told Pala all about you. She was really very pleased. She is quite anxious to meet you. After I get your approval, I shall bring her to you. Hope you will like her.

Do you know why I compare you with Pala? I don't mean the complexion, as you are undoubtedly by far prettier. Anybody will have to accept this fact, even if he or she may be unfriendly with you. It is the mental phase where you both resemble each other.

Girls of your temperament can never compromise with injustice.

It becomes most difficult for them who come into contact with you. They cannot afford to avoid you and proceed with any work. At the same time, they are conscious that you would not allow them to do any unjust acts. That is why they are afraid of you as much as they like you.

We are all safe, and hope you are doing well.

With regards,

Yours sincerely,
Debabrata Ghosh."

ASHA: Then this letter is also a hoax, isn't it?
BIMAL: But the Professor has written facts. You are likeable, and you also instil fear. I wonder how the Professor understood your nature. Even Robi Dutt is afraid of you. I well remember once he was telling me something and suddenly warned me not to bring it to your notice. Can you tell me the reason?
ASHA: I don't know, but I tell you this gentleman who has written this letter is least scared of me. He has literally bored me with his oft-repeated stories of his wife and children, and now we find he is a bachelor.
BIMAL: I'm in fact amused, you know. I'll go to his place.
ASHA: I, for my part, am puzzled. Having heard so much fiction, I won't be able to believe anybody easily. I know we are in the midst of untruth like the society, and the affectionate ties. But I used to like the conversation of the Professor. I was attracted, since I didn't enjoy such a happy life, as he depicted. I was more or less tempted. Even though it is false. In such a case, what is true in this world? Can you say, Bimal?
BIMAL: Calm yourself. I am going now and shall come back with the details of the Professor.

After Bimal goes away, Asha comes out and watches a few plants in pots outside. They are in bloom. After a little while, she slowly retraces her steps to the door. As she is about to enter the room, she turns around and finding somebody in the distance, takes a few steps and calls loudly.

ASHA: Prof. Ghosh, Prof. Ghosh!

As before, Prof. Ghosh comes to her laughing, with books and umbrella in his hands.

DEBA: What a pleasure indeed! You are standing outside.

ASHA: I think you are on your way for a tuition.
DEBA: You are right.
ASHA: I got your letter, but I'm sorry I couldn't reply. When I have met you personally, there's no further necessity to write letters. What do you say?
DEBA: I feel happy to get letters, and keep many of them safely.
ASHA: Are you busy this evening, Prof. Ghosh?
DEBA: Not particularly.
ASHA: Then how do you like my going to your place and being introduced to your Pala?
DEBA: Oh, Pala? It's a very good suggestion. She is herself most anxious to meet you. But you know——
ASHA: What?
DEBA: It is not possible to-day. She went to her father's house only last night.
ASHA: So what? Let's go there and meet her.
DEBA: (Laughing) It's not in Calcutta. It is a long distance. That's the trouble.
ASHA: Oh, I see. Come on, let's go in. I have to give you something.
DEBA: Sure.

Asha and Debabrata go in. Asha puts on the light. She takes out the money from the drawer and hands it over to Debabrata.

DEBA: You have redeemed your whole debt, I see.

ASHA: Yes. I have also given you back your freedom.

DEBA: Many thanks, but there was no hurry for this.

ASHA: Shall I ask you one question? Will you truly answer me?

DEBA: Yes, certainly.

ASHA: Was it so necessary to tell me so many lies?

DEBA: What do you mean?

ASHA: Don't you understand? Pala, your sons, daughter, your family—didn't you tell me all those tales? You are a bachelor and you live in a hotel. I have come to know the truth.

DEBA: Have you? Who told you? Is it Robi Dutt?

ASHA: Whoever he may be! What a shame! You have fooled me for such a long time.

DEBA: No, I have not fooled you. . . . . What I mean . . . . .

ASHA: A low born, mean minded person only can play such practical jokes.

DEBA: You're unnecessarily getting excited, without understanding me. I haven't played any joke.

ASHA: Please don't talk. I can't believe a word of it.

DEBA: (Pausing a while) You are cross with me, while I'm not the only person who told lies. You too told lies. You threatened me several times that you would report me to Pala, that you would take me to task, and so on, whereas you never intended them. Of course——

ASHA: I have no time to appreciate your intellectual gymnastics. I am going out.

DEBA: Let us both start. I'll take you to the house of a student of mine. What I was actually telling you——

ASHA: No more talk, please. Good-bye.

DEBA: Oh, Good-bye.

Asha closes the door. Debabrata stands outside for a few moments and goes away. Asha takes out the letter from the drawer and reads. At this time, Debabrata comes back and presses the calling bell. Asha opens the door and is surprised.

ASHA: You've come back?

DEBA: No, I mean, there was a mistake. As a matter of fact, today is not the day of my tuition. By mistake, I have come to this locality. If you don't believe me, you can have a look at my time-table. (Hurriedly opens a note book, turns the pages and shows her). Yes, look here—Shibnath Sen, Wednesday and Saturday. Today is Tuesday.

ASHA: It may be, but you haven't come by mistake. You have come on purpose. Who knows if you have a student at all in this locality? It may be another trick of yours.

DEBA: This is really too much. You suspect me without reason. I tell you I can take you now to my student's house. They are quite big people. They will be pleased to receive you.

ASHA: You may kindly stop joking with me.

DEBA: If you object, I'll never do it. It's against my nature.

ASHA: I'm amazed how God created you all out of the same mould. My husband, Robi Dutt, you, Bimal—all are alike. Do you find any difference amongst all of you?

DEBA: Poles apart. Your husband is a wealthy man, couldn't feel happy even with a pretty wife, and is accustomed to an aristocratic life. Robi Dutt is too proud and suffers from over-confidence. These people may fall down from their own created pedestals, but will never admit defeat. Then, Bimal. He is a boy, with plenty of money. He doesn't know what to do with it, and cannot decide anything. And I——

ASHA: Why do you stop? Go on.

DEBA: Let me stop here. If you hear, you may get excited again.

ASHA: I have respected you in my heart all these days, and thought you were coming to me due to fear of my blackmail. I've treated you as a strong man, who courageously and openly admitted his pure love towards his wife, children and happy family life. Now I know it's nothing but a bare-faced lie. You've been visiting me not out of fear, but of your own free-will, and to be amused, just as Robi Dutt comes here and many others.

DEBA: I have admitted all your accusations. There's nothing more to charge me with. You should also give me an opportunity to explain.

ASHA: Please, excuse me. It'll be another day. I'm unable to stand any more today.

DEBA: Give me five minutes. I wish to tell you a small story before I leave. There was a writer in English literature, whose name was Charles Lamb.

ASHA: What will I gain by Lamb's life?

DEBA: Please listen. (Pause). Charles Lamb used to work as an ordinary clerk in a mercantile office on a small salary. As the youths generally do, he too loved a girl, but couldn't marry her. Lamb's sister, Mary, had at that time became insane. One day, she happened to kill her mother in one of her lunatic fits, and she was arrested by the Police. Charles gave an undertaking to the Police that he would be completely responsible for Mary and brought her home. All his time was spent in looking after her, and so he could not marry later on. The girl he loved was married elsewhere, and she begot children, whom Charles Lamb used to see and feel that they were his own, and feel in his mind that the girl was his wife. (Smiles). There's a personal essay of Lamb. If you get an opportunity, I wish you read it. The essay is entitled "Dream Children" —

As he says the story, slowly his voice becomes hoarse.

ASHA: Dream Children!

DEBA: You said correctly that in this world there are certain people who exist by dreaming only. Let me take leave of you today. I have vexed you a lot. If possible, please try to forgive me.

Debabrata takes his books and umbrella, and slowly walks out without looking at Asha any more. Asha, however, goes on staring at him. Suddenly she gets up and shouts for him: Prof. Ghosh, Prof. Ghosh! Debabrata comes back.

ASHA: I've forgot to give you some news, and didn't even thank you for your help.

DEBA: What is it ?
ASHA: I think I have got that job in Delhi.
DEBA: Congratulations.
ASHA: It's due to the application prepared by you. I'm obliged.
DEBA: Oh, that's nothing. So, on to Delhi, isn't it ? When are you going there ?
ASHA: They told me at the time of interview I should be ready to join by the beginning of next month.
DEBA: I see. If I pass this way for my tuitions, I shall look at this house, and it shall bring back many memories of you. (Sighs deep) It's really funny. Although we were acquainted recently, I feel that ours was an old and intimate friendship.
ASHA: (As she talks, she enters the room) It's probably because we met in exceptional circumstances. We were brought together at the death's door.
DEBA: I'm only sorry that I have failed to save you in the end. It's my fault that I irritated you.
ASHA: No more of it. Come on, will you have a chocolate ? I've got it in my bag.
DEBA: Sure.
ASHA: When the mouth is sweetened, we are friends again.
DEBA: But I haven't quarrelled with you.
ASHA: I have got a doubt. Will you clear it ?
DEBA: What doubt ?
ASHA: Why have you told me the story of Dream Children ?
DEBA: Because I like it.
ASHA: It's not merely that, Who's Pala? Won't you tell me ?—
DEBA: Pala is a girl's name.
ASHA: Please.
DEBA: Her original name is Utpala. She is my friend's sister.
ASHA: Then ?
DEBA: What do you want to know ?
ASHA: Please, Professor.
DEBA: I used to like her much and I named her Pala. She was also attracted by me. The rest of the story is simple. It was a question of her status and mine, and she was married to someone else.
ASHA: Where is she now ?
DEBA: At her husband's house with her children.
ASHA: Oh. Do you visit her now and then ?
DEBA: No. What's the use of troubling her ?
ASHA: And you didn't get married also ?
DEBA: Didn't get a chance. Actually, I couldn't find a girl.
ASHA: Anybody would laugh, if you say you couldn't find a girl.

DEBA: There's no dearth of girls, but not one of my choice, I mean like Pala. She has got herself imprinted in my mind like Helen of Troy. I would be disappointed, if I begin to compare any girl with her. Now even if the real Pala comes to me, perhaps I may not accept her also. I prefer only my ethereal Pala. Believe me, she is my real Pala. She speaks to me, laughs with me, and narrates stories to me. When I am sick, she sits close to my head for nights on end. I'm pained to see her unpleasant, and am frightened when she loses her temper. I can never tolerate her tears.
ASHA: Professor !
DEBA: I feel lighter after I have told you all this, which I couldn't do to anybody else. Pardon me, I never wanted to deceive you with lies. I wanted to tell you about Pala at a suitable opportunity. (Pause). Can you get me a glass of water, please ?
ASHA: Sure.

Asha gives him a glass of water. Debabrata drinks the water and returns the glass to her. He holds her other hand lightly.

DEBA: I have narrated to you many things today, as I pleased, without caring to know how you take them.
ASHA: I liked it immensely.
DEBA: But I haven't finished, you know.
ASHA: Then, go ahead.
DEBA: Probably I would have continued to live with my visionary Pala and ended my life without being much affected, but when I had seen you on that first night, my dream broke. I felt Pala had come down to earth in you.
ASHA: (Looks at him) Professor !
DEBA: Your looks, your features, your voice —these are familiar to me. The beautiful hair on your head, your gait, your accent, your movements, and your clean mind—I could never imagine that my Pala would come to me in such a perfect form.
ASHA: Don't you speak like that, Professor. I m afraid.
DEBA: Afraid of what, Asha ?
ASHA: All the subtle sentiments in me were dead, but today they seem to be waking up again. Professor, everybody wishes to live, isn't it? Nobody would like to die. (Pause) But, Professor, can you assure me that this isn't a mirage?
DEBA: No, Asha, it's not. This is life.
ASHA: I see. This joy, this happiness, this love —Professor !
DEBA: Asha !

Both catch hold of each other's hands and look at each other intently. At this juncture, Robi Dutt enters the stage in a drunken state. He pushes the door with a jerk and coming into the room, notices Debabrata and Asha. He laughs boisterously.

ROBI: Fine, fine, Excellent. The drama is reaching its climax. (Both of them separate). What happened ? Why should you feel shy about it ? The pose was wonderful, holding each other's hands. Resume it, please. I'll just take a photograph.
ASHA: Please, Robi, stop it.

ROBI: Why should I ? I told you I liked the way you were standing. Actually, what was on your mind—to pose as a perfect couple, or a pair of love-birds.
DEBA: What will please you ?
ROBI: Shut up. I'm talking to Asha, who is true to her name.
ASHA: You're terribly drunk, Robi.
ROBI: What's there left for me except drink ? You have forsaken me like an old shoe, and are enjoying yourself with others without compunction.
DEBA: Would it be too much to ask you to talk in a gentlemanly manner ?
ROBI: I do behave with gentlemen in a gentlemanly manner, but not with fellows like you. Bare-faced liar ! What kind of Professor are you ? Professor of lies ?
ASHA: I say, Robi, what's all this ? I won't allow you to insult the professor in my house.

Debabrata walks up to him seriously and slaps his face.

ROBI: Oh! It's because he is a respectable man, who makes an honest living with his wife and children, is it? A most dishonourable, cheap fellow without any shelter but for the disreputable hotel, where he is put up—

ASHA: There's a limit to my patience, Robi. I wish you get out of here at once.

ROBI: If I don't?

DEBA: Then I'll be compelled to neck you out.

ROBI: What? You dare to talk to me like that! I'll thrash you and teach manners to you, my dear Cheap Jack!

Debabrata walks up to him seriously and slaps his face. Robi Dutt is stunned. Asha remains silent.

ROBI: Well, Asha, I've now come to know what a turncoat a woman can become. When I am insulted in your own house by a mean fellow like this, you don't even protest.

ASHA: Probably you deserved it.

ROBI: I see. Anyway, let me tell you why I've come here today. I admit I'm no more a match for your wits: You have managed to dissuade Bimal from our venture, with the result that I've lost my only chance of producing a picture. I'm surrounded on all sides by creditors, and so I had no other alternative but to file my insolvency petition. All those, who used to adore me in the past, have developed a dislike to my very sight, and have gone to the extent of laying hands on me. You are aware how many women like you were maintained by me in the good old days. To-day you have the audacity to ask me to get out of your house. (Takes out a small phial from his pocket) All right, now listen why I'm here. (He fetches a glass and a whiskey bottle. Pouring whiskey into the glass). This is my old friend. There is a strong poison in this phial, which I'm mixing in this whiskey. I'm sure you now understand why I've come.

ASHA: What are you saying, Robi?

ROBI: Quite simple. It's enough if I gulp this down. That's all. The creditors won't trouble me any more. I will cease to be a target of your attacks. I'll attain salvation, from one and all—salvation.

ASHA: Don't be crazy.

ROBI: I've decided to take this step after much deliberation. I shall be alive after death, while you suffer a living death, and that too very gradually.

ASHA: What do you mean by all this?

ROBI: (Laughing) Ha, ha, ha. The police will come and find Robi Dutt's body in whose house, you know?—in Asha Choudhury's. They will detect poison in the whiskey glass. The rest is easy—murder—trial—sentence—

ASHA: What's this, Professor?

ROBI: What can the Professor do? At the most, he can give evidence in the court, but no one would believe him, as such practices are common in affairs connected with women. You also realise that our relationship is not unknown to all around us.

DEBA: If you get another opportunity to produce a picture, would you work?

ROBI: What?

DEBA: Don't you wish to live?

ROBI: I did in the past, and I lived all along with fond hopes. Now I've come to the conclusion that there's no more utility of my life. So I've got to die, and in my death I am determined to implicate you both.

DEBA: Suppose I advance you the money?

ROBI: (Laughs) It's not a paltry thousand like the house rent. It's about a lakh of rupees.

DEBA: I haven't got that much money, but then if I give you twentyfive thousand—

ROBI: (Winking his eyes) Twentyfive thousand?

DEBA: Yes. I can give you a cheque right now.

ROBI: Twentyfive thousand! That'll do for the present. I shall extract the balance from the distributors.

ASHA: What is it you are doing, Professor?

ROBI: Don't object, Asha. Allow me to make my last effort. I wish to live. I am awfully scared of death.

DEBA: Here's the cheque. I've crossed it.

ROBI: (With tears in his eyes) I don't know how to talk to you. I've misjudged you. Please forgive me. Asha, you both be happy. That's my request. I will not squander this money. This will enable me to rise up in life once again. (Holding Debabrata's hands) If I utter the word 'thanks', it'll be a pale expression of my real feelings of gratitude. May God bless you. To-day you have given fresh life to a down-trodden human being on the verge of extinction. You know, Asha, a black curtain was coming down over my eyes. I could clearly feel the inevitable beckoning. Now the darkness is clearing up. I begin to see light, getting brighter in golden yellow hues. I'll succeed this time. My picture will be released in the best theatres of Calcutta, the neon sign will glow at Chowringhee corner announcing Robi Dutt's next production. Let me go now. Probably I have wounded your feelings, but I have apologised to both of you. I'm off.

Robi Dutt opens the door and goes out happily.

ASHA: My God! I was frightened beyond measure.

DEBA: Of what, Asha, specially when I'm with you?

ASHA: I began to feel that after a long long time I had been blessed to taste the first fruits of real life, and if this crashed due to Robi Dutt's curses, my sorrow would have been limitless, Professor.

DEBA: I sincerely wish to see you happy.

ASHA: I'm happy. There's nothing more I want. My bad dream seems to have ended. Tell me, aren't you sorry to waste such a lot of money? (Smiles). You won't get it back. I know Robi well. He will burn it up in two days.

DEBA: (With a pale smile). Don't worry, Asha. It's a false cheque.

ASHA: What do you mean?

DEBA: I don't have that much money.

ASHA: (Surprised). What do you say? You have given him the cheque wantonly. He would come to know your game, as soon as he calls at the bank tomorrow. Why have you done it?

DEBA: To save you.

ASHA: Strange! You mean you don't mind destroying one to save another?

DEBA: There was no other solution. Can you imagine the consequences, if Robi took that poison?—police, enquiry, courts, no end to our worries.

ASHA: We both have boldly faced all that, and suffered, if necessary, with a smiling face. No, no, this isn't proper. Robi Dutt, I know, is not to be trusted, he is a man without character, but after all he is a human being. On the point of death, you tempted him with false hopes. Didn't you see how happy he felt and how he tried to acknowledge your help?

DEBA: I never thought of anything else except you. That's why——

ASHA: That's why you acted like a blind man.

DEBA: Love is blind——

ASHA: I don't appreciate such blind love; let others do it, whoever believes that foolish theory. You have yourself written to me in your letter that I can never compromise with injustice. I never did it, and probably will not in the future. (Sighing deep). Whatever it is, you please leave this place and go away somewhere for a few days.

DEBA: Why?

ASHA: It's very likely that Robi may harm you.

DEBA: And you?

ASHA: Forget about me.

DEBA: It can't be. If it's going out, we shall go together. Will you come away.

ASHA: Let me think.

DEBA: What's there to think? We are both in danger. I played that game only to gain a few hours. Let's go meanwhile to whatever place you say——

ASHA: (With a pale smile). And Robi Dutt will chase us like Pluto. That will be another drama.

DEBA: My brain refuses to work today. I shall come tomorrow morning and then let us do what we feel best.

ASHA: That's good.

DEBA: Then, let me get along. You will remain here won't you? If suddenly I get a brain wave, I'll rush here. (Pause). What are you thinking?

ASHA: Somehow I am troubled in my heart of hearts. I am questioning myself as to why I'm unable to retain this joy, this happiness, and this love.

DEBA: Asha, (Sighing deep)—this life of human beings is most complicated. Love cannot exist here.

ASHA: Love is eternal, love is immortal, it cannot die, Professor. We may travel far and wide and away from each other, but there is nothing like death for love. Good-bye, Professor.

Sighing deeply, Asha closes the door. Debabrata goes away. Asha stands silently for a few moments in the centre of the room. Then she goes and takes the poisoned whiskey glass left by Robi Dutt from the table. She comes again to the centre of the room. She puts out one light. Only the table lamp in the corner is lit. She writes a letter. She leaves it on the table, and puts a paper weight on it. She raises her hands and salutes. Exactly at this time Debabrata enters the stage in a disturbed state and presses the calling bell.

ASHA: (Frightened). Who's that?
DEBA: It's me, Debabrata.

Asha raised the whiskey glass and drinks it in one gulp. Debabrata knocks hard on the door.

DEBA: Open the door, Asha, open the door . . . . I've got a wonderful idea.

There is no response. Asha is slowly losing her senses. Debabrata goes to the back of the house and enters the room through the window, in the same way as at the beginning of the drama. He approaches Asha and springs back with fear.

DEBA: What happened, Asha? Asha, Asha, tell me.

He shakes up Asha, gets no response, looks at the empty whiskey glass, and also reads the letter on the table.

DEBA: Oh, God! What have you done, Asha? Why have you done this?

ASHA: Don't be angry with me. You have given me this fresh lease of life. Now I am not afraid to die.

DEBA: It's my mistake, I couldn't understand you earlier, and I did trouble you.

ASHA: No, Professor. I had not tasted real love before and so I was afraid of death at the first attempt. Now I am fearlessly dying, as I got what I wanted.
DEBA: Asha!

ASHA: Forget Asha, Professor. I shall always be alive as your Pala.
DEBA: Pala!

Asha falls down, Debabrata weeps bitterly. He recalls the first day's incident. He looks around vacantly. A thin rope hangs from the ceiling as on the first day. The curtain comes down.

NEITHER PRESIDENT NOR CONVENER BE

by

CHARULAL MUKHERJEE

WITH so much of Shakespeare in the air (not yet in the A.I.R. to be fed up) in his Quater Centenary (mind it quater, not 'quarter' in Shakespeare's mother tongue English—a grim reminder that the Bard of Avon had "small Latin and less Greek") the line that haunts me from Hamlet is the advice of Polonius to Laertes :

"Neither a borrower nor a lender be".

It will be a sacrilege to distort Shakespeare but one can just mend his sayings. A quote : "Ben Jonson's" He was not of an age, but for all time", could well be amended (italics ours) to. "He was not of one land, but of all the world" (Vide folder, William Shakespeare Quater Centenary, B.I.S.)

Thus fortified by an Englishman's liberty, this scribe by a fantastic association of ideas amended it to :

"Neither a President nor a convener be."

President of what ? Convener of what ? Why ? Why? Functions. Fanctions (if you choose to call it so)—I have heard it pronounced like that, times without number, by Rockefellers and "road-side Romeos "in Poundals (yes, pandals to purists). On oath I say—it is not a manufactured malapropism. I swear again, "like a Heathen", you may scold.

So it comes to this : Don't be either a President or a Convener of a function (yes Cultural as they say).

PRESIDENT ? Why not ? The observed of all observers, "the cynosure of neighbouring eyes", the focus of two slanting arc-lights in fullest blaze —on whom flowers are strewn and garlands hung— "Crowns and garlands cut from the branches of palms and lotos drawn from the water" (Songs of Bilitiz).

Pardon gentles all, you will find the answer in the following story connected with a combined festival commemorating Shakespeare and Tagore, Centenaries (an amalgum of 'Eve' and 'Post') of the national poets of India and England.

When a brain-wave struck the disciples of Dr. H. of Rangoon to organise a Cultural festival synthesizing Shakespere and Tagore at the Bengal Academy Hall and they asked the doyen of Bengali culture at Burma to preside over it, he was afire with enthusiasm. There would, be, the organisers said, a Gargantuan feast of play-readings, music, dance-dramas, solo dances of the fairies of Mid Summer Night's Dream, a scene from Valmiki Prativa, the Rehearsal scene from Hamlet etc. etc. Dr. H. thought and dreamed of the prospect, lapsed in a brown-study and felt he was calling upon the "Muse of fire, that would ascend the brightest heaven of invention! A kingdom for a stage, princes to act and monarchs to behold the swelling scene "and a' that and a' that." A D.Litt of Harvard would inaugurate the function and a homo multarum literarum would be the Chief Guest. The time for the festival is 6 p.m. sharp. Punctuality first target. Everything according to schedule. The artistes would be brought in timely, despatched timely. They have other engagements. The Chief Guest has a high blood-pressure and the inaugurator is nursing something like an arthritis.

The conveners have invited Mrs. Benjamin, the Bulbul of Shakespearean music and her husband (both Goanese) a maestro of the songs of East and West. Miss Loyla of Bombay will give a recital of Portia and Miss Mehta and her troupe will stage the English version of "Valmiki Prativa." It was agreed that they would be released by 6-30 P.M. as soon as their parts are over.

Morning of the festival. With a complete works of Shakespeare on his lap together with some translations from Tagore, President Dr. H. was scribbling on his pad:

1. Homely Shaks.

I remember the toddler Winston Churchill's cry on returning from a stage-play of Macbeth. "Daddy, Macbeth was speaking Shakespeare."

An eloquent commentary on the home-consumption of Shakespeare.

2. Tagore's "Chini go chini tomay ogo bideshini"—Of. Dark lady of Shaks' sonnets — mark English tune.

3. A joke.

I remember again how when Lady Macbeth was "mouthing it". . . . trippingly on the tongue". . . . . "Out, damned spot" in a Radio-play, the house-holder's dog SPOT listening to the relay, quietly walked out of the drawing-room.

President Dr. H. was at his post—one hour before the function. The reality was that the Inaugurator, motoring from Kemmendine, was delayed due to a street-accident and the Chief Guest from the Rangoon University campus was detained as his daughter-in-law had to be sent to a Maternity Home.

Bengal Academy Hall. Longyis shine with all their rain-bow hues. Mangoloid beauties in a fashion-parade with Gujerati, Sindhi, Bengali saris and salwars. The cosmopolitan audience all 'agog' with enthusiasm (to use a journalese). But suddenly the mikes fail with all the lights. Repairs take twenty minutes and then the mikes blare a cacophony. Adjustments take another five minutes.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said the inaugurator on his legs. The President Dr. H. suddenly received an S.O.S. from Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin that they must be off at 6-30 P.M., their scheduled departure. Miss Loyla (Portia) scrawled on a card, "It was settled that my car would come at 7 p.m. Please, I cannot wait." He stared at the slips: he felt the lights of his brain were fused.

The inaugurator starts from Shakespeare's deer-stealing episode, warms up with the sonnets, delves in the Dark Lady with her Shavian reorientation—katharsis—Bradley Coleridge, Lamb (Lear cannot be acted) German criticism, Russian communistic angle on Shaks.—Brings in Tagore (the inheritor of Vyas and Valmiki), compares his dramas with Shakespeare and the symbolical plays of west.

The Assistant Secretary steals into the dais on tip-toe and whispers into the ears of Dr. H., "Sir, Messrs. and Misses—are in tantrums. They say their parties are about to leave. Please stop the address."

"How can I lift up Olympus?" blurted out the President in an audible whisper, "Dr.—from Kemmendine is here on our invitation.

"But, sir . . . . . ."

"Patience," crooned the President with the most amiable smile he could summon. And then he mentally recited Cleopatra:

> "Patience is sottish, and impatience does become a dog that's mad."

Another Joint Secretary hands over a note, "Kindly ask the speaker to shorten. The Dancing troupe leaving."

The President looked glum and without his elan. How could he, observed of all observers, walk up to the mike and hand over a slip? That would be insulting a guest.

The inauguration took an hour. The Chief Guest had to be accommodated. He would be short, he said. "My blood-pressure won't allow a lengthy address."

Short? Shakespeare was compared with Aristophanes—Tagore's comedies were brought in relief—Sheridan's influence traced—Restoration Comedies—a fusion of East and West—"the twain shall meet. . . . ."

Behind the stage, the artistes were nagging. The President's heart went pit-a-pat. The last slip read, "The Kerala dancer has asked for his driver."

"Since there is no help let us kiss and part," mentally mumbled the President.

But the last slip was a bomb-shell. "Stop," wrote his missus from the auditorium. Electrified, the President was about to rush to the mike, when suddenly, the hurricane stopped with a long-drawn applause from the guests.

When he woke up from the stupor, President Dr. H. looked at his watch—8 p.m. Mr. and Mrs. — left? The Kerala dancer? "None left," twittered a girl Assistant Secretary. There Mrs.—was supervising the entrance of the table-harmonium on the stage with tambourines, tablas, and all "muraja, murali madhura". . . . . "with more peril in thine eye than twenty of their swords," happy, blinking, stagy, self-conscious. . . . . .

"Then why this 'pother'? Frailty, thy name is woman. The husband is a sne-man a hen-pecked hubby, "the President philosophised. He was feeling like tea. As he left for the tea-room for a pot of green-tea, a girl artiste was crooning:

"Love, love, nothing but love, still more—" from Troilus and Cressida.

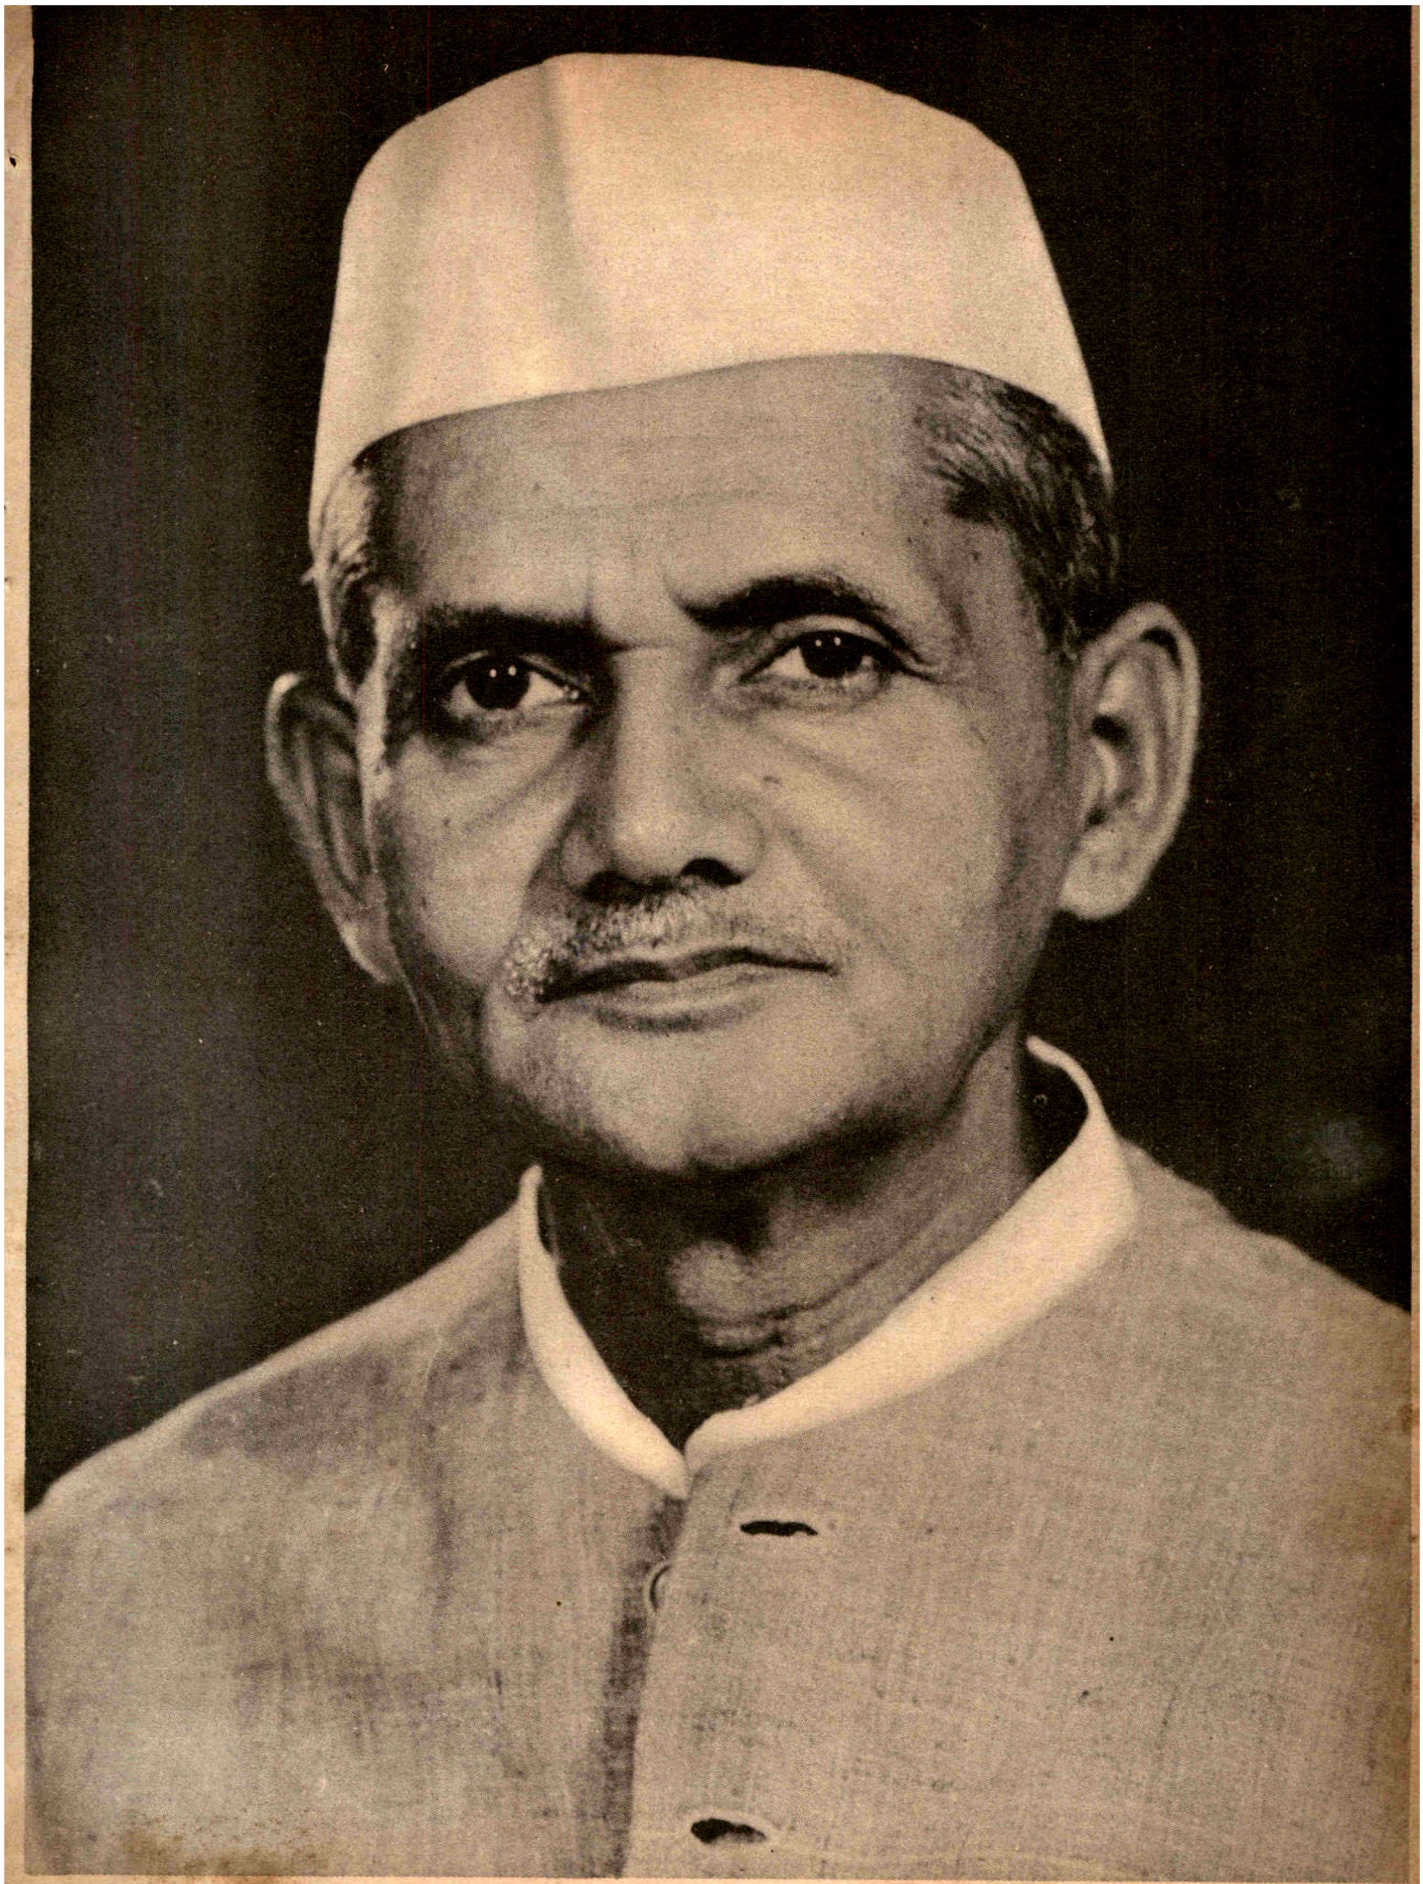
* * * *

Filled with a "humorous sadness" as Dr. H. was walking up, did he hear the lines?

"Second childishness and mere oblivion,

Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything."

The voice was from the green-room. "Can they mean me?" Dr. H. wondered and wondered.



OUR PRIME MINISTER

THERE is no accounting for personal preferences as far as places are concerned. One is influenced sometimes by the obvious aesthetic pleasure a place provides; at others, doubtless by sheer association. My predilection for, of all places, the Rue Lepic in Paris, seems utterly illogical. It has neither the fashionable aura of the Champs Elysees, nor the artistic and bohemian appeal of Montmartre or the Left Bank. In fact, it has no obvious claim to distinction whatsoever. At one end it forks off the Boulevard de Clichy, just where the husk of the old Moulin Rouge stands—a modernised, streamlined night club without any of the atmosphere it had in Toulouse Lautrec's day. The Rue Lepic winds over a hill whose highest points are the Sacre Coeur and Montmartre. In its first half, more fascinating than the second, the Rue Lepic is a shopping centre. Here things are cheap and those who have the time to haggle will find their efforts well repaid. In its second half, before the night clubs start, the Rue Lepic is a residential area which, with its quiet, shuttered, old-fashioned windows reminds one of Malabar Hill in the days before the flat system took over: in its queer, dirty sepulchral hotels, more than one character out of a Simenon novel has sought temporary refuge from justice. In the small alleys branching off from the main roads between the houses, there is invariably a great deal of activity of one sort or another. Carts rumble through cobbled side streets, and children under the influence of the cinema, play on the pavements, while cats chase each other over the tiled roofs. The Rue Lepic is a connecting link between the prosaic Paris of the housewives, and the enchanting Paris of the tourists. It has an "anything-can-happen" air, and in a small way, is a street full of petty excitement and unexpected farce.

It was quite by chance that my husband and I discovered the Rue Lepic. He had gone to enquire about a particular night club, and I walked down by the Moulin Rouge to buy some petit suisse, the cheese, which according to the initiated, is no cheese at all. It was being sold at a small counter in front of a shop. In the untidy glare of an unshaded lamp, the owner, all in white, was a man who might have been almost any age. He was completely absorbed in an Ellery Queen detective novel. Having read it myself, I appreciated his avid interest. A shapeless woman, with a half-filled shopping bag was arguing with him.

"Five francs? Who do you think you are? I'll give you two!"

"Five," he said mechanically, his eyes still glued to the page.

"Two-fifty, you rogue!"

'Five." he said, turning a page.

"Three!.....Or I'll call the cop."

"Five," he droned.

"Four-fifty," and that's my last offer."

I don't know what they were arguing about. He reached below the counter, wrapped something in paper and handed it to her. She fumbled in her shopping bag, and brought out her purse, grumbling the while.

"Have you ever heard of such a thing? What is this country coming to? Soon, we'll be murdered in our beds!"

With each statement, she thrust her rather unpleasant warty face into mine. I shrugged and approached the counter she'd left.

'Yes?" said the man, without looking up.

"Can I.....can I ....have some petit suisse?"

I suppose it was the voice and the accent which were all wrong. He looked up from his book. "Ah! A stranger!" he said.

"Indian," I murmured.

His eyes showed a spark of interest.

"I have just been reading a serial on India,...." He turned from the counter to a rack behind him, and thumbed through a pile of papers on it.

'Here it is," he announced triumphantly. "All about India!"

I looked at another one of those "mystic East" articles.

"Must be wonderful to be a maharajah!" he said.

"Not much, any more," I replied.

He looked disappointed. He asked a number of questions and it was difficult to cut his enthusiasm short.

"Escargot? What's that?"

"My petit suisse," I said firmly. He fumbled in an ice-chest behind a counter, while I picked up the Ellery Queen.

"Did you guess who did the murder?"

"No, of course not! Do you think I would be reading it if I had?"

"I suppose not."

"He gave the petit suisse, and as I was leaving, held the book up.

"Who was it?" he threw after me.

"The doctor's wife."

"Why did you tell me?" he said perversely.

"But you asked me!" I protested.

"Yes, but I thought you wouldn't tell me. A hint perhaps, but not actually tell me!"

I joined the strollers who were mostly habituees of the place, out for their evening walk. They were mostly middle class people and the street seemed to have both the harassed housewife—and the elegant loafer. In a little while, my husband joined me and we proceeded to look for some sugar —to go with the cheese.

The grocer was a big, untidy man.

"What do you want?" he asked belligerently.

"Some sugar please."

"How much?"

I should have known this would happen. Those were the days before we were introduced to the metric system.

"Very, very little," I said, hoping it would work.

"So much?" he asked, holding up a thumb and forefinger, about an eighth of an inch apart.

"Give me a kilogram," I said boldly.

I was horrified to discover how much a kilogram was, but had not the temerity to argue. My husband's horrified query as to why I needed so much sugar was more than justified.

"Please," I said. "I don't want to argue with this chap. Let's just take it!"

When he handed the package over, my husband essayed his few words of French. "L'addition s'il vous plait....the bill, please?"

The grocer shook a thick finger in his face and said in English: "No l'addition....cash!"

We paid quickly, and fled towards the higher reaches of the road, and stopped at a small bar in a side street. It was almost full. There were a couple of young men in T-s-irts and some older ones with berets and sabots. One of two women who looked like artists sipped coffee, while behind us, a serious-looking young man with thick spectacles read Jean-Paul Sartre. Two Africans were discussing something loudly in a kind of French I couldn't follow, while the woman with them, who looked like a model had an air of perpetual boredom. One or two couples regarded each other intently as if the world outside was a mere hallucination.

After a few drinks we sought our dinner at a shabby little restaurant nearby. It was the kind of place where bills are scribbled on the paper tablecloths, and where rabbit in lieu of chicken was liable to arrive. At the moment it was short-staffed, for the single-aproned attendant was deputising for the cook. He brought the menu and asked what madame would like. I rattled off an order for an omlette and garnishings.

"What about monsieur? Hors d'oeuvres, perhaps?"

"Yes. What do you suggest?" my husband asked.

"You would like some escargot? No?"

"Escargot? What's that?"

"Hors d'oeuvres, monsieur," the man said obligingly.

"Is it fish?"

"No, not fish. It is small....." he made a circle of thumb and forefinger.

"Ah! Round. Meat balls, perhaps?"

"Not meat..... No, no....."

"If it's not fish or meat, what is escargot?" my husband asked me.

"Escargot?.....Oh, its some kind of hors d'oeuvres," I said absent-mindedly, reading my paper.

"I know it's hors d'oeuvres," he said patiently. "I want to know what kind. Animal, vegetables or mineral?"

"Frankly, I've forgotten what it means. Why not have something else?"

"I shan't! I'll have escargot."

It arrived quite fast.

"Hm.....delicious!" he exclaimed.

I looked at his plate. He seemed to be eating

THE ARMY OF GHOSTS

By L. N. BIRLA

THERE ruled in Ahmedabad a king by the name of Mohammed Beg. Large parts of Sourashtra and Gujrat were under his sway. He had a commander in the army called Hathikhan Pathan. Hathikhan also acted as Governor of Patan. But the commander was a man of straw. There were allegations against him but he paid no attention to such complaints and this had created a sense of frustration among the people.

About fifty miles from Patan was situated the town Soubhat, and Tejsingh Tunwar ruled there. He had a beautiful daughter of about fifteen years of age. Her eyebrows were slanting like fishes, while the two large eyes were like lotus buds. Her nose was like the bill of a parrot and the two lips were of the colour of coral. Her teeth were pure white like pearls of the first water and a long neck like a Kurja bird (a kind of stork). She had a well sculptured body, and was like a second moon on the earth. The fame of her beauty spread far and wide.

Hathikhan also heard of it and decided to kidnap the daughter of Tejsingh. He collected about a thousand men who were well trained in riding and quietly reaching Soubhat at night he attacked the town. The queen of Soubhat with her daughter under the cover of darkness, escaped and went to her brother, while Tejsingh together with three hundred of his soldiers was killed in defending the town.

When Hathikhan reached the palace he was disappointed to find that the queen and her daughter had already gone. In his fury he ransacked the palace and burnt the whole town.

Tejsingh and his soldiers became ghosts and they visited Soubhat at night. The town was already ruined and when they found it was also haunted, even those near about fled afar. Some cowherds used to tend their cattle there during the day, but at night they went back to their villages.

An ascetic was travelling in easy stages in that part of the country. One day, late in the evening he reached the ruined town of Soubhat. The cowherds were just returning with their cattle. They saw the aged and venerable ascetic, and went to him for his blessings. They also informed him that the town was haunted. But if he would so agree, they would feel honoured to take him with them and put him up in their village.

Replied the ascetic: "My boys! I am neither afraid of ghosts nor of death. Even if I die, it does not matter because I am always in the services of God and if He so desires, I shall go to Him after death."

The ascetic proceeded towards the burnt town. The only good place which had a roof over it being the king's palace, the ascetic went inside and in one corner of the large hall, put down his things and went to sleep.

After an hour or so, he was awakened because of a strong light falling on his face. The whole place was brightly lighted with the chandeliers. The ascetic found servants cleaning the big hall and laying cover for dinner. Shortly afterwards when everything was ready, he saw a tall and comely figure having a kingly look approaching with one hundred followers. The king sat in the centre while the officers sat all around him. While they were having their dinner and drinking wines, lo! a few dancing girls arrived and started dancing to entertain them. The ascetic was surprised to see such happenings and was wondering whether they were really ghosts or living beings. In the meantime, the king turned his head and his eyes fell on the ascetic in that corner. Tejsingh ordered two of his officers to fetch the ascetic. The officers went and with due respects requested him to present himself before the king.

King Tejsingh after bowing and paying his respects to the ascetic said: "Oh! revered man, know that I am Tejsingh, king of Soubhat. All of the men whom you see around here including the dozen girls, are all ghosts." Then he narrated to him what had happened at Soubhat and how while defending the town they all had been killed. And he said: "The only way to end our living as ghosts is firstly to marry my daughter to a suitable and worthy young man, and secondly to take revenge against Mohammed Beg and his commander Hathikhan. Unless these conditions are fulfilled, we shall all continue as ghosts till the last day. My request to you, Oh, Holy man, is to kindly proceed to Muaha. If anybody could help, it is my friend, king of Muaha. He has a brave and worthy son named Jagmal. If he agrees to marry my daughter and promises to take revenge, I shall be rid of this life of ghosts."

The ascetic promised to convey his message to the king of Muaha and also assured the king that he would do his best to persuade Rawal Mallinath to agree to such a proposal.

When it was near about dawn, all on a sudden the ghosts and everything disappeared from the hall, and all became quiet as before. The ascetic rested a little while and, next day he took the road to Muaha arriving there after about a week.

On the outskirts of the city, he took shelter under a tree. Those who saw, thronged to him the whole day. As the ascetic was a well-known figure, there was a large crowd standing around him to do obeisance to him. The next day the king of Muaha also heard about his arrival, and with his queen accompanied by about fifty officers went there to visit him. After he had enquired about his wellbeing, the ascetic asked the king to call Prince Jagmal also as he had a message for both of them. The prince was sent for. When he arrived, the ascetic took the king and the prince aside and conveyed to them the message of King Tejsingh. He also added. "O! King, it is your duty to come forward and help brave men like Tejsingh and take revenge against the turpitudes of Hathikhan and his king Mohammed Beg.

Prince Jagmal was a brave man and he was ever ready to help all those, who were in distress. Therefore, it didn't take more than a moment to decide what he would do. He immediately agreed to marry the daughter of Tejsingh and also take revenge against the king of Ahmedabad.

The ascetic returned to Soubhat and going to the same hall in the palace stayed there for the night. The events of the previous night started to repeat again. The king arrived with his officers and the girls started dancing. After Tejsingh had finished his dinner. his eyes fell on the ascetic. This time, he himself got up and approached him.

The ascetic informed the king how he had carried out his mission at Muaha and how Prince Jagmal had readily agreed to marry his daughter. So when he had already done so much, the ascetic was requested to contact the queen of Tejsingh and inform her of what had happened in Soubhat. He was also to carry the message from Tejsingh to the queen that she should return with her daughter to Soubhat and make arrangements for the marriage with Prince Jagmal.

On an auspicious day the prince at the appointed hour with five of his friends arrived at Soubhat. The queen was already there with her daughter and at night in the presence of Tejsingh they were married. After the marriage, Tejsingh blessed the happy couple and informed Jagmal of the second condition that he should take revenge against King Mohammed Beg and Hathikhan. He also said that his three hundred soldiers who had died with him would be there to help the prince whenever he went to war against Mohammed Beg. When he saw the morning approaching, the ghost departed and Prince Jagmal with his bride returned to Muaha

The news of the marriage of Jagmal with the daughter of Tejsingh became known everywhere. Hathikhan got wind of it and he became furious. He started making arrangements to fight with Jagmal and kidnap his wife. Muaha fort was a very well protected place and it required a great planning to attack it.

Jagmal also learnt the news. He was also not idle. Mohammed Beg was a big king and had larger resources. It was difficult for Jagmal to go and attack him to win. The only course left for Jagmal was to induce Mohammed Beg to attack Muaha and defeat him there. Preparations, therefore, were made by Jagmal with this strategy in mind. With the rolling of the days, years flew quickly and before anybody realised, three years had already passed. On this side, Tejsingh was getting impatient, but having no means of direct contact with Jagmal he was helpless.

The Princess, Jagmal's wife, remembered the day she was married. When the proposal was mooted to marry her in her father's palace at Soubhat, she was afraid. All the time she was gaping from behind her mother with fear. Every noise made her jittery. Then suddenly she saw her father poised under the glittering chandelier.

He was adorned in full kingly regalia. He had his gold handled sword hanging from his waist from the brocade belt, his broad forehead shining under his turban. She was enchanted beyond fear. Without touching her, he blessed her by raising his hands and said: "Mrinal, now it is in your hands to get me my freedom from a ghost's life. Don't let your husband forget about me."

..... take revenge against Mohammad Beg and his commander Hathikhan

Princess Mrinal tried to speak but her words were lost in a blush and murmuring. Then a haze surrounded him and slowly he vanished. Only then she realised what had happened. And now three years after that, she still remembered every detail, as if she was just watching the scene happening at that very moment. She could not control herself and a sob escaped her.

Jagmal was resting by her side. He sat up. This was as if a signal for her. She put her face on his lap and burst out.

"Why, Mrinal, what has happened?" Jagmal was full of apology. He put his hands on her back and after a great deal of cajoling, she replied. She reminded him of how her father was still a ghost and that though three years had passed he had not done anything to fulfil his vow.

Jagmal suddenly realised that so much time had passed. He had been so busy with strengthening his fortifications. He had also trained up a good fighting force. He told her: "Oh my lady, now my preparations are practically at an end, and I shall certainly take some action by which I shall force Mohammed Beg and Hathikhan to attack me in Muaha".

In the month of Chaitra (about March) falls the annual festival of unmarried girls. They worship Mahesh and Gouri and pray for worthy and beautiful bridegrooms for themselves. After worshipping, the idols are taken in procession with music and dancing through the city.

King Mohammed Beg had a grown up daughter of the age of sixteen. Her name was Gindoli. She was a beautiful girl, and though she could not worship Mahesh and Gouri, being a daughter of a Mohammedan king, she always joined the procession. All the best musicians and dancers of her father's realm accompanied the procession. She herself sat in a palanquin.

Jagmal decided upon that particular day to make his first move. He selected fifty brave soldiers of his army with very fast horses. One by one, all of them entered Ahmedabad quietly and waited on the road as if to watch the procession. When the palanquin carrying Gindoli reached there, they stopped the palanquin and capturing Gindoli put her on a horse and raced back to Muaha. Before anybody could become wiser, they had gone quite a distance. The army of King Mohammed Beg got ready to follow them, but it was already too late. They soon reached Muaha and there Gindoli was married to the younger brother of Prince Jagmal.

Mohammed Beg was furious and Hathikhan became so white with rage that it appeared as if he had no blood left in the body.

Mohammed Beg ordered the whole of his army and after selecting thirty thousand strong, he started for Muaha.

In order to reach Muaha they had to pass through the valley of desert which was full of high sand dunes. Jagmal hid his army behind the sand dunes and deployed them for a surprise attack on Mohammed Beg. Mohammed Beg's army was preceded by his scouts. One by one they were picked up by unseen hands, and Mohammed Beg lost all his intelligence about the enemy.

It was just before dawn on the sixth day when Mohammed Beg's army passed that spot which was selected by Jagmal. Because of the journey, the army was feeling tired and the beasts also were not in their humour. Suddenly Jagmal attacked. The ghost-army of Tejsingh also arrived instantly and joined the fray on the side of Jagmal. Whenever the ghosts struck they shouted: "Take it from Jagmal". The men of Mohammed Beg were killed in hundreds and thousands. They only noticed a sword falling on them but saw no man doing it. This created a panic among them and very soon they started running. Soon the run became a rout. Mohammed Beg with great difficulty escaped but Hathikhan was killed in the battle.

Jagmal actually did not have to do much, and before his men even could put up a good fight they were surprised to find that the army of Mohammed Beg was already routed and gone. Jagmal returned to his town in triumph. What the Beg's army could not understand was how a single Jagmal could reach thousands of men and strike them with his sword.

Jagmal grew into a legend in Ahmedabad. His name would create a profound effect on the soldiers of Mohammed Beg. It was enough to shout the name and they would throw their swords and run.

"Are you quite sure its all right?" I asked diffidently. "Are you sure you like it?"

"Its delicious!"

"What does it taste like?"

"Can't say, quite. Its like mushroom....only more spongy and different. Now that you've seen it, do you recognise it?"

"It's....I'm glad you like it," I said parrying the question.

"Have some."

"No thank you," I said hastily, wondering at the perversity of human nature, for how often had I been in despair at home over his squeamishness, and here he was eating escargot of all things!

"Do have some!" he insisted.

"No really....I'll stick to my omlette."

"Why won't you have some?" he asked suddenly suspicious.

"Because," I said slowly, and perhaps a little maliciously, "I don't like snails!"

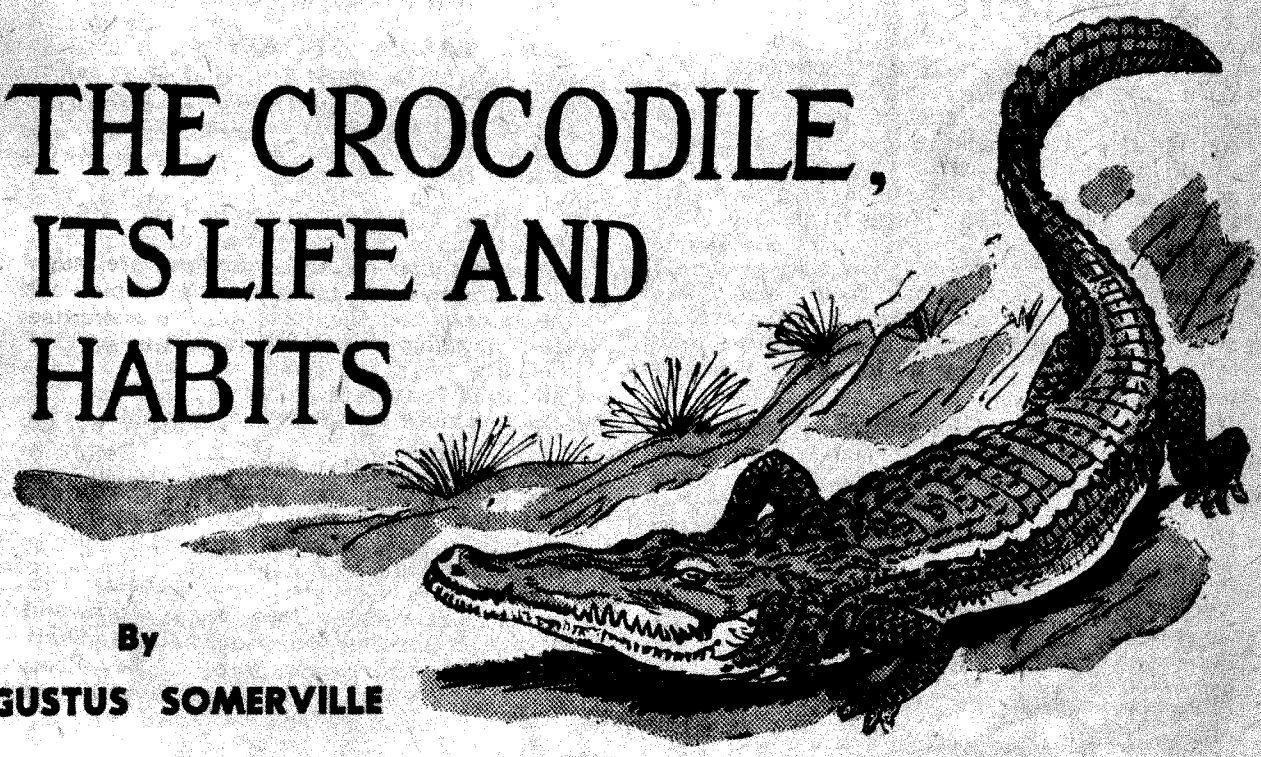
THE CROCODILE, ITS LIFE AND HABITS



By

AUGUSTUS SOMERVILLE

I HAVE always been fascinated by the crocodile and have never lost an opportunity of studying it at close quarters. To the average man, this reptile is sinister, repulsive and dangerous. But to those who live in close proximity to it, the crocodile is no worse than the many far greater dangers they have to face in the jungles. This repulsion is probably based on some atavistic memory of dinosaurs and dragons that preyed on man in his pre-historic past and the appearance of this saurian, so dragon-like and sinister, awakens in him a response of fear and loathing.

When Dost Mohammad my shikari informed me that a large number of these saurians were always to be found basking on the sands that fringed the banks of the Raimangal River that lay a few miles to the East of our present camp, I immediately directed him to proceed in that direction. Care must be taken when navigating this stream. Not only is it broad and rough, but it forms the Eastern Boundary of Pakistan with West Bengal.

When we emerged on to the waters of the Raimangal it was still early dawn. Edging our way closely along its bank, we were gratified on observing several large crocodiles basking in the early morning sun. Around them the usual crocodile birds fluttered in large numbers and our approach was a signal for them to spring into the air, uttering their shrill, harsh cries, warning the sleeping saurians that danger was approaching. These birds are a species of Egyptian plover who appear to obtain much of their sustenance from the worms, ticks and other vermin that conceal themselves in the cracks and crevices of the armoured backs of the crocodiles and in repayment for this free lunch, constitute a valuable warning system for their hosts. Herodotus, before 450 B.C. is credited with the story that these birds actually enter the distended jaws of the crocodiles basking on the sands and pick out the vermin and bits of decaying meat adhering to their gums. How far this is true I am unable to state, as although I have watched these birds for long periods at a time, I have never had the good fortune to see any of them engaged on this essential dental service. This does not mean that the statement is incorrect. Many shikaris affirm that they have actually seen the birds so engaged, but I have probably been unfortunate.

After spending the major portion of the day in drifting up and down these banks, I realized that it was practically impossible to approach sufficiently close to the basking saurians to study them in their natural habitat. Selecting a patch of firm grassland, sheltered by solitary tree, I directed the Manjis to beach the boat and while Dost Mohammad and I proceeded on foot along the banks, the rest of the crew erected the tents and set up camp for a protracted stay. About a mile south of our camp, Dost Mohammad and I came on a site that was ideal for the purpose I had in mind. Here the sand was fine and deep and the forest at one point approached fairly close to the water's edge. Here well hidden in the dense scrub jungle, I directed Dost Mohammad to build a "Hide". As we were not waiting for tiger or deer, this shelter was not to be a very elaborate affair. Just a screen of grass and leaves sufficient to protect the front and keep me from being observed by any crocodile leaving the stream and approaching the bank. Here for the next few days I sat at my ease in a deck chair and studied these saurians as they crawled up the bank.

In West Bengal, in fact in the whole Gangetic Delta, we have three distinct species of crocodile. The first of these is called, locally, a sose, and is well known to sportsmen as a marsh crocodile. This species seldom exceeds five feet in length. It is found in shallow water in marsh-lands, in jheels and creeks. It lives entirely on carrion, fish and the like. Burrying itself in the mud it awaits the passing of small animals, like kids, fowls, ducks and piglets, all coming from neighbouring villages to feed. A swift blow from its powerful tail precipitates the animal or bird into the water, where it is promptly seized and eaten. It does not attack cattle or man. This crocodile is noted for the distances it will travel in quest of fresh feeding waters. It is easily traced from the broad, flat trail left by its tail, as it wanders over the country.

A few years ago, when visiting Hazaribagh, I shot one of these reptiles in a small village called Khatkamsari on the old Chattra Road. Miles away from the nearest water supply, this crocodile had taken up its residence in the village tank or rather

The crows now swept in and in a moment several viciously snapping crocodiles were picked up . . . .

jheel, where the disappearance of several kids, piglets and ducks, soon made its presence known.

The sose is held in high esteem by fishermen. The fat when boiled down and clarified is used as a specific for rheumatism.

The most popular crocodile from both a sporting and commercial standpoint is the "Gharial", also called a "Bhoja" from the tufted snout or sponge-like termination on its upper jaw. This is the largest of our fish-eating crocodiles. It frequently reaches 25 feet in length. Its snout is usually four times as long as the base of its skull. Its jaws are armed with rows of formidable looking teeth, 27 on each side of the upper jaw. Its fingers and toes are partially webbed. Although the colour varies, the prevailing tint is dark olive, paler in young crocodiles and spotted with brown. Although living mainly on fish, it evinces a partially for carrion both human and animal, so frequently seen floating down our rivers. It seldom attacks man or large animals.

Finally, we have the mugger, the most dreaded of all our crocodiles. Similar in every respect to the Gharial, this saurian has heavy, powerful jaws, the snout being about twice as long as the breadth at the base of the skull. It carries about 17 to 19 teeth on each side of its upper jaw. Its fingers and toes are partially webbed, with a serrated fringe on the outer side of the legs. This is the true man-eating crocodile and is frequently observed far out at sea. It often exceeds 30 feet in length.

Although I spent about 15 days in my hide on the Raimangal Sands, I never had an opportunity of witnessing two crocodiles mating. This, the fishermen informed me takes place at the beginning of the rains, when the turbulent waters lend zest to their courtship. Once the rains are over and the biological urge has cooled off, the male crocodiles tend to drift away from the females. The latter, taking advantage of the receding waters, press their way up-stream till they reach a favourable chur or sand bank where they proceed to lay their eggs. My luck at this time was wonderful. It was about the fifth day of my vigil that I observed, late one evening, a huge Gharial cautiously drifting in towards the bank. For a long while she lay partially submerged in the water, only her eyes and the end of his snout, visible. Then obviously satisfied that no danger threatened she moved in on to the sand and slowly dragged herself out of the water. Even now her movements were cautious and restrained. A quick survey of the terrain evidently satisfied her and she moved slowly up the bank and to my alarm directly in my direction. When about ten feet from the hide, she turned away towards a clean patch of dry sand that lay before her. With her fore legs she started to remove this sand rapidly, till she had dug a shallow depression about two feet across and about one foot deep. This done, she hurried back to the water and submerged. I cursed my luck but I need not have. Barely an hour passed when I saw her again emerge in the increasing darkness and hasten back to the hole she had dug. It was too dark for me to see in detail what she did, but I could tell from her movements that she was laying her eggs in this depression. It was now quite dark and I was feeling rather uncomfortable. Crocodiles were not the only man-eaters who were abroad that night, so rising cautiously I made my way out from the back of the hide and returned to the camp.

The next morning I was back at the hide early. A cautious look round showed me that the mother crocodile had carefully covered up her nest with sand and dried leaves from the surrounding bushes. Certain that she could not have left the site completely, I watched the surface of the water intently and was rewarded by seeing a tufted snout and two eyes emerge slowly and drift towards the bank. Evidently the crocodile has the same distrust of her neighbours as others have.

For three days this unprofitable vigil continued. On the fourth day, at about noon, when I had just finished a cup of coffee and some sandwiches, I noticed two pelicans settle on the sand before me. Shortly after a flight of crows arrived and sat noisily on the branches of a dead Sundari bush at the edge of the clearing. A hawk or two glided through the air above me. I was intrigued. Why had these birds come? Could a shoal of small fish be drifting in towards the shore. Eager to ascertain the cause I watched the water intently. Suddenly I was electrified to see the eyes and snout of a crocodile emerge from the water and move steadily towards the shore. Immediately the two pelicans were awake and alert. The crows sprang into the air, wheeling and cawing incessantly, while the crocodile, without a moment's hesitation hurried up the bank. Here on a secluded spot she paused and started to remove the sand slowly. Immediately after she had completed the task, I observed some twenty eggs, gleaming whitely in the setting sun. The removal of the sand seemed to have awakened the unhatched crocodiles, for in a few minutes the eggs were agitated violently, the shells peeled off and tiny black snouts appeared, snapping and wrigling. In a moment even this encumbrance was cast aside and a mass of tiny monsters, looking like large black ants, rushed out of the nest and started moving towards the water. This was the signal for the awaiting audience. In a moment the pelicans pounced on the procession and snapped up all they could catch. The crows now swept in and in a moment several viciously snapping crocodiles were picked up and borne away towards the edge of the forest. From below me a mongoose and two water rats joined in the slaughter and by the time they were through, I do not believe more than ten of the newly hatched crocodiles reached the water. Later, when the stampede died down, I left the hide and went to inspect the nest. An actual count revealed some thirty eggs. So nature was proving once again, her ability to maintain the status quo.

That evening Dost Mohammad showed me an egg he had extracted from a nest further down the stream. It was the size of a Turkey's egg, round off-white in colour with large beige freckles. The shell was soft and clammy, and the contents pleasing neither to the eye nor to the nose. The female lays these in a shallow depression in the sand, covering them up carefully and leaving the sun to assist in the hatching-out process. From twenty to seventy eggs are laid at a time and if it were not for natural enemies destroying the majority at birth, our streams and marshes would be choked with a teeming mass of crocodiles. When the eggs are due to hatch, the mother crocodile returns to the nest. Here she removes the sand covering the eggs and it is thought that this movement indicates to the unborn crocodile that the time to emerge has arrived. Provided by nature with a sharp, bony protusion at the upper end of its snout the young crocodile attacks the egg shell from within and in a few seconds breaks free. Within a minute or so they are able to move and then starts the race for the water.

Baby crocodiles are about 8 inches long at birth. Their skins are olive and bluish in colour, their eyes bright and golden. Aggressive and fierce from the moment they quit the shell, they will snap viciously at anything in their vicinity. On entering the water the young crocodile subsists eitirely on water insects. From insects he gradually advances to crustacea and then on to fish. Fish appear to form the bulk of his diet for the rest of his life. But as he grows older, heavier and more bulky, he probably looses his taste for an exclusively fish diet or with age he probably lacks the speed and energy needed to catch his prey. At this period he will probably be about ten feet long and it is now that he develops a liking for meat, any meat, and human flesh is a delicacy he cannot resist. Like the tiger, once he has killed man, human flesh is the only meat that seems to satisfy his voracious appetite. He will lie in wait near bathing-ghats, fords and any place where he is likely to intercept human beings, and the toll he takes of unwairy humanity is terrible.

Dost Mahammad showed me an egg.....

When in search of prey, he will lie motionless in the water, his eyes just above the surface, and await his opportunity. His favourite method is a slow, stealthy approach towards the bank and opposite the place his victim is standing. Here he will submerge himself still further till he can secure the necessary purchase on the soil below him, when with amazing power, he will lash out with his tail, precipitating his victim into the water, where he will seize it and dive deep into the stream drowning his victim. Seldom does he consume it immediately. Once all further resistance has ceased he will rise to the surface carrying his victim with him, frequently draped over his neck and back. This extraordinary habit has given rise to the belief that the spirit of his victim rides on his back especially in the case of the man-eating mugger, directing him to where he may obtain other human prey. Although the mugger will attack and kill any animal entering his element, he is at heart a scavenger. I have seen him swimming beside the rotting bodies of men and animals, swept down the river during the floods, tearing off pieces of flesh and swallowing them with a quick snap of his powerful jaws. In the case of live prey, he will first drown it, and, then when sure that his victim is dead, will carry it to some depression in the bank or a convenient hole under water, where he will leave the body "to hang" till it has decomposed sufficiently to suit his taste. This peculiarity is often of great advantage to his human victims. Some years ago while shooting in the vicinity of the village of Gosaba, I was shown an underwater cave, entrance to which had been effected by a shaft driven through the silt directly above. Here the Fishermen informed me that one of their members, who had been seized further up the stream, while bathing, had been taken by the crocodile. Fortunately the man lost consciousness as soon as he was seized and the crocodile, assuming TRIKRAMDAS Karoree was the proprietor of a large business combine. Sitting in his own chamber of the Delhi office he was signing cheques. His orderly came with a card. It was from M. Zulfiqar Khan. "Ask him to wait," said the boss.

After a while the clerk went out of the chamber with a bunch of signed cheques. Trikramdas rang the bell. The orderly entered. Said Trikramdas, handing over the card. "Let the gentleman come in".

Zulfiqar Khan entered the chamber. He saluted Settji and said:

"I am from the Intelligence Branch."

Settji was perturbed.

"Any more income tax irregularities?" He enquired.

"That I don't know," Zulfiqar Khan replied. "But here is a serious charge against you.

"Is it? What's wrong?"

"You have married thrice."

"Oh, is that all!" Trikramdas whooped in joy! "If I've married at all what is wrong with it? I am a Hindu. I can marry as many times as I like. I am not supposed to be confined to four Bibis like you".

Khan Shahib waved his hand and said: "Aw, Settji I see, you only know how to earn money and nothing else! You are quite ignorant about the world. Why don't you know that a Hindu cannot marry according to law more than once. Haven't you heard of the Hindu code?"

"A pleasant surprise!", Settji exclaimed, "Is it so? Yes, I am always busy with this or that. I cannot keep abreast of time. I am only interested, you see, in what new tax is going to be imposed, which licence I shall have to apply for and such items. But really, I do not quite understand what you say. Why, my uncle Hurchandji, has two wives. Yet he is quite hale and hearty. And no charge-sheet against him."

"He had married twice before the enforcement of the Act. So it is not an offence. But you married three times after the Act. You are liable to a deterrent punishment. It may run into ten years' imprisonment or heavy fines".

Settji was frightened. He said: "It is really embarrassing. Now what is to be done?"

"Look here, Settli! you are a rich man and and respectable too. We don't like to put into trouble a distinguished person like you. We are giving you a month's time. Please settle the matter in the meantime."

"How?"

"Keep one wife and dispense with the other two as early as possible. How much compensation you have to pay I cannot say. You better consult a lawyer. And as for my fees it may be settled later on."

Trikramdas stroked his forehead with his plam and uttered in despair: "Oh, Ramji; Oh, the Supreme Spirit; Oh, save me please. I have married one according to the Sanatani rites, another by the Arya Samaj custom and the third one by the Civil Marriage Act. How can I discard them all?"

"Don't get nervous please, Settji. You are not short of money. Spend a few lakhs and everything will be o.k. Give your two wives a heavy compensation and have a confession from them that they are not your real wives but only 'pleasure girls'. In that case we can hush up the whole matter. Please do not waste time. Engage a good pleader immediately. Goodbye, I am leaving now. Two weeks hence we are meeting again."

Trikramdas was on the wrong side of fifty. The history of his married life is really a chequered one. Just a year ago, his only wife died leaving behind a few children. Some months later, Trikramdas married Anandibai. He again married not once, but twice. But he did not disclose it even to his relatives and friends. Anandibai is the name of his eldest wife. She is the only child of Harjeevanlal the ex-Dewan of Khajoulee Estate. Thus, she inherited enormous wealth. When Harjeevan died, one of his distant cousins posed himself as the guardian of Anandibai and tried to deprive his niece of her property. But, Trikramdas with the help of her maternal uncle married Anandibai and brought her entire property to his custody. Anandibai is about twenty-five. She is not good-looking. She makes it up with her virulent tounge, and hauteur derived from her high birth.

Delhi is the business centre and head office of the Trikramdas concerns. Besides, the branch offices at Bombay and Calcutta are not negligible. He inspects these two offices three or four times in a year. Once he went to Bombay after marrying Anandibai. Kissenram Khobani, the Manager there, invited his boss one day to his house. He hailed from Sind, now in Pakistan. After partition he came to Delhi for settlement. Now he is living in Bombay as branch manager of the Settji concerns. Kissenram is foppish. His flat is well-furnished. He introduced his wife and his wife's younger sister to his master.

Settji was an old-fashioned man with no experience at all of society girls. So he was simply charmed at the sight of Kissenram's sister-in-law, Rajhansi Zalkani. How nicely she dressed! How fair her complexion! She put on a light blue Salwar and a deep blue Kamij and a light green tinselled dopatta on it. She was a pleasant talker and very animate, smiling all the time. She was hospitality itself.

The meal was over. Settji took Kissenram aside. He heard from him all about Rajhansi Zalkani. She had no parents. Her only brother lived now in Singapore. He was a business magnate there. But hardly made any enquiry about his younger sister. So Kissenram sheltered his sister-in-law in his house. She could act very well, sing very well and wished to be a film star. But Kissenram and his wife did not like the idea.

Settji made up his mind then and there. He asked his Manager to arrange her marriage with him. "I will make her happy", he assured. He asked his Manager to purchase immediately a house in Bombay. Rajhansi would live there. He, too, would come to Bombay and stay most of the time there. "You see, I want to expand my business here" he told his Manager.

Settji suppressed the story of his former marriage with Anandibai. Kissenram knew his boss to be a widower. So he gladly agreed to the proposal. Rajhansi, too, agreed. She did not remonstrate at all against his old age. They were happily married according to the Arya Samaj custom. A new house was then purchased and Rajhansi began to live there.

Some time after Trikramdas went to Calcutta for inspection of his Calcutta business. Paritosh Hore-Chaudhuri, Manager there, is a man of active habits. He puts up at Alipore in European fashion. He invited his boss to dinner at his residence. Trikramdas was introduced to Sri Hore-Chaudhuri's wife and sister. He was simply amazed to see Miss Balaka Hore-Chaudhuri. True, she was not fairer than Rajhansi. But the style in which she put her saree on was graceful indeed. And how she talked! Her manners and etiquette, too, were charming. She spoke English like an Englishwoman. Hindi she spoke but not faultlessly. Nevertheless, how sweet it was! Settji was captivated.

Paritosh Hore-Chaudhuri informed him that Balaka was an M.A., a good dancer and singer too. The film directors were after her for a contract. It is only Paritosh who did not lilke the idea. Trikramdas could not restrain himself:

"Miss Balaka, I would like to marry you", he spoke out in Hindi.

"It is so kind of you", Balaka replied with a pleasant smile. "But how can I stand the sweltering heat of Delhi? Neither should I be able to take your food? Dal-roti, bhaji and dahibora".

"By Jove! who is pressing you to go to Delhi?" replied Settji. "I am purchasing a new house here in Alipore. You will stay there near your brother's house. I will spend nine to ten months of the year here. I would like to expand my Calcutta business. And you are quite free to take fish and rice and no dal and roti business. Don't think that I dislike to eat fish. But after all it has a very bad smell."

"I will make hilsa-fry for you with essence of rose you'll see, how it tastes".

Balaka heard from her brother that Settji was a widower. She gave her consent to the marriage without delay. And they got registered after twenty days.

Trikramdas alternated his stay between Bombay and Calcutta. There arose no difficulty in his three-prong conjugal adventure. He began to pass his days with great pleasure. So all on a sudden that day Zulfiqar Khan came to him and broke his peace of mind with that distressing news.

Khajanchand, B.A., LL.B., Pleader, is a trusted and obedient friend of Trikramdas. Trikramdas needs him most when he has to submit his income-tax returns. That evening Settji went straight to Khajanchand's house. He told him of his distress.

"You acted very childishly, Settji", replied Khajanchand. "I know, you trust me. But it is regrettable that you even for once didn't inform me that you were dating with girls in Bombay and Calcutta"

Settji folded his hands and said: "Please excuse me, dear. That I am going to marry again at this old age with a wife still living, is itself disgraceful. How can I tell you this, young friend?"

Khajanchand thought for a while. He then said: "You should not tell Anandibai anything at present. She would be upset, perhaps weep bitterly. You better tell your two other wives the whole story one by one. They are modern girls. Their sense of self-respect is very high. They will sure be flared up. Maybe even refuse to see your face again. In that case, it will go in our favour. If you compensate them handsomely and give your two managers a few coppers, everything will, I tell you be all right. Of course, in that case you will have to spend a few more lakhs. But that won't be too much for you".

Would you please register this house in my name . .

Trikramdas did not like the idea. He said: "You don't understand, dear Khajan, what my heart desires. I have a mind to expand my business. For that I shall have to hobnob with men of position. Now, if I give any Ministers and big officials a party, who will play the hostess? Anandi? Phew! Rajhansi and Balaka are the women for it. If I am to discard any one well, I will discard Anandi. And may it cause my heart crack or I may have to loose a great fortune. I am ready for it. Again, there is another difficulty. I am in a fix as to whom to keep and whom to discard, between Rajhansi and Balaka. But I like most Balaka Debi of Calcutta. My next choice is Bombaiwallee Rajhansi. Well, do not bother about the amount. I am ready to spend ten to fifteen lakhs, if necessary."

Khajanchand earnestly requested him not to take that extreme course. For, Anandibai was his legally married wife. Her case should be considered first. But in that case he may have to play many deceitful tricks. He will have to give up his claim over her paternal properties at a huge loss. He may also have to take the help of that wicked uncle of Anandi's. But Trikramdas is resolute. He never gives in.

Khajanchand at last said: "Well, I shall try my utmost. You, too, don't waste time and explain the whole story to your three wives. Let us watch how they react. Then I will tell you what is to be done next".

Trikramdas flew to Bombay without wasting time. Straight he went to Rajhansi's house. Rajhansi was at that time gossipping in her drawing room with a well-dressed young man.

"Oh Settji! When did you come?" she said surprised. "You don't know him, perhaps. He is my phupheya (a cousin) Mr. Zumkamal Motkani. My distant relative. He is an expert accountant. By the by, the accountant of this office has grown grey in years. Why do you not retire that old man?. Won't you take him in for that post?"

"Well, I would consider it. But, I have a very urgent matter to discuss with you, Rajhansi".

Zumkamal left the room. Trikramdas hesitantly spoke out the story of the wives. But its reaction was quite unexpected. Rajhansi eagerly heard what he said and then burst into giggles:

"Bravo Settji, bravo! You are a jolly chap, I see! So you have two more wives! But what does it matter to me? I won't mind it, rest assured. Everything will be all right. Please see to it, that it may not leak out. Would you please register this house in my name as early as possible? The municipal authorities are harassing me very much".

"Very good", replied Settji. "It will be so arranged as you like. Sorry, I cannot wait now. I am just starting for Calcutta"

Reaching Calcutta Trikramdas went direct to Balaka's residence at Alipore. Balaka was then dancing in her drawing room. A strapping youth was at the piano.

"Well, Settji, you come all on a sudden. Is it not surprising!" Balaka spoke out: "Perhaps you do not know him. He is Lotankumar Bhore, a distant cousin of mine. He is a proficient dancer. I am now taking lessons from him in pigeon dance. Do you like to witness it for a while?"

"Sorry, I have no time just now", replied Trikramdas. "Balaka, I have an urgent talk with you".

When Lotankumar left the room, Trikramdas told Balaka the story of his three marriages with a heart palpitating.

"Good gracious! Is it so?" Balaka touched her cheek with a finger and said lightheartedly: "Oh Settji, you are a real cormorant, fishing under water. You are indeed a lady's man. But why are you so depressed? What harm, if you have three wives? It is all right. I am not a jealous girl. But, please, don't make a row of it.....Now, Settji, I want a new model car. My old Austin often goes out of order. Would you please draw a cheque of rupees twenty thousand at least? I can't buy a good one at a lower price"

"Sure, I will do, as you like", said Trikramdas. "I am going out. I am now leaving for Delhi".

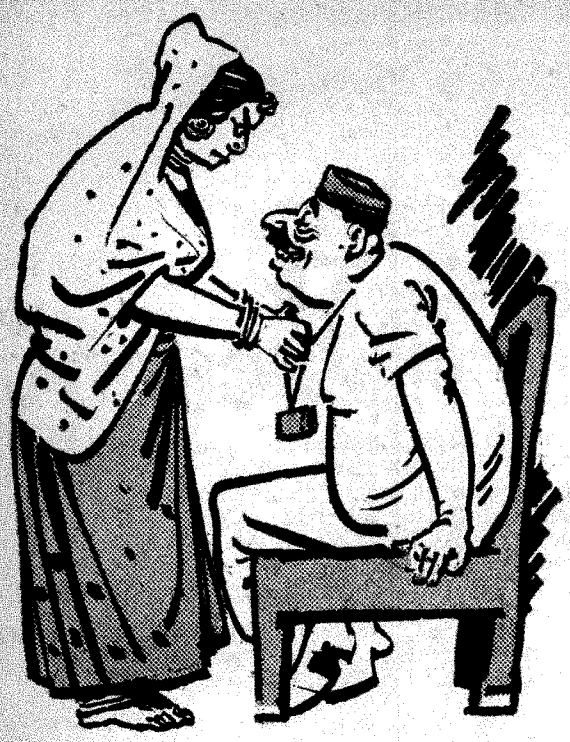
Trikramdas returned to Delhi and reported everything to Khajanchand in details. He then took Khajanchand to his drawing room and requested him to wait.

Trikramdas went direct to the inner parlour of his house and called Anandibai to his bed chamber.

"Well, no trace of you for the last three days? You have been much reduced also", Anandi asked in anxiety. "What ails you? Is there any further trouble with the Government?"

Trikramdas hung down his head and then was slowly out with his secret.

Anandibai was stunned for a moment.



She fastened it to her husband's neck.

She placed her hands on her waist and then darted an angry glance at Settji. "What do you say ?"

Settji got frightened. "Be quiet, Anandi, quiet please. Everything will be allright", he said appeasingly.

They say Bengali is rich in literature but it is not as rich in the vocabulary of abuses as Hindi. Anandibai began to bound about in fury throwing her hands and feet in the air. At the same time she started scolding her husband with the choicest abuses in her language. They poured out of her mouth like the stream from a hose-pipe. Anandibai was blind with her rage. She lost her equilibrium. Seeing her passion gradually rise Settji folded his hands in avowed supplication and said again : "Please excuse me. Anandi. Everything will be okay. !"

"Shut up, you a street dog, a musk-rat of the drain pipe," thundered Anandibai. She sprang upon Settji like a fierce tigress and scratched his two cheeks with her nails. She retreated a few steps. She then took a bunch of heavy gold bangles ten in number—out from her left hand and threw them aiming at her husband's head. Blood trickled out of his forehead. He cried in agony and fell on the floor. Anandibai, too, crying louder retired to her own Puja hall. There she lay down on the floor and began to sob bitterly ! There was a hue and cry in the whole house. Relatives rushed there to console Anandibai. And Khajanchand went out to fetch a doctor for Trikramdas.

Seven days passed. Trikramdas got round a good deal. He was sitting in an easy chair on the balcony of first floor and was smoking a hubble-bubble. His head was in a bandage and his face was plastered here and there.

Khajanchand came to him and inquired about his health : "How do you feel now, Settji ?"

"Better", Settji replied. "Look here, dear Khajan ! I don't like to prolong my connection neither with Rajhansi nor Balaka. You better start immediately for Bombay and Calcutta and settle the matter amicably. I will pay the cost. Those two girls of Bombay and Calcutta only want my money and not me. But Anandi wants me. Well, do you get the smell of a delicious dish ? It is the chow-chow Anandi is now preparing for me. Look at this comforter also. She has knitted the woolen scarf for me."

"Good news, indeed" Khajanchand said : "Settji, don't worry, please. I will settle everything Meanwhile please go on a pilgrimage with Anandibai and visit holy places like Mathura, Brindaban, and Dwarka. She will then recoup her high spirits."

Thanks to the good nursing of his wife, Trikramdas soon recovered. Through the good offices of Khajanchand also he settled amicably with Rajhansi and Balaka. Zulfiquar Khan, too, was appeased. Moreover, Anandibai purchased a thousand-rupee worth talisman from Calcutta's biggest astrologer - monarch, Jyotishchandra Jyotisharnava. She fastened it to her husband's neck. Marvellous is the effect of that charmed talisman. For, Settji keeps telling his bosom friends that in her service to her husband Anandi surpasses all women. That is to say, all but Anandi are ugly women.

THE CROCODILE, ITS LIFE & HABITS

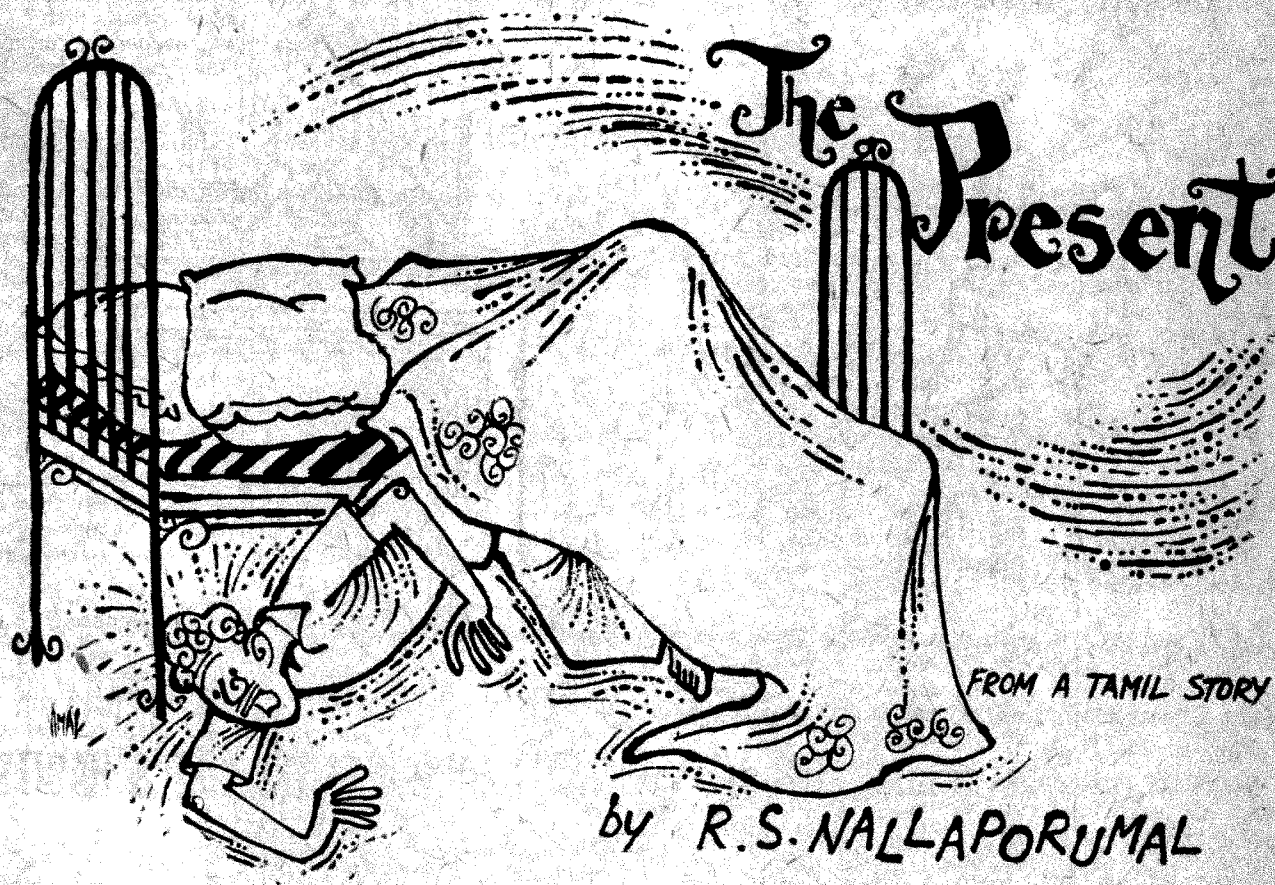
he was dead, had deposited him in his under-water cave. His comrades who had witnessed the attack, now followed the crocodile as soon as it reappeared. This fisherman appears to have had extra-ordinary luck. Not only did the crocodile deposit him in this larder and depart, but the cave appeared to have a few feet of bathing space above the surface of the water. No sooner did the fisherman recover, than he started shouting for help and his comrades hearing his cries, soon located the spot and digging down into the cave, rescued him. Unfortunately the man did not survive. Shock, loss of blood and gangerene, contracted on the long jurney to Hospital, brought about his death a few weeks after his rescue.

The fishermen have a theory that if attacked and seized by a crocodile, an infallible method of escaping from its jaws is to dig the fingers into its eyes. The pain not only blinds it temporarily but causes it to open its jaws, thus giving its victim an opportunity to escape.

I have heard people sarcastically refer to crocodile tears. Strange as it may sound there is a basis of truth in this term. The crocodile does actually shed tears when seizing its victim. The tear glands of the crocodile are so situated that when attempting to seize an animal far beyond its capacity to hold it is forced to distend its jaws to their utmost capacity. This brings considerable pressure on the tear glands, so that the liquid literally gushes out. Hence the sarcasm, "crocodile tears" — false sympathy.



VELU who was lying on a cosy cushioned bed in a beautiful cot, did not get sleep. He was restless. He had not purchased that cot and that cushion. They were presents given to him by a big merchant for the help he had rendered him. But there was anxiety in his heart. Was it a present or a bribe? He was in the region of doubts. Would a bribe become a present? Yet his was a hard-boiled heart! He did not funk. His heart did not fear.

All on a sudden, the messengers of Yama came round his bed! They carried Velu away!

"Where are you taking me to?," asked Velu.

"To hell," replied one of the Yama's messengers.

"Alas, what wrong have I committed?"

"We do not know anything. The order is to consign you to hell".

"Don't you know that you should not punish a man without proving his guilt?," shouted Velu much exasperated.

"We do not know all these. You just come without creating a scene," snapped a messenger.

"I will file a writ in your court and I will successfully try conclusions with you," so saying Velu followed them.

On the third day after his arrival in hell, a great crowd milled around the Court of Indra. Even Ramba and Urvasi had come to enjoy the tamasha. Velu was his own advocate. Manu appeared for the celestial government. (Manu was the codifier of Hindu Law.)

"What is your case?," asked Indra.

Velu spoke: "They have put me in hell without any justification. Verily they should have sent me to Heaven. Not only am I a great lawyer in the human world but also a renowned politician. I am a representative of the people who voted for me in lakhs. To put me in hell is not only against the law but it is against Dharma as well."

"What do you say for this?," asked Indra, pointing toward Manu.

Manu said: "My Lord, he has committed many sins. Firstly he is a rich man....."

"But in this celestial world, too, they enjoy themselves like anything, they enjoy much more than the rich men of Earth," averred Velu.

Indra intervened: "Order, Order, you should not snap in and shout. Let Manu proceed."

Manu continued his brief:

"My Lord he has committed breach of faith. He has an oily hand. He is a toddy bibber. He has deserted his love....."

"Stop. I deny all your accusations," shouted Velu.

"How do you deny?" asked Manu.

"All these may appear as sins to you. But I performed all these as public good."

"Did you not cheat your friend Subbier? Was it not a breach of faith? Was it not a guilt?" asked Manu

"Who is that Subbier?" asked Indra.

"My Lord, this petitioner and Subbier were friends. This man desired to stand for the election. He had no money, however. He was just leading a hand-to-mouth existence, was hard put to it to keep the wolves away from his door and had not even the deposit money on him. Under these crucial circumstances, Subbier came forward, of his own accord, to throw succour to this man. Only because of his help, this man came out victorious in the election. To that Subbier, he proved ungrateful....."

Velu intervened:

"Subbier helped me. I did not forget his help. I was grateful to him. I too helped him in turn. The help I rendered him is interpreted by Manu as a betrayal."

"What was his act of ill-faith ?" asked Indra.

" Subbier conducted a business. He took him as a partner. Not even a paisa did this man put in it as capital. Subbier took him as his partner only with a view to giving him a helping hand. But in a year not only did this man make him lose and lose heavily but made himself its sole proprietor, deceiving him in the process" said Manu.

The wrath of Indra now knew no bounds. He looked daggers at Velu but Velu did not get cold feet.

"Lord, I did that, only having Subbier's good at heart. I did that because I thought that Subbier should not fall into the abysmal sin of forgetting the Almighty by amassing fabulous wealth. There is no selfishness involved in this act of mine, Therefore there is no guilt," reiterated Velu.

Indra's face brightened: He saw eye to eye with the view-point expressed by Velu.

"My Lord, he is a politician who has purchased a car within five years of his election. Before the election, he found it hard to have even a single meal. In five years, he has come to own a car. He has feathered his own nest!" said Manu.

"Hold on. It unmistakably proves my ability if I, who was foodless, have purchased a car in five years," said Velu.

"Yes, Yes, I congratulate you on your ability," said Indra. Manu was put out.

"My Lord, he got that car as a bribe," said Manu.

Indra, thoroughly irked, bounded out of his seat.

"A bribe? A politician getting a bribe?"

Indra roared and threw out angry glances at Velu.

"Manu considers a present as a bribe. I did not, of my own accord, demand anything. As enjoined by Lord Krishna, I have been doing everything without caring for quid pro quo and sans attachment and sans hatred. A merchant wanted a licence. I helped him to get it. In gratitude, he gave me this present. Can you equate a present with a bribe?" asked Velu.

How do you deny ?

"No, No," said Indra.

"He conspired to throw out his political leader to install himself in the gadi of leadership" said Manu.

"Who is there, my Lord, who does not hanker after position ? I have filed this writ because I yearn for the blessings of position in heaven! Even on the earth people go on telling the story of the efforts made by you, my Lord, to attain your present position !" said Velu.

Indra's face fell. His figure perspired. He hung down his head. Silence prevailed. Manu disturbed this:

"He drinks. It is an egregious sin," said Manu.

"What nectar and ambrosia are in this celestial world, toddy is on Earth. Devas forget themselves by taking ambrosia. To forget myself I took to toddy. Is this a guilt, deserving the punishment of hell," blurted out Velu.

"Do you deny cheating many without returning the loans you took from them?." said Manu.

"I borrowed money from many people. That is a fact. But how did I spend that money ? Did I spend it on me and for my sake ? My lord, how did the Saint Manickavasagar spend the wealth of the King Pandian ? How did Ramdas spend the money of the Nabob ? On temples. The temple is a treasure-house of art. I, too, spent the borrowed money on art. Drama is an art. The dance of Lord Nataraja of Chidambaram is a drama! I started a drama company with the borrowed money. The Company failed. The fault is not therefore, mine ! I have, in effect, earned blessings for those from whom I had borrowed" said Velu.

"Blessings ?", asked Indra.

"Yes, Yes, I dedicated their wealth to art. Because I spent their money on art, the blessings should go to them."

"Yes, Yes," chimed in Indra.

"Is it not a guilt to jilt the girl you loved ?" asked Manu, infuriated.

Velu threw a majestic look at Indra.

"My Lord, what is a wrong? That which should not be done in a society, if it is done, is a wrong. But how can an occurrence that happens daily be called a wrong? That I loved a classmate in my College is a fact. But a College love vanishes in a second! This is an aspect of modernity. It is a law of the world too. Will a law of the world be a guilt, my Lord?"

"Is not the betrayal of love a guilt?" asked Indra.

"My Lord, is my crime more heinous than the one committed by my Lord by going after a girl who did not love you at all, thereby making her husband mete out the severest punishment to her?" pleaded Velu.

Indra shivered. Ahalya, who was witnessing this tamasha, ensconcing herself at a place with ladies, just slowly left the assembly without anybody's knowledge. Indra was just sitting, just looking down. Silence prevailed. Manu continued his speech:

"Did you not marry another girl, throwing over your first wife within a year of your marriage? Was it not a sin? In her anguish, that girl had committed suicide!"

"I just offered an opportunity to a soul on the earth to go to the celestial world soon without living long carrying the burden of sins. Would that soul have obtained release from the worldly attachments had I not taken as my wife another girl? In every act of mine, therefore there will be a good enshrined".

"You are a confirmed womanizer", cried Manu.

"How can I be considered a criminal, my friend, how can I be considered a criminal when Rambhas and Urvasis are having their days on the earth! Why prohibition for me when Arjuna is in heaven?" asked Velu indifferently. Urvasi and Rambha who had been enjoying the fun going on there in the Assembly, just disappeared now from their seats. Even Arjuna who was there just noiselessly escaped.

"My Lord, he is an advocate on the earth. He can easily make the best out of bad bargain and turn everything to his good. His tongue can make a hell of heaven and a heaven of hell. You should not believe him at all. He is an arrant knave who was, by the deterous gift of his tongue, instrumental in saving a murderer from the jaws of punishment. His only place is in hell and hell alone," asserted Manu.

Velu looked at Indra.

"My Lord, who is to give punishment to a man for his commission of a wrong?", asked Velu.

"God", said Indra.

"When it is so, what right has a man to punish a murderer? I pleaded for the release of the murderer, because God alone should punish a man and also because the earthly judge should not commit sin by sentencing a man to punishment," said Velu.

"You gambled. Do you deny even this?" asked Manu.

"I do not deny, my friend, I do not deny. Yudhisthira of the Pandavas gambled. But now he is in heaven? Then is it a crime for me to gamble?"

"Yudhisthira has experienced the rigours of punishment for his gambling on the earth itself!"

"I too gambled, and I lost by thousands. Is not this loss a sufficient punishment for me? Injustice, my Lord, atrocious injustice! I have proved all the accusations of Manu false! I should be in heaven. I imagine that I will not appear a criminal to my Lord's mind", said Velu.

How can I be considered a criminal .....

Indra sat bolt upright and spoke:

"Because Velu has proved himself not guilty by denying all the accusations levelled by Manu against him, and also with a view to safeguarding the interests of those who are in hell, I order that Velu need no more be in hell," so Indra delivered the judgment and quickly went away.

Now nothing but confusion ensued. Everyone had his own comment to make on the judgment. Velu who now extricated himself from the clutches of the messengers of Yama hastened towards Heaven; When he neared Heaven, however, a watchman stopped him!

"I am Velu. Allow me to enter. That is the order of Indra", said he.

"The order is that you need not be in hell. It is not for permitting you into Heaven", said the Watchman.

Stumped, Velu found himself in a quandary!

"Indra has outwitted me. All those in Heaven are traitors. Good men like me have no place in it? Where can I go now?" cried Velu.

"You may go anywhere you like," said the watchman and pushed him out. Velu was now fast coming down to the earth, head down and legs up.

"Alas, Alas, is there no one to create a heaven for me as it was created for Trisanku" cried Velu. In a second his head touched the ground.

"Alas, I am dead!" cried he.

"Nothing is dead," said Velu's wife. "You do not listen to my word if I tell you that you should not sleep on this spring cot! It will happen only like this if you have it because someone has given it to you gratis."

Velu had fallen on the ground from the cot. He opened his eyes, very widely, and saw. Yes, it was a Earth!

"Hey! this spring cot throws out the man. I should return it to the man who gave it and ask him to give me some other thing instead," slowly murmured that politician, scratching his head with his fingers.

THE THRONE OF Judgment

A Hindi Story

By PREMCHAND

JUMMAN Shekh and Algu Chaudhury were close friends. They carried on farming in partnership. They were, also, partners in money-lending. They had full faith in each other. When Jumman set out on Hajj, he entrusted the welfare of his family to Algu's care, and whenever Algu had an occasion to go out, he would rely on Jumman for safe conduct of his house-hold affairs. They had no inhibitions in the matters of eating at each other's place—a question they kept outside the purview of religion. Their friendship was founded on reason. That undoubtedly, is the quintessence of friendship.

The origin of this friendship could be traced back to the days, when the two associates were mere boys and Jumman's revered father Jumrati imparted them education. Ungrudging and unstinted service to the teacher redounded to Algu's credit. He spared no pains to wash the teacher's plates, dishes and cups. His pipe (hukkah) was not allowed to have even a moment's respite, for every adjustment of the pipe offered Algu had an opportunity to be away from his books for, at least, half an hour. Algu's father was a man of old ideas. He set more store by the loving care bestowed on the teacher than the education imparted by him. He held that learning was not to be acquired only through efforts; it was, in fact, the teacher's blessings that bore fruit. His benedictions were more than enough. Even if Jumrati's benedictions and supervision proved unavailing to Algu, he would rest content that he had left no stone unturned to have his son properly educated. There was no learning in his lot; how could he have it?

But Jumrati Shekh, himself did not subscribe to the view of teacher's blessings. He relied more on his rod and it was the self-sense rod that accounted for the veneration for Jumman among the people in the neighbouring villages. A sale-deed, drafted by him, could not be challenged even by a clerk of a judicial court. The postman, the constable and the peon of the Revenue Department of that circle—all sought his favour. So, if Algu was in a position to command respect on account of his wealth, Jumman was equally respected for his unvalued learning.

Jumman Shekh had an old aunt (mother's sister). She had a small property, but none of her close relations. She bequeathed it to Jumman, hoodwinked by his high-sounding promises. So long as the will was not registered the old aunt found herself rolling in comfort. She was given delicious food to eat. All sorts of dainties were, virtually, showered upon her; but the very seal of registry sealed up all hospitality. Jumman's wife Kariman began to offer her a sauce of pungent remarks in addition to bread every day. Jumman's heart, too, was hardened. Now the poor old lady had to bear such words almost regularly.

"How long will this hag live? She seems to have bound us hand and foot only for a patch of uncultivable land," Kariman would say, "she does not relish bread without dal. A big landed property would have been, by now, bought for the money that has been literally wasted on her."

The old aunt heard it and put up with it for some time, but when it was past endurance, she made a complaint to Jumman about it. He did not deem it proper to interfere in the management of the Local Self-Government—The Housewife. She dragged on her miserable existence for some time more. At length, the aunt, one day, said to Jumman, "My son, it is not possible for me to pull on with you. Let me have my pittance in cash. I shall manage to cook for myself apart."

Jumman replied brazen-facedly, "Do rupees grow on branches of trees?" The aunt put in meekly, "Should I not have even a meagre subsistence?" Jumman, then replied in a serious tone, "Who knew that you came down after a quarrel with death?"

The aunt flew into a rage and threatened to have recourse to Panchayati arbitration. Jumman laughed, just as a hunter does, when he finds his game proceeding towards his net. He said, "Yes, to be sure, you should go in for arbitration. Let the thing be decided once for all. I, too, do not like this constant trouble."

Jumman had not even the least shade of doubt as to who was going to profit by arbitration. There was no one in the neighbouring villages who was not indebted to him for his experiences. Who was there so rash as to antagonise him? Who was strong enough to grapple with him? Surely angels from heaven would not descend as members of the Panchayat.

The old aunt went about in the villages, propping herself up with a stick in her hand. She was double with age. It was difficult for her to move even a single step: but the problem was there. It had to be solved.

There was hardly any one to whom she did not relate her sad story. Some served her with lip-sympathy, only to get rid of her immediately and some cursed the order of the day for that injustice. Some said, "You have one of your feet already in the grave. You may die any moment, but your desire knows no restraint. What should you have now? Just have your meal to keep body and soul together and be absorbed in meditation What have you got to do with farming at this stage?" There were yet some who found a good occasion to indulge in pleasantries. There were very few really kind-hearted and justice-loving people, ready to champion the cause of the poor, and to pay any heed to the words of the afflicted lady or to console her. Algu Chaudhury was the last man to whom she came. She dropped her stick down and after some amount of gasping and hard breathing, spoke out, "My son, please, come to attend the Panchayat for a while."

Algu — What will you gain by calling me when so many people from different villages are coming?

Aunt — I have acquainted all with my sorrowful tale. Now, it is up to them to come or not to come.

Algu — I shall come, if you so like, but I won't utter a word.

Aunt — Why so, my son?

Algu — It is a question to which I have no reply to make. I wish it to be so. Jumman is my old friend. I cannot alienate him.

Aunt — My son, will you not speak out the truth for fear of estrangement?

Even the entire wealth of the dormant sense of ethics may be lost but a challenge makes it alert. None can, then, vanquish it. Algu could not answer her question, but these words kept on ringing in his ears—"Will you not speak out the truth for fear of estrangement?"

One evening the intended arbitration started under a tree. Shekh Jumman had already carpets spread out. He had made arrangements for betel-leaves, smoking and the like. Yes, he himself, along with Algu Chaudhury, sat a bit apart from others.

"Do rupees grow on branches of trees?"

Whenever anyone came to join the Panchayati judgement he would receive him with a low bow. The sun had already set and a noisy discussion among the birds on the trees started. Now, on the ground, too, the business began. Every inch of the selected site was occupied, but the bulk were mere spectators. Of those invited, only such men had thought it worthwhile to come as were, in any way, at loggerheads with Jumman. Fire was burning in a corner. A barber went on adjusting clay pipes. It was difficult to ascertain whether more smoke issued from the cowdung-cakes, burning or from the tobacco-pots. Children were running hither and thither. Some were abusing one another and some were weeping.

There was din and bustle everywhere. Thinking this assemblage to be a programme for a feast, the dogs in the village were gathering fast.

After the Panchayati arbitrators had taken their seats the old aunt addressed herself to them with all humility, "Gentlemen, three years back, I bequeathed my property to my nephew, Jumman. You must be aware of it. Jumman undertook to provide me food and clothes till death. I spent a year with him so painfully; but this constant misery is past endurance. I get neither food to eat nor clothes to wear. I am a helpless widow. I am not in a position to go to the law-courts. There is none but you whom I should approach with my pitiful tale. Please, show me the way I should follow. If you find any fault with me, let me be subjected to slapping. If Jumman is to blame, let him see reason. Why should he be guilty of such an inhuman conduct. The words of the mediators will be divine law to me."

Ramdhan Mishra, a number of whose tenants had been persuaded by Jumman to settle in his village, said, "Whom do you name as the arbitrators? Let it be decided here and now. Whatever the arbitrators say will be binding on the parties concerned."

At the moment, Jumman spotted out mostly those in the assemblage, who were not on good terms with him for some reason or other. He spoke out, "The order of the arbitrators is an injunction of God. Let aunt select any one she thinks fit. I have no objection." The aunt cried out, "O creature of God, why don't you propose the names of the arbitrators. Let me, too, have an idea."

Jumman spoke out angrily, "Now don't force me to speak. You have gained the vantage point. You may choose any one you like."

The aunt, at once, understood Jumman's hint and said, "Son, fear God. The arbitrators are neither anyone's friends nor foes. Why say so? If you do not have faith in any one else, it matters little? Do you accept Algu Chaudhury? Have it as you will. I nominate him as the chief Panch."

Jumman Shekh was, now, beside himself with joy, but suppressing his feelings, he said, "Let it be Algu, as you say. As for me, there is no difference between Ramdhan and Algu."

Algu did not like to be involved in this trouble. He tried to forge a way out. He said, "Aunt, you know there is a great intimacy between Jumman and me."

The aunt spoke out in a serious tone, "My son, nobody barters away his soul for friendship. God is enshrined in the heart of a Panch. The words that drop from his lips are prompted by God Himself."

Algu Chaudhury, now, became the chief arbitrator. Ramdhan Mishra and other adversaries of Jumman cursed the old woman much inwardly. Algu said, "Shekh Jumman, you and I are old friends. You have always stood by me in my need. I, too, have been trying to serve you in my humble way; but at this time you and your aunt are equal in my eye. If you have to say anything to the Panchayat, do that."

Jumman fully believed that he had, now, gained the upper hand. Algu was only making a show by talking in that way. He, therefore, submitted calmly, "Aunt bequeathed her property to me three years ago. I was bound to supply her with food and clothes till death. I swear by God that I have, in no way, put her to trouble till to-day. I regard her as my mother. I am duty-bound to take care of her, but there is some difference of opinion between her and my wife. Am I not helpless in this? Aunt demands monthly expenses by way of partition. The arbitrators, very well, know the extent of the property. Its yields are not enough to allow me to offer her monthly subsistence in cash. Besides, there is no mention of monthly expenses in the will, otherwise I would keep aloof from this trouble. Now it is upto the arbitrators to make any decision they like."

Algu Chaudhury had been in constant touch with law-courts. He was, therefore, fully aware of legal points. He began to cross-examine Jumman. Every question put by him lacerated Jumman's heart. Ramdhan Mishra was greatly attracted by these questions. Jumman wondered what had happened to Algu! Only a while before, he was sitting with him talking in quite a different fashion. In a split moment, he was so changed! Who knew what old scores he was paying off? Was their friendship of such a long standing not going to avail him in any way?"

Jumman was absorbed in a reasoning like this, when Algu pronounced the judgement: Jumman Shekh, the arbitrators have given this case a serious thought. They have deemed it right that the aunt should be given monthly expenses. We are of the opinion that the yields of her property justify a monthly amount. This is our decision. If Jumman does not see his way to accepting it, the bequeathal should be deemed null and void."

The moment Jumman heard this pronouncement, he was speechless. What should he think it to be, but an evil augury of days ahead, when his own bosom friend acts like an enemy and does not stick at cutting his throat even? He, whom he reckoned upon unreservedly, deceived him like that. It is on occasions like these that friends are tested. This is how friendship operates during these modern days of absolute enlightenment. If people were not so debased, why should the country be visited with calamities. Cholera, plague and such other fatal diseases are only punishments for sinful acts.

But Ramdhan Mishra and other arbitrators were praising Algu Chaudhury from the very core of their hearts. They said, "This is arbitration, indeed! The whole thing has, now, been rendered as clear as crystal and as smooth as glass. Friendship cannot form an impediment to duty. It is only such souls of rare veracity as sustain the earth or it would have long been annihilated."

This judgement shook the friendship between Algu and Jumman to the very foundation. They were, no more, found talking to each other. Such an old tree of friendship could not withstand even a single gust of truth. To be sure, it grew on sandy ground. There was, now, much of ceremoniousness between them. They began to be more pretentious to one another. They met one another as usual, but just in the same manner as a sword meets a shield.

His friend's crookedness always caused heart-ache to Jumman. He was always anxious as to how he should have a chance to avenge himself on him. One has to wait long for achieving something good, but it is not so in case of evil things. Jumman got an opportunity to retaliate very early. Algu Chaudhury had, the year before, bought a fine pair of oxen from Batesar. The bullocks were of western breed, with long horns. For months together people from the neighbouring villages kept pouring in to have a look at them. As luck would have it, just a month after Jumman's fateful arbitration, one of this pair died. Jumman told his friends, "This is punishment for faithlessness. Man may have the patience to endure, but God sees through the motive, good or bad." Algu suspected that Jumman had got the animal poisoned. Algu's wife, too, charged Jumman with the responsibility for the mishap. She said, "It is all Jumman's doing." Chaudhury's wife and Kariman had, one day, wordy warfare on this subject. Both the shrews caused a river of words to flow. Metaphors, similes and other figures of speech were freely used. Jumman restored peace some how or other. He scolded his wife into reason. He, also, dragged her away from the cock-pit. On the other hand, Algu Chaudhury employed his argumentative club to do the job.

Now the single ox was of no use. In spite of the most careful search, no match for it was available. It was ultimately decided to sell it. There was one Samajhu Sahu in that village. He used a cart to which he yoked a single ox. He carried a load of gur and ghee to market and brought oil, salt and the like therefrom to be sold at the village. He was greatly attracted to this ox. He thought if he could but have it, he would make three trips a day easily. He could hardly have one a day till then. He eyed the animal, tested it by yoking it to a cart, got it physically examined by experts, and had its price fixed. Then he brought it home. The price was promised to be paid in a month. The Chaudhury, too, was hard-pressed. He little cared for the loss.

After Samajhu Sahu had had this bullock, he started subjecting it to overwork. He would complete three trips a day; at times even four. He would not care for feeding it. He was concerned only with his trips. On reaching the market, he would place some dry chaff before it. Hardly did the poor creature have any rest, when he would, again, yoke it. While with Algu, it had had a merry life. It was seldom put to the yoke. It would be, then, very frolicsome and cover miles at a stretch, running. There the ox would get clear water, pulse, chaff and oil-cake for its food every day. Besides, it would have, from time to time, even ghee to taste. Every morning and evening it would be well groomed. On the one hand there was that life of joy and comfort; on the other, this twentyfour hours' drudgery. Hardly had a month passed when the ox was literally crushed. It shuddered at the very sight of the yoke. Now it was difficult for it to move even a single step. It was reduced to skin and bones, but being of a fine metal, it could not endure whipping.

One day, the merchant put double load in the cart in the fourth trip. Being very weary on account of the day's hard labour, the animal, now, found it difficult even to move. But the cruel master began to use the whip freely. The ox, therefore, had no option but to move at the very cost of life. It ran a while to cover some distance and then had a mind to have some rest, but the merchant wanted to reach home in no time. So he whipped the ox a number of times relentlessly. The animal, once more, tried to pull, but there was no strength left. It fell down to the ground, never to rise again. The man beat it mercilessly pulled it up by the legs, but can a lifeless body rise up? Then the merchant felt, a little bit, anxious. He examined the animal carefully, untied it and separated it from the vehicle and now began to think how to pull the cart back home. He cried himself hoarse for some one to come and help him, but the traffic in the country-side closes like the eyes of a child with the setting of the sun. Not a soul was within sight. There was no village nearabout. Out of anger, he beat the ox once more and began to curse it saying, "O wretch, if you had to die at all, you had better do it on reaching home. This father-in-law of mine is dead on the way. Now who will pull the cart?" The merchant was, in a fury. He had sold several bags of gur and some tins of ghee. He had about two hundred rupees hard cash tied round his waist. Besides, there were some bags of salt, lying in the cart; so he could not go away, leaving it unguarded. He had, therefore, no other alternative than to lie down on the bags in the cart. He decided to sit out the night there. He smoked and sang alternately to divert himself. The merchant, in this way, tried to ward off sleep till the dead of night. He thought that he had been up all the night, but just before sunrise, when he broke his sleep and placed his hand on the waist for the money, he found the purse vanished. In this very confusion, when he looked around, he found some tins, too gone. His grief knew no bounds. At dawn, he reached home, weeping bitterly. When his wife heard this sad news, she first wailed and then began to curse and call Algu Chaudhury names saying that the villain had given them such an ill-omened ox that all the earnings of their life-time were lost.

This mishap took place months ago. Whenever Algu Chaudhury demanded the price of the ox, Samajhu Sahu and his wife would fall upon him like infuriated dogs and start raving, "What a fun! We have been robbed of all our life's earnings. We are undone. Yet you think only of the price. You gave us a dead ox, but now you demand the price. You deceived us outright and befooled us by selling that ill-omened ox to us. Do you think us to be down-right fools? We belong to the business community. Try to find out such fools elsewhere. Go and wash yourself in a dirty pond, before receiving the price. If you are so impatient, take away our own ox instead, use it for two months instead of one. What more do you expect to have from us?"

Those who did not wish well of the Chaudhury were so many. On such occasions, therefore, they would assemble and support the ravings of the merchant. But to lose one hundred and fifty rupees in that way was not easy. Once he too, flared up. The infuriated merchant went about searching for a lathi. In the meanwhile, the fair sex, too, took the field. From words they were about to come to blows. The merchant's wife ran into the house and banged the door. Hearing the uproar, good people in the village came up. They expostulated with the two. They persuaded the merchant to come out of the house. They advised them that it would be bad for them, if they went on like that. They should have a Panchayati arbitration and accept its decisions. The merchant was agreeable. Algu, too, gave his consent.

Preparations began to be made for the impending arbitration. Both the sides set about strengthening themselves. On the third day after this, the arbitrating assembly held its session under that very tree. It was the same time of evening. Some distance away in the field, a community of crows met in a parliament of fowls. The subject debated was the ownership of peas—do crows have any claims on peas? They were determined to agitate till the question was solved.

A flight of parrots in the trees about were very keen on solving the question as to what right human beings have got to call them ungrateful, when they themselves do not hesitate to cheat their friends.

When the members of the panchayat were properly seated, Ramdhan Mishra said, "Why make delay? Let the arbitrators be chosen. Chaudhury, speak out the names of the persons whom you like to arbitrate."

Algu submitted in a mild tone, "Let this be done by Samajhu Sahu." Samajhu rose up and lashed out, "Jumman Shekh on my behalf."

No sooner had Algu heard Jumman's name than the beating of his heart grew abnormal, as if some one had slapped him abruptly. Ramdhan was Algu's friend. He realized the whole thing at once. He asked the Chaudhury if he had any objection, but he said that he had none.

The realization of our sacred duty and responsibility most often sanctifies our attitude and the resultant behaviour. After deviation from the right path, when we start going about groping for it, this very realization acts as our guiding star.

The moment, Jumman Shekh occupied the exalted position of the chief arbitrator, he realized his great responsibility. He felt that he, at the moment, occupied the highest position of duty and righteousness. Whatever dropped from his lips then, would have the sanctity of divine utterances which must be totally free from his mental blemishes. He would not budge an inch from the truth.

The arbitrators now began to interrogate the two parties. Both went on reiterating and trying to substantiate their own claims for long. There were no two opinions as regards the payment of the price of the dead ox by Samajhu. But two gentlemen pleaded for the leniency to him, for the death of the animal had caused him trouble and loss; whereas two others wanted Samajhu to be punished in addition to his paying the price, so that it might serve as a deterrant to others as regards cruelty to animals. At last Jumman pronounced judgement, saying, "Algu Chaudhury and Samajhu Sahu, the arbitrators have made sifting enquiry into your case. It is Samajhu's duty to pay the price of the dead ox. When he took the animal it was free from any kind of disease. Had the price been paid at that very time, Samajhu could now lay no claim to getting it back. The ox died because it was subjected to unjustifiably hard labour and poor feeding".

Ramdhan Mishra said, "Samajhu had killed the bullock not unwittingly. A fine should, therefore, be exacted from him".

Jumman said, "That is quite a different question. It does not come within our pruview". Jhagru Sahu said, "Some leniency should be shown to Samajhu". Jumman finally said, "That depends upon the sweet will of Algu Chaudhury. If he is lenient he desrves thanks for his nobility and magnanimity."

Algu Chaudhury was, now, beside himself with joy. He rose up and shouted out, "Victory to the panch the god like."

This sound was reechoed from all sides.

Everyone present eulogised Jumman's policy. It was justice indeed. It was something beyond human comprehension. God is enshrined in the hearts of arbitrators and prompts them to deliver nothing but the right and just.

A little later, Jumman came to Algu and embracing him, said, "Brother, I had been like a blood hound to you eve since you arbitrated in my case, but to-day I have come to realize that when one occupied the position of Judge, one is nobody's friend or foes. One's aim is nothing but justice. To-day I feel that God speaks through the tongue of a Panch". Algu burst into tears. This saline water washed clean the hearts of the two. The fading creeper of friendship regained its usual verdure.

The fading creeper of friendship regained its verdure.

Puja Holidays

IT was half-past four and still there was no sign of either Bimal Krishna Bhowmick or Raju. They were to have met me at the Alipore Zoo. The restaurant there was to be our randezvous.

Bhowmick was our host at Calcutta and Raju was my colleague. It was because of Bhowmick's pressing invitation and his promise "to take us where ever we wished-whether to hell or heaven in Calcutta" — we consented for a short stay there. And of course we wanted to see a bit of both the worlds in Calcutta.

I had already waited for more than half an hour and it had made me somewhat restless. But there was not much to do there except to watch, idly, either the inmates of the zoo or their visitors! It was then it happened.

As I was looking around, I suddenly accosted two little girls eyeing me intently. They were probably twins and it seemed a bit difficult to distinguish one from the other at first sight. They were so much alike and even of the same build. Their ready smile, their lovely dimpled cheeks were just captivating. In other words it was the kind of kids one would like to have and fondle.

The moment they knew they had caught my attention they looked at each other and again looked at me and broke into broad smiles. I was now sure they were just waiting to be taken into my arms. I had, I thought, probably reminded them of someone who was so near and dear to them.

I just could not resist those kids any longer. The moment I stretched out my arms they at once flung themselves into them crying excitedly "Daddy".

I did not quite remember what happened next during the few minutes that followed. Having no daughter of my own, all I remembered was a smothering of kisses from those little ones with the complaint "Daddy, why don't you come home? Mom is always crying for you!"

Then I heard a soft voice calling out: "Jharna! Jyotsna! Where are you?"

I woke up from my reverie.

"We are here, Mom!" cried out one.

"With Daddy," piped the other.

"What are you saying, Jharna?" exclaimed the voice which was obviously their mother's. Then there was the swish of a sari and as I looked up I saw face to face, a young woman, in her mid twenties, chic and seductive. She seemed a bit startled on seeing me with the children clasped in my arms but recovered herself immediately.

"You look so much like him! You are his double, I must say", was all she managed to mutter.

I could discern all her shock, surprise and pain in those few words. She hardly took her eyes off me. I felt a little embarrassed.

"I have probably been mistaken by the kids for their father," I said in low a voice. "I did not want to kill their joy so soon and so suddenly."

Her reaction was rather unexpected. Tears welled up in her eyes. "Yes, they have indeed mistaken you for their Dad whom they have not seen for the past two years. Please, for my sake, will you keep up that pretense at least for a while?" She begged me.

"Why Dad! Why don't you speak out?" exploded the one who looked the elder.

"No, Mom! You don't quarrel with him and send him away again. We want him back." pouted the younger one.

I was puzzled at the unexpected turn of events and the little human drama that was being enacted there. There was intense pain on that young woman's face as the children spoke. She wiped her tears, bent down and took the children in her arms and gently told the younger one. "No, Jyotsna! I shall not quarrel with Dad any more."

The elder one was smarter. She disengaged herself from her mother, ran to me and threw her arms around my neck and said sweetly. "Daddy, do come home, Mom is daily crying for you!"

"No, Jharna! How many times have I told you not to talk like this?" said the mother sternly. She was admittedly embarrassed by the children's frank disclosure.

"I am unable to distinguish between Jharna and Jyotsna," I cautiously remarked hoping to divert her attention and ease the embarrassment in which the children had placed her by their utterances. She did not reply but only looked at me sadly. The distress in her eyes was obvious.

For a while I stood confused. Here I am, waiting for my friends to pick me up and take me around Calcutta but am mistaken for somebody whom I never knew and am called upon to play his role! My pocket was no doubt bulging on that day for I had with me a month's pay and the advance of home-leave fares I drew only the other day. Was it somebody's ruse to relieve me of my hard earned money, I wondered.

But there was not much time for such deliberations. The children, so charming and innocent looking, were holding my hands fondly and looking at me expectantly. Their mother whom anybody would like to possess and call her his very own was entreating me to play the role of the children's father. I became interested. I was looking for some material for a short story I had promised for the annual number of my favourite magazine. "Well," I said to myself if this is a ruse and even if I am made to cough up the money I have with me now, I shall still take it as the price of the story I am going to write."

Suddenly there was a downpour and all of us scurried to the nearest shelter which happened to be the restaurant. I sat down with the children on either side and their mother opposite. The children were happy and excited and had obviously been anticipating a re-union with their father. I had now fully determined to play the role of their father come what may.

I ordered some snacks and ice-cream which the children greatly relished. But they hardly took their eyes off me. Then I watched their mother's reaction.

I had not so far asked for her name nor had she told me that herself.

I wanted a little briefing as well. So I leaned across the table and asked her. "How would Jharna's father address you? You haven't even told me your name and yet you want me to play the role of your husband and their father!" Now was I game for anything.

"That was my fault" she readily confessed. "My name is Maya Mukherjee. Jharna's father used to call me either Maya or Maya Rani. You may do likewise."

"I am afraid I will have to do that if I were to play the role effectively." I said.

"May I know your name please? You haven't told me yet! she whispered.

"I didn't tell you because you didn't ask for it!" I said as if I had been hurt by this lapse. "Well, anyway, my name is Devdas. I am a Government servant who is now in Pakistan Okay?"

"Surely you aren't the same Devdas — the short-story writer?" she gasped.

"It is I", I replied somewhat self-consciously but I really felt flattered that even my infrequent short stories should have made some imprint upon her — somebody whom I did not know until half an hour ago and whom I never expected to meet. Then I asked her, "Did you like my short stories, Maya?"

"That I shall tell you later," she said smilingly and I could straightaway guess what she would tell me. But she also warned me in the same breath. "Don't forget that you are to play the role of their father well!"

"It means the role of your husband as well even it is only for a short while, isn't it?" I interjected.

She looked at me enquiringly for a few seconds and then said with dignity, "Well, if that is the price you want, you take it!"

"No, not unless you give it yourself" I bargained.

The children had by now finished their second helping of ice-cream. Then Jharna, the elder child spoke first "Dad is always like this. Whenever he starts talking to mother, he just forgets us!" The tone was a little complaining but quite understandable.

But Jyotsna unexpectedly came to my rescue, "No, Jharna! Let him talk to Mom first and then we shall have him all for ourselves. Okay, Dad?

I looked at them approvingly and they went into raptures. I looked at Maya. She seemed to be serenely happy. I could detect a feeling of fulness in her. Our eyes met and she said with a deep sigh. "No price is too much for their happiness, Mr. Devdas! I shall willingly pay the price you wanted and I shall have absolutely no regrets".

I was touched to the quick. At once I hastened to say "No, Maya! I never meant it and I just said it for fun. I am so sorry I have hurt your feelings". I was full of remorse.

Don't feel bad, Mr. Devdas. I think I know you better through your short stories. The moment I know you are Mr. Devdas, I wanted to bare my heart to you. Even if you had really meant it, I wouldn't have hesitated to pay the price you had asked for. Look at my children! How happy they are! Do you think I can purchase this happiness for nothing? You have certainly not hurt me. You had just asked what I expected of you! After all aren't you a short-story writer?"

I looked through her eyes. There was no hurt, no injured pride to be seen in them. Maya must have been indeed a sporting girl.

"The showers have stopped. What should be our next programme?" I enquired.

"Are you free for the evening?" She questioned me back.

"Well, I shall make it so since you and children desire it". I offered.

"It is really so kind of you, Mr. Devdas, I do not know how to thank you sufficiently," began Maya.

"Look, Maya! I am now going to play the role in right earnest. Now then, you will do as I tell you, all right?"

She smiled at me and said. "The real He-man!"

"Jharna, Jyotsna!" I cried out. "Now we are going to the films and then back home, Okay?"

The children's enthusiasm knew no bounds. With Jharna and Jyotsna on either side and Maya following me a few steps from behind, we made straight to the theatre where they were screening the latest Walt Disney's film. I forgot all about Bhowmick and Rajù. Nor did I know that they did turn up at least and saw me going with Maya and children and followed us right up to the theatre and then left. This Maya had noted and told me late that night. I concluded from her description the two men that they must have been Bhowmick and Raju.

II

When the show was over, I hailed a taxi and we drove home straight. I, being new to Calcutta, let Maya give directions to the cab driver.

It was a mixed locality where various religious groups inter-mingled without much ado. Nobody seemed to bother the other. Maya led the way and I was following her with both the children on either side chatting animatedly. To everyone who stopped her, Maya had a ready smile, and a sweet word to say. Must be quite good at Public relations I thought to myself.

As we entered the flat, I looked around. It was a small two-roomed flat but self-contained. Every square inch of the space has been thoughtfully made use of. There was even a telephone.

The ayah was first to greet me. "Welcome to you, Debendra Babu! I know you will come for the Puja. I have been telling the children so!" She hardly finished when Maya cut in. "Please, Aruna, Babuji is tired and the children are hungry. Do give them something to eat, quick".

Aruna shot a quick glance at me and then there was surprise in her eyes. When they met Maya's she had already been warned. I did not fail to notice that.

It was the first day of Puja. The meal was excellent and the hospitality was nothing but lavish. The children ate little because of excitement. More than the food Maya's attention was just flattering. For her part, she seemed in an equally excited state. She had to be cajoled to take her food in her own home! What had brought up this metamorphosis? I wondered.

I felt I was getting into deep waters. But at the same time I did not allow myself to forget that I had already made my decision.

When the meal was over, Maya put the children to bed but they would not go to sleep so easily as she wanted. They wanted me near them all the time. It was getting late for me too. I had half a mind to take leave; yet I know I will be asked to stay I was afraid of being misunderstood by Bhowmick, yet Raju was there to come to my rescue. So I felt re-assured.

The issue then solved itself suddenly. It was again Jyotsna who settled the issue!

"You will sleep with us. Daddy! You won't go anywhere!"

It was a command.

I looked at Maya. She merely asked me, "You have heard what Jyotsna said?".

"The man who came to dinner....." I began to mumble. Maya cut it short. "Don't bother. The children need you. Hope nobody will miss you for the night".

"No, except you and the children", I made myself bold to say.

When I woke up at the crack of dawn, I was feeling strangely exhilarated—with Jharna and Jyotsna on either side of me clutching my hands securely. I felt a twang in my heart. Poor children they must have indeed been missing their father very much.

In the nearby cot lay Maya sleeping serenely. Now she was without any make up, dressed plainly yet irresistible. Who was she? Who was her husband? What would he think if he happened to see me sleeping with his children and his wife nearby in the same room?

..... Maya sleeping serenely.

Maya did not tell me much about herself the previous night. The children went to bed late and kept awake for long. They were not quite sure whether I would stay during the entire Puja holidays.

I wanted to speak to Maya all alone but the children would not let me do so and Maya, for her part, gave me little opportunity. By the time the children went to sleep, it was already very late and I had little mind or inclination to ask Maya any questions. But one thing was evident—that Maya wanted to detain me there as long as possible.

Next day, after a hearty break fast—for Maya had spared no pains—we were relaxed. The children left us free for the first time—they had now gone to tell their friends that their Daddy had indeed come for the Puja holidays.

Maya was free from household chores and the children came and sat by me. "Are you happy now?" I asked her.

"Don't you see it yourself, Mr. Devdas?" She replied.

"No! I am now Debendra Babu. You may call me Devdas if you like".

"You are dead-serious in your new role, I am afraid", she protested coquettishly.

"Just to please you and the children", I retorted.

She had no ready answer to give me. She looked at me steadily and said, "Since yesterday night I was feeling wonderful. Life no longer appears to be the grim struggle which I thought it was till I met you. Why don't you stay with me always, Devdas Babu?"

"And what that mean?" I smiled at her.

"Happiness and security — for me and my children. But I know I am asking for the impossible," she said with a deep sigh.

I had to admit the truth of it. But I did not dare to say so openly. She was already sad. I did not want to make her sadder.

"Well, Maya! You have not told me anything about you so far. How long are you going to keep me in suspense?

"Till to-night," she replied with a roguish smile.

* * * *

As the next two days happened to be the Puja holidays, I wanted to go out and attend to some important private work. I had my bank drafts to encash, railway tickets to purchase—I was on my way home — and gifts for my sons to buy.

But Maya would not trust me. She must have feared I might slip away. With reluctance she agreed to let me go but took care to send the children along with me!

With Jharna and Jyotsna on my hands I could not do anything except to buy them each, as my Puja gift, an attractive dress from a shop which happened to be kept open and we came back in time for lunch.

We had a quiet lunch and it looked a perfect picture of domestic bliss.

It must have been a long siesta. When I woke up, I heard Maya with her back turned to me talking to some body pleadingly. I wanted to know what the conversation was about so I pretended to be still asleep but my ears were turned to the talk that was going on. As the conversation dragged on, I could not shake off my drowsiness. Then I fell asleep again.

When I woke up it was nearly 6 p.m. Jharna saw me first. She kissed me affectionately and asked "Daddy, may I get you some coffee, please?"

"Please do, Jharna" said I and looked around.

Maya was not there. Jyotsna was struggling with some home work even on a holiday. Jharna was busy giving instructions to the ayah.

I got up, had a face wash and sat to write a letter to my wife to say I was not coming to her for Diwali. The plea I just put forward was not convincing enough; yet I know she would not question me. I knew her unwavering faith in me.

As I finished the letter as if she had anticipated my want, Jyotsna came near me and pulled out the chest of drawers and fished out a few odd things out of which she took out an envelope handed it over to me, and went back to her home-work.

Meanwhile Jharna brought my coffee. As I sipped it lazily, I ran my eyes through the papers left by Jyotsna with the carelessness which only a child would be capable of. Among them one caught my attention all at once. It was a copy of the recent court judgment against one Durga Rani Choudhury. I immediately remembered the case and as I went through the proceedings I realised that Maya Mukherjee was none other than Durga Rani Choudhury. My heart almost missed its beat. When I accepted Bhowmick's invitation with alacrity, she was the one person whom I wanted to meet very much in Calcutta. But I was already staying with her without my knowing it!

When I had done with the copy of the proceedings, I put it back quietly from where Jyotsna took it out and awaited Maya anxiously.

Maya came home very late. As the children were impatient and restless, I took them out for a short-while and learned two home truths, — that children do not ask to be born; and there is no substitute for parents.

By the time Maya came back, the children were fast asleep. Out side it was drizzling though lightly. Maya looked extremely tired and exhausted. I even felt that she was avoiding to see me face to face. All I could notice in her was an extreme sadness.

The ayah brought her a cup of hot coffee which she declined. I took it myself and handed over to Maya. She took it without protest.

I sat by her and took her hands into mine. She didn't resist me. I wanted to comfort her. I hugged her gently and asked, "Where had you been, Maya Rani? I want you to tell me the truth!"

Maya did not reply for while. Gradually she picked up courage and said softly, "I am a working-girl, Devdas. I have to work hard if I am not to starve!"

"Who is that employer who expects you to work even during Puja holidays?" I demanded

"Devdas! I am an artist and work as extra in the films. I also accept casual engagements for dancing performances. This is a busy season for me. You see! I have two kids to maintain!"

"I see," I said gruffly Maya watched my reaction nervously.

"Forgive me, Devdas! I shall tell you everything but please, please let me take my own time." she begged.

I left her at that. For the second successive night I slept in the same room.

It must have been past mid-night. There was a gentle knock at the door. I pretended to be fast asleep. Maya cautiously got up and looked around and ensured that I was indeed asleep. Then she slipped out and opened the door.

The man who came seemed to be in a hurry. Though they talked in whispers I could very well make out that he was the man who rang her up during the day and talked about "appointment." But Maya was firm. She plainly told him that Jharna's "father" had come and she won't be able to keep up any appointments. The other man was desperate. I could hear him clearly cursing me for coming in the midst of a "busy season." Maya cut short everything by closing the door with a bang. A little later I heard a car speeding away.

I got up from the bed as if I had just woke up. Maya came and sat by my side and looked at me with concern.

"I had a bad dream." I began.

"I too had my own. They won't let me free even for a day. The human vultures!" She was fretting.

"What happened, Maya? Who was that midnight caller!" I enquired. Her face fell. "I shall tell you that to-morrow Devdas." She replied.

"Why not to-night? Why not now?" I insisted.

..... she buried her face in my chest

"If you can understand your own characters, why not me, Devdas? I am not going to hide anything from you. I shall make a clean breast of everything. But please do let me take my time" she pleaded.

* * * *

The next evening Maya suggested that we go out alone. The children behaved extremely well and did not even protest when I told them of our plans.

We attended first a film show featuring a top-notch star and emphasizing the sacredness of marital union. Later she took me to one of the lesser known and what seemed to me not a very respectable hotel where she said she worked as a casual artiste. From there we proceeded to some mixed locality and stopped before a big house which seemed to have come to life only just then. A liveried Gurkha smartly saluted us and showed us in. Maya seemed to be in her elements now. Her nervousness, which I noticed when I questioned her as to why she had been late yesterday was no longer there. She seemed to be in complete possession of herself.

* * * *

As we entered, we were greeted by half a dozen attractive girls — mostly in their teens and early twenties. Maya selected a quiet corner and we settled ourselves comfortably there. A bearer came and took orders for drinks. The other girls gave us an understanding smile and left us alone.

A little later I heard a couple of cars drawing up the portico. Two men entered followed by a bearded man who seemed to be the boss of the show there. The two men sat for a while as the girls watched them. A little conversation took place and soon the two men went upstairs followed by two of the prettiest of the lot. It did not take me much time to guess that it was a brothel and a well-organized at that. The girls there were not of the common prostitute type. Evidently they were call girls drawn from middle and higher income groups.

Maya was now sitting so close to me that I felt a little uncomfortable. It was she who broke the ice first.

"Why do you think I have brought you here, Devdas? She asked me without a trace of guilt.

"I am trying to guess it, Durga," I said deliberately, At once she recoiled as if she was stung. There was a look of terror and of extreme fear in her eyes.

"Don't be afraid, Maya!" I assured her, "I think I am beginning to understand you," and drew her closer to me.

She gave me a poignant look. Then she buried her face in my chest and began to sob. It was one of the most embarrassing moments of my life.

One of the four girls, who were apparently waiting to be picked up by customers, came down to me and said, "Debendra Babu, ever since you left her she is behaving like that. You mustn't leave her again. She is such a tender flower." Then she helpfully suggested, "Whenever she gets into that mood, Jabbar Saheb sends her back. I think you had better take her home."

At the mention of Jabbar Saheb, Maya clutched my hands firmly. Her hands were trembling with fear. I thought she was going to faint.

I summonned the bearer and ordered some brandy. Maya would not take it first but I forced her to take it. She was evidently in a state of near collapse and I knew it was high time I took her home.

* * * *

The ayah did not show any surprise. She helped me to put Maya in bed and then retired. The children were fast asleep each cuddling a teddy bear. As I saw them in that state I had to agree with Maya that no sacrifice was too great to ensure the happiness of those two little innocent lives.

Maya showed signs of revival after a little while but would at no stage leave my hand which she was clutching tightly. As the night advanced, I was so exhausted I felt I had no strength left even to change my dress. With difficulty I took off my shoes and leaned against a pillow still resisting overwhelming sleep. Maya in her semiconscious state nudged closer to me. I was so exhausted that I cared little for anything. Then I also fell asleep.

* * * *

With the chirping of early birds came the chatter of children. Jharna and Jyotsna were already awake and talking to each other and giggling. I felt a bit ashamed to be seen in the same bed with Maya still clasping my hands tightly. But the children apparently did not see anything unusual in their parents sharing the same bed. To them I was their father. I did not want to smash that image.

Thus another night passed without Maya telling me her story.

* * * *

The Puja holidays were over. I had not seen Bhowmick and Raju ever since they missed the randezvous at Alipore. According to our original programme Raju was to return to Pakistan the next day after seeing me off at Howrah.

I felt guilty in not calling upon Bhowmick all these days. But at the same time I felt I had very strong reasons not to call upon him also! Bhowmick was the sort of person who would not hesitate to ask inconvenient questions about Maya in his wife's presence. It was the thing that I precisely wanted to avoid.

I rang up Bhowmick at his office. He replied at once. His first question was, "So the Durga Puja is over?"

"I don't quite understand you, Bhowmick," I said hesitatingly.

"No! You won't! I said "Durga Rani Puja," Clear?

"What you mean by this Bhowmick?," I asked him irritated

"I meant Abdul Jabbar's best call-girl. Understand?"

Maya was listening to the entire conversation. I felt my head was reeling. I put down the receiver abruptly.

* * * *

I took my decision. I sent the children out and told Maya plainly that it would be the last night I would be spending with her and then be off whether she tells me her story or not.

* * * *

We went to the bank first. As I was encashing my drafts. I saw Raju too there. Our eyes met, but he did not even pretend to know me. I could see intense hatred and contempt in his eyes. If stares could burn, I am sure he would have reduced me and Maya and her children to ashes long ago. I had no doubt felt a little uncomfortable at his silent watch but decided to ignore him.

Later we did a little shopping — mostly toys for the children — and returned home.

Jharna and Jyotsna were hardly able to control themselves when they learnt that I was leaving them the next day. It was indeed a pity to see those two children yearning for their father's love yet denied the same.

I did not wish to stir out that day. Maya and the children hardly spoke to me; yet my mere presence there made all the difference. Maya felt secure and the children were reassured.

After tea, Maya came and sat before me. She was gorgeously dressed and I thought she was preparing to get out. An intense jealousy took possession of me. I brusquely caught hold of her hand and rudely demanded, "To whom these are meant for?" I completely forgot that I was not her husband.

Maya gave me one of her bewitching smiles and said "For Devdas — the short-story writer and Debendra Babu's double."

It had an electric effect upon me. I felt ashamed; I immediately calmed down.

Was she trying to pay me by her "service"? I asked myself. When I gave her that morning all the money I had encashed, she vehemently protested. When I said that it was for Jharna and Jyotsna from their adopted father, she just kept quiet and accepted it without muttering a word.

"Is it the price you promised to pay me?" I asked her.

"No!" She said with emphasis. "I was yours just for the asking all these days. But you behaved in an exemplary manner. You are too much of an idealist, Devdas." She finished.

I chuckled. Could she be ever aware of my inner fury? It was the greatest moral test I had so far faced. But for my wife's unwavering faith in me, and the thought of it I would have fallen a victim of Maya's charms the very day I met her.

The thought of my wife and her unshakable faith in me made me feel much better. I was now sure that no amount of Maya's charms would shake me off my feet.

"Why so thoughtful?" She asked.

"I was thinking of tomorrow when I would be leaving you all-?"

"I am going to tell you my story to-night," she said in soberly and sadly and looked at me.

I took her in my arms. There was no passion in it. Maya began to cry as if her heart would break. The children looked puzzled and unhappy. "I know" I said with understanding.

III

After dinner, we relaxed for a while. The children were extremely happy at the day's outing and Maya was repeatedly thanking me for the "most wonderful evening". She said it was most memorable.

"I wish I could die now. I shall have no regrets — if only you could take charge of Jharna and Jyotsna," she added feelingly.

I didn't say anything. I looked at Jharna and Jyotsna. They were sleeping with not a care in the world. Was I sapping the will of that girl to fight for her existence in this cruel world? I shuddered at the very thought of it.

The clock struck ten. There was a draught of chill wind from outside. I turned on the radio. It was pouring out some sad, sentimental, love-lorn song. Maya was sad, but as usual sweet and charming. I met her eyes and I felt I never had a woman look at me so listlessly. She was feminine, so warmly feminine and gracefully feminine. I began to be afraid of her for the first time.

She partially closed the window's to protect the children from the cool draught. Then she pulled out the chest of drawers and took out the copy of the judicial proceedings which I had already seen and gave it to me.

I watched her again. As I said, "Thanks, I have already seen the newspaper report of it, Maya," I vividly recollected the news item in which was given a graphic description of what transpired in the Court of Law when Durga Rani Choudhury, a call-girl, narrated, before the Magistrate, how poverty drove her to lead a life of shame. Her frank confession was "I am just helpless. Even if I want, I just cannot give up this immoral profession as I would not be able to get a square meal for myself and my two children." It shocked and saddened me.

"Must I go through this, Maya? You had better give me the account yourself" I suggested.

"Must I?" She hesitated for a while and then spoke, "Yes I shall do so, Devdas Babu. The sooner I get it off my chest the better. Otherwise I shall collapse."

The radio was now broadcasting a sad orchestral music. Maya Mukerjee alias Durga Rani Choudhury began her sad but sordid story. It was the story of a woman who sold her body to save her children.

"When I got married ten years ago, Devdas Babu," She began, "I was as hopeful and excited as any other young girl. I dreamt of a happy little home, mind you, a happy little home and a couple of children and a loving husband. I did not ask for a luxurious life; a life that was above want—that's all I wanted.

"But the man I married — he was an apology for a man. He was more interested in the dowry I brought with me than in me. To him his mother and unmarried sisters meant much more than I. He would not take me out even on the Puja day! Can you think of that! That was the mouse I had married.

"When my parents died, and, when he knew that I could not get any more loot for him, he began to treat me cruelly. His sisters even tried to poison me. It was His mercy that I didn't conceive through that man.

"But the neighbours were so kind. But for them I would have killed myself long ago. Then one day, at the pressing invitation of a college girl who was my next door neighbour and my confidante, I went to see a film. When the film was over, it was raining cats and dogs. Transport became a problem. All the buses and trams were so crowded that it was just not possible for us two young girls to get into them. We were afraid to hire a taxi either. Apart from the fact that we could ill afford that luxury, we were too scared to get into one without a male escort. I nearly died of fright.

Maya was almost in a stupor. I did not want to interrupt her.

"Well then, when we finally managed to reach home, my husband, my mother-in-law and sister-in-law were all waiting to pounce upon me. My heart sank. As I was about to enter the house, my husband brutally barred me and kicked me out. My mother-in-law threw out my suit case which contained my few earthly belongings. 'You enter this house only at your peril,' shouted all of them in unison and then slammed the door with a bang. I stood there all alone, shivering in the early winter rain, with none to come to my rescue.

"The College girl who got me into this trouble was nowhere to be seen. She had just vanished.

"I did not know how long I had been lying outside in the drenching rain. When I came to my senses, a middle-aged man was holding me and asking me, 'Where is your house? Can I help you?

"I could only cry my heart out.

"He did not ask any more questions. He gently lifted me and led me in the rain carrying my suit case.

* * * *

"I changed to dry clothes. Debendra Babu, he said it was his name, had some biscuits and a steaming cup of tea ready for me. I ate them greedily. I was so hungry. Then I fell asleep.

"I got over my shock soon and took stock of the situation. My going back to my husband was out of question. If he were man enough, he would have never left me like that.

"The only relations I had — my parents — were dead. I had no choice but to face the cruel world all alone.

"Debendra Babu was emotional but exceedingly kind and considerate. He fed me, clothed me. He was a man with a broken heart. And I needed a prop. Well, I would spare the details. After some time, one day he proposed and I said 'yes' and we began to live as husband and wife. He was an artist and a poet but not very well-to-do, yet we did not starve. Jharna and Jyotsna were born in quick succession. I was happy and content with my lot.

"Well as a girl, I showed some promise as a dancer and an actress but when once I was married off I thought that was the end of them. But that was not to be; when Debendra Nath came to know that I could dance and act, he went wild with joy.

I was to play the role of a court dancer .....

He wanted to make a top star of me in the film world.

"With two children to bring up, I did not, at first, quite relish the idea; yet at the same time, I had no strength of mind to let go a "golden opportunity" as I thought it to be at that time. The lure of money and the glamour of better life was too strong for me to resist.

"Well, I picked up threads and was progressing astonishingly well. Debendra Nath's joy knew no bounds. My cup of happiness at last seemed full.

"True, there was a serpant in my paradise but at that time I did not see it.

"One day Debendra Nath came home highly excited and said that I had been given a stellar role and that we were to sign a contract the next day. It was only after signing the contract I was told of the role.

"Its details shocked me beyond measure. I was to play the role of a court dancer and just as Salome did, I was to cast off one after another all the garments, I was wearing and dance through the finale in the flimsiest underwears.

"I felt deeply humiliated. But my husband saw nothing wrong in it. He said it was art for art's sake!

"That was the beginning of the end. I kept mum and played my role to the best of my ability but the film unfortunately turned out to be a big flop. Debendra Nath was disillusioned. He took to drinking and began to quarrel with me frequently without rhyme or reason."

Maya held my hands tightly. She was tense and excited.

"Well, to cut the long story short," she continued nervously. "One day he went out in a huff after a big quarrel. I waited for him to come back as usual but he did not come back this time. I got alarmed and reported the matter to the police but they were not of much help. Even now they say they are still investigating!

* * * *

"Our funds had almost exhausted and when we were facing certain starvation, Jabbar came to my rescue. He engaged me as a dancer and musician but it was not quite a paying proposition. I did not get sufficient engagements, to keep the wolf from the door. The profession was already overcrowded, and there was too much of competition; besides the demand was slack. In the circumstances I had perforce to switch over as a call-girl out of sheer necessity. "I know it is a shameful profession," she said passionately, "but tell me, Devdas Babu, who would give me and my children a square meal every day?"

"That's what you have told the Magistrate. Isn't it?"

"Yes, Devdas Babu. I did not become a call-girl just for the fun of it. Do you know that I have to part with, everyday or rather every night, half of my earnings, sometimes upto Rs. 60/- to Jabbar?"

I wanted to listen to Maya's story no doubt. But this was not what I had bargained for.

Maya was weeping copiously. I could not bear it. "Enough of it, Maya" I said and took her in my arms. And then I asked her, "Do I mean anything to you?"

"You are everything to me, Devdas Babu. I shall never forget this Puja. If only you could stay on with me, I shall give up this profession and slave for you. My children's future — it is the only thing I care for in this world. To achieve that I shall not hesitate even to immolate myself. Devdas Babu!"

"I could very well guess that, Maya! I know you are not the type to sacrifice yourself in search of a vague ideal."

"Can you get me a regular job? I can sing well, dance well. If only I am assured of a steady employment....."

I did not wait for Maya to finish. "I am already thinking on those lines, Maya." I said, "I have a few contacts. If I succeed, you must turn over a new leaf. Will you?"

"I promise" She said with determination.

* * * *

Though my train was only in the afternoon, I took leave of Maya and children in the morning. I had certain obligatory calls to make, to apply for cancellation of leave, raise enough money for my return journey to Pakistan and for expenditure en route.

As I prepared to leave, the children started crying. Maya, with flowing dark hair and tiny tears at the corners of her eyes and dressed in the manner of a typical Bengali housewife was so comely that I found it difficult to believe that she could also be a call-girl.

I promised Jharna and Jyotsna that I would come again for the next Puja. Then I hugged them and kissed them. Then I left with a heavy heart.

When I arrived at the Sealdah Railway Station, I found I still had about some thirty minutes to let go. I leisurely walked and got into one of those green painted, ramshackle compartments. Then I closed my eyes out of sheer fatigue.

When I opened my eyes again, I saw Raju seated in the same compartment, but he did not speak to me. Bhowmick was standing on the platform and as usual smiling mischievously.

I wanted to show my annoyance with him. So I kept quiet. But he was not the type to be cowed down. He also kept quiet.

Then I heard Raju muttering to himself "That whore again" and all at once I saw Maya accompanied by Jharna and Jyotsna making a bee line for me.

I got down from the compartment. Bhowmick looked astounded. Maya, charmingly dressed as usual, gave me, with a happy smile, a big basket. "What's all this, Maya? I asked her.

"Some fruits and sweets for your onward journey, Devdas Babu. I made them all myself for you." Then she gave me one of her steadfast looks that would crack down any man's will.

I avoided her eyes and turned on my attention to Jharna and Jyotsna who were clamouring to give me something.

"What's in it, Jharna? I enquired. "Sweets for Dad," cried both of them in chorus.

"You are not to open it till you reach the border," enjoined Maya.

I accepted the gifts without further ado and put them inside. Maya took the dust of my feet. The children kissed me affectionately.

The train to Pakistan pulled out. Bhowmick was watching all these in shocked silence.

* * * *

At Ranaghat, the compartment nearly emptied itself. There was no-one in the compartment except me and Raju who still kept his silence.

I felt hungry. I examined the food basket so thoughtfully brought for me by Maya. There were luscious luchis kept in a food flask and still warm. Then there were some delicacies made of coconut and cool rosagollas in an earthen pot and some out of season fruits.

I invited Raju to share the meal. "What?" he sneered, "to eat the food made by that whore?"

My blood boiled. I felt like knocking him down. By the time I finished counting ten, I became near normal. But he had killed my appetite for food.

* * * *

At the Indian border check-post there was a long, long wait. I lazily opened the gift parcel given by Jharna and Jyotsna. The contents shook me. Apart from two expensive chocolate bars, there was a bank draft for the exact amount I gave Maya that morning. I was shocked and surprised. Raju looked bewildered.

"Is she a sinner after all?" Raju asked me after a long pause.

"No," I said with emotion. "She has been more sinned against."

* * * *

At the Pakistan border check post the wait was not so long. The train began to move. "Let us have something to eat, Devdas," Raju suggested.

Without a word I took out the food flask and served ourselves with the luchis which were still warm and fresh and the other eats. Raju tasted a few morsels of them. Then he said appreciatively, "These are really delicious, Aren't they?"

I gave him a faint smile in agreement.

Outside the moon was shinning brightly. The green, ramshackle train was speeding ahead under full steam.

COME FROM THE DEAD

By TARASANKAR BANDOPADHYAYA

THE wife of Chandrasekhar Babu, the litterateur, burst into his room and asked him straight away — "What is this? What do these scribblings mean? You might be a writer, perhaps popular, but are you to wound readers' feelings in whatever way you like?"

Her face was reddened with anger. She held in her hand a copy of the Puja Number of "Navajuga."

Chandrasekhar Babu had crossed the frontier of his middle age—old age was creeping in. His wife too was middle-aged. Her hair was just greying. Their family was a big one. With all the children, grand-children, nephews and servants it was at times forty strong.

Chandrasekhar Babu was sitting in a thoughtful mood. He was weak and felt washed out. He had fought many a life's battle, in which, they say, he was victorious. For some time past, his eldest son-in-law, a man in a high Government post, was laid with suspected cancer. In people's eye this was the only blot in his happiness. None believed that he had any other worry except the illness of his son-in-law. From the worldly point of view, no cause was found to exist. But it did exist. He was called a man of emotion and perhaps that trait tended to make him worry-minded.

A theist all through, he was in his middle age confronted with a sudden accession of agnosticism. Everything appeared to be sham. Everything was meaningless. Today also he was cogitating over it. It found a place in his story—"Heart's Blood"—published in the Puja Number of "Navajuga."

Chandrasekhar Babu looked at the face of his wife. Simultaneously his two eye-brows were contracted. It was idiosyncratic. He queried, "What?"

The wife rejoined. "I had a morbid fear of your contracted eye-brows. But no more of it. I would no longer fear it."

—"You might. But what of that?"

"What have you written here?"

He lowered his eyes and glanced at the marked paragraph in the copy of "Navajuga" thrown to him. He said with a faint smile. "Is it a lie? Just recollect: did you not utter all these words? You are a pious woman. Say it yourself."

This time the wife wept out. Her lips quivered. Tears rolled down her cheeks. She replied in a choked voice—"What you did that day in a fit of anger enraged me. You have taken those words as true uttered in an angry mood. Though I am a mother I have forgotten all about my dead daughter. Yes, said that. Man is apt to forget. One cannot live if one is to carry on throughout one's life the recollections of the dead one. But can you tell me that the dead man will come back if kept embalmed in saline tears? Has the dead one at any time come back? On the contrary we shy at a shadow seen in the night—. We think it has come to take us away."

Suddenly she burst into quick tears. "When any one will read it, he will be under no illusion as to he identity of the father or the mother. All through ny life you have been besmirching me in your umerous writings—"

She did not stand there to finish her words. She came out and as she was ascending the stairase, she finished her utterance. Chandrasekhar Babu was rooted to his seat with a vacant look at he offending passage. Truth is stranger than fiction. n the present case the story was a true one from tart to finish. Every word and every line of it was rom fact. Curiosity led him to experiment how far is a writer he could base his story on reality and vrite it out. There was something more. It was replete with the mortal agony that recently overtook his mind as a cruel truth which had the visage of dreadful agnosticism. But in the story the dart was not aimed at his wife alone. It included everyone of the world. His self-reprimand was far exceeding.

He chid his wife for being oblivious of her dead child. "Oh, what a blessed mother you are! You do not care to know in what poor corner the memory of your own child is lost."

Her excuse found expression in the words she uttered. They were blazing in printed letters before his eyes on the opened page of "Navajuga." But on the next page, he whipped himself. It was wholehearted self-condemnation. It ran thus:

"When his daughter-in-law found the photograph discoloured, she put it aside and did not hang it up. His wife did not look at the photograph as she did not find any semblance of her daughter, in shape and grace, in it. But what about him? Fie! He could not scoop out any spare time! He was running fatuously lured by fame."

He reprimanded himself. Repeatedly. 'Fie upon you! You have set yourself adrift in the whirlpool of self-aggrandisement. You cannot protest against it. Nor have you any excuse for it. Nothing at all. You did not think of making out any time for the renovation of the photo. You found no time. You will perjure yourself if you deny it. It proves at the same time that all your talk about love, affection remembrance and your endeavour to score a triumph over Time are artificial, specious, bootless!' Simultaneously his inner soul cried out — "No — No — No. Don't say more. Don't say more."

There was a plethora of reproaches. On the day of occurrence he was overwhelmed by deep self-pity. He penned the lines without reserve. What happened afterwards was still more cruel. In it was revealed the harsh sober truth of the world. It was truth in all nakedness. There was no nectar on earth but mere death—sure and inevitable. There was erosion, bit by bit erosion—then dissolution—dissolution in the big void of agnosticism. He had disclosed in the story why nectar brought the notion of God along with it, God too was a myth if there was no nectar.

That day he was overtaken by the feelings of self-mortification and became impatient. He reprimanded his wife and the whole world. But today he remained unmoved at the mortification of his wife. He gave a faint smile and accepted that cruel truth and looked at the sky lying outside through the front southern window.

It was the onset of winter. The Puja festivity was over a month ago. The perspicacity of the autumnal sky was just giving way to gloominess. The smoke from the factory chimney at the back of his house was being scattered over on the southern side under pressure of the northerly wind.

It was just at this time that Bulu breathed her last. It was the beginning of Agrahayan, the 3rd Agrahayan. The name "Bulu" as a shortened form from "Bulbul". She spoke sweetly and distinctly. Her articulation was so distinct that he would term it as a message and not as string of words. Everybody would ask her "What is your name, pretty one?"

Her complexion was dark and her eyes were slightly squinted. Dimples appeared in her two cheeks when she smiled. She would smilingly say, "Father calls me Bulbul, mother calls me Bulu. My real name is Srimati Sandhya Bandopadhyay." She died when she was five years of age. Long before that, she articulated quite distinctly. All the niceties of alphabets, single or mixed, were clearly and correctly pronounced by her. Bulu died in 1932.

Bulu was his most favourite child. She was very mild-tempered and timid. Chandrasekhar Babu named her Sandhya. When she was three Bani was born. She had shining colour and beauty. In the family circle words went around about the inferior complexion of Bulu. Those words were not hard enough but were replete with sympathy and compassion. But Bulu felt her own inferiority in that expression of compassion. Because he was a litterateur, Chandrasekhar Babu could feel her sorrow. He discovered a wonderful beauty even in that blackness. His eldest son was the favourite of his aunt, and second son was the favourite of his mother. His eldest daughter and the youngest Bani usurped the two sides of their mother. But this weak and tender girl cleaved to her father. For her clear articulation Chandrasekhar Babu taught her to recite poems.

In 1930 when Chandrasekhar Babu joined the Civil Disobedience Movement, he had to shoulder the leadership of the movement of his place. Under its spell Bulu was taught to recite from Rabindranath's "Katha O Kahini." He came out of his house in early morning and would return home at midday. Bulu was the first to rush towards him and to clasp him with the word "Papa" in her lips. His wife was silenced by apprehension, his aunt was mortified and irritated through it and his mother was complacent. Still the family affairs urged her to say—"Just ponder and proceed. In your early years your education was hindered by your contact with the revolutionaries. You know the whole story."

His two boys were then 12 and 8 years of age. Though interested in their father's work, they were afraid to approach him. His eldest daughter was 6 years old but she was more timorous. Bulu alone would rush forward to meet him. Thereafter he went to jail. The day he came out of it, all the members of his family went in a hired bus to receive him. That day Bulu was sitting in the lap of her aunt. It was Bulu who greeted him first and leapt into his bosom. How bitterly she wept! What an uncommon beauty did her father discover in her face that day. Even to-day that picture of hers floated before his eyes. It was winter. He still remembered that Bulu had a green-coloured warm coat on.

Soon after, Bulu was attacked with typhoid fever. Chandrasekhar Babu was by her bed-side all the time. She recovered from her illness but for some strange reason, she lost her voice. She gazed at the face of all with piteous eyes. Tears would roll down. The financial state of Chandrasekhar Babu's family was not sound. Still the top-ranking doctor was called in from the district headquarters. He remembered how he told the doctor that his patient was called Bulbul for the sweetness and the distinctness of her pronunciation but that voice was destroyed for ever.

The doctor asked him not to lose heart.

The assurance of the doctor was fulfilled. Bulbul regained her voice after a few days. Again she started chirping. But the fever left a mark. It affected the colour of her body and her eyes. She became darker and more squint-eyed. At such a time a strange thing happened and made Bulu cling to her father more closely.

One afternoon her elder sister, Ganga, took her to a festival in the Thakurbari of one of their rich relatives. Just when they stepped into the temple someone shouted out — "Look! whose daughter is this one! the girl over there!"

Bulu was flabbergasted. Ganga replied, "Grandma! she is my younger sister, Bulu."

"Your younger sister? so black? my God! I just thought she might be the daughter of some low-caste people."

She was then joined by one of her flatterers— "Oh my God! How will Chandrasekhar Babu give this daughter in marriage! There is ugliness and ugliness. But she surpasses all!"

Bulu made for her home forthwith. Her elder sister too followed her. Bulu could not shed tears before them but with the crossing of the temple yard, she started weeping bitter tears. She did not stop and went on crying till her father returned. Chandrasekhar Babu stopped her with great difficulty. He told her—"Sable colour is a sign of merit."

She shrugged her shoulder—"No, Papa." Chandrasekhar Babu put in "What about me?"

Bulu was taken aback. Her father too was dark-complexioned.

Chandrasekhar Babu proceeded on — "I, too, am black. Am I not good?"

She rejoined — "Yes, Papa — You are black and I am also black."

—"Oh yes. It must be so in the course of things. You are my mother! I am your son. The other people are devoid of sight. They can't discern what a wealth of sweet beauty lies in you."

She replied — "Yes, Papa, you are black and I am black. Mother is beautiful, so also my elder sister and my brothers. You are my son."

Yes, papa, you are black and I am black .....

After that time, she clung to her father more closely. She started a play. She acted as the mother and Chandrasekhar Babu had to act as her son. This play did not take place before all but in a solitary atmosphere. There is a scope for rest at noon, whether in winter or in summer in our rural life. It is not a mere siesta. Many would enjoy a short nap, specially in summer. The play was commenced in summer time. The two sons of Chandrasekhar Babu would go to school and his wife would take rest in the ground floor along with her other two daughters. In the early thirties wives did not meet their husbands at noon. Bulu would sleep with her father. Her repast over, she would wait for her father and when he finished his meal, she would then close the door and would start the play.

The whole house fell asleep in the heat of summer noon. Bulu would take up the role of the mother and Chandrasekhar Babu acted as her son. She was presented with a small piece of sari by Chandrasekhar Babu. It was yellow-coloured. The border was patterned like a creeper wrought in white thread. She would wear it and skirt her head and rub the face of Chandrasekhar Babu with the pillow towel. He had to lie down on the bed and her palm served as a shell spoon to feed him. Then, she would close up to give him suck and say "Take it."

Then she passed her fingers over his body to "rub" mustard oil for a bath. A hole on the floor became the bath tub, "Water" was poured on him with her cupped palm. When the bath-scene was over, he was given a wiping with the towel and his hair was dishevelled and rearranged with her hand. Then he was fed and asked to go to sleep.

By this time, his eye-lids were heavy and he was dozing. It would not do to go to silent sleep. He had to say — "Lie down and give me a suck."

She would reply — "You naughty child! Does one take a suck after meal?"

Chandrasekhar Babu would feign tears. She would then lie by his side and consoled "Don't cry. Take it. You are very naughty. I am to do household work. I am to take my meal. Quick, go to sleep quickly."

She would lie beside him and sing a lullaby intoning it sweetly and distinctly. Chandrasekhar Babu would mingle his own intonation with it. Sleep would in the meantime overtake them both.

In the afternoon when they rose from sleep they became separated. Chandrasekhar Babu would go out for a walk, Bulu would reach to their parlour to play with her sister. In the evening he attended the theatrical club and the library. He was almost their helmsman. Bulu would sit by the side of her grandmother and listen to her yarns. Very few people could approach her in story-telling. She could tell fairy tales or tales from the Puranas. Young and old, all listened to her, bewitched by her narration. Bulu would also listen to it. But she never fell asleep when story-telling was going on. She would fall asleep when the stories were finished and she woke up when Chandrasekhar Babu took his meal after his return. She wanted to sleep in her father's bed.

Chandrasekhar Babu would lull her to sleep and put her on the bed of her mother. He had a single bed of his own. Even four days before her death, she jerked her feverish frame erect as soon as Chandrasekhar Babu entered the room.

She was attacked with malaria. At that time malarial fever was deeply rooted in the air and soil of Bengal, specially in rural areas. On that occasion both his wife and daughter were attacked at the same time. But Chandrasekhar Babu did not seem to care—he could not find time, he was producing a play of which he was playwright, director, stage manager, prompter and all.

This constituted the gravamen of his charge against himself. He asked himself — "Where is leisure, outside or inside the mind? He could not get it as he employed his mind in outside urgency. He was not anxious for his Bulu. Obligation was something more imperious than a thought on Bulu. He neglected the nectarine vessel of his fatherly heart and became crazy with quaffing to his heart's content the cup of the wine of merriment held up before his mouth by the stir and bustle of the festival.

On that day after the play was over, its festivity was prolonged further till the next night. He returned home after its finish and pushed the door. The door was so kept as his wife was also ill of fever. Bulu woke up and muttered — "Papa" — "Mamma."

"Papa, — water."

He held the glass of water kept by his bedside to her mouth and touched her body.

He was startled. His finger seemed to burn. The fever was so high.

After her drink Bulu urged her father to keep her in his bed and not in her mother's.

Chandrasekhar Babu did not fulfil her wish. He lulled her to sleep and laid her as usual in her mother's bed.

Next day the doctor examined her and said: "Though the fever persists she is well. There will be remission either in the afternoon or early next morning."

All through the day Chandrasekhar Babu was in deep sleep as if to pay off the debt of vigils of several nights.

The maid servant woke him up in the afternoon. His wife was shivering with fever sleeping by the side of Bulu. The maid servant was asked by her to call up Chandrasekhar Babu as she felt that Bulu's fever was high.

They were on the ground floor. Even though there was fever, all the inmates at that period would make their beds in the ground floor and sleep there.

Chandrasekhar Babu went downstairs. He was startled when he felt the pulse of Bulu. He found the pulse intermittent. He himself ran to the doctor living in Bazarpara. He was not at that time so famous but he was honoured for his service to the village and villagers and for his personality. The doctor came along with him and frowned as he examined her. He gave her an injection. Death turned its back on that day but exactly after two days it re-appeared. The illness deceitfully took the crooked path. It could not be better described than deceit. Next morning there was full remission. Everybody was assured. The fever of Bulu's mother stuck on. The doctor thought it would take sometime. As for Bulu, rice was prescribed for the next day in place of soup as she was very much weakened.

Really she had no fever. Yet she lay still and motionless. She became speechless as if struck with coma. There was a tired look. She did not turn her face even at the voice of Chandrasekhar Babu. Still Chandrasekhar Babu could not size up the situation. After his afternoon rest, he got downstairs and became ready for the walk. He was seized with fear when he touched Bulu's body. Such a cold body! Where was the heart? He felt the pulse quickly. What ? It was intermittent again. The thin pulsating thread of the pulse, off and on, lost its clue. He ran towards Bazarpara again.

The doctor took up his bag and left the place, Chandrasekhar babu did not fail to guess the hint.

The doctor arrived and repeated the injection. The pulse looked up. But before half-an-hour there was a spasm, and again she became pulled down. Her father again felt the pulse. Again the pulse was intermittent. Her finger tips were icecold. He again ran for the doctor. The doctor again injected her.

Bulu uttered in a piteous tone "Papa ... Mamma... No more injection."

Finishing her words, she vomited several times. The doctor was frightened and again felt the pulse. His face turned pale.

He left the instruction — "Please send some one for medicine. No more injection."

He took up his own bag and left the place. Chandrasekhar Babu did not fail to guess the hint.

After that, Bulu called his father alone several times. But Chandrasekhar Babu could ill prepare himself to sit by her side.

When after a long time, he tried to recollect the event, he sensed an anxious feeling or similar agony in his heart. His eyes were being filled with tears. As if the assured belief in some meaningless blind faith was departing from his heart. He cried "Oh! God."

God was a myth.

He believed in God all through his life. Meanwhile, he tried to be an atheist but failed in the attempt. After that, he abandoned that course and kept alive his belief in God with deeper zest and belief by taking resort to daily worship, by watering regularly the root of that rootless tree. But that belief did not survive the incident taking place two months ago over the memory and photo of Bulu on which he wrote the story of "Heart's Blood" in the "Navajuga". His wife made tearful complaint against it and the writing was lying open before him and its leaf was being fluttered by the wind. Dead belief in God is not lost and obliterated in the rottenness of oblivion like the memory of a lost one. Dead belief in God is like the broken image of God in a stone. It cannot be effaced by breakage.

Till to-day he was worshipping under the force of long-formed habit but it was lifeless like the blue of the sky. Many know now-a-days that the azure colour of the sky is imaginary. Still the people will gaze at it and poets write on the cerulean heavenly vault.

Bulu died at 10 that night. It was his first affliction in life. He became almost mad. The shock turned the course of his life. He forsook politics, theatre and for sometime he took to research in after-life. At night he would pass his time in the cremation ground. He frequented Sannyasins. He would pass time night after night by sitting in the play-room of Bulu. When he opened his heart, in literary composition, life's main gate was opened up to him on the path of literature. That story came out under the title "The Cremation-Ghat" in the first issue of the Bangasri Magazine. Later on, he changed the title into "Evening Primrose." The hero was a theatre-mad vagabond. It contained his own accusation against himself, his craze for the theatre when Bulu was on the point of death. The name of the daughter of this hero was "Evening Primrose." The souls of the readers of that story was touched by the agony of his heart.

The story ended thus — "The hero returned home in the morning passing his night in the cremation ghat. The evening primrose was still in bloom in the house. He said to his wife — "Look! The evening primrose —. ".

His daughter planted that flower plant. With tearful eyes his wife smiled a smile of expectation — "She will come again."

Chandrasekhar Babu was then over thirty. Perhaps on that day he expected such a return. At least there is no scope for any doubt that he wanted to believe in transmigration of the soul.

It was the photograph of that Bulu. No picture was taken of her when she was alive. When her body was carried over to the cremation ground, it struck him. Perhaps in future her face might not be recalled. A village photographer was called in and he was told to go to the cremation ground to take a picture.

The photograph was taken by laying her dead body on a bed in front of a bush. He wanted to show her sleeping in a bower. But the cruel truth of a dead body could not be hid.

He brought it to Calcutta and had it enlarged. With the death of Bulu, Chandrasekhar Babu came over to Calcutta with his grief-stricken wife and children. He found it impossible to stay in his house without Bulu. He stayed in Calcutta for a month. There he gave the picture to a photographer. He was asked to make it a living picture. The photographer tried his best. This first impression of the altered photograph soon gave place to the shock of reality. The paleness could be removed by colour but where the eyes are closed, how much of the real man resides therein? Life is life so long as those two lamps are burning. Even the blind has that flame. It leaves the dead eyes.

He hugged the picture several times on the first day.

He hung it up on the wall in his village home. He would look straight to the picture arising in the morning. Her eyes were closed. Whenever he entered the room in day time, he stood once before it and adorned it with flowers. Occasionally he would weep.

Forgetfulness is the triumph of death over life. But Chandrasekhar Babu inwardly resolved not to lose Bulu in his life. She was kept alive by the nectar of memory. He would not accept defeat before Time, and would not lose Bulu.

* * * *

Change came over Chandrasekhar Babu's life. The dark, cloudy days of his life were gone. Clear autumn days dawned. They brought him fame and money. The great city as the centre of activity drew him out from the village. In the bed room of his hired house he hung up the picture of Bulu. Not a day passed without flower-offering to or a talk with the picture. She appeared again and again in his writings. He lived in this manner for 10 years and then shifted to a house of his own. Bulu's picture was also put up there.

Whether or not there was any nectar on earth, he was sure it could be found in life and he infused this belief in his writing. He became more famous. He became stricter with the avowed pursuit of his life. But suddenly, after 12 years, in 1962, he discovered that his Bulu was lost in obscurity. He could not guess when during this interval of 12 years, the thousand-petalled lotus of agony withered away and the precious gem dropped down to the bottom of the ocean of oblivion.

Somewhere in his house one afternoon the sound of an organtuned harmonium wafted up. He had freshly arisen from his siesta. That mechanical sound evoked the memory of a distant past in his blood stream and in every brain-cell. He became quite oblivious of time and place and felt that he was harked back to his childhood. In the quiet of such an afternoon of that day, a table harmonium was being played upon for the first time in his village. In his childhood, such a tune entwined all his nerves, pulses and brain-cells in a strange magical bound for which he had to purchase an organ in his early youth to learn singing, but his efforts proved unrewarding.

He followed the thread of the tune and came down to his sitting room. It was not an organ but an organ-tuned harmonium. It was being played upon by his youngest son, Sudhanya. This new harmonium was purchased for his daughter. It reminded him of the harmonium which he purchased in his early youth. It was brought into the house along with other articles. It was left in a corner. Its stands were broken, the polished coverings on the keys were worn-out and the bellows were punctured. But on that day it was found missing in its place. It was found out in an overturned condition in a corner of the stair-case leading to the terrace. When the lid was lifted it was found that all the reeds were gone. The little ones of the house had broken the organ, took out the reeds and made them playthings. They were now all lost only the shell remained. He lost the poise of mind, took the remains with his two hands and threw into the dustbin. Then in a strange way, but he was not aware how, it crept in, there was a flashing revival of the memory of Bulu's picture.

It struck him that day that for a long spell of time he had not seen the picture. It was long time, no doubt but he could not recall how long. His Bulu, his lost jewel, had been really lost. He ran upstairs and stood in his sleeping room and looked all around. Where was Bulu's picture? It was nowhere, nowhere, nowhere!

There was a sarcastic laughter of Time, silent and formless, in that vacant spot, so harshly real. He looked inwards. He tried to call up in his remembrance the face of his daughter Bulu. Again that void. He had forgotten her face. It was totally obliterated. Really there was the death of Bulu.

His inner soul cried out piteously. But it did not bring any release. The truth of reality smashed down to dust all his concepts. It seemed to say — "Just close your eyes and see. You are misled. You are a worshipper of untruth. Just see the empty and false fruits of your pursuit."

He visualised it in the case of Bulu's picture. At last that picture was found in the same condition in which the organ was found. It was a mere semblance of a picture that was pale and discoloured. The glass was broken, the chemical paint was worn-out. It was kept on a heap in the lumber room.

He wrote thus in the story in "Navajuga" — "Oh the world! Oh the cruel law of time! Oh, the selfishness of the present! Wipe out for good — wipe out the past. Inquilab, Zindabad!"

He wrote elsewhere — "His voice broke down under the weight of his crying! Oh! Oh! Is this the pursuit of life? He failed to keep alive in his memory his dear one snatched away by death. Bulu died through a cruel joke. Death took place while she was under his control, in his presence and in his hand. Could anything be more ridiculous ? What is a worse defeat? There is no nectar; nothing like it. It is all bosh. Man is a beast! He too a beast!" It did not end here.

Still he would not accept defeat. He roved through the circle of photographers in Calcutta to have the photo renovated. They relieved it.

Man is born to die. He devotes his span of life to waging a false fight with death like one mad. Thousands of years have gone by, uncounted men have crossed the bar. They searched for nectar and died for want of it. In spite of all these man cannot believe that there is no nectar.

Perhaps this time, under the present belief he put the photograph by the side of his deity in his place of worship.

The deity was not something more. The deities or gods were pictures, some stock and stone, some earthen or copper idols. The photograph was put by their side. After several months he noticed that it had become bloated. A spoonful of water was poured daily on it. This was the reason why it looked bloated.

He raised it through restless anxiety. The frame too was bloated. It gave in. The glass fell down and was broken. The picture too came down. A splinter glass pierced into his chest. He was stunned. He realised and visualised the hard truth that the nectar he sprinkled had made the picture rot instead of brightening it.

Splinter glass pierced into his chest. He was stunned.

When he became conscious of his wound it was found to bleed.

He had to stop his worship and asked for tincture iodine.

* * * *

He wrote about it in the "Navajuga". It was a frank composition. He scourged himself more. The entire world was reduced to untruth. As if the facial grace of everyone including himself had been effaced out and the ugly expression of the beast had come out. What was called humanism in the present age in place of manliness was dissected by him and he exposed its interior, — a frame of straw and rope shaped by the falsity of man.

None wanted to know the real state of the mind of Chandrasekhar Babu. The horizon he discovered in life suddenly burst a covering and it became more distinct. Standing on the desert he discovered or saw with his piercing eyes that around the horizon an inexhaustible current of water was murmuring down. He espied the semblance of a green belt on the banks. He imagined that the travellers of the ages who trod on it, of at least those who proceeded onwards without halting fixing their gaze on the horizon must have reached that destination. By the side of the river, a habitation of matchless beauty must have sprung up. Those who failed to see this horizon or disbelieved it though looking at it and took to other routes by turning their backs thereon or by bypassing them were the people whose skeletons filled up the desert. But today he was awakened to the belief that the horizon, the river, the lush greenery —everything was mere illusion and myth. The non-believers alone had known the truth. They did not take to the desert path but danced on the sand as long as they could and enjoyed life by eating, drinking and being merry and smilingly sighed their last breath. They did not become mortified and sad. They did not heave deep sighs.

The telephone rang. He held the receiver — "Hallo "!

—'Hallo'! who are you ? Whom do you want ?

—I am Romen, Romen Bose. Is Chandrasekhar in ?

—Chandrasekhar speaking.

—How are you ? Why this voice ?

—"My voice" Chandrasekhar laughed. He heaved a deep sigh and said — 'What shall I say ? It will be a lie if I say nothing has happened. Brother, I am very much broken-hearted. I feel I have been worshipping the untruth all these days. I spun falsehood and told lies to the people.

—I understood it when I read "Heart's blood." It appealed to me. But why have you written in that vein ?

— At least, I learnt a truth in my life and told it to the people. A partial penance."

—No ! no ! no ! It does not behove you to say so or to write so. Do you know? Whatever you might accept as reality, in truth man is quite naked but you do not call nakedness truth.

Chandrasekhar laughed and said — Certainly you have not included in it the nakedness of saints like Tailanga Swami ?

—No. Certainly not.

—Then? But when it is falsified and is on a par with the nakedness of a lunatic and it exhibits its teeth in cruel laughter, is there any other way than to cry hiding the face with two hands?

Romen Basu kept quiet for some time and said "—Well! yes! How is your son-in-law?"

—I am afraid today to tell you the serious truth.

A deep sigh floated over through the receiver and then came the word — "Well".

"Well". Chandrasekhar Babu put down the receiver.

Romen Basu was an intelligent man — learned too. At the same time he was good-hearted — a rare thing in these days.

Chandrasekhar Babu's wife re-entered the room. "Won't you take your food ? Or will you give it up ?"

Chandrasekhar smiled — At least I am not going to give it up. on the contrary, the reverse is the truth. I am to eat in a goodly manner. But my stomach revolts. What am I to do ?

Sometimes in a heated brain he thought of putting up in a hotel.

The wife went out to bring his food. Chandrasekhar came outside. — "No, he will give up writing. He ought not to write".

Suddenly he re-entered the room. He dialed the phone.

"Hallo ! Sahitya Bitan ? Is that Bidhubhusan ? I am Chandrasekhar. Hear me. I won't be able to write any more. No. No. Forgive me brother. I am defeated. Release me. I entreat you".

After a few days, Chandrasekhar rang up Bidhubhusan.

—Bidhubhusan ! I am your brother.

—Please tell me, brother.

—Listen. Do you require any writing ?

—Are you writing it ?

—"Yes. I have got a plot ? But what I have written in the "Navajuga" — —"Heart's blood"?

—Yes, the first part of the story will contain the summary of "Heart's blood". There will be something more thereafter — but it will be a mere story.

—Certainly I will publish it. Have you finished it ?

—No. I will begin it.

He put down the receiver and drew out some paper and took up the pen.

Strange is the world ! Strange is man ! The event of the last night struck him as uncommon. Day by day, he was being shattered down and his son-in-law meanwhile expired. The son-in-law could not be saved on any account. Utmost attempt was made but everything ended in failure. While he was in such a state of mind, suddenly the telephone rang up last night.

—"Hallo !" It was the voice of a shy maid.

Chandrasekhar Babu had the receiver in his hand—"Hallo" ! Whom do you want, please ?

—Is this the house of Chandrasekhar Babu, writer ?

—Yes, whom do you want?

—I want him.

—Yes, speaking.

—I am a young girl, I like you very much. I love to read your writings. How can I talk to you if you begin with 'please' ?

—Well. I drop it.

—Do you know how near and dear you appear to me ?

—It is my fortune.

—I avow the truth. It seems to me that in my past life perhaps you were my father.

—I bless you, mother.

—I am reading in the B.A. class. We are to read your writings. Besides, I have gone through all your books. I forgot — all about my meal and bath, these two months.

Her voice was tremulous with emotion. It did not please Chandrasekhar Babu. Still he could not stop it. Her emotion was mounting high. Chandrasekhar Babu had to find out an answer. It was found out. He replied — "You are a rare reader of mine. Did every piece please you ?"

—Everyone of your writings. Again, your story "Heart's blood" published in the Puja number of "Navajuga" pleased me exceedingly. I wept as I finished reading it.

—"You wept ? Chandrasekhar Babu became a bit alert. She was an extraordinary girl. People became emotionally agitated when they read "Heart's blood". The whole world evaporated into the big void of nothingness in it. One might weep after reading it but how could it please one ?

—Yes. I wept. I felt like running to you at that time.

Chandrasekhar Babu kept quiet. He could not tumble upon any answer.

The girl from the other end proceeded — I am quite eager to go to you. I read in the Bethune College. While I was passing over the Tala Bridge today, I thought of getting down. But it struck me —if you think otherwise.

—I won't think, otherwise.

—Then I go to you ?

—Yes, come.

—Tomorrow ?

—Come ! Then I put down the receiver.

—Please, you have not asked my name ?

Chandrasekhar Babu laughed and said—I have just forgotten it ? What is your name ?

—I am called Bulu.

Chandrasekhar was startled — "Bulu"!

—Yes, my real name is Sandhya Bandopadhyay.

—What ! wonderful !

"I am called Bulu! My real name is Sandhya Bandopadhyay ?"

The sound of sob wafted down from the other side. Simultaneously, the sound of putting down the receiver was also heard. The girl could no longer control herself.

This was his Bulu — Sandhya Bandopadhyay. There was no agreement but still he fancied that it must be so — it must be so.

Her lost child Bulu — Sandhya — had come back to him, restored to a new life by the nectarine agony of his heart. He was seeing her and he was weeping and was thinking how unique was the human heart with its nectar. A girl had hurried forward on hearing the story of the agony of a father's heart which was being consumed by the inextinguishable fire of mortal affliction. He fancied she was no other than his daughter, she came to pour out—

No, why should it be thus? Today he would accept the doctrine of transmigration of souls.

This one was his daughter whom he called Bulu whose real name was Sandhya — Sandhya Bandopadhyay. It was a greater truth than the truth of reality itself.

This was the story which Chandrasekhar had begun to write out. It was not a story, yet a story. Really it was not a story at all but at the same time, it was a story too.

On that day, his grandson was performing the monthly ritual of his deceased father in another room. The priest was reciting the mantras :—

"All the winds blow in happiness.
All the streams exude nectar".

But no one in his house would admit her to be Bulu, their Sandhya.

Let them rest with their negative attitude.

A good number of families had come to the health resort that year. Not all of them were Bengalees; some well-to-do Bihari families had also come and occupied houses on high rent here and there. It was a small town in Bihar and enjoyed reputation as a health resort. Firstly, here the water from the wells was rich in mineral content, particularly lime and iron to tone up the poor digestive system of Bengalees. Secondly, the houses stood wide apart with smooth open space in between them through which zig-zag paths led to a distant sylvan valley. The air was light, healthy and appetising. The climate did not allow acidity or indigestion to develop. Naturally the place was much liked by the Bengalees. The leisure that one enjoyed here in quiet surroundings was another of its attractions.

The river Sone was not far from this place. From cities and towns like Patna, Bhagalpur and Kiul, big boats came sailing here frequently. Also pilgrims passed through the place on a visit to the shrine of Mahadeoguni or the Sone Fair and en-route they had opportunity to visit Hanumangunj, Dariagunj and a few other places.

Throug the waterway, a few days ago, came on a big boat, Mr. Chowdhury and his wife who occupied a rented house. Mrs. Chowdhury's health, except for periodical attacks of a kind of headache, was otherwise good. In the opinion of her medical attendant, the river breeze incidental to a journey by boat should do her a lot of good. Abhavati or Mrs. Chowdhury, however, did not agree with her medical attendant.

"The headache will leave me as soon as I am out of Calcutta. I see no point in spending a lot of money on a journey by boat," she had told her husband.

"Why do you say so. How can that be," her husband had opposed her rather impatiently. The "head has to do with the entire body. Head can't be ignored. Money is small consideration before your health, Abha."

"The climate of the place should be enough to effect a cure. We don't have to spend much if we go by train," she suggested.

No doubt journey by train was less expensive but Chowdhury did not pay heed to it. He seemed to know more than his wife about her health. He also knew some wives preferred to endure discomfort to save their husband's money.

"All my pleasure from this journey depends on keeping you cheerful. I can't quite explain my feelings to you, Abha. In fact I get inspiration for all my work finding you hale and hearty," he had added.

Although their house was situated in the centre of an open space, it was surrounded by gardens of the neighbours. With the break of dawn, the crimson glow of the rising sun invaded their bedroom. It was the beginning of the month of October and at this time, dew drops glistened on the meadows. The glare of the morning sun on the sandy river beech could also be seen. By the time the husband and wife returned from their morning walk they would find their neighbours out of bed.

The Sen family from Calcutta had also come. But here too, they could not discard the kind of living to which they were accustomed in Calcutta. They held their morning and evening sessions of gossip and indoor games regularly in the Verandah of their house. They didn't care to go out for morning and evening walks. The women kept themselves busy with household work, running errands for their males and catering to their various needs all through the day without giving a single thought on their health for which they were supposed to have come. They continued to be pre-occupied with, as slaves of their old habit, cooking, and cleaning the utensils. They had no time to enjoy a care-free leisure.

"But how do you expect them to live differently? Household work and especially cooking cannot be dispensed with for the family wherever one may be," observed Abha.

"I know that too. But why this elaborate programme of cooking when you come out for a change of climate to improve your health? The food should be just simple and wholesome on an occasion like this. If you have to keep yourself busy over it throughout the day, what chance is there for rest and relaxation? How would your health improve? Isn't it a shame the way their males oppress them? While they themselves have a good time, their womenfolk work like maidservants. This change of place for them is no better than coming out of one house to enter another. Don't you think this is sheer injustice. Abha?" commented Chowdhury.

The fact is, Chowdhury was somewhat finicky by nature. For his wife's comfort he had sent the cook earlier by train and brought two servants with him. Arriving here he had engaged a gardener to look after the flower trees and plants in the garden. He didn't allow his wife to have anything to do with cooking or other household chores.

From dawn to dusk, Abha had all her needs attended to by others. The experienced cook and the two trained servants did their jobs faultlessly. Except rambling about and enjoying uninterrupted leisure in the house, she had nothing else to do. This is just what a husband should provide for his wife at a health resort, thought Chowdhury. Bengalee wives generally lacked attention from their husbands in matters of health. That his wife did not have a grouse on this score, gave him much satisfaction.

"Have you ever noticed," confided Chowdhury one day to his wife "how Mrs. Chatterjee moves about shabbily dressed? If she were my wife, I should have committed suicide. But then Chatterjee lacks good taste, has little education — altogether an outlandish sort of a person."

"I wonder that it didn't escape your notice. But may be they are not financially well off," remarked Abha with a smile.

"Far from it, my dear," said Chowdhury. "They have come here by train travelling second class to show off they are monied people. I see Chatterjee smoking tins of cigarettes. Can't he purchase a good sari for his wife? Why, it is not only Chatterjee. Look at that well-known Bose family of Calcutta. Their eldest daughter limps in a pair of undersized high-heeled shoes. Can't they purchase a pair of slippers for her worth two rupees? Their two little boys don't have good shirts to put on. The family may have a big name but no decent living to its credit."

Abha was fairly used to hearing such caustic comments about others from her husband. It was however not untrue that theirs was a peaceful orderly life with little want. They had brought over a costly gramophone which under Chowdhury's instructions was played on by a servant every morning. As a matter of fact, Abha's mornings broke to the music of Bhajan and Kirtan songs from gramophone records. The chirping of the birds on the meadows could be heard through the open windows. The gardener regularly placed sun flowers on a vase in the room. Some rose buds were about to appear to make the garden look gay.

Although some families were rather their close neighbours, Chowdhury did not feel inclined to be familiar with them. He was averse to hob-nobbing with all sorts of people. His mental make-up did not allow easy adjustment with people outside his class. Aristocracy is almost always confined to its own class and its ways are different.

On that day the husband and wife were discussing the subject of sticking to their class when absent-mindedly they had walked up a fairly long distance. It was nearing evening. The water of the Sone looked red from the rays of the setting sun. Small kerosene lamps had already been lit in some of the boats on the river carrying merchandise.

Chowdhury liked this part of the countryside. Married four years and not having a child, he felt better to pass time with his wife in lone surroundings. They halted under a shady peepul tree and sat under it on the soft grass. To-day they had actually walked a good distance from their house. Instruction, however, had been given to the servant to bring a tonga to this side if their return was delayed.

From the other side of the river touching the horizon, the bright moon had moved up in the sky. A light cool breeze blew against their faces and eyes to produce the effect of a kind of mild intoxication. To-day Abha looked splendid. Even though she was a wife, her walk through the moonlit night to a lonely river bank made her look like an enchantress. She was so close to him, yet as if the shadow of a remote mystery hung upon her filling Chowdhury's mind with emotion.

Abha was not much educated but that didn't matter. Chowdhury did not marry her for education. The spell of a visit to Europe in youth was on him for some time, for he had seen how beautiful young girls of the west enjoying full freedom moved about, but it wore off after he came in contact with Abha who did not let him feel he missed anything for having her as his mate. Free from sophistication she retained much of the generous wealth of beauty of her youthful days.

Like a river in monsoon Abha's figure looked full to the brim but with no strong current in it to incite one to plunge headlong into it. A quiet charm radiated from her entire being in which Chowdhury bathed sometimes with deep delight.

"Hello Abha", asked Chowdhury.

"Yes, my dear", replied Abha.

Placing one arm round his wife's neck Chowdhury enquired, "Do you want to go anywhere from here".

"Wherever you would like to take me to", replied Abha. "I have still one and a half month's leave to spend. We can go round in Rajasthan via Delhi and Agra. Would it be all right?" proposed Chowdhury.

"It's no doubt a good idea", remarked Abha. "Do you remember Abha, you had said before we started you would purchase a sari from each of the places we shall be visiting?" continued Chowdhury.

"Aren't you just mad! Casually I might have said such a thing, but do you think I actually meant it.? No, there is no need to waste money in this way", remarked Abha.

"That won't do", said Chowdhury rather complainingly. "You always have expenses on your mind and nothing else." If you had known what pleasure it gives me seeing you always dressed up elegantly, you would never have said so".

Abha passed the fingers of one of her shapely hands through the hair on her husband's head in silent appreciation of his remarks. Then in a soft undertone she said, "If I didn't have good saries, I should have asked from you but I have quite a number of them already".

They were quiet for some time.

"What are you thinking about, my dear", asked Chowdhury. "Well", said Abha. "When we were leaving for this place your younger sister asked for two balls of wool but I forgot to get them for her. Isn't it a great shame?"

"Why do you feel like this?" Why should you have to give whatever is asked from you?" Why this reckless charity, Abha", said Chowdhury almost excitedly.

"It's just a trifling gift", replied Abha.

Abha smiled beautifully "Is it a question to be asked after such a long time?"

"I don't take it the way you do", rejoined Chowdhury. "If ever you are in want, will anybody come forward to help? Everyone, I find, tries to exploit you for your good nature. No, you have done nothing wrong. If you want to retain your control on anybody don't give away things quickly. It is good to make a show of charity but never a wise policy to give the thing actually away."

Abha had known her husband intimately for four years. This queer argument of her husband did not surprise her. She said nothing.

Both of them were again quiet for sometime. The moon shone brighter now. Chowdhury drew away his wife's head on his lap. Resting one hand on her he said, "How happy I feel, Abha. You are lying on my lap like this and it is heavenly bliss for me. The light of the moon on your body makes you look like a fairy. Oh, when I think of my good fortune, I feel pity for the husbands of Bengal".

"By the way, Abha" asked Chowdhury, "have I made you happy?"

Abha smiled beautifully. "Is it a question to be asked after such a long time?" she said.

"Have you really loved me" enquired Chowdhary.

Clasping her husband's waist with her arms Abha said, "How could I speak it out?"

Chowdhury bent down and kissed his wife on the cheek. Abha's eyes closed.

In the bright light of the moon, a tonga was seen coming towards them. No doubt their servant had brought it. Abha hurriedly sat up and said with some concern, "Oh, we are rather late today for your evening tea."

"What a glorious night. But the fool of a servant has spoiled everything for us" remarked Chowdhury sullenly.

The night had well advanced when they returned to the house. There was light in their bedroom and the perfume of the burnt out incense sticks placed in the room early evening lingered still. Seeing them return, the other servant started playing on the gramophone from another room a record in Ashavari tune. The cook had left for preparing tea.

Chowdhury walked up to a table in the room to find if any letter had come by the afternoon mail. No, there was none. But suddenly his eyes fell on a letter on the table and at once his face went pale. This is the letter he had written today to his office which was to be posted before the mail left. His boss was to go on tour within two or three days. Now there was no chance of his getting the letter before he left. Chowdhury felt he had been let down badly.

"Rambirij" he shouted.

"Huzoor", answered the servant as he appeared before the master.

"Why haven't you posted this letter by today's mail"?

"Memsahib didn't tell me to post it, Huzoor" replied the servant.

"Send your Memsahib here, you rascal", shouted Chowdhury.

The servant gave the message to Abha and took cover elsewhere.

Abha hurriedly entered the room and asked her husband, "what has happened?"

Chowdhury was trembling in rage. Pointing his finger at the unposted letter on the table he asked sternly, "Why hasn't this letter been posted, Abha?"

"Oh my God", exclaimed Abha. "I forgot all about having it posted".

"Do you realise what this forgetting means," pointed out Chowdhury, "I had come here on a false pretext. In that letter I wanted to inform my boss I was seriously ill. A medical report in proof of my illness is also enclosed."

Abha stood abashed for a time. "It surely is a big mistake of mine. I am sorry for it", she said.

"As a consequence of your mistake," continued Chowdhury, "We will now have to return to Calcutta in a day or two, Oh, with what hopes I came!"

"Don't feel upset so much. I am quite well now. Let's go back to Calcutta", she said trying to console her husband.

"This is not your first mistake, Abha", went on Chowdhury. "Don't you remember that other mistake of yours, what loss I had to sufler for it!"

Abha now looked up to her husband full in the face and replied calmly, "It was not much of a loss. Only you were put to some inconvenience for a while."

"But why should I be put to inconvenience through your mistake", demanded Chowdhury.

My charge against you is you have failed to do your duty.

"Listen", answered Abha, "House-keeping involves such little mistakes. Why didn't you tell me in the morning it was that urgent to post the letter by today's mail ?"

"Well, it's my business if I did or didn't I am not bound to explain everything. It is enough I asked you to get the letter posted today. My charge against you is you have failed to do your duty", said Chowdhury in a manner so as to hurt her.

"Don't try to snub me unnecessarily. It is just by chance that the letter hasn't been posted. Why didn't you have it posted yourself ?" remonstrated Abha.

"Why should I have to? Why you are here then"? said Chowdhury raising the pitch of his voice.

"You know that too well. Don't please keep saying it", returned Abha.

"That I should be put to difficulty is what you want, remarked Chowdhury.

Abha grew excited. She blurted out "what I want or don't want, you needn't bother".

"What's the big idea?" asked Chowdhury. "Why shouldn't I bother to know ? What haven't I done for you ?"

"Whatever you have done is for your own sake, to please yourself, to satisfy your personal interest. No more of this talk, please", replied Abha in a decisive voice.

Chowdhury thumped the table with the palm of his right hand and screamed out, "What a shameless woman I am married to. What meanness....."

"You are meaner", replied Abha. "For you don't even know what gentlemanliness is. No husband ever quarrels with his wife over such a trifle".

"It may be a trifle with you, but certainly not so far as I am concerned. You are utterly indifferent to me, your disrespect for me is deep-rooted," returned Chowdhury.

"Well. I have no better respect for you than what you think I have. You may do whatever pleases you," said Abha in exasperation.

Pacing to and fro in the room, Chowdhury flared out saying, "I know how to curb this impudence of yours."

"Not that you never tried before, but I also know your little tricks. That's why I could see through you cajolery and make out what it was meant for", retailed Abha.

"Be careful," warned Chowdhury, "be careful, I say".

"I am quite careful about myself. Don't you try to scare me like this. If you have to show your red eyes, do better show them to your servants," returned Abha.

"Do you think I give you any higher place," howled Chowdhury. "The shoe, you know, is for the foot and not for the head. Too proud of your beauty, aren't you ? Well such beauty as yours can be purchased in Calcutta for a few chips. You mean woman, do you think I can't ? Yes, I can—definitely. It isn't any hard job for me to keep you where you belong to. Why it's a great folly to have even pity for a person like you. One should never believe a serpent :"

Some neighbours had in the meantime collected in front of the garden gate of their house. Seeing them, Chowdhury came out of the room. He was panting.

"What brings you all here ?"

He walked up to the gate and asked in a high-pitched voice "What brings you all here?"

A gentleman from the crowd answered with a soft smile, "We are all your neighbours, Sir. We heard shouts and thought something might have gone wrong. So we called".

"It's a lie", said, Chowdhury excitedly. "Do I not know it's one of your funny ways? You have collected here only to see the tamasha when a husband is having a heated discussion with his wife. Don't you feel ashamed? Aren't you gentlemen".

The gentleman was stupefied for a while. Then he said apologetically, "We are going away, Sir, kindly excuse us".

"Do please go away and attend to your personal matters", replied Chowdhury.

Re-entering the room he found Abha lying on the bed in an exhausted condition. "Look", he said, "I have given those fellows a bit of my mind. If I shouldn't quarrel with my own wife, should I quarrel with theirs?"

But what's the matter with you, Abha?" enquired Chowdhury with anxious concern as he leaned over her.

Abha lay still with her eyes closed. Chowdhury rushed out of the room to get a little cold water with which he gently massaged his wife's forehead.

"Isn't it that damn headache again Abha", enquired Chowdhury softly.

"Yes", muttered Abha.

"Now you can see for yourself. I know you are not quite well. That's why I wanted so keenly to avail of a long leave to come over here", deplored Chowdhury. Then with one hand he began massaging his wife's forehead and with the other kept a punkhha blowing to let her have a soothing breeze.

MISTER BHATIA

By MOHAN RAKESH

BHATIA insisted that he should be addressed with a mister in front or esquire at the end of his name. Nothing short of this would satisfy him. Whenever he had money, he went to a matinee film show. He went alone but always purchased three tickets. As soon as the booking closed, he would start looking for prospective buyers for the extra tickets. He did not part with them for just anyone. He would wait for two unattached girls and sell them the tickets, keeping the middle one for himself. This was his way of ensuring pleasant company.

Instead of taking eggs for breakfast and tomatoes, he preferred to have a sky blue letter pad on his desk, with his name embossed in deep blue. The pad bore the words 'K. C. Bhatia (B.Sc., LL.B.)'. The degrees were shown in brackets because he had not acquired them. He however felt that he had spent enough time in their pursuit and had therefore attained the requisite standard to entitle him their use.

Three years ago Bhatia weighed a hundred pounds. Last year he weighed only ninty five. This year he is only about eighty. For the last two years he has been without a job. For a whole year he tried to get one. Then he gave up.

When I met Bhatia, he had only two possessions; his body and a rented one room flat. Even though it was a single room, Bhatia will not hear of anything less than a flat for it. Bombay is terribly short of accommodation. He therefore managed always to get a paying guest. I also met him when I moved into his flat as his paying guest.

I had been in Bhatia's flat barely a week. One morning when I got up, I found him sitting at his desk surrounded by papers allround, deep in thought, as if he was trying to solve a mystery. I stared at him trying to fathom his predicament. He was oblivious of my presence. I did not therefore consider it proper to disturb him and started browsing through the morning paper. Hardly had I picked it up when Bhatia threw away the pen he was holding and shouted, "Here it is, at last." And he thumped the table loudly. "What have you found, Bhatia?" I asked putting down the paper. "The horse," smiled Bhatia, pressing his upper lip between his teeth, "the horse." "The horse?" I asked puzzled. Bhatia did not reply but pointed to a paper in front of him. I looked at it over his shoulder and found 'GIZALA' written in bold type. I looked again at him unable to understand it all. "Gizala will win the second race today," explained Bhatia laboriously, "and what a win it will be. It will upset all calculations, all hopes, all guesses. It will be the greatest upset of the season. It will give hundred and thirty rupees for every ten. Do you want to come?" Without waiting for an answer, he started sauntering up and down the room. Then he stopped in front of the mirror, looked at himself and ran the comb through his unruly hair. Putting it down, he felt his over-night beard. Then he put some cream on the brush and went out to fetch water.

I went through the newspaper. On the eighth page was a write-up about the races and photographs of horses. There was a longish account of 'Lady Cleopatra' and forecasts about 'Meghpuspa,' 'Nasarullah' and 'Rangarao.'

Bhatia brought the water. "Do you go to the races every week?" I enquired. "I go whenever I have the money", he replied without looking towards me. "Have you ever won?" I asked. Bhatia opened the drawer and took out a towel. Wrapping it round his neck, he said, "There is a win for me today." Just then there was a knock at the door. Bhatia opened it. In came a darkish looking man — short and thin — with a small moustache. He smiled displaying his dirty teeth, nodded half-heartedly towards Bhatia and took out the book he was carrying under his arm. "Next month," said Bhatia, without giving the visitor a chance to speak. The visitor broadened his smile, wiped the chair and sat on it without taking notice of what had been told him. Running through the pages of the book, he said, "This is the fifth month running." "I know" replied Bhatia impatiently, "I must have the rent this time," said the visitor again. Bhatia put his hand in his hip pocket, took out a five rupee note and flung it towards the visitor. He got up yawning and said, "Shall I come next week?" "No," said Bhatia, sharply, "on the first," and started moving the razor quickly on the lower part of his chin. A thin scratch appeared on it. As the visitor's steps faded in the distance, Bhatia grumbled, "The rascal, the unmitigated swine, ..." and came and sat near me. Taking out a wad of five-rupee notes from his pocket, he spread them on the bed like a pack of cards.

"What are you going to do with this money?" I asked.

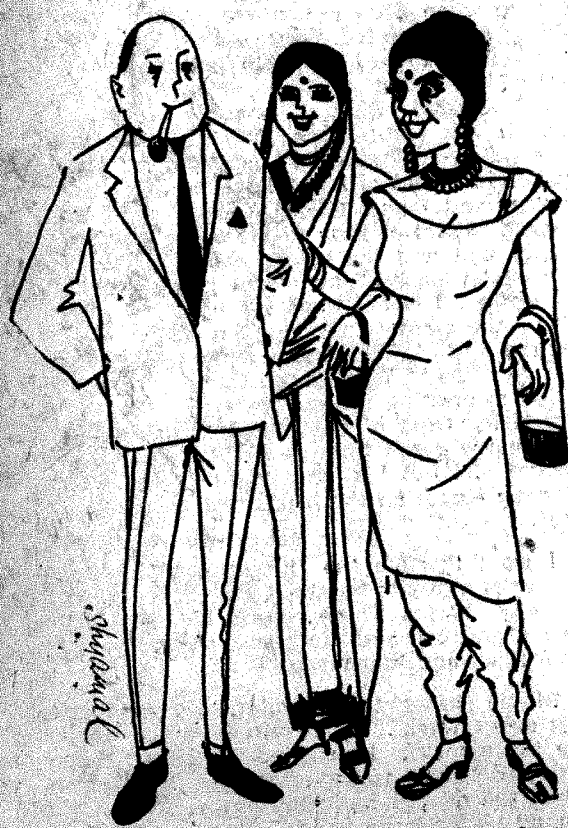
"Within six hours," he replied, "they are going to multiply. They will be two thousand." And he slipped them back into his pocket. "Where did you get all this money?" I enquired knowing that yesterday he had a bare rupee and some annas. Bhatia gave a self-satisfied smile and said, "Got them from Gopu Mal."

I had met Gopu Mal once or twice. He was a very short, fat man with a hoarse voice. Had he been an inch or two shorter he could have easily been mistaken for a dwarf.

"Are you going to put all this money on Gizala?" I enquired. "Yes," he replied with a very American accent, and started polishing his shoes.

* * * *

Bhatia turned out to be right. Gizala came first in the second race. Those who put their money on it got a hundred and thirty five rupees for every ten. But Bhatia had a tragedy. During the first race he met, accidentally, one Captain Kashev. In the stampede for tickets, the Captain stepped on Bhatia's toes. Besides a profuse apology, he offered him a cup of tea. There Bhatia met the Captain's wife Sharda and his sister Leena. Leena was a vivacious young lady. Poor Bhatia became an instant victim to her charms. Passing him the cup of tea, she said, "Gizala cannot win the second race". Those seductive lips of hers could have made anyone believe anything. Bhatia did not even express an opinion about Gizala's chances and readily agreed that it had none. Leena confided that Nasarullah will be made to win. Captain Kashev said that he was going to put five hundred rupees on it. Nasarullah did not get even the second, third or fourth place. Captain Kashev lit a cigarette and sighed. For Bhatia the only consolation was that he had lost on Leena's advice. He was prepared to lose his whole world at her bidding. Leena was very sympathetic: she even admired his knowledge about horses and their chances. Bhatia's heart was sinking at his loss but he kept smiling. When he reached home he abused them all — Leena, Captain Kashev and Nasarullah — as much as he could, to get even with them. The night he spent restlessly turning sides. Even in the next morning he lay in bed till late, without bothering how he was going to spend the day. I left him to his thoughts and went out. In the evening when I returned he was all decked up to go somewhere and was signing cheques for large amounts in a fat cheque book. As he saw me come, he motioned me to sit down and handed me a cheque for ten thousand rupees. "What madness is this," I asked. Bhatia replied in a very serious tone. "Don't think I am drunk." "Then it is even worse," I retorted, as I sat down. Bhatia gave a loud laugh. Have you seen the date on the cheque?" I looked at the cheque again. It was dated fifty years hence. "How did you manage to get this cheque book?" I enquired. "Found it in the flat, replied Bhatia. "Have you an account with this bank?" I asked. "No," replied Bhatia and disclosed that the cheque book belonged to Bhatnagar who stayed as his paying guest before me and who had to leave Bombay after a year of unsuccessful attempts at finding a job. As he told me this story, he wrote out another cheque for a lakh and twenty five thousand rupees in favour of Miss Leena Kapur. "What is this going on?" I enquired. Bhatia carefully folded the cheque, unfolded it, looked at it again and then folded it back. Then he took out a blue envelope from his pocket and removing a letter, put the cheque in it. The letter he handed over to me. It was from Captain Kashev asking him to come and discuss the next race and have dinner. "Are you going?" I asked. The question was superfluous. "Of course," replied Bhatia, "but the Dhobi has not brought my trousers. I shall have to iron this one and use it." And since the trousers were fairly dirty, Bhatia started a discourse on his philosophy on dressing. "If the shirt is nice and clean and well starched, one can do with dirty trousers. The eyes of the beholder notice first the shirt." I nodded and said, "That may be so but your shirt is also coming off at the shoulder seams." Bhatia gave a philosophical sigh and replied, "The jacket will cover it."



Leena was a vivacious young lady.

The dinner was at 7.30, but Bhatia had ironed his trousers, polished his shoes and had got ready at 6.30. To while away the time, he went down and brought the evening news. At 7.15 he had a last look at himself in the mirror and went to the party. He returned quite early. When I came back I found him cutting pictures from an illustrated magazine. "What is this latest craze?" I enquired. Bhatia replied, "I am trying to figure out what my life will be six months from now." "What, by cutting pictures from a magazine ?" I said. Bhatia replied, "Do you know my friend what my life will be six months hence ?" I looked at him seriously. "I shall have a drawing room like this," he continued, as he handed me the picture of a drawing room with the most ultra modern furnishings, "and a car like this". I had in my hand the picture of an American car which looked more like a luxury liner. "And a girl like this." He looked at the girl's picture fondly again for a while before handing it over to me. It was one of Rita Hayworth's film poses. "Where do you expect to find a girl like Rita Hayworth ?" I asked. "Right here in Bombay," he replied, "Not one but by dozens. All I need is money." "And where will the money come from ?" I enquired in a serious tone. Bhatia pointed a finger towards his head and said, "Out of the efforts of this fertile brain." "Then you are bound to get Rita Hayworth," I replied ironically and tried to get up. "Sit down," said Bhatia, "I'll tell you the whole thing. We are planning to issue a race card." "And who are we ?" I enquired. "Captain Kashev and I, of course," replied Bhatia with an expression as if he considered me unusually dim. "The Captain will finance the project and the brains will be mine. They are terribly impressed with my calculations. I am telling you. Within months things will be different. People will swear by Mr. Bhatia's tip."

"And a girl like this."

And he cut the picture of a radiogram from the magazine and put it by the side of the drawing room. "That girl Leena is a perfect disciple. I am wondering....." "They seem to be making quite an investment," I observed. Bhatia remained serious and said, "Cultured she is but not one of those ravishing beauties. She is all right from present standards but I wonder if she will fit into my life six months from now.....you know what I mean..... may be she will." "This new life of yours, when does it start ?" I asked. "Wait and see," replied Bhatia, leaning forward, "Give me a year and I shall have an office in fort area. There will be four messenger boys and half a dozen typists. Outside there will be a sign board 'K. C. Bhatia Esquire.' There will be dancing every night at the Taj and dinner at the C.C.I." "Where do you intend starting your office to begin with?" I enquired. "Right here," he replied and started looking around the room. "We shall put a partition in. On one side I shall sit. The other will be used by the typist. The corridor will be the waiting room. As for Captain Kashev....." and he looked towards the balcony. "When does this project starts ?" I asked. Bhatia looked at the ceiling as if the answer was to come from there. Then he said, "Very soon. Probably from the first."

Bhatia had tea with Captain Kashev the next day. They went to pictures after that. Since it got late Bhatia stayed the night at their house. Next morning he returned at seven and went straight into bed. Addressing me he said, "See if I am running temperature". And he raised his arm towards me. "Did you have something that upset you ?" I asked in jest. Bhatia remained serious. "No it was not the food," he replied, "The bed they gave me was far too warm, soft and comfortable. I could'nt sleep a wink all night and felt as if I was running temperature." "There is no fever," I replied. Bhatia heaved a sigh, and started humming a tune. I went on looking at him and enquired after a while, "Did she sing last night ?" "Sings well," he replied. "Then you are progressing," I said. He smiled condescendingly. His eyes had the gleam of a Romeo.

From next day Bhatia's desk started piling up with books on races, newspapers of all sorts and forecasts about horses. The whole day Bhatia used to spend chewing his pencil and studying history of past races at Bombay and Poona. The evenings he spent with Captain Kashev. When he returned he complained of the same fever.

On Sunday I left early as I had to lunch with a friend. Bhatia was busy with his work. When I returned in the evening, the whole room was full of smoke. Bhatia sat in the balcony putting light to heaps of paper and the wind scattered the burning bits all over the room. "Intend putting the house on fire", I enquired moving towards the balcony, "Why don't you put some kerosene and show it the light ? Will be a quicker and a cleaner job." "I am burning some useless papers," said Bhatia annoyed. "So I can see", I replied, "And the rest these burning papers will finish." Bhatia realised the danger for the first time. He closed the door of the balcony and started stamping on burning bits of paper. "Why this sudden impulse for destruction ?" I enquired. "I should have committed suicide today," replied Bhatia. "What happened ?" I asked. "What has not happened ?" sighed Bhatia," I am crushed, killed and buried." "But pray tell me how ?" I asked. "Captain Kashev has been transferred to Delhi," said Bhatia. I sat by his side on the floor for I felt that this was really an occasion for mourning.

"When is he leaving ?"

"This very week."

"What happens to the race card ?"

"They are all before you." And Bhatia pointed towards the burnt bits of paper in front of him.

Bhatia sighed again and said, "If she were also going, it would have been easier to commit suicide."

Just then the door opened and Gopu Mal entered. "Have you brought the money ?" he enquired and looked listlessly at the burnt bits of paper around. "Haven't been able to get it" replied Bhatia without looking at him.

"Not even today ?"

"No".

"When will it come"

"You will have it the day I get it."

"But when ?"

Bhatia kept quiet. Gopu Mal looked towards me and said, "This man is mad". "The fault is with my stars", said Bhatia. "Just the same." observed Gopu Mal and after a while added, "Why don't you listen to me and get married. There will be a girl and three thousand rupees in cash and clothes. Shall I arrange it?" "Get married? I?" Bhatia's eyes were red with rage. "I shall get married when I have an income of three thousand rupees a day. There will be a Gopu Mal in front of me and one behind me. You think two hundred rupees is a problem for me? I can throw these in your face any time I like." "Why don't you do it today?" asked Gopu Mal equally sternly.

"Today I haven't got them."

"When will you have them?

"Don't know."

And Bhatia went to the mirror and started running the comb through his hair. Gopu followed him.

"What do you want?" Bhatia asked annoyed.

"Want to look at your face."

"And what is unusual about my face?"

"That's what I want to find out too."

Then Gopu Mal walked away.

* * * *

I had to leave that flat soon after. Bhatia got an offer of five thousand rupees for vacant possession. I did not meet him for nearly six months after that. One day I came across him in a bookshop. He had brought three books to sell — one was on ball-room dancing, another on the art of publicity and the third an insurance guide. The shopkeeper offered him three rupees. "They are brand new," argued Bhatia. The shopkeeper left him to attend to another customer. "Will you pay four rupees?" asked Bhatia. The shopkeeper paid no attention to him. "Let'us settle it for rupees three and a half," said Bhatia, after waiting for a while. The shopkeeper still paid no attention. "O.K. pay three" said Bhatia ultimately and handed over the books. The shopkeeper gave him three rupees and kept the books aside. As Bhatia came out of the shop, I followed him. He was a picture of misery: There was no crease to his trousers, his cheeks were dry and sunken, the collar of his shirt was missing. I put my hand on his shoulder and asked, "How has life been treating you?"

"Fine", he replied, with a forced smile.

"Why were you selling the books?"

"Oh just like that. Needed some money."

"Have you been learning dancing?"

"No, only tried for a day or so."

The smile vanished from his face.

"And then?"

"Gave it up."

"I am crushed, killed and buried."

"What is this publicity stunt?"

"There was once the chance of a job in the publicity bureau."

"What came of it?"

"Didn't get it."

"What else?"

"Worked as an insurance agent."

"No success?"

"A friend decided to give a policy of five thousand rupees but....."

"But what?"

"His wife didn't agree."

"What are you doing these days?"

"These days? ..... These days I am resting."

We had reached the Flora Fountain Tram Stand.

"Are you taking a tram from here?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied, "I am going to the hotel."

"Which hotel?" I enquired.

"Imperial Guest House," he replied.

"Have you given up the flat?"

"Ages ago."

"What did you do with the money?"

"It was finished long ago."

"You finished five thousand rupees in six months?"

"I didn't spend : they got spent."

"By themselves?"

"Part went to the races, part to pay off debts and the rest in hotel bills. This month's bill is still to be paid."

"How do you propose paying it?"

"Intend liquidating the other assets — the watch and the ring."

I hadn't noticed the watch and the ring before. An 'L' stood prominently engraved on the ring.

"What does 'L' stand for?" I enquired, "for love?"

"I had got it made for Leena," disclosed Bhatia turning aside.

"You didn't give it to her?"

"No.....she....."Bhatia thurst his hands in his trouser pockets defiantly and moistened his lips with his tongue. I kept on looking at him.

"She used to say that she will wear only an engagement ring."

"You have got engaged, have you?"

Bhatia turned his side again and renewed moistening his lips. "I got engaged only this month ....she got engaged years ago".

"What?" I asked amazed.

"She got engaged to an Air Force Officer."

"But you said....."

Bhatia bit his lower lip. For a moment both of us were quiet. Someone shouted very near us "Kole Moti race card, Race card Kole Moti." Bhatia took the most worn out note of the lot, purchased the card and started looking at it. "Do you still go to the races?" I asked. Bhatia gave an assertive yes.

"I meant....." I said.

"How do you think I am going to get back, otherwise, the money I have lost?" replied Bhatia, his contours hardening.

"But where is the money to get it back?"

"That's all fixed. It will be here in fifteen days."

"Have you won a lottery?"

"No, I am getting married. It will bring three thousand rupees in cash."

I looked at the swelling nerves in Bhatia's forehead and asked, "Have you seen the girl?" Bhatia nodded. "What is she like," I asked again. "O.K." replied Bhatia and his face hardened more.

The Kolaba Tram had arrived. Bhatia put forward his hand. Shaking it I said, "When is the party?" The tram started moving. Bhatia ran to catch it. As he got in he shouted, "On the first." And his eyes got glued to the race card in his hand.

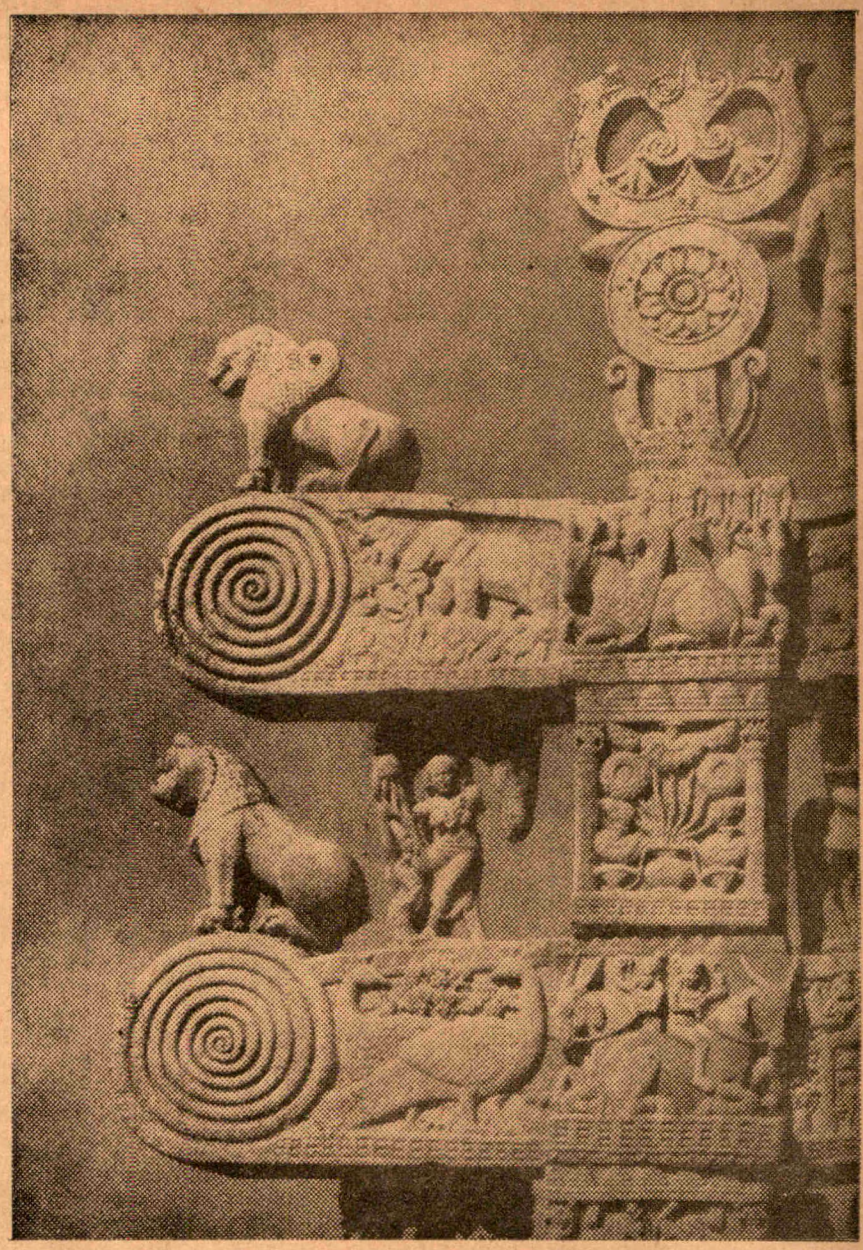
BUDDHA IN THE TRADITIONS OF EARLY BUDDHIST ART



By
KALYAN K. GANGULY

IN the expansive cultural horizon of India Lord Buddha is a luminary of the brightest magnitude. Missions carrying the message of Buddha's peace and compassion had for many centuries roamed the length and breadth of India and from here had gone to distant lands defying barriers of formidable mountains and tossing seas. The tremendous impact of Buddha, born a prince of a tiny Indian kingdom, on the masses, took the expanding west with surprise. While some admiring Europeans hailed Buddha as the light of Asia, to many others he became a veritable challenge in superiority. Intensive efforts have been made to show that Buddha was a protest against the traditional way of life held sacred in India. Whatever progressive move there was in the teachings of Buddha, and which held some influence in India for a time, was ultimately thrown over board. Buddha had failed in his efforts to reform India, and India gained little from him. Historically speaking Buddhism practically disappeared from India as a separate creed by the time the Muslims came.

But in the final analysis, Buddha and his preachings were not lost to India! Buddhism, at least in the early days, did not estrange itself from the older traditions. If there is literary evidence to prove this, early Buddhist art can probably bear this out with a much greater emphasis.

Buddhism was not merely a spiritual force, it had been an enthusiastic patron of art as well. Buddhist art was not only the vehicle of a sectarian thought, it grew to embody the spirit of a group of people deeply fed in a long standing tradition but at the same time profoundly influenced by the personality of an individual.

It is not definitely known how Buddhist art was born. There was certainly an artistic tradition in India, and there is now being known from archaeological remains dateable from pre-Buddhist times. But the surviving artistic remains from that age exist mostly in terracotta and are not monumental in scale. During the life time of Buddha nothing that can be called Buddhist art was probably brought into being. A few monasteries were certainly built and gifts were made of those to Buddha when he was alive. A part from the architectural features, nothing is known about any embellishments, if there were any, in those monasteries. If anything was strictly associated with Buddha, it was the stupa, a number of which had been erected after the Mahaparinirvana, that is the death of the master. Unfortunately, however, no trace of any stupa, built earlier than the second century B.C. has survived. The stupas at Sanchi, however, in their magnitude and embellishment stand out to amply compensate for the non-existence of any Buddhist art from the earlier age. The Sanchi stupas account for the true design of a Buddhist stupa and also reveal the shape and character of the balustrate walls and gateways which serve as the epitome of Buddhist art of the earlier phase.

The stupa on Tumuli was a burial mound and was probably in use in India from a fairly early age. The satapatha Brahmana has the description of the construction of a burial mound for a dead person in order to serve him as a house or a monument. After the mahaparinirvana, the sacred relics of the body of the master were collected from the funeral pyre and those were distributed among many claimants who enshrined the relics in newly erected stupas. Buddha is known to have stated that after the Mahaparinirvana he would be ever existent in the stupa. This very well-known deliverance of the master made the stupa the most sacred and the supremely respected symbol to the followers and admirers of Buddha and in erecting a monument to the great departed, as can be supported from the Satapatha Brahmana, the followers of Buddha did not deviate from an older tradition. Even Brahmins are known to have paid respect to funeral mounds by paying visits to such monuments and offering lamps at their base.

The stupa mound thus erected became a very sacred edifice for the followers of Buddha and the stupas containing relics of the Lord became great centres of pilgrimage. Originally the stupa was a mere earthen mound but by the second century B.C. the mounds were covered with stone casing in order to protect those against the ravages of time and nature. Circumambulation of any sacred spot is an ancient practice in India and the tradition of circumambulating the stupa had probably grown from the very establishment of the same. Consequently a circumambulatory path with a balustrade around and four gateways on four cardinal directions were also put up round the stupa from the very beginning. Such balustrades and gateways were probably built of wood at the outset, but at Bharhut, a stone balustrade made its appearance replacing the wooden prototype. At Sanchi apart from the stone fencing and elaborate gateways, the great stupa has a lion-surmounted pillar just in front.

The lion quadripartite at once recalls the famous capital of Asoka's lion pillar found at Sarnath, a monument surviving from the stupa complex set up by the emperor at that place. Such pillars invariably carried a spoked wheel on top, a symbol, as the stupa was conceived as the abode of Buddha, a chakravartin of his universality. According to the Brahmanical tradition, Mandhata was the first chakravarti ruler of the world and the symbol of his position was the majestic wheel presented to him by the universal ruler of the celestial world. Clearly the wheel was the symbol of the Sun, and it was a pre-Buddhistic heritage, traceable from the vedic traditions.

The conception that Buddha was a chakravartin is fairly old, and can be traced from earliest Buddhist literature. When a tribal hero or a religious leader is to be elevated to the position of supreme consideration. Indian mind has always tended to conceive him as an incarnation or God himself. Even if Buddha led the life of a monk never claiming devine powers or super-natural entity for himself he was soon elevated to the status of a divine entity or the manifestation of the supreme entity itself. Though early Buddhist literature shows strenuous eflorts on the part of the authors to retain the stature of Buddha as an ethical force and an organiser of an order, only incidentally yielding to the use of such highly symbolic words as Sakya-muni for the master, art, since it had a much wider appeal, clearly reveals the working of the mass mind and the real place of Buddha in the popular estimation. If the traditions as revealed in the artistic representation of these early monuments are to be taken into consideration, Buddha was already a manifestation of the supreme entity, truly a muni.

In one of the panels of Bharhut Buddha is found referred to as Saka-muni that is the muni of the Sakya clan and in another, with the representation of a wheel bedecked with jewelled garlands and placed on a throne, having two persons on two sides in the pose of supplication, as Bhagavato Dhammachakam. The use of the word Bhagavato clearly indicates that already people had elevated him to the status of an object of worship, some sort of a cult deity. About the same age, the followers of Vasudeva, an ancient hero of the Jadava clan were calling their object of worship as Bhagavan while such semi divine elements as Yaksha Manibhadra. Sculptured in human form was also worshipped as Bhagavato Manibhadra by his followers. Though the intellectuals responsible for the literary works of early Buddhism tried to remain earnestly true to the teachings of Buddha by carefully avoiding any proclivity towards the deification of the founder of the order, to the ordinary masses Buddha had already been invested with the lustrous mantle of divinity. He had already become a chakravartin, an incarnation, or himself the greatest of the great.

As such his palace, the stupa not only had the symbol of chakravartihood, the wheeled disc in front, but had its four gates guarded by the four lords of the four quarters, the Dikpatis of the Brahmanical tradition and the maharajas of the Buddhists.

These maharajas were Dhritarastra for the east, Virupaksha for the South, Virudhaka for the west and Kuvera for the north. In the Brahmanical tradition, the same Kuvera rules over the north, while Indra, Yama and Varuna are held as the rulers upon east, south and west respectively. The deviation here from the Brahmanical tradition, to which it is basically related, is negligible. The next most interesting thing to note is the illustration of various male and female figures upon the balustrade posts at Bharhut and Bodhgaya, enormous figures on cave walls at Bhaja, another Buddhist monument of about the same age in western India and the torana posts and lintels at Sanchi. The labels accompanying the figures at Bharhut considerably help in establishing the identity of most of these figures as Yakshas, Nagas and Devatas. Most of these figures, life size in stature, in perfect gait with turbans, ornaments, uttariya, tightly worn dhoti, represent the social beings of the contemporary age but some super human aspects find attached to those due to the extraordinary snake hood upon the head in case of the Nagas or the various types of mounts in case of almost all such figures. Some are without any labels and in such cases there are reasons to believe that those were to represent the vedic gods held in high esteem by the people belonging to the upper strata of the society. Such mounts as the elephant, characteristic of the vedic god Indra and the chariot symbolic of the god Surya (Mitra) can easily be identified among the figures represented in these monuments. Evidently the impulse on the part of the patrons and artists of these monuments was to represent semidivine and divine entities held in honour and worship by the masses of the contemporary age, as holding in their turn, the great redeemer Buddha, in supreme honour.

This effort on the part of the propounders and builders of these monuments has been taken by most scholars to be indicative of the fact that the Buddhists had broken away from the traditional fold and had made, much to the chagrin of the traditionalists, Buddha the supreme object of devotion. The traditions maintained in art as well as literature can prove that this contention was far from the truth. If the dharma chakra was symbolical of Buddha, an indication of his assumption or elevation to the supreme position of respect and devotion, then the Jains had also used the same in respect of their Tirthankaras and the Vasudevites in respect of their object of worship, the god Vasudeva-Vishnu. If the gods and demi-gods were made to bow before Vasudeva and still the followers of this hero god were not considered as breakaways from the traditional fold then why at this stage the followers of Gautama, the recluse of the Sakya clan, be deemed runaways and heretics to the orthodox? The age was the same when Buddhists were making the founder of their order the greatest among the great when the followers of the Vasudeva cult were proclaiming that their Vasudeva was the greatest among the great. This effort could be logically supported by the contents of the upanishads wherein the use of the word muni finds its proper explanation. In the Brihadaranyaka Upanishad in answer to Kahola Kaushitakeya's question "tell me the Brahman which is visible not invisible," Yagnavalkya says, "He who overcomes hunger and thirst, sorrow, passion, old age and death (is the Brahman which is visible!) When Brahmanas know that self and have risen above the desire for Sons Wealth, and new worlds they wander about as mendicants. (Viksha charyam charanti) . . . . . Therefore . . . . after he has done with learning, wish to stand by real strength; after he has done with that strength and learning he becomes a muni." Elsewhere in the same Upanishad it is said: "And He (Brahman) is that unborn self who consists of knowledge, is surrounded by Pranas, the ether within the heart. In it there reposes the ruler of all, the Lord of all, the King of all. He does not become greater by good works nor smaller by evil works. He is the lord of all, the King of all things, the protector of all things. . . . He who knows Him becomes a Muni. Wishing for that world only mendicants leave their home." "This great unborn self undecaying immortal, fearless, is indeed Brahman. Fearless is Brahman and he knows this becomes verily the fearless Brahman." Thus the upanishads propounded the theory of knowing as becoming. Why no image of him at this stage! Because the Svetasvatar Upanishad states that there is no image of him whose name is great glory. (Na tasya pratima asti yasya nama mahadyasah). The Taittiriya Upanishad states, "He who knows Brahman as non-existing becomes himself non-existing . . . . . From the terror of it (Brahman) the wind blows, from terror the Sun rises, from terror of it Agni and Indra." This upanishad further states, "He who knows these knows the Brahman. All devas bring offerings to him." (Sarvehsmaip deva valimavahanti).

All these are enough to ensure the background against which the great Sakya-muni Gautama was being viewed by the masses. As one who had renounced his home and had become a mendicant, had overcome hunger, thirst, sorrow, passion, old age and death, risen above desire and done with knowledge, he had become a muni and by becoming a muni he had become one with the unknowable and the unknown, who was not being nor unbeing. That is why in the galaxy of represented world of gods, semi gods, men and animals, Buddha remains unrepresented in the anthropomorphic form or pratima. Because no pratima can be made of one such, and it was no wonder that all the gods are shown as bringing homage to this greatest of the great, the highest among all. So if the traditional gods were shown as subordinate to the Muni of the Sakya clan, the donors and the artists of these monuments did nothing in contravention of the traditional belief nor was in the contemporary estimate the Sakya Muni and the followers of him can be considered to have broken away in revolt from the traditional fold.

The great master was still in the minds of his followers an entity which was fully in conformity with the age old traditions of the country. The truth about these traditions is nowhere held better than in the upanishads and the artistic tradition of early Buddhism prove beyond all doubts that this art had not in the least deviated from the norms set up by the upanishadic lore. Buddha was yet the well-known Sakya muni, a mendicant who had known and become one with the highest among the high to whom all gods demi gods, men and animals, brought their offerings and homage.

The ART of the CHANDELAS

By Prof. O. C. GANGOLY

THE Art of the Chandelas represented by the brilliant group of temples at KHAJURAHO, in the Chatrapatta State in Bundel-Khand in the Madhya Pradesa, were constructed by the Chandela Kings who reigned between the 7th Century and 13th Century.

These monuments form a compact group of twenty temples, clustered around an area of a few miles revealing a uniform style, illustrating the Northern Indian phase of Nagara Architecture, beautifully designed and richly sculptured with magnificent bands of carved friezes challenging comparison with the analogous group of temples at Bhubaneswara (Orissa).

The different stages of evolution are marked by three outstanding temples: (1) The Lakshana Shrine (953 A.D.), (2) the Kandariya temple (C. 1000 A.D.), and (3) the Chatturbhuja Mandir (1100 A.D.)

The characteristic Chandela style is illustrated by the brilliant bands of sculptured decorations which run round the facade in three parallel waves illustrating Saiva Images in high relief set off by a series of celestial damsels — Apasaras, Sura-Sundaries, and Nayikas, love-heroines in entrancing poses, some-times, of weird fantastic anatomical poses.

They differ substantially in their peculiar plastic idioms from the Kalinga School of sculpture illustrated on the monuments of Bhubaneswara, Puri, and Konarak. There is nothing at Khajuraho to compare with the famous colossal horse and elephant at Konarak.

Yet Chandela Sculpture has many original types and new standards of plastic beauty equal, in a different way, to the figurative decorations of the Kalinga Temples.

In common with the Kalinga sculptors the Chandela artists have also decorated their temples with a large series of "Mithuna" or "Reproductive Pairs" of profound and mysterious "Masonic" symbolism sometimes abused in exaggerated erotic obscenities of equally bad taste as that of the Orissan sculptors.

The aims and objects of these erotic sculptures have been the subject-matter of much discussion and controversies amongst scholars. It is not generally known that these Mithuna effigies occur not only in Hindu, but also in Jain and Buddhist Temples. The earliest Mithuna effigy occurs in a Buddhist cavet—the Temple at Bhaja, near Bombay.

As a rule, the representations of Mithunas on Buddhist monuments are absolutely free from any obscene suggestions. The series of Mithunas—in groups of loving couples—in domestic love gestures and homely anecdotes—are of exceptionally beautiful patterns glowing with artistic imagination, typically represented on the marble monuments at Nagarjuni—Konda (Guntur District).

But the Chandela Mithunas stand on their own grounds, and draw our praise and admiration by new types of faces, new types of gestures, and poses which surpass the beauty of Abhinaya gestures of dancers.

In some of the distorted and twisted poses of the Nayikas the artists display their mastery of human anatomy, in original and radiant poses which extract new beauties from female figures, while the types of faces, both Masculine and Feminine by their brilliant linear representation of the contours, coiffeurs, and beards, present new beauties of human figures as imagined through the vision of the Chandela sculptors who have indeed contributed a dazzling page to the History of Indian Art.

THE FORT TEMPLE AT AIHOLE

By S. R. BALASUBRAHMANYAM

IN the former Bombay State, and in the present Mysore State, lies the valley of the Malaprabha, a tributary of the Krishna. The monotony of the level country is here relieved by a chain of picturesque hills —offshoots of the Western Ghats. At the foot of these hills, there are four towns close to one another, which played a glorious part in the past as Capitals and cultural and artistic centres of the Western Deccan; these are Badami, Mahakuta, Pattadakkal and Aihole.

Badami was known in the past as Vatapi, after the legendary demon of that name, said to have been overthrown along with his brother Ilvala by the sage Agastya. It is said that Agastya himself resided in an asrama near a holy tank named Vishnu Pushkarani with a natural spring, located in the neighbouring town of Mahakuta, three miles east of Badami. The temple of Mahakutesvara on the northern bank of this tank was perhaps an original foundation of Agastya, later renovated in the first half of the 6th century A.D.—soon after the rise to power of Pulakesin I the founder of the line of the Early Western Chalukyas of Badami. Agastya was a worshipper of Ganapati and perhaps also the founder of the Ganapati cult in this area, so that, in later times, the expression "Vatapi Ganapati" became a household name in the Deccan and South India.

About A.D. 533, Pulakesin I conquered Vatapi, fortified the place and made it his Capital. An inscription on a boulder at Badami mentions that in A.D. 543 (Saka 465), the Chalukya King Pulakesin I, here called Vallabhesvara, performed the Asvamedha, Hiranyagarbha and other sacrifices, and made the best hill of Vatapi into an unconquerable fortress, for the prosperity of the world. The conquests that he had made justified his performing the Asvamedha sacrifice, a hall-mark of supreme power.

Some earlier historians and archaeologists have held that Aihole, 16 miles east of Badami, was the original capital of the grandfather as well as the father of Pulakesin I, and that during their time the early temples of Lad Khan, the Durga, and Kontgudi at Aihole, and that of Mahakutesvara at Mahakuta were built. This opinion is not supported by any evidence. Pulakesin I was the first ruler of the Early Western Chalukyas; he captured Vatapi and made it his Capital. None of the early authentic epigraphical records of this dynasty gives any credit for specific victories or other historical achievements to the ancestors of Pulakesin I. The later panegyrics found in the prasastis of the copper-plate grants of the Eastern Chalukyas of Vengi and the later Western Chalukyas of Kalyani are all a "mere farrago of vague legend and Puranic myth of no authority or authenticity". All the cultural and artistic renaissance in this area, after the age of Agastya, should be attributed to the founder of this dynasty, Pulakesin I and his successors. The three Hindu rock-cut cave-temples at Badami, which are among the earliest monuments of the Hindu revival after the decline of Buddhism in Western Deccan, belong to the middle of the 6th century. A.D. Cave III at Badami, called the "Mahavishnugriham", can be definitely dated, for it contains an inscription mentioning its foundation in A.D. 578 (Saka 500) by Mangalesa, the younger son of Pulakesin I.

The earliest temple in the "temple-city" of Aihole—which should be regarded as part of "Greater Badami"—is the so-called "Lad Khan temple", a misnomer for the Hindu temple of Suryanarayana. The early archaeologists, Henry Cousens, Percy Brown and Ananda Coomaraswamy, were carried away by its cave-like features, and attributed it to the middle of the 5th century A.D. (A.D. 450), nearly a century earlier than its probable date, and gave the credit for its foundation, as already stated, to the ancestors of Pulakesin I. With the evidence since available, we may venture to state that it should have been constructed only after the rise to power of Pulakesin I.

Chronologically, the Durga temple comes next to the above temple. The name is meant to indicate that the temple is situated inside the fort (durga). The walls of this fort are to be found even now. This temple is peculiar in many respects. It is a Hindu temple, built of stone after the model of the earlier rock-cut Buddhist chaitya-grihas like those of Bhaja (2nd century B.C.) and Karle (1st century B.C.). The sanctum has an apsidal back. Longitudinally, the Durga temple is divided by two colonnades into a broad nave in the centre and two aisles on the sides. The sanctum is surrounded by walls which have alternately perforated stone-windows and divinities in stone installed in niches. All round the garbhagriha (the sanctum), there is a path of circumambulation, protected by a sloping slab-roof resting on pillars. In front, there is a porch resting on thick stone-pillars, whose lower halves have sculptures carved on them. There is a tower (sikhara) over the sanctum, perhaps built later, after the two main styles of Hindu temple architecture, the northern and the southern, had been evolved and come to be practised.

There is a figure of Garuda on the lintel of the doorway of the sanctum. Hence it should have been a Vishnu temple. It has to be mentioned, however, that the temples of the Early Chalukyas were not, as in later times, devoted exclusively to Saivite or to Vaishnavite deities. In this temple, both Saiva and Vaishnava deities adorn the niches of the outer walls of the sanctum and the mandapa in front.

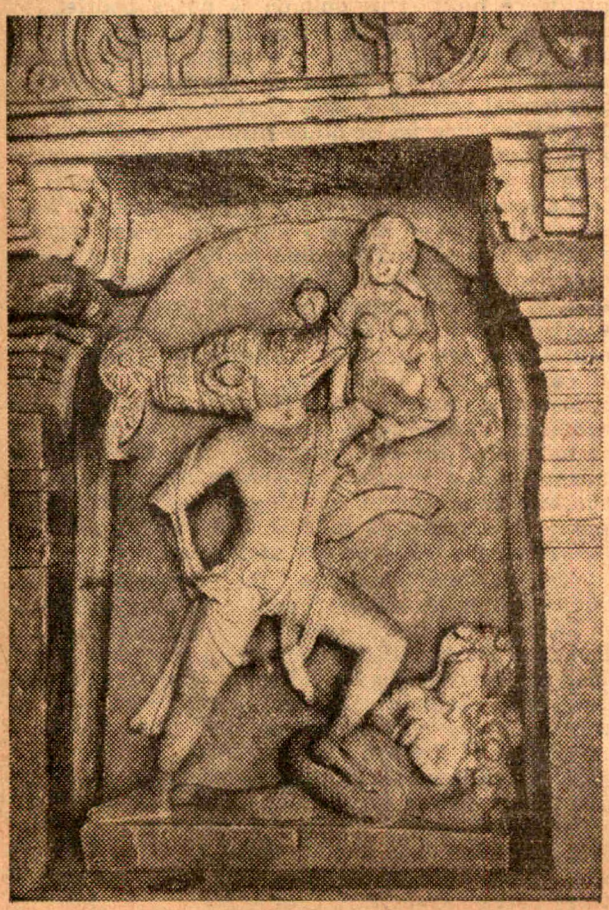
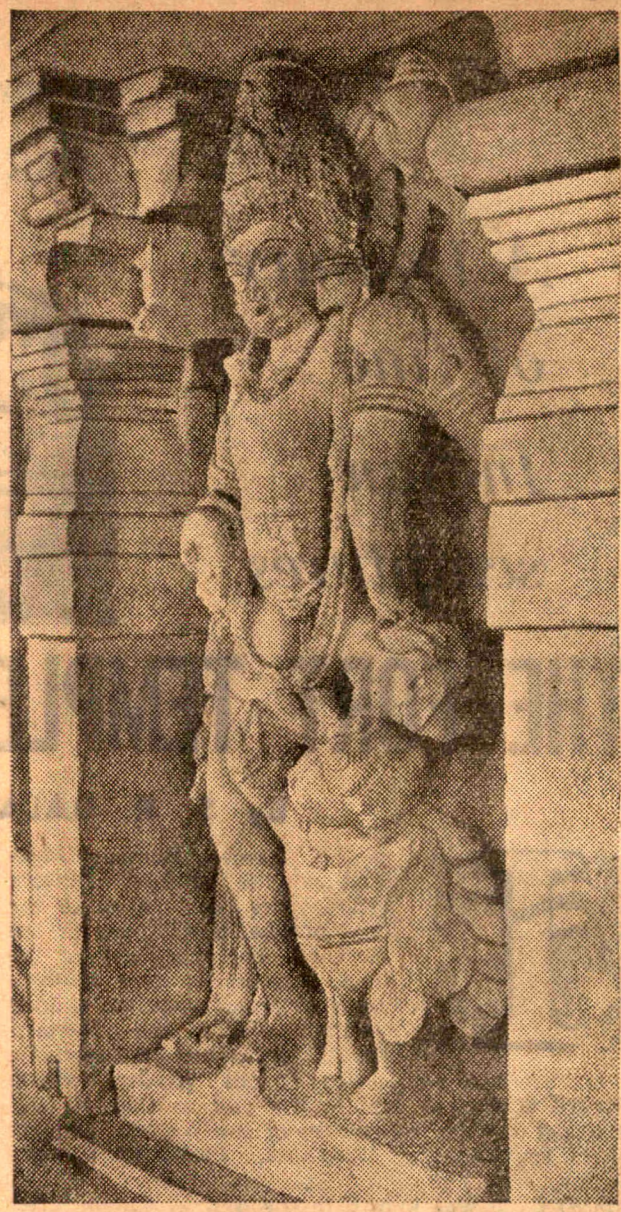
The Vaishnavite sculptures here are : Varaha-murti rescuing Prithvi (Goddess Earth); Narasimha with human form below the neck and a fierce lion-face; and two figures of Vishnu, one with four hands and the other with eight.

There is a figure of Ardhanarisvara, the complex icon of Siva and Sakti in one, symbolising the unified principle of the Supreme Powers of creation.



Varaha-avatar of Vishnu.



Vishnu (with four hands) with Garuda His vehicle.

Mahishasuramardini with Her lion vehicle engaged in the act of destroying the demon Mahishasura, and Gangavisarjanamurti (see page 57 column 2 tailpiece) depicting Siva receiving the proud and turbulent Ganga on His matted locks much to the jealousy and consternation of Parvati, and releasing Her (Ganga) from one of the locks —these sculptures are among the masterpieces of Indian Art belonging to the middle of the sixth century A.D.

The ceiling of the verandah of this temple once contained images of flying Vidyadhara couples, of exquisite workmanship. These were found lying loose in the compound of the temple, and now adorn the National Museum at New Delhi.

The ceiling of the porch has a sculpture of a coiled Naga. This feature of the decoration of the ceiling of the central hall and the porch is characteristic of Chalukyan Art, carried on further as adornments in Kakatiya and Hoysala monuments.

The outer sides of the basement of the porch contain panels of sculptures depicting scenes from the Ramayana.

The Durga temple at Aihole is one of the earliest and the finest of the Early Chalukyan temples of Western India.

TEMPLES Of MYSORE

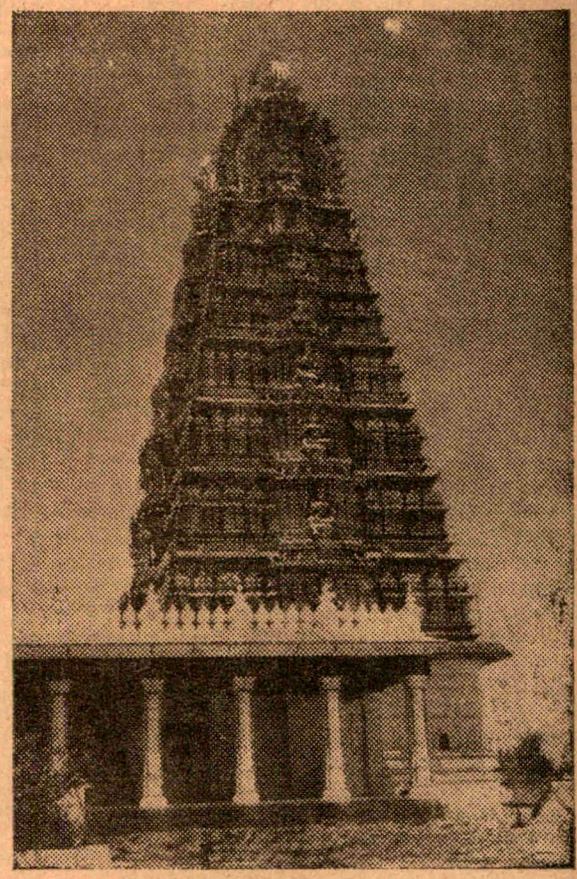
By J. C. DAS



Chamundi Temple, Mysore.

SOUTH India is a land of legendary temples. Most of these temples bear the testimony of ancient India's splendour and advancement in the fields of sculpture and architecture. Referring to the South-Indian temple architecture Paul Genthner, a French Savant, wrote: "In Dravidian art, it is not the engineering skill, but the sculptor's skill that is most important....." The details of the sculpture are very interesting, and the history of architecture of South-India reduces itself to the history of ornamentation".

It has been remarked by Fergusson, to whose genius we owe not only a wider appreciation of Indian and Eastern architecture, but also of the history of architecture itself, that "the great value of the study of these Indian examples (he has been really referring to the Halebid group of temples in this State of Mysore) is that it widens so immensely our basis for architectural criticism. It is only by becoming familiar with forms so utterly dissimilar from those we have hitherto been conversant with that we perceive how narrow is the purview that is content with one form or one passing form. By rising to the wider range, we shall perceive that architecture is as many sided as human nature itself, and learn how few feelings and how few aspirations of the human heart and brain there are that cannot be expressed by its means".

The history of sculpture and architecture of Mysore requires lengthy treatment, if they are to be dealt with in adequate fashion. So much attention is now being paid to Indian sculpture and architecture that it seems necessary to stress the point that Mysore has something unique in these spheres to offer to the critical student of Art in general and of Indian Art in particular.

The bearing of image worship on sculpture in India is so close that a few words are necessary as to the impetus that image worship gave to sculpture. It is now generally acknowledged that image worship in India is older than the time of Buddha. It has been suggested that it is contemporaneous with, if not older than, the Yoga System, which dates from a time probably anterior to Patanjali, who was only its systematiser. Patanjali lived about the 2nd century B.C. Buddha himself was a follower of Yoga before his Enlightenment. He is sculpturally represented in the Gandhara School as an emaciated person, almost dying under the stress of the austerities he practised. Patanjali himself gives an idea as to the images which were commonly in use in his time. In his Mahabhashya, he says:— "What about such likenesses as of Siva, Skanda, and Vishaka, which are known as Siva, Skanda and Vishaka, and not as Sivaka, Skandaka, and Vishakala?"

Images of gods, as they laugh, cry, sing, dance, perspire, crack etc., are referred to in the Adhbuta Brahmana, part of Shadvimsa Brahmana, a supplement to the Panchavimsa Brahmana. Dr. Bollenson thinks that images of the gods are clearly referred to in Vedic hymns. "Indians", he says, "did not merely in imagination assign human forms to their gods, but also represented them in a sensible manner". Image worship seems to have become common in the time of Yaska. In his Nirukta, he considers "the forms of the gods". "One mode of representation in the hymns makes them resemble men; for, they are praised and addressed as intelligent beings. They are also celebrated with limbs such as those of men". In the Ramayana, we have mention of temples in Lanka from which we may infer that at least in South India temples existed, where images were enshrined and worshipped.

Sculpture in Mysore, as elsewhere, may be treated under the various heads of: (1) Wood; (2) Stone; (3) Precious gems; and (4) Metals. Agamic writers add to these earth, ivory, bricks and lime. Among precious stones, crystal, diamond, cat's-eye, coral and ruby are highly valued for the purpose. For images set up permanently in Brahmanic temples or in Buddhist or Jain Chaityas, stone has been generally used. There are occasional instances of wood being used for them, but in that case, the images are periodically renewed, the old ones being either buried deep in the earth or thrown into the sea with due solemnity. The gods and goddesses of village folk are usually made of wood, though even in their case there has been in recent times a tendency to replace them by stone. Occasionally they are made of brick and mortar. In the temples of the 15th century and thereafter, the decoration of the Vimana part has invariably been by means of brick and chunam sculpture. Metal is rarely employed in the making of images intended as permanent fixtures in Brahmanic temples, though very occasional instances are not wanting of their use for such purposes, especially where the permanently fixed stone image has been desecrated or mutilated and another in stone has not been got ready to take its place. Metal, however, has been generally used for casting images for processional purposes. Such an image is called the utsava vigraha, or the image for festive occasions. There is evidence to believe that the art of metal casting has been long known in South India. At least it is older than the 10th century A.D., if we are to believe that the inscriptions of Raja-Raja and Rajendrachola, both of whom are known as the conquerers of parts of Mysore. In fact, both of them specially patronised the temple of Pidariyar in Kotar, now known as Kolaramma, and especially endowed it, while Rajendrachola had the brick-parts rebuilt in stone.

Mahishasura, Mysore

MAINLY BUDDHIST

There is reason to believe that the sculptural work of Mysore upto the beginning of the 3rd century B.C. was mainly Buddhist. Little of it has, however, survived to our times. Under the Satakarnis (1st and 2nd century A.D.), Buddhist worship began to decline, though it still shared with Brahmans the devotion of the people. The Kadambas (3rd to 6th century A.D.) who succeeded the Satakarnis were avowedly Brahmans in origin and the earliest known temples in the State are connected with them. Jainism, however, competed for supremacy with both Buddhism and Brahmanism from very early times, and succeeded during the Ganga times (2nd to 11th century A.D.) in firmly establishing itself, in the land. Buddhism lingered on to the 12th century A.D., while Brahmanism which lay dormant during the period of the Gangas, slowly gained strength during the time of Rashtrakuta, Chalukya and Chola domination in Mysore, and finally asserted itself during the Hoysala period.

The kings of the Hoysala dynasty (11th to 14th century) were, however, staunch Jains upto the time of Vishnu-Vardhana (1111-1141 A.D.), and favoured much the Jain religion, but after his conversion to the Brahmanic faith, the latter, especially Vaishnavism, gained considerable strength and spread over the country. The later Buddhists of Mysore, as elsewhere, used in their worship images as much as the Jains and the Brahmans, and the adherents of the three religions drew on a common stock of symbolism in the same way as in early times. The Buddhist statuary of the 12th century, for instance is almost indentical with that of the Brahmanic temples of the period. The Jain statues, are, however, distinguishable from the Brahman by their nudity, but the accessions of both do not differ widely. The Rashtrakuta sculpture found in Mysore bears close affinity to early classical art as represented in the Kailasha temple at Ellora. The Chalukya kings, their generals and ministers (10th to 12th century) built and endowed many temples in their State, and they developed a style of architecture which goes after their name. The later Kadambas, who were their feudatories, closely followed their style. In fact, most of the monuments in the Chalukyan style are connected with this line of kings. Its chief characteristic is elaborate ornamentation. A development of this style, peculiar to Mysore and the outlying parts of Madras Presidency close to it, is the Hoysala style, which is represented by many fine examples in the State ranging from the 11th to 14th century. This style is specially noted for its rich friezes, crowded with thousands of figures, often worked out in the most elaborate and delicate manner. The Cholas (11th century) introduced the Southern (or Dravidian) style of architecture with which they were most familiar in their homelands.

The principal specimens of the Dravidian style in Mysore are the temples at Terakanambi, Gundlupet Taluk, which date from a period anterior to Krishna Raya of the Vijayanagar Dynasty (1509-1530); the Sriranganath temple at Srirangapatam, the Nanjundesvara temple at Nanjangud and the Chamundesvari temple on the Chamundi hill near Mysore. On the imposing gopuras attached to these temples of the Mysore-royal family, the first probably belongs to the 15th century, or may be older; the other two are modern, that at Chamundi being built in 1827, and the one at Nanjangud, apparently, about 1845. The temples at Halsur (16th century), Melkote, Talkad (1100 A.D.) Tirumukudlu-Narasipur (1100 A.D.), Ramanathapur and other places may be mentioned as effective illustrations of temples in this style. The Nandisvara temple at Nandi, architecturally the first and most ornate of Dravidian temples in the State, goes back to the 8th century A.D. The temples of Kolar and Kaivara (11th and 12th century) belong to this style. The Binnamangala temple, dating from the time of Kulottunga Chola I (11th century) is typical of this style in the State. The Lakshminarasimha temple at Doddadalivatta (Tumkur District) is one of the largest temples in the State in this style. The Somesvara temple on the Nidugal Durga, is another fine structure in this style. It was probably founded in 1292 A.D. Its more noteworthy features are its carved doorway and its beautifully sculptured navaranga.

The temple of Vidyasankara at Sringeri is another well designed and effective building in this style. It resembles the temple at Vijayanagar and belongs to the reign of Bukka I (1356 A.D.). As Burgess remarks, the earlier Dravidian structures had lions or yalis and elephants placed as supports for pillars; and these were gradually enlarged, made affixes to pilasters or pillars and the animal forms multiplied and conventionalised with riders and human and other figures introduced as supporters or attendants, until about the 14th century or earlier they had obtained a permanent place in the architecture. At a later date figures of gods, demons and patrons or donors sometimes took their places. Well-known examples of these occur in the famous temples of Vellore, Madura, Vijayanagar and Rameswaram. In this State, the best examples of these later innovations are to be seen at the Aghoresvara temple at Ikkeri, Hanumantha mantapa at Terakanambi (1640 A.D.), the double temple of Rameswara and Virabhadra at Keladi etc.

In Mysore there exist also a few caves and cave temples. Their age is not certain. The inner sanctuary of the Hidimbesvara temple at Chitaldrug is carved out of a single rock. The figure of Hidimba, the Rakshasa who was killed by Bhima, one of the Pandava brothers, is sculptured on the Vimana. The Anklematha at Chitaldrug is noted for its caves which form a perfect labyrinth consisting of rooms of various sizes at different levels. They are approached by a good stone staircase. The shrines, lingas, baths and pedestals, the last apparently for Yogasana, may be of recent origin, but the caverns no doubt existed long before. When and for what purpose they were originally formed or occupied is unknown. At the Panchalinga cave, near the entrance, is an inscription, which says that the tirtha of the five lingas was established by the Pandavas and that Perumala Deva Dannayaka, the minister of the Hoysala King Narasimha III and others joined in making a grant of land to it. The temple of Gangadharesvara at Sivaganga is a large cave sheltered by a huge overhanging boulder with cells all round. The caves on the Bettadapura hill and near the Anjaneya temple close to it are irregular shaped and dark. The double linga to be seen in them, one placed in front of the other, on a single pitha or seat, is specially noteworthy because of its unusual character. The Virabhadra temple on the Nandi hill is in a large cave near the fort gate, the overhanging boulder being about 70 feet high. The Gopinatha temple on the Gopinatha hill is in a large cave sheltered by a gigantic boulder measuring 100' x 60' x 70'. On the Tyakal hill, the cave known as Bhima's Gardi (Gymnasium), is a magnificent one measuring 150' x 70' x 50', the approach to it being very difficult.

BLEND OF STYLES

The influence of the dominant Hoysala style on later Dravidian architecture as known in this State is manifest in many temples, during the period of Vijayanagar ascendancy and even later. The most notable example of this is the Vidyasankara temple at Sringeri (1356 A.D.) which is such a blend of the two styles that it is difficult to say to which style it belongs, though there is mistakable evidence of its Dravidian parentage. Another is the Aghoresvara temple at Ikkeri and the Gopalakrishna temple at Krishnarajasagara. The Gopal Krishna temple at Nonavinkere is a three-celled temple (or trikutachala) in the Dravidian style.

In the Hoysala style, called a sub-variety of Chalukyan style, a new development of the Chalukyan style is seen. All the temples in this style are to be found in Mysore State, and were built entirely during the period of Hoysala rule.

The temples at Belur, Halebid and Somanathpur are doubtless regarded as master-pieces of the Hoysala style. These temples stand unrivalled for their sculpture as well.

The Kesava temple at Belur, Hassan District, was caused to be built by Vishnu Vardhana in 1117 A.D. to commemorate his conquests. A complete description of this temple, with numerous plates and full notes on its architectural and sculptural peculiarities, will be found by the interested reader in a monograph devoted to it in the Mysore Archaeological Series. The figure sculpture on the eastern gateway is characteristically Vaishnava with the figures of Hanuman and Garuda, Narasimha killing Hiranyakasipa and Varaha killing Hiranyaksha. The rail to the right of the east entrance illustrates briefly the story of the Mahabharata, upto the Salya-Parva. The frieze on the creeper depicts scenes from the Ramayana. The same frieze exhibits here and there exquisitely carved tiny seated figures playing on musical instruments. Above the rail come pierced stone windows or perforated screens surmounted by the caves. They are twenty in number and form a charming feature of this beautiful temple. Ten of them are sculptured with Puranic scenes, and the rest decorated with geometrical designs. Around the temple, on its walls, there are eight large images, of gods and goddesses, which extort admiration. Inside this temple, the sculptural work is even finer. The figure of Kesava—or Vijaya Narayana as it is called in the inscriptions—is a very handsome one. The pillars of the navaranga (central hall) are artistically executed. They are in three different sizes, and the arrangement of the pillars enhances the beauty of the structure. Two other pillars here deserve special notice. The well-known Narasimha pillar, which apparently used formerly to revolve, is marvellously carved with minute figures all round from the base to the capital. One of the figures, a tiny bull, is known as Kadalebasava, because it is of the size of a seed of the Bengal gram (Kadale). The representation at Belur of the Seven Mother goddesses, female counter-parts of the gods, who took part in Siva's conquest of Andhakasura, is an impressive one. These are: Brahmani, Mahesvari, Kaumari, Vaishnavi, Varahi, Indrani and Chamunda.

Darpana Darsini in Belur, Mysore State

The temple of Kappe Chennigaraya, within the enclosure of the Kesava temple, is equally noteworthy for its fine sculpture. The Vira Narayana temple to the west of the Kesava temple has numerous finely sculptured figures of the leading Brahmanic gods. The temple of the goddess Andal, north-west of the Kesava temple, has sculptured images on its outer walls, the canopies over which show elegant workmanship. The temple of the Alvars, in the enclosure, is specially noteworthy for the frieze representing scenes from the Ramayana which it contains. Describing the sculptural beauty of the Belur temples, Fergusson, in his Architecture in Mysore and Dharwar, bestows very high praise on them. "There are," he says, "many buildings in India which are unsurpassed for delicacy of detail by any in the world, but the temples of Belur and Halebid surpass even these for freedom of handling and richness of fancy."

The exact date of erection of the Halebid temple is not known, but it has been set down, with good reason, to about 1141 A.D. Probably it was begun in the reign of Vishnu Vardhana and continued in that of his son Narasimha I. It is a double temple, dedicated to Hoysalesvara and Banchikesvara. Again the author has to quote Fergusson with regard to the architectural and sculptural peculiarities of the Hoysalesvara temple at Halebid: "The great temple at Halebid if it had been completed, is one of the buildings on which the advocate of Hindu architecture would desire to take his stand." The general arrangements of the temple are that it is a double temple. If it were cut into halves each part would be complete, with a pillared porch of the same type as that at Belur, an emblem of Siva.

ELEPHANTS

The buildings stand on a terrace, ranging from five to six feet in height, and paved with large slabs. On this stands a frieze of elephants, following all the sinuosities of the plan and extending to some 710 feet in length, and containing not less than 2,000 elephants, most of them with riders and trappings, sculptured as only an oriental can represent the wisest of brutes. Above these is a frieze of Sardulas or conventional tigers, the emblems of the Hoysalas, who built the temple. Then comes a scroll of infinite beauty and variety of design; over this a frieze of horsemen and another scroll, over which is a bas-relief of scenes from the Ramayana, representing the conquest of Ceylon and all the varied incidents of that epic. Then come celestial beasts and celestial birds, and all along the east front a frieze of groups from human life, and then a cornice, with a rail, divided into panels, each containing two figures. Over this are windows of pierced slabs, like those of Belur, though not so rich or varied. In the centre in place of the windows, is first a scroll and then a frieze of gods and heavenly apsaras, dancing girls and other objects of Hindu mythology. Siva, with his consort Parvati seated on his knee, is repeated at least fourteen times; Vishnu in his nine avataras even oftener. Brahma occurs three or four times, and every great god of the Hindu pantheon finds his place. Some of these are carved with a minute elaboration of detail, which can only be reproduced by photography, and, as Fergusson rightly says, "may probably be considered as one of the most marvellous exhibitions of human labour to be found even in the patient East." Fergusson continues : "If it were possible to illustrate the Halebid temple to such an extent as to render its peculiarities familiar, there would be few things more interesting or more instructive than to institute a comparison between it and the Parthenon at Athens....." Numerous images of gods and goddesses would be found at this temple, and the existence of Gana Gopala (variety of Krishna image), Govarhanadhara Krishna, Kshetrapala (the protector of cities and villages), Vrishabhavahanamurti (the most popular representation of Siva), Gajasurasamharamurti, representing the destruction of an elephant asura by Siva and his wearing the skin of the elephant, etc., etc. are worth-mentioning.

Around Belur and Halebid temples there also exist a number of notable temples, amongst which mention may be made of Chennakesava temple at Belur (Ravananugrahamurti, representing Siva and Parvati on Mount Kailas, being lifted by Ravana, and also an image of Varaha) and Nritta-Ganapati Hoysalesvara Temple at Halebid.

THREE-CELLED

Somnathpur, or Vidyanidhi-Prasanna-Somanathpura, according to inscriptions, is situated about twenty miles to the south-east of Srirangapatam in Mysore State. It lies on the left bank of Cauvery. The Kesava temple at Somnathpur is an excellent example of the Hoysala style of architecture, its sculpture being, according to Fergusson, more perfect than that of the fascinating temples at Belur and Halebid. The temple, which measures 215 feet by 177, is a trikutachala or three-celled temple. An image of Kesava once occupied the cell opposite the entrance and gave the name to the temple. The other two, which are opposite to each other, face north and south respectively. The original image of Kesava in the central shrine is not available now, and in its place a modern image has been installed. The north has the image of Janardhana and the south that of Gopala. The temple, which resembles the famous Kedaresvara temple at Halebid, stands on a raised platform which is supported at the angles by figures of twelve elephants facing outwards. Round the exterior base are portrayed interesting events from the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, and the Bhagavatapurana. The Panchalinga and Lakshminarasimha temples are respectively to the east and south-west of the Kesava temple.

With the silent displacement of the Hoysala by the Vijayanagar dynasty, the Dravidian style of architecture became once again predominant in the land. The resuscitation of this style resulted in the erection of many temples in that style in the State. The newly built temple of Sarada at Sringeri at this place shows great skill in modern sculptural work. The temple at Virupakshipura in Kolar District, perhaps, the largest temple in the State, was built during the reign of Deva Raya II (1419-1446 A.D.). It has a Parvati shrine, which is unique in having the figure of a lion in front of it, just like Nandi in front of Siva temples.

One of the best examples of the influence of Hoysala art in temples built in the Dravidian style, as already stated, is the Aghoresvara temple at Ikkeri, the second capital of the Keladi kings. Also as stated earlier, the Gopalakrishna temple at Krishnaraja Sagara (Kannambadi) is still another instance of a Dravidian Temple with Hoysala features about it. The image of Gopalakrishna is beautifully carved. This temple is said to have been enlarged by Narasa Raja Wodeyar, son of Raja Wodeyar (1578-1617). The double temple of Rameswara and Virabhadra at Keladi belongs to the Vijayanagar times. The gandabherunda ceiling of this temple is a remarkable piece of sculpture. It is conceived in the best classical Indian style and is, perhaps, one of the few examples of its kind in the State. The ceiling in the navaranga of the Someswara temple at Magadi is well sculptured on all the sides with figures of animals, etc., some of the panels showing skilful combinations of birds, men and beasts. The Grudastambha before the Soumyakesava temple at Nagamangala, a temple in the Hoysala style, is one of the finest in the State.

During the period of the Vijayanagar Kings, the custom of engraving labels descriptive of figure sculpture was continued. Thus in the Janandhana temple at Sringeri is a stone on which are small figures of Brahma, etc., with labels giving their names. In the Melkote temple on the four pillars in the Mondapa of the Lakshmidevi temple, are engraved notes explaining the sculptures to which they relate. The practice was perpetuated by the Mysore Kings down to a late period. There are, for instance, thirteen short inscription on a pillar in the Tirukachchinambi temple at the Melkote temple, five of which are on the pedestals of the images representing Krishna Raja Wodeyar and his four queens.

There are many examples of good workmanship in brass, copper, bronze, etc., in the temples of the State. The best of this kind of work is to be found chiefly in connection with the processional images. During the periods of Hoysala and Vijayanagar ascendancy, the custom of presenting cast metallic images to the temples received even greater sanction and the tradition was kept up by the kings of the Mysore royal line upto the most recent times. A number of metallic images, presented by Sri Krishna Raja Wodeyar III in 1829, are to be seen in the Prasanna Krishnaswami temple at Mysore. These images represent various Vaishnava deities and saints and sages of Southern India. The Lakshmivaradaraja temple at Terakanambi contains a number of metallic images of gods and goddesses belonging to several of the ruined temples at the place. The fine metallic image in the sanctuary of this temple itself was presented to it by Sri Krishna Raja Wodeyar III. This temple has also metallic images of child Krishna and child Balarama and of Yasoda suckling Krishna. Sri Krishna Raja Wodeyar III also brass-plated the doorway of the Mahabhutesvara temple on the Chamundi Hill near Mysore. In the Gangadharesvara temple at Seringapatam is a very handsome metallic image of Dakshinamurti used for processional purposes.

Most temples in the State possess jewellery, gold, and silver plates and vessels, bells of various kinds, vehicles of different sizes, brass and copper utensils, large and small, and many miscellaneous articles made of metals of different kinds. The jewels of the goddess Sarada, at Sringeri, for instance, are of very great value, made of solid gold and set with diamonds, rubies and other precious stones. There are also numerous pearl necklaces with fine pendants set with precious stones. The famous jewel at Melkote, known as the Rajmundi, a golden crown, set with jewels, was presented to it by Raja Wodeyar (1578-1617) whose image about 1½ feet high, standing with folded hands, with the name inscribed on the base, is to be seen in one of the pillars of the navaranga of the Narayanaswami temple at Melkote. It is said that Raja Wodeyar was much attached to the Melkote temple, whose sanctum, tradition says, he entered on the day of his death, and was seen no more afterwards. The other jewels at Melkote date from the days of Krishna Raja Wodeyar III. The Nanjangud temple, likewise, owns many silver articles, gold vehicles, vessels, and ornaments, set with precious stones.

The beautifying effects of painting were well understood from very early times and, the customary modes pertaining to it were fairly uniformly followed by the builders of temples and maths in this State during successive centuries.

There exist still innumerable temples at this treasure-state of India, all of which, if described in detail, will form a voluminous publication. The temples of Mysore, famous not only for their mystic history but also for their sculpture and architecture, were doubtless being, and, if maintained properly, will also be considered, for ever a paradise of mythologists, historians, students and research scholars of sculpture and architecture, saints and sanyasins, tourists and journalists, and thinkers and lovers of all walks of life. The temples of Mysore are the pride of India.

MAHA-ASHTAMI AT SEA

by LOKESH GHATAK

"EE here Mister Mate," said our German Captain to me on the bridge that morning after droping the Pilot at Suez Bay, "I work Hansa Line twenty years before war, sail with plenty Indian crew. This only one Indian festival we give for holiday at sea, see you, it is the Idd".

"Even of that festival," I said gloomily, "There are two. If you won't give a holiday to the men, you won't. They all came up here to see me early in the morning, that's all."

"Ho! You think I cut up rough like the Captain Bligh, hein? You think I make trouble for my men? Then there's mutiny?"

"Oh, you need'nt fly off the handle, they're used to doing without any holidays at sea."

"But you do not like it. Because you do not comprehend. There is the discipline to be considered, rules must be rules. See you, I will go and bring my note book and show, you."

He went into his day-room and presently came out with a small, weather-beaten, brownish coloured note book. He opened it at a page and held it under my nose. I was surprised to see that the entries were made in English, and one particular line was underlined in red.

"This book," the Captain said with a grin, looking sideways at me, "He is given to me by my English friend from B.I. whom we carry as passenger one trip. Look what is written."

I looked. The underlined sentence read: "The most important festival for them is the 'Idl-Fitre', when they will break their month old fast, and be sure not only to give them a holiday on that day but also extra rations of meat, flour and ghee"

The Light dawned on me. "But Captain! I remember now ..... I was only a cadet then. Your Hansa Line ships before the war carried Afghani crew in the Engine Room only, as stokers! They are Muslims. Our lads on this ship are all Hindus, except the Saloon Crew who are Christians. And some of the Officers are Muslims, Parsees Christians, Hindus and all sorts."

"Hindus, huh?" The Captain stroked his chin for a while. Then he said. I have it! "I have something for this contingency also, have no fear". He promptly went inside and brought out another book. This was a printed manual, in German, issued by the Hansa Line many years ago.

"I will translate for you," said the Captain: "When the Hindu is in the crew you will please to give the Divali as Holiday. That's right, I remember now. It is Divali and not ..... this what do you call it?"

"Maha-Ashtami".

"Manastatami. There is no such festival. The men. ....." and he drew up his full four foot and three to look up at me, "are, how you say, trying to pull your legs. They're bluffing you! But they can't bluff an old sea-dog like me, eh?"

"But Captain, we observe this festival at home ourselves! Why, it's the biggest day of the Pujas, which end in another festival called Dashami, better known in the rest of India as 'Dussera".

"Dussera, Dussera! Now where have I heard that word before? Wait." He went inside again and after a few minutes came out with the current year's diary, a gift from our Company, one to each Officer on the eve of our departure from Hamburg on the ship's maiden voyage under an Indian Flag twenty one days ago.

"I have it! Yes, Dussera. That is a holiday. Of course, it is printed here. The men shall have it. And also extra rations of meat, flour and ghee. Like Divali. That is also entered here. How many holidays do you have? If this is only for Hindus, then which are the other ones for Muslims, Christians Parsees, Sikhs, Jains, Budhists, ... how many kinds of people do you have in your country?

How do Indian ships work cargo and sail? How many times extra meat, flour and ghee?

"Where are the store rooms to keep the extra food? The new owners never told me about this," he grumbled. Then, looking at me still through the corner of his eyes, he added, "But there's no 'Mastamtamie' written here."

Spying our Bengali Serang Mukherjee patiently trying to follow our conversation, standing in a corner on the deck below, I raised my voice slightly and said, "You see, Captain, there is a festival called Durga Puja, lasting for four days, and ending with the ceremony of 'Dussera' when the idols are immersed. That last one is the only day observed in the rest of India except Bengal, and this diary which you have got was printed in Bombay. Now our men on this ship were all recruited at the Calcutta Shipping Office, and so naturally almost all of them are Bengali Hindus. Maha-Ashtami is the biggest religious festival in Bengal besides Kali Puja, which is the same as Divali. These boys want a day off, they don't want any extra rations." These last few words I uttered looking straight at the Serang who was in my direct line of vision, and who now winced at me. "They can have their extra rations on Dussera and Divali days." The Serang's face resumed its normal expression.

... "What? No feast? I mean no 'Burra Khana'? —— see how I quickly pick up my urdu. Do they just want to pray on this day, then?" The Captain seemed curious now to learn more about our strange habits, "You mean, they will pray ——" I said, uncomfortably, "Well, no, they won't actually pray. I mean it is a day for rejoicing and all that, recalling Rama's victory over Ravana and the conquest of Lanka and so on ....."

A small power boat appearing fast from the starboard bow helped me in avoiding further discussions on the subject as I began to give helm-orders to the quarter-master and the Captain, after making a note of the two names, Rama and Ravana, in his diary, slipped back into his cabin. I knew, of course, that the day was won for the men now, so I waved a hand to dismiss Mukherjee, who lost no time in sending the galley boy galloping down to the crews' quarters to break the glad tidings.
But my ordeal was not quite over yet.

At breakfast, about an hour later, the Captain announced: "My Steward says there is no such person called Rama or any Ravana."

"Your Steward said that?" Having a brand new crew on board and the voyage having begun soon after I myself had arrived at Hamburg, I did not have any chance yet to get fully acquainted with all members of the crew. The Captain was gazing fixedly at nothing in particular out of the port hole.

"What's his name?"

"George."

"George? But he's no right to go about saying a thing like that. It might upset the crew, turn them against him. I've never known a Goan to hold such views."

"Is he a Goan?" asked the Captain with considerable interest. "Three of our ships had scuttled in Mormagao Harbour during War and a number of my friends were in them. They stayed in Goa all through. Is lively place, Goa, no? But no Rama and no Ravana. 'Mantatami' is not for all India. Why ship, that is all-India, have holiday?"

Our Chief Steward, who was hovering about the pantry, came up behind me, bent his neck over my ears and whispered hoarsely, "George is not a Goan, Sir. His name is George Goonatilaka. He and the pantryman are Ceylonese." The Chief Steward was a Goan.

"Oh," I said, relieved, "They're Ceylonese, are they. You see, Captain, it's rather a curious thing: although the episodes of the Ramayana are not exactly historical, legendary really, but Indians believe in them implicitly. But in Ceylon, the island most concerned in bringing about the denouement, to the tale, has no legends concerning Rama's conquest of their island or the existence of a demon king there called Ravana. They don't learn these things in their school text books like we do in ours"

"But he said worse things," said the Captain darkly.

"What worse things?"

"He said the whole story was nothing but Aryan conspiracy."

"Good Heavens!" I exclaimed, "are we carrying a bunch of intellectual anarchists in the Saloon Department?"

But the Captain took no notice of me and continued in an injured voice: "Why must you also have Aryan Conspiracy in India, this I like to know. You been Germany before. You say so to me. What you see in Hamburg, Bremen, Bremmerhaven? Desert. Jungle of ruin. This result of Aryan Conspiracy. Why you want that in India?"

The Chief Engineer, at the other end of the table, bent forward on his elbows and said: "I am a Jew, Captain, a Bene-Israelite from Poona. Did'nt you know my name was Levi?" The Captain looked at him silently for a minute or two and said: "When you have your holiday, Chief?" and then asked pleasantly, "When do I have to give you extra meat, flour and ghee?"

The Chief looked disgustedly at the Captain..... one must remember that they hold equal ranks on a ship as technical heads of departments..... and retorted: "You start fraternising with a bunch of stewards and what not! Just try and be guided by what the Mate says, for Chrissake."

"Yet he swears by our Lord," said the Captain, who was a devout Catholic.

I tried to explain to the Captain, patiently, the secular nature of India and why only the three major community's principal religious occasions were declared public holidays as otherwise no office or industry could run on account of absenteeism. Men belonging to other communities, if they absented themselves on their own religious holidays, would not lose their pay and at the same time their absence from work would not markedly hamper productive work. But on his ship, as it happened, the majority of the crew belonged to a particular community whose 'Big Day' of the year was this, and so today the ship wanted a holiday. But I could see that the Captain was not listening. He was gazing vacantly at me. When I stopped speaking, he asked: "Why Aryan conspiracy?"

Breakfast having now being eaten, I said: "Let us, with your permission, call Mr. George Goonatilaka now to the Saloon, and ask him what he meant by it."

The Captain merely nodded his head. He was still apparantly thinking of the ruins of Hamburg, Bremen and Bremmerhaven.

Goonatilaka arrived. He was even shorter than the Captain, a shy subdued looking young man, not at all any body's idea of a budding fire-eating anarchist.

"Sir, please Sir," he said in a whimpering voice. "I never said conspiracy, Sir", "What you said," said the Captain, "means to me the same as conspiracy in German. Made up story to fool people." George turned to me and said, "Sir, please Sir," Captain read the names of Rama and Ravana from his note book and asked me who they were. I said they were a Hindoo God and a Demon, but we did'nt believe in them. He asked, 'Because you are a Chirstian?' I said 'No, Sir, but because there is no mention of any conquest of Ceylon before
